DISSIMULATION, the act of dissembling. It has been distinguished from simulation thus: Simulation is making a thing appear which does not exist; dissimulation is keeping that which exists from appearing. Moralists have observed, that all dissimulation is not hypocrisy. A vicious man, who endeavors to throw a veil over his bad conduct, that he may escape the notice of men, is not in the strictest sense of the word a hypocrite, since a man is no more obliged to proclaim his secret vices than any other of his secrets. The hypocrite is one who dissembles for a bad end, and hides the snare that he may be more sure of his prey; and, not content with a negative virtue, or not appearing the ill man he is, makes a show of positive virtue, and appears the man he is not. (See HYPOCRISY.)—Buck.

DISSOLUTION; death, or the separation of the body and soul. The "dissolution of the world" is an awful event which we have reason to believe, both from the Old Testament and the New, will certainly take place. 1. It is not an incredible thing, since nothing of a material nature is formed for perpetual duration. 2. It will doubtless be under the direction of the Supreme Being, as its creation was. 3. The soul of man will remain unhurt amidst this general dissolution. 4. It will be an introduction to a greater and nobler system in the government of God. 2 Pet. 3: 13. 5. The consideration of it ought to have a great influence on us while in the present state. 2 Pet. 3: 11, 12. (SEE CONFLAGRATION.)—Hend. Buck.

DIVAN. (SEE BEDS.)

DIVERSION. (SEE RECREATION.)

DIVINATION, is a conjecture or surmise formed concerning some future event from something which is supposed to be a presage of it; but between which there is no real connexion, only what the imagination of the diviner is pleased to assign in order to deceive.

Divination of all kinds being the offspring of credulity, nursed by imposture, and strengthened by superstition, was necessarily an occult science, retained in the hands of the priests and priestesses, the magi, the soothsayers, the augurs, the visionaries, the priests of the oracles, the false prophets, and other like professors, till the coming of Jesus Christ, when the light of the gospel dissipated much of this darkness. The vogue for these pretended sciences and arts is nearly past, at least in the enlightened parts of the world. There are nine different kinds of divination mentioned in Scripture, and condemned as involving an idolatrous departure from the true God. These are, 1. Those whom Moses calls Meonen, from Anan, a cloud. Dent. 18: 10.—2. Those whom the prophet calls, in the same place, Menacheseh, which the Vulgate and generality of interpreters render Augur.—3. Those who in the same place are called Mecaseph, which the Septuagint and Vulgate translate, "a man given to ill practices."—4. Those whom in the same chapter, (v. 11), he calls Hkober.—5. Those who consult the spirits, called Python.—6. Witches, or magicians, called Judeeni.—7. Necromancers, who consult the dead.—8. Such as consult staves, (Hosea 4: 12); called by some Rhodomancy.—9. Hepatoscopy, or the consideration of the liver.

Different kinds of divination have passed for sciences. We have had, 1. Aeromancy, divining by the air.—2. Astrology, by the heavens.—3. Angury, by the flight and singing of birds, &c.—4. Chiromancy, by inspecting the hand.—5. Geomancy, by observing of cracks or clefts in the earth.—6. Haruspicy, by inspecting the bowels of animals.—7. Horoscopy, a branch of astrology, marking the position of the heavens when a man is born.—8. Hydromancy, by water.—9. Pyromancy, a divination made by fire. Thus we see what arts have been practised to deceive, and how designing men have made use of all the four elements to impose upon weak minds. The entire superiority of the Bible to all these forms of superstitions, is one among the many evidences of divine inspiration, which unbelievers will do well to consider.—Hend. Buck.

DIVINE; something relating to God. The word is also used figuratively for any thing that is excellent, extraordinary, and that seems to go beyond the power of nature and the capacity of man. It also applied to a minister or clergyman.—Hend. Buck.

DIVINITY; the science of theology. (See THEOLOGY, and ANALYSIS OF THEOLOGY.)—Hend. Buck.

DIVISION OF THE EARTH. The prophecy of Noah, says Dr. Hales, was uttered long after the deluge. It evidently alludes to a divine decree for the orderly division of the earth among the three primitive families of his sons, because it notices the "tents of Shem" and the "enlargement of Japheth," Genesis 9:20—27. This decree was probably promulgated about the same time by the venerable patriarch. The prevailing tradition of such a decree for this three-fold division of the earth, is intimated both in the Old and New Testament. Moses refers to it, as handed down to the Israelites, "from the days of old, and the years of many generations; as they might learn from their fathers and their elders," and further, as conveying a special grant of the land of Palestine, to be the lot of the twelve tribes of Israel:—

"When the Most High divided to the nations their settlements,
When he separated the sons of Adam,
He assigned the boundaries of the people [of Israel]
According to the number of the sons of Israel:
For the portion of the Lord is his people,
Jacob is the lot of his inheritance." Deut. 32: 7—9.

And this furnishes an additional proof of the justice of the expulsion of the Canaanites, as usurpers, by the Israelites, the rightful possessors of the land of Palestine, under Moses, Joshua, and their successors, when the original grant was renewed to Abraham, Gen. 15: 13—21. And the knowledge of this divine decree may satisfactorily account for the panic terror with which the devoted nations of Canaan were struck at the miraculous passage of the Red sea by the Israelites and approach to their confines, so finely described by Moses:—

"The nations shall hear [this] and tremble,
Sorrow shall seize the inhabitants of Palestine;
Then shall the dukes of Edom be amazed,
Dismay shall possess the princes of Moab,
The inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away:
Fear and terror shall fall upon them,
By the greatness of thine arm they shall be petrified,
Till thy people pass over [Jordan] O Lord,
Till the people pass over, whom thou hast redeemed."

Exodus 15: 14—16.

St. Paul, also, addressing the Athenians, refers to the same decree, as a well-known tradition in the heathen world: "God made of one blood every nation of men to dwell upon the whole face of the earth; having appointed the predetermined seasons and boundaries of their dwellings," Acts 17: 26. Here he represents mankind as all of "one blood," race, or stock, "the sons of Adam" and of Noah in succession; and the seasons and the boundaries of their respective settlements, as previously regulated by the divine appointment. And this was conformable to their own geographical allegory; that Chronus, the god of time, or Saturn divided the universe among his three sons, allotting the heaven to Jupiter, the sea to Neptune, and hell to Pluto. But Chronus represented Noah, who divided the world among his three sons, allotting the upper regions of the north to Japheth, the maritime or middle regions to Shem, and the lower regions of the south to Ham.

According to the Armenian tradition recorded by Abulfaragi, Noah distributed the habitable earth from north to south between his sons, and gave to Ham the region of the blacks, to Shem the region of the tawny, fuscorum, and to Japheth the region of the ruddy, rubrorum: and he dates the actual division of the earth in the hundred and fortieth year of Peleg, B. C. 2614, or five hundred and forty-one years after the deluge, and one hundred and ninety-one years after the death of Noah, in the following order:— "To the sons of Shem was allotted the middle of the earth, namely, Palestine, Syria, Assyria, Samaria, Singar [or Shinar,] Babel, [or Babylonia,] Persia, and Hegiaz; [of Arabia;] to the sons of Ham, Teimen, [or Idumea, Jer. 49: 7,] Africa, Nigritia, Egypt, Nubia, Ethiopia, Scindia, and India; [for India west and east of the river Indus] to the sons of Japheth, also, Garbia, [the north,] Spain, France, the countries of the Greeks, Slavonians, Bulgarians, Turks, and Armenians."

In this curious and valuable geographical chart, Armenia, the cradle of the human race, was allotted to Japheth, by right of primogeniture; and Samaria and Babel to the sons of Shem; the usurpation of these regions, therefore, by Nimrod, and of Palestine by Canaan, was in violation of the divine decree. Though the migration of the primitive families began at this time, B. C. 2614, or about five hundred and forty-one years after the deluge, it was a length of time before they all reached their respective destinations. The "seasons," as well as the "boundaries" of their respective settlements, were equally the appointment of God; the nearer countries to the original settlement being planted first, and the remoter in succession. These primitive settlements seem to have been scattered and detached from each other, according to local convenience. Even so late as the tenth generation after the flood, in Abraham's days, there were considerable tracts of land in Palestine unappropriated, on which he and his nephew, Lot, freely pastured their cattle without hindrance or molestation. That country was not fully peopled till the fourth generation after, at the exode of the Israelites from Egypt. And Herodotus represents Scythia as an uninhabited desert, until Tartorius planted the first colony there, about a thousand years, at most, before Darius Hystaspes invaded Scythia, or about B. C. 1508. The orderly settlements of the three primitive families are recorded in that most venerable and valuable geographical chart, the tenth chapter of Genesis, in which it is curious to observe how long the names of the first settlers have been preserved among their descendants, even down to the present day:—

1. Japheth, the eldest son of Noah, (Gen. 10: 21,) and his family, are first noticed, Gen. 10: 2—5. The name of the patriarch himself was preserved among his Grecian descendants, in the proverb, older than Japetus, denoting the remotest antiquity. The radical part of the word Japet, evidently expresses Japheth. (1.) Gomer, his eldest son, was the father of the Gomerians. These, spreading from the regions north of Armenia and Bactriana, (Ezek. 38: 6,) extended themselves westward over nearly the whole continent of Europe; still retaining their paternal denomination, with some slight variation, as Cimmerians, in Asia; Cimbri and Umbri, in Gaul and Italy; and Cymri, Cambri, and Cumbri, in Wales and Cumberland at the present day. They are also identified by ancient authors with the Galatæ of Asia Minor, the Gaels, Gauls, and Celtæ, of Europe, who likewise spread from the Euxine sea to the western ocean; and from the Baltic to Italy southwards, and first planted the British isles. Josephus remarks, that the Galatæ were called Gomariani, from their ancestor Gomar. See the numerous authorities adduced in support of the identity of the Gomerians and Celts by that learned and ingenious antiquary, Faber, in his "Origin of Pagan Idolatry." Of Gomer's sons, Ashkenaz appears to have settled on the coasts of the Euxine sea, which from him seems to have received its primary denomination of Azenos, nearly resembling Ashkenaz; but forgetting its etymology in process of time, the Greeks considered it as a compound term in their own language, A-zenos, signifying inhospitable: and thence metamorphosed it into Euzenos, "very hospitable." His precise settlement is represented in Scripture as contiguous to Armenia, westward; for the kingdoms of Ararat, Minui, and Ashkenaz, are noticed together, Jer. 51: 27. Riphath, the second son of Gomer, seems to have given name to the Riphean mountains of the north of Asia; and Togarmah, the third son, may be traced in the Trocmi of Strabo, the Trogmæ of Cicero, and Trogmades of the council of Chalcedon, inhabiting the confines of Pontus and Cappadocia. (2.) Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, sons of Japhet, are noticed to together by Ezekiel, as settled in the north, Ezek. 38: 2, 14, 15. And as the ancestors of the numerous Slavonic and Tartar tribes, the first may be traced in the Mongogians, Monguls, and Moguls; the second, in the Tobolski, of Siberia; and the third, Mesech, or Mosoc, in the Moschici, Moscow, and Muscovites. (3.) Madai was the father of the Medes, who are repeatedly so denominated in Scripture, 2 Kings 17: 6; Isaiah 13: 17; Jer. 51: 11; Dan. 5: 28, &c. (4.) From Javan was descended the Javanians, or Jaones, of the Greeks, and the Yavanas of the Hindus. Greece itself is called Javan by Daniel, (11: 2;) and the people Jaones, by Homer in his "Iliad." These aboriginal Jaones, of Greece, are not to be confounded, as is usually the case, with the later Jaones, who invaded and subdued the Javanian territories, and were of a different stock. The accurate Pausanias states, that the name of Iōnes, was comparatively modern, while that of Jaones is acknowledged to have been the primitive title of the barbarians, who were subdued by the Iōnes. Strabo remarks that Attica was formerly called both Ionia and Ias, or Ian; while Herodotus asserts, that the Atheians were not willing to be called Iōnes; and he derives the name from Iōn, the son of Zuth, descended from Deucalion or Noah. And this Ion is said by Eusebius to have been the ring-leader in the building of the tower of Babel, and the first introducer of idol worship, and Sabianism, or adoration of the sun, moon, and stars. This would identify Ioa with Nimrod. And the Ionians appear to have been composed of the later colonists, the Palli, Pelasgi, or roving tribes from Asia, Phœnicia and Egypt, who, according to Herodotus, first corrupted the simplicity of the primitive religion of Greece, and who, by the Hiadus, were called Yonigas, or worshippers of the yon or dove. This critical distinction between the Jaones and the Iones, the Yavaans, and the Yonigas, we owe to the sagacity of Faber. Of Javan's sons, Elishah and Dodon, may be recognised in Elis and Dodona, the oldest settlements of Greece; Kittim, in the Citiium of Macedonia, and Chittim, or maritime coasts of Greece and Italy, (Num. 24: 24;) and Tarshish, in the Tarsus of Cilicia, and Tartessus of Spain.

2. Ham and his family are next noticed, Gen. 10: 6—20. The name of the patriarch is recorded in the title frequently given to Egypt, "The land of Ham," Psalm 105: 23, &c. (1.) Of his sons, the first and most celebrated appears to have been Cush, who gave name to the land of Cush, both in Asia and Africa; the former still called Chusistan by the Arabian geographers, Susiana by the Greeks, and Cuscha Dwipa Wiluio, by the Hindus; the other, called Cuscha Dwipa Without. And the enterprising Cushim or Cuthim, of Scripture, in Asia and Europe, assumed the title of Getæ, Guitis, and Goths; and of Scuths, Scuits, and Scots; and of Sacas, Sacasenas, and Saxons. The original family settlement of Abraham was "Ur of the Chasdim," or Chaldees, (Gen. 11: 28;) who are repeatedly mentioned in Scripture, Isaiah 13: 9; Daniel 9: 1, &c. According to Faber's ingenious remark, it may more properly be pronounced Chus-dim, signifying god-like Cushites. It is highly improbable that they were so named from Chesed, Abraham's nephew, (Gen. 22: 22,) who was a mere boy, if born at all, when Abraham left Ur, and was an obscure individual, never noticed afterwards. Of Cush's sons, Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Sabtacha, and Raamah; and the sons of Raamah, Sheba, and Dedan, seem to have settled in Idumea and Arabia, from the similar names of places there; and of his descendants, Nimrod, the mighty hunter, first founded the kingdom of Babylon, and afterwards of Assyria, invading the settlements of the Shemites, contrary to the divine decree. His posterity were probably distinguished by the title of Chusdim, Isaiah 23: 13. (2.) The second son of Ham was Misr, or Mizraim. He settled in Egypt, whence the Egyptians were universally styled in Scripture, Mizraim, or Mizraites in the plural form. But the country is denominated in the east, to this day, "the land of Misr;" which, therefore seems to have been the name of the patriarch himself. The children of Misr, like their father, are denominated in Scripture by the plural number. Of these, the Ludim, and Lelabim were probably the Copto-Libyans, (Ezek. 30: 5;) the Naphthum occupied the sea-coast, which, by the Egyptians was called Nephthus: whence, probably, originated the name of the maritime god Neptune. The Pathrusim occupied a part of Lower Egypt, called from them Pathros, Isaiah 11: 11. The Capthorim and the Caslubim, whose descendants were the Philistim of Palestine, occupied the district which lies between the delta of the Nile and the southern extremity of Palestine, Deut. 2: 23; Amos 9: 7. (3.) Phut is merely noticed, without any mention of his family. But the tribes of Phut and Lud are mentioned together, with Cush, or Ethiopia, (Jer. 46: 9; Ezekiel 30: 5;) and Jerome notices a district in Libya, called Regio Phutensis, or the land of Phut. (4.) Canaan has been noticed already; and the original extent of the land of Canaan is carefully marked by Moses. Its westera border, along the Mediterranean sea, extended from Sidon, southwards, to Gaza; its southern border from thence, eastwards, to Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zebaim, the cities of the plain, afterwards covered by the Dead sea, or Asphaltite lake; its eastern border extending from thence, northwards, to Laish, Dan, or the springs of the Jordan; and its northern border, from thence to Sidon, westward. Of Canaan's sons, Sidon, the eldest, occupied the north-west corner, and built the town of that name, so early celebrated for her luxury and commerce in Scripture, (Judges 18: 7; 1 Kings 5: 6;) and by Homer, who calls the Sidonians poludaidaloi, skilled in many arts. And Tyre, so flourishing afterwards, though boasting of her own antiquity, (Isa. 23: 7,) is styled "a daughter of Sidon," or a colony from thence, Isaiah 5: 12. Heth, his second son, and the Hittites, his descendants, appear to have settled in the south, near Hebron, (Gen. 23: 3—7;) and next to them, at Jerusalem, the Jebusites, or descendants of Jehus, both remaining in their original settlements till David's days; 2 Sam. 11: 3; 5: 6—9. Beyond the Jebusites, were settled the Emorites, or Amorites, (Num. 13: 29,) who extended themselves beyond Jordan, and were the most powerful of the Canaanite tribes, (Gen. 15: 16; Num. 21: 21,) until they were destroyed by Moses and Joshua, with the rest of the devoted nations of Canaan's family.

3. Shem and his family are noticed last, Gen. 10: 21—30. His posterity were confined to middle Asia. (1.) His son Elam appears to have been settled in Elymais, or southern Persia, contiguous to the maritime tract of Chusistan, Dan. 8: 2. (2.) His son Ashur planted the land thence called Assyria, which soon became a province of the Cushite, or Cuthic empire, founded by Nimrod. (3.) Arphaxad, through his grandson, Eber, branched out into the two houses of Peleg and Joktan. Peleg probably remained in Chaldea, or southern Babylonia, at the time of the dispersion; for there we find his grandson, Terah, and his family, settled at "Ur of the Chaldees," Gen. 11: 31. Of the numerous children of Joktan, it is said by Moses, that "their dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east." Faber is inclined to believe that they were the ancestors of the great body of the Hindus, who still retain a lively tradition of the patriarch Shem, Shama, or Sharma; and that the land of Ophir, abounding in gold, so called from one of the sons of Joktan, lay beyond the Indus, eastward. (4.) Lud was probably the father of the Ludim, or Lydians, of Asia Minor; for this people had a tradition that they were descended from Lud or Lytus, according to Josephus. (5.) The children of Aram planted the fertile country north of Babylonia, called Aram Naharaim, "Aram between the two rivers," the Euphrates and the Tigris, thence called by the Greeks, Mesopotamis, (Gen. 24: 10,) and Padan Aram, the level country of Aram, Gen. 25: 20. This country of Aram is frequently rendered Syria in Scripture, (Judges 10: 6; Hosea 12: 12, &c. ;) which is not to be confounded with Palestine Syria, into which they afterwards spread themselves, still retaining their original name of Armoi, or Arameans, noticed by Homer in his "Iliad."

4. Upon this distribution of Noah's posterity we shall only observe, that the Deity presided over all their counsels and deliberations, and that he guided and settled all mankind according to the dictates of his all-comprehending wisdom and benevolence. To this purpose, the ancients themselves, according to Pindar, retained some idea that the dispersion of men was not the effect of chance, but that they had been settled in different countries by the appointment of Providence, Gen. 11: 8, 9; Deut. 22: 8. This dispersion, and that confusion of languages, with which it originated, was intended, by the counsel of an all-wise Providence, to counteract and defeat the scheme which had been projected by the descendants of Noah, for maintaining their union, implied in their proposing to make themselves a name. By this scheme, which seems to have been a project of state policy, for keeping all men together under the present chiefs and their successors, a great part of the earth must, for a long time, have been uninhabited and overrun with wild beasts. The bad effects which this project would have had upon the minds, the morals, and religion of mankind, was, probably, the chief reason why

God interposed to frustrate it as soon as it was formed. It had manifestly a direct tendency to tyranny, oppression, and slavery. Whereas in forming several independent governments by a small body of men, the ends of government, and the security of liberty and property, would be much better attended to, and more firmly established; which, in fact, was really the case; if we may judge of the rest by the constitution of one of the most eminent, the kingdom of Egypt, Gen. 47: 15—27. The Egyptians were masters of their persons and property, till they sold them to Pharaoh for bread; and then their servitude amounted to no more than the fifth part of the produce of the country, as an annual tax payable to the king.

By this event, considered as a wise dispensation of Providence, bounds were set to the contagion of wickedness; evil example was confined, and could not extend its influence beyond the limits of one country: nor could wicked projects be carried on, with universal concurrence, by many small colonies, separated by the natural boundaries of mountains, rivers, barren deserts, and seas, and hindered from associating together by a variety of languages, unintelligible to each other. Moreover, in this dispersed state, they could, whenever God pleased, be made reciprocal checks upon each other, by invasions and wars, which would weaken the power, and humble the pride, of corrupt and vicious communities. This dispensation was, therefore, properly calculated to prevent a second universal degeneracy; God dealing in it with men as rational agents, and adapting his scheme to their state and circumstances.—Watson.

DIVISIONS, (ECCLESIASTICAL.) See SCISM.

DIVORCE is the dissolution of marriage, or separation of man and wife. Divorce a mensa et thoro, i. e. from bed and board,—in this case the wife has a suitable maintenance allowed her out of her husband's effects. Divorce à vinculo matrimonii, i. e. from the bonds of matrimony, is strictly and properly divorce. This happens either in consequence of criminality, as in the case of adultery, or through some essential impediment; as consanguinity, or affinity within the degrees forbidden, pre-contract, impotency, &c., of which impediments the canon law allows no less than fourteen. In these cases, the woman receives again only what she brought. Sentences which release the parties a vinculo matrimonii, on account of impuberty, frigidity, consanguinity within the prohibited degrees, prior marriage, or want of the requisite consent of parents or guardians, are not properly dissolutions of the marriage contract, but judicial declarations that there never was any marriage; such impediment subsisting at the time as rendered the celebration of the marriage rite a mere nullity. And the rite itself contains an exception of these impediments.

The law of Moses, says Dr. Paley, for reasons of local expediency, permitted the Jewish husband to put away his wife; but, whether for every cause, or for what cause, appears to have been controverted amongst the interpreters of those times. Christ, the precepts of whose religion were calculated for more general use and observation, revokes his permission as given to the Jews for their hardness of heart, and promulgates a law which was thenceforward to confine divorces to the single cause of adultery in the wife. Matt. 19: 9. Inferior causes may justify the separation of husband and wife, although they will not authorize such a dissolution of the marriage contract as would leave either at liberty to marry again; for it is that liberty in which the danger and mischief of divorces principally consist. The law of England, in conformity to our Savior's injunction, confines the dissolution of the marriage contract to the single case of adultery in the wife; and a divorce even in that case can only be brought about by an act of parliament, founded upon a previous sentence in the spiritual court, and a verdict against the adulterer at common law; which proceedings, taken together, compose as complete an investigation of the complaint as a cause can receive. The laws of several of the United States are more lax on this subject. See Dwight's Theology, (Ser. cxxi.) Paley's Mor. and Pol. Philosophy, p. 273; Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 73.—Hend. Buck.

DOCTÆ; the advocates of an early heresy, which taught that Christ acted and suffered, not in reality, but in appearance. They were so denominated from dokein, to appear. (See GNOSTICS).—Watson.

DOCTORS, or TEACHERS, of the law; a class of men in great repute among the Jews. Luke 2: 46. They had studied the law of Moses in its various branches, and the numerous interpretations which had been grafted upon it in later times; and, on various occasions, they gave their opinion on cases referred to them for advice. Nicodemus, himself a doctor (didaskalos, teacher) of the law, comes to consult Jesus, whom he compliments in the same terms as he was accustomed to receive from his scholars: "Rabbi, we know that thou art didaskalos, a competent teacher from God." Doctors of the law were chiefly of the sect of the Pharisees; but they are sometimes distinguished from that sect, Luke 5: 17.—Watson.

DOCTRINE; whatsoever is taught, the principles or positions of any master or sect. As the doctrines of the Bible are the first principles and the foundation of religion, they should be carefully examined and well understood. The Scriptures present us with a copious fund of evangelical truth, which, though it has not the form of a regular system, yet its parts are such, that, when united, make the most complete body of doctrine that we can possibly have. Every Christian, but divines especially, should make this their study, because all the various doctrines should be insisted on in public, and explained to the people. It is not, however, as some suppose, to fill up every part of a minister's sermon, but considered as the basis upon which the practical part is to be built. Some of the divines of the seventeenth century overcharged their discourses with doctrine, especially Dr. Owen and Dr. Goolwin. It was common in that day to make thirty or forty remarks before the immediate consideration of the text, each of which was just introduced, and which, if enlarged on, would have afforded matter enough for a whole sermon. A wise preacher will join doctrine, experience, and practice together.

Doctrines, though abused by some, yet, properly considered, lie at the very foundation of religious experience, and will influence the heart and life. Thus the idea of God's sovereignty excites submission; his power and justice promote fear; his holiness, humility and purity; his goodness, a ground of hope; his love excites joy; the obscurity of his providence requires patience; his faithfulness, confidence, &c. (See Fuller's Works, vol. 1. 626) —Hend. Buck.

DOD, (JOHN.) This reverend man was born in Cheshire, England, 1551. He was the youngest of seventeen children, and much beloved by his parents. He was educated at Cambridge, where he was afterwards a fellow, and resided for sixteen years. While there, being accused, in consequence of a mistake of the steward, of being a defrauder for a considerable sum, the distress occasioned by the circumstance led him to such serious reflections, as issued through divine mercy in a sound and scriptural conversion. His accuser, afterwards discovering, and confessing his fault, entreated his forgiveness, when Mr. Dod assured him, that he now considered him not as an enemy, but as (under God) his good friend; and, indeed, a faithful friend he proved ever after. So wonderful oft-times are the methods of God's grace! At the college he acquired great reputation, both as a disputant and a preacher. The former, however, was praise he did not covet; while in the latter office the Lord greatly blessed him. His first settlement was at Hanwell, in Oxfordshire, in 1581, where he remained twenty years, and was the means of the conversion, as well as edification of multitudes. He was, however, suspended from his ministry there by Dr. Bridges, bishop of Oxford, and went to Cannons, Ashby, in Northamptonshire. After laboring quietly in this place for some years, he was again silenced on a complaint to king James, by bishop Neale. His private labors were, however, little less useful than his public had been. After the death of king James, he gained liberty to resume his public labors, which he did with unremitting faithfulness and success, till his death, which took place at Fausley, in 1645, at the advanced age of ninety-six years. Mr. Dod was an excellent scholar, especially in Hebrew.

His spirit was eminently catholic and kind. He loved and honored those who feared God, though in point of subscription and ceremonies, they were not of his judgment. As he sowed, so he reaped; he was full of love himself, and greatly beloved of others. He was a sort of passive non-conformist; and though he lived through the reigns of three successive princes, such was his love of peace and holiness, that archbishop Usher said of him, "Whatsoever some affirm of Mr. Dod's strictness, and scrupling some ceremonies, I desire when I die, that my soul may rest where his doth." Indeed, he was held in such universal esteem, that it was a discredit to any one to speak evil of him.

His sayings are well known, and well deserve remembrance. They are the fruit of an eminently sagacious and spiritual mind, deeply read in the school of Christ. In his last hours, he longed and thirsted to be with his Lord. "I am not afraid to look death in the face. I can say, Death, where is thy sting? death cannot hurt me." His last words were, "I desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ."—Middleton, vol. iii. 171.

DODANIM; the youngest son of Javan, Gen. 10: 2. Several Hebrew manuscripts read Rhodanim, and believe that he peopled the island of Rhodes. (See DEBAN).—Calmel.

DODD, (DR. WILLIAM,) a native of Lincolnshire, was born at Bourne, in 1729, and was educated at Clare hall, Cambridge. While at college, he produced his version of Callimachus. Having taken orders, he settled in London, became a popular preacher, and obtained valuable church preferment. But Dodd was vain, extravagant, and not nice in his expedients to accomplish his purposes. He endeavored to procure by bribery the living of St. George's, Hanover square, and for this criminal attempt he was struck off the list of king's chaplains. Pressed by his necessities, he next ventured on a more dangerous step, which proved fatal. He forged a bond on his former pupil, the earl of Chesterfield, and for this crime he suffered death in 1777, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts which were made to save him. Among his numerous works may be mentioned, Sermons, 4 vols.; Thoughts in Prison; Sermons to Young Men, 3 vols.; a Commentary on the Bible, 3 vols. folio; Reflections on Death; and The Sisters, a novel.—Davenport.

DODDRIDGE, (PHILIP, D. D. ;) the celebrated author of the "Rise and Progress," and of "The Family Expositor," was born in London, June 26, 1702. Dr. Doddridge was the twentieth and youngest child; all the rest, except one daughter, having died in infancy. It is not a little singular, that when Doddridge was born, he was laid aside as a dead child; but a person in the room observing some motion in him, took that care of him upon which the flame of life depended. His parents were eminently pious, and his earliest years were by them consecrated to the acquisition of religious knowledge. The history of the Old and New Testament his mother taught him before he could read, by means of some Dutch tiles in the chimney corner of the room in which they resided. In 1715, he was deprived, by death, of his father, and not long afterwards, of his excellent mother. In the same year, he was sent to the school of Mr. Nathaniel Wood, of St. Albans, where he commenced his acquaintance with the learned and excellent Mr. Samuel Clark, who not only became to him a wise counsellor, and an affectionate minister, but a disinterested, generous, and liberal friend and benefactor.—February 1, 1718, he was admitted a member of the church, under the pastoral care of Mr. Clark. In that year, he quitted the school at St. Albans, and retired to the house of his sister, there to determine on his future plans. From the duchess of Bedford he received an offer to be educated in either of the universities, as a clergyman of the church of England; but whilst the proposal inspired him with gratitude, he respectfully declined it, because he could not conform to a church from which he conscientiously dissented. He applied to Dr. Calamy for advice as to the profession he should follow, who dissuaded him from becoming a minister; and, in consequence, he for some time reluctantly determined to follow the profession of the law, till at length a liberal offer of assistance and advice, which he received from Mr. Clark, altered those determinations, and he resolved immediately to prosecute his studies preparatory to becoming a dissenting minister. In October, 1719, Mr. Clark placed him in the academy of the learned and pious Dr. Jennings, who resided at Kibworth, in Leicestershire. There, though young, cheerful, and devoted to the attainment of knowledge, he did not, however, forget the more important concerns of his own personal religion. He formed some admirable rules for the regulation of his conduct and the improvement of his time; which he did not merely form, but cheerfully and inviolably performed. In 1723, his tutor, Mr. Jennings, died, having not long removed from Kibworth to Hinckley. Soon after his death, Dr. Doddridge preached his first sermon at Hinckley, from the words, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus, let him be anathema, maranatha;" and two persons ascribed their conversion to the blessing of God on that sermon. Having received an invitation from the congregation at Kibworth, he accepted their offer, and was there settled in June, 1723. In that retired and obscure village, there were no external objects to divert his attention from the pursuit of his studies; and his favorite authors, Baxter, Howe, and Tillotson, he read with frequency and attention. To his pastoral duties he was not, however, inattentive; but in religious conversation, and visits of mercy, he spent a suitable portion of his valuable time. His preaching was plain and practical; and whilst his mind was richly stored with knowledge, and his imagination was lively, he made all his talents subservient to the moral and religious improvement of the people committed to his care. During the whole year, he accustomed himself to rise every morning at five o'clock; and thus, as he would sometimes say, he had ten years more than he otherwise would have had. In 1725, he removed to Harborough, though he continued to be minister of the congregation at Kibworth. With Dr. Some, the dissenting minister at Harborough, he became acquainted; and from his prudence and piety derived many benefits. In 1728, he received invitations to settle at Nottingham; but fearful that they would interfere with his spiritual welfare, he declined, and continued at Harborough; and in 1729, he was chosen assistant to Mr. Some. In the same year, Dr. Doddridge, in conjunction with Dr. Watts, Rev. Mr. Saunders, Rev. Mr. Some, and others, established an academy for preparing young men for the work of the ministry among dissenters; and to that institution he was appointed tutor. No man was better qualified than Dr. Doddridge for that situation, and the institution soon acquired a just and wide-spread celebrity. The students he instructed in every department of science and learning; and connected with all their studies, their religious improvement. Towards the close of the year, he received an invitation to settle at Northampton; and, urged by Mr. Some and Mr. Clark to accept the call, he quitted Harborough, and immediately entered on his more arduous and important duties. Soon after his settlement, he became seriously ill; but on his recovery, in March, 1730, he was set apart to the pastoral office. In this year, he published a tract, entitled "Free Thoughts on the most probable means of reviving the Dissenting Interest, occasioned by the late Inquiry into the Causes of its Decay, addressed to the Author of that Inquiry." He performed the various duties of a dissenting pastor, with exemplary diligence and affection. His sermons were well studied, and delivered with zeal and affection. He watched over his flock, like one who had to give an account. He prayed with and for them. He visited the sick; attended to the wants of the poor; admonished those who erred; cautioned those who wavered; confirmed those who were undecided; and, in every respect, attended to the doctrines, discipline, and practice of his church and congregation. In 1732, he published some admirable "Sermons on the Education of Children." In 1735, he yet further manifested his affectionate concern for the rising generation, by his publication of "Sermons to Young People;" and in 1743, by his "Principles of the Christian Religion," in verse. In 1736, he published "Ten Sermons on the Power and Grace of Christ, and the Evidences of the Gospel;" the three last of which, on the "Evidences of Christianity," have been since repeatedly printed separately, and have received great and well-merited praise. In 1741, he published some "Practical Discourses on Regeneration," which were well received, and by many have been greatly admired. In 1745, he published, in conjunction with Dr. Watts, "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul." It has been translated into Dutch, German, Danish, and French. But the work for which Dr. Doddridge has been so long and deservedly celebrated, is "The Family Expositor," containing a version and paraphrase of the New Testament, with critical notes, and the practical improvement of each section. Of the doctrinal opinions contained in such Expositor, the learned and pious have, of course, entertained various sentiments, according to their various tenets; but critics and scholars, and Christians of every sect and party, have eulogized it with a candor which did honor to themselves, and conferred yet greater renown on the name of Dr. Doddridge. In addition to the foregoing works, he published "The Memoirs of Colonel Gardiner;" "A short account of the Life of Mr. Thomas Staffe;" and prepared "A proper and new Translation of the Minor Prophets, with a Commentary on them;" and "A Dissertation on the Jewish Proselytes," which, with other pieces, have been published since his decease. In 1748, he revised the "Expository," and other works of archbishop Leighton; and translated his Latin Prelections, consisting of two volumes printed at Edinburgh.

Dr. Doddridge sustained all the relationships of life with honor to himself, and advantage to his family and the world; so that, as he approached nearer to the eternal world, his path, indeed, resembled that of the just, which is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. He died at Lisbon, whither he had gone for his health, October 26th, 1751. For further account of this eminent scholar and Christian, see Dr. Doddridge's Works; his Life written by Job Orton; and also by Dr. Kippis—Jones's Relig. Biog.

DODWELL, (HENRY;) a critic and theologian, born at Dublin, in 1641, and educated at Trinity college, was chosen Camden professor of history at Oxford, in 1688; but, being a non-juror, he lost his office at the Revolution. He died in 1711. Dodwell was a learned and a virtuous man, but addicted to paradoxes, and such a perfect ascetic that, during three days in the week, he refrained almost wholly from food. Of his many works, the most curious is, an epistolary discourse, in which he labors to prove, from the Scriptures, "that the soul is a principle naturally mortal, but immortalized actually by the pleasure of God."—Davenport.

DOG; a well-known domestic animal, which was held in great contempt among the Jews. It was worshipped by the Egyptians. (See ANUBIS.)

The state of dogs among the Jews was probably much the same as it is now in the East; where, having no owners, they run about the streets in troops, and are fed by charity, or by caprice; or they live on such offal as they can pick up. That they were numerous and voracious in Jezreel, is evident from the history of Jezebel. (See that article.)

To compare a person to a dog, living or dead, was a most degrading expression; so David uses it, (1 Sam. 24: 14.) "After whom is the king of Israel come out after a dead dog?" So Mephibosheth, (2 Sam. 9: 8.) "What is thy servant, that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am?" The name of dog sometimes expresses one who has lost all modesty; one who prostitutes himself to abominable actions; for so several understand the injunction (Deut. 23: 18.) of not offering "the hire of a whore;" or "the price of a dog." Our Lord, in Revelation, (22: 15.) excludes "dogs, sorcerers, whoremongers, murderers, and idolaters," from the new Jerusalem. Paul says, "Beware of dogs" (Phil. 3: 2.)—of impudent, sordid, greedy professors; and Solomon, (Prov. 26: 11.) and Peter, (2 Epist. 2: 21.) compare sinners, who continually relapse into sins, to dogs returning to their vomit.—Calmet.

DOGMA; (Greek dogma, from dokēō, to seem, think, be of opinion,) an opinion, tenet, principle, or article of belief; what is propounded for belief, or established as a fixed and indubitable doctrine.—Hend. Buck.

DOGMA'S, (HISTORY OF;) a branch of theological science, particularly attended to in Germany, the object of which is to exhibit historically the origin and changes of the various Christian systems, showing what opinions were received by the various sects in different ages of the church, the sources of the different creeds, the arguments by which they were attacked and supported, what degrees of importance were attached to them in different ages, the circumstances by which they were affected, and the mode in which the dogmas were combined into systems. The sources of this branch of history are the public creeds, the acts of councils, and other ecclesiastical assemblies, letters and decrees of the heads of churches, liturgies and books of rituals, the works of the fathers, and of later ecclesiastical writers, as well as the statements of contemporary historians. It is easily seen how important and interesting a study this is, teaching, as it does, modesty and forbearance in the support of particular opinions, by showing the vast variety of those which have afforded subjects of bitter controversy at particular periods, and have then passed away into oblivion; and how much learning, industry, and critical acuteness are often required, in order to a thorough investigation of contested points of doctrine. The distinction between this branch of history and ecclesiastical history is obvious. It is the same as exists between political history and the history of politics. Lectures on this subject are delivered in all the German universities.—Hend. Buck.

DOGMATICS; a systematic arrangement of the dogmas or articles of the Christian faith, with respect to which a distinction is made between biblical dogmatics,—the study of which goes to examine closely the doctrinal passages of the holy Scriptures, and to derive the system of doctrines exclusively from the Bible—and ecclesiastical dogmatics, which consist in the systematic exhibition of doctrines considered to be biblical by particular churches. The first attempt to furnish a complete and coherent system of Christian dogmas was made by Origen in the third century; it was succeeded by Augustine in the fourth, by Isidore of Seville in the sixth, and by John of Damascus in the eighth. In the middle ages, ingenious examinations of the doctrines were made by the schoolmen; but agitating, as they did, subtle questions of little or no practical importance, they loaded the science with useless refinements. Among the Protestants, Melancthon was the first who wrote a compendium of Christian doctrine, which is still justly esteemed.—Hend. Buck.

DOMINICANS; an order of preaching friars (sometimes called Jacobins;) founded by Dominic de Gusman, a Spaniard, early in the twelfth century. They adopted first the rule of St. Augustine, but afterwards that of St. Benedict, with great alterations. Preaching was professed to be a great object with them, and from thence they were called preaching friars. They were also called Black friars, from their habit; and are rendered infamous in history, by pretended apparitions and miracles, in opposition to the Franciscans. As the tool of their impositions, they employed a weak brother named Jetzer, whom they afterwards attempted to poison; but he discovered the whole plot, and brought great disgrace upon the order.

The mother of this saint, (for he has been canonized,) when pregnant with him, dreamed that she bore a dog with a flambeau, or firebrand in his mouth, which received a remarkable accomplishment; for he has the honor of founding that diabolical institution, the Inquisition, by which thousands, perhaps millions, of innocent persons have been destroyed. (See INQUISITION.)—Broughton's Dict.; Butler's Confess. p. 132.; Williams.

DOMINICUS; a learned soldier in Italy, and a martyr of the twelfth century, who having read several Waldensian writings, became a zealous Protestant against the corruptions of Rome, and retiring into Placentia, preached the gospel in its purity to a very considerable congregation. One day, when just beginning his sermon, he was arrested by the papal magistrate. He readily submitted to his custody, remarking, "I wonder the devil has let me alone so long!" When brought to examination, this question was put to him: Will you renounce your doctrines? To which he replied, "My doctrines! I maintain no doctrines of my own; what I preach are the doctrines of Christ, and for those I will forfeit my blood, and even think myself happy to suffer for the sake of my Redeemer." Every effort was made to induce him to recant, but in vain, and he was accordingly sentenced to death, and hung in the market place.—Foz.

DONATISTS; a body of Christians in Africa, so denominated from their leader, Donatus. They had their origin in the year 311, when, in the room of Mensurius, who died in that year, on his return to Rome, Cecilian was elected bishop of Carthage, and consecrated, without the concurrence of the Numidian bishops, by those of Africa alone, whom the people refused to acknowledge, and to whom they opposed Majorinus, who accordingly was ordained by Donatus, bishop of Casæ Nigræ. They were condemned, in a council held at Rome, two years after their separation; and afterwards in another at Arles, the year following; and again at Milan, before Constantine the Great, in 316, who deprived them of their churches, and sent their venerable bishops into banishment, and punished some of them with death. Their cause was espoused by another Donatus, called the Great, the principal bishop of that sect, who, with numbers of his followers, was exiled by order of Constans. Many of them were punished with great severity. (See CIRCUMCELLIONES.) However, after the accession of Julian to the throne in 362, they were permitted to return, and restored to their former liberty. Gratian published several edicts against them, and, in 377, deprived them of their churches, and prohibited all their assemblies. But, notwithstanding the severities they suffered, it appears that they had a very considerable number of churches towards the close of this century; but at this time they began to decline on account of a schism among themselves, occasioned by the election of two bishops, in the room of Parmenian, the successor of Donatus. One party elected Primian, and were called Primianists; and another Maximian, and were called Maximianists. Their decline was also precipitated by the zealous opposition of St. Augustine, and by the violent measures which were pursued against them by order of the emperor Honorius, at the solicitation of two councils held at Carthage—the one in 404, and the other in 411. Many of them were fined, their bishops were banished, and some put to death. This sect revived and multiplied under the protection of the Vandals, who invaded Africa, in 427, and took possession of this province; but it sunk again under new severities, when their empire was overturned, in 534. Nevertheless, they remained in a separate body till the close of this century, when Gregory, the Roman pontiff, used various methods for suppressing them: his zeal succeeded, and there are few traces to be found of the Donatists after this period. They were distinguished by other appellations, as, Circumcelliones, Montenses, or Montainiers, Campetes, Rupites, &c. They held three councils—that of Cita in Numidia, and two at Carthage.

The Donatists, it is said, held that baptism conferred out of the church, that is, out of their sect, was null; and accordingly they rebaptized those who joined their party from other churches; they also re-ordained their ministers. Donatus seems likewise to have embraced the doctrine of the Arians; though St. Augustine affirms that the Donatists in this point kept clear of the errors of their leader. Jones's History of the Church.—Hend. Euck.

DONATIVE, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, is a benefice given by the patron to a priest, without presentation to the ordinary, and without institution and induction.—Hend. Euck.

DONNE, (JOHN, D. D.,) a celebrated English poet and divine, was born in London, of Catholic parents, in 1573. At Oxford, where he was sent at eleven years of age, it was observed of him, as of the famous Picus Mirandula, that "he was rather born wise than made so by study." At Cambridge and Lincoln's Inn he prosecuted his studies still further; and in the course of which, after careful investigation, he was led to embrace the Protestant faith. He was made secretary to lord chancellor Elsmore; but lost his situation by a clandestine marriage, and was even thrown into prison; from which, however, he was soon liberated, and reconciled to his father-in-law, Sir George More. After this, he resided many years in Surry, with his kinsman, Sir Francis Wolley, and subsequently in London, with his friend Sir Robert Drury, until 1610, when, after long solicitation, he was induced to enter into holy orders.

"Now all his studies," says his biographer, "were concentrated in divinity; now he had a new calling, new thoughts, new employment for his wit and eloquence. Now all his earthly affections were changed into divine love, and all the faculties of his soul were engaged in the conversation of others. To this he applied himself with all diligence; and such a change was wrought in him, that he rejoiced more to be a door-keeper in the house of God, than to enjoy any temporal employment; preaching the word so, as showed he was possessed with those joys that he labored to instill into others; a preacher in earnest, weeping sometimes for his auditory, sometimes with them; always preaching to himself; like an angel from a cloud, but in none; exciting the affections of others, and feeling the most lively motions of his own."

He was appointed by James I. one of his chaplains; and was also chosen preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and dean of St. Paul's. After twenty years of devoted labors in the pulpit, he died March 31, 1631, greatly lamented. In his last hours, he was favored with such views of heaven, that he said, "I were miserable if I might not die!" His learning was vast, and he left numerous writings behind him.—Middleton, vol. ii. 492.

DOOLITTLE, (THOMAS,) was born at Kidderminster England, in 1630. He was converted in early youth, under those discourses of Mr. Baxter which were afterwards published as the Saints' Everlasting Rest. He entered upon the study of the law, but being required by the attorney with whom he lived to copy some writings on the Lord's day, he left the business with disgust, and determined to give himself to the work of the gospel ministry. At the university of Cambridge, which he now entered, he grew in grace as he advanced in learning. After taking his degree of master of arts, he went to London, where he was soon noticed as a warm and affectionate preacher. He was soon settled over the parish of St. Alphage by London-Wall, and applied himself to his work with great humility, diligence, and success. Even in old age, he was wont to remember with thankfulness the divine power that attended his early ministrations. Nine years he labored here; but on Bartholomew day, 1662, with about two thousand of his brethren, he was silenced for non-conformity. Having a growing family to support, he opened a boarding school near London, which was soon crowded. In the time of the great plague, he retired to Woodford Bridge, where, though many resorted to his house for the worship of God, he had not one sick of his numerous family, consisting at that time of more than thirty. Here he wrote an address, entitled "A Spiritual Antidote in dying Times." After the plague ceased, he returned to London, and, roused by the voice of providence in the great fire, he could no longer be silent, but at the peril of liberty and life, devoted himself again to preaching the gospel. He had many seals to his ministry, which was prolonged to the seventy-seventh year of his age. He died full of peace and joy, May 24, 1707. He published twenty pieces on practical subjects.—Middleton, vol. iv. 149.

DOORS. (See GATES.)

DOROTHEUS, high chamberlain to the household of the Roman emperor Dioclesian, A. D. 303, was a Christian, and labored assiduously to win others to the same holy faith. In these efforts he was aided by Gorgonius, another Christian, who belonged to the palace. Both stood high in the emperor's favor; but they soon had an opportunity of evincing by their behavior that worldly honors and pleasures are nothing in competition with the joys of immortality. Being informed against, and refusing to renounce their Christian profession, they were first tortured and then strangled, willingly suffering martyrdom for Christ.—Foz.

DORCAS. (See TABITHA.)

DORT, SYNOD OF.* This famous synod was convoked by the authority of the States General of Holland, and consisted not only of deputies from the Belgic churches; but an earnest application was made to all the reformed churches of Europe to commission pious and learned theologians, lovers of peace, to attend, and assist in restoring order and harmony to the agitated churches of Holland. The occasion of these dissensions and disturbances was the prevalence of the new opinions vented by James Arminius and his followers. Various efforts, for ten years and more, had been made to reconcile the contending parties and restore peace to the disturbed churches; but all these efforts proved ineffectual.

At length, under the auspices of Maurice, prince of Orange, letters of convocation were issued, and a committee appointed, selected from both parties, to settle all the preliminaries of time, place, &c. Accordingly, in November, 1618, the synod met at the ancient city of DORDRECHT or DORT, and sat until the end of April, 1619. Prefixed to the published "Acts" of this synod, there is an exact and authentic history of Arminianism from its origin, and of all the conferences held between the parties, and of the steps taken to bring about the meeting of the synod. This history is far more authentic than the partial accounts of individuals, for it was not only approved by the Belgic church, but also by the States General.

The character and conduct of this venerable body have been variously represented by writers, according to their partialities in favor of the one side or the other in the controversy. The Arminians complained loudly of having been treated with injustice. They demanded, that before the synod, Remonstrants and Contra-remonstrants should be placed on the same ground; but the synod determined, almost unanimously, that the Arminians should appear before them to explain and defend their peculiar opinions, in which they had deviated from the standards of the Belgic church, and from the doctrines of the reformed churches. But all their efforts to induce the Remonstrants to take this ground were unavailing; and accordingly they left the synod in a body, and went home, and never returned. The synod then resolved to proceed to the examination of the FIVE ARTICLES, which had been published by the Arminians, in a paper entitled a REMONSTRANCE, from which they took their name. These articles were taken up in order, and the foreign divines requested first to deliver their judgment, which they did, in writing. (The foreign churches represented in this synod were those of England, Scotland, Geneva, Switzerland, Embden, Bremen, the Palatinate, and Hesse. The reformed churches of France deputed two eminent theologians to the synod, but they were prevented from attending by an order from the French government.) These papers read before the synod furnish a rich body of sound theology, and are all preserved in the journal or minutes of the body, the whole of which have been published. After the foreign divines had expressed their opinion, the deputies of the Belgic churches, in order, delivered their judgment on the FIVE ARTICLES.

The proceedings of the synod, if we may judge from their minutes, and from the testimony of such men as bishop Hall and bishop Davenant, were characterized by order, dignity, and a zeal for evangelical truth. Although the Belgic churches had acknowledged standards of doctrine, yet they were not made the rule of judgment on the points brought before this synod; but every member, rising from his seat, took a solemn oath that he would determine all points on which he gave a judgment by no other authority than the word of God, contained in the holy Scriptures.

* This article was prepared for the Encyclopedia by Rev. Dr. Alexander, of Princeton Theo. Sem.

The harmony of the sentiments of these eminent theologians, from different countries, on the great vital doctrines of Christianity, is truly wonderful, and must be highly satisfactory to the friends of evangelical truth. Not that there was a perfect unanimity in the mode of explaining every point; for in regard to the extent of the atonement there was a difference in their views; for while a majority argued in favor of particular redemption, the English divines and a few others maintained that Christ died for all men. But they all agreed in condemning the Arminian doctrine on this point, as well as on all others. And the general Confession was so drawn up that all could subscribe it, which they did, as far as appears, without exception. This became in consequence the public Confession of the Belgic churches, as it ever has been of the Dutch Reformed Church in the United States of America. The doctrine taught in this document is moderate, sound Calvinism.

The intercourse between the members of the synod was of the most fraternal and delightful kind. Bishop Hall somewhere says, that the society which he there enjoyed was more like a heaven upon earth than any thing which he ever witnessed.—See The Acts of the Synod of Dort, and Dr. Thomas Scott's History of the Synod of Dort, Phila. 1818.

DOSITHEANS; an ancient sect among the Samaritans. in the first century of the Christian era, so called from Dositheus, who endeavored to persuade the Samaritans that he was the Messiah foretold by Moses.—Hend. Buck.

DOTHAN; a town at the distance of twelve miles northward of Samaria. Gen. 37: 17.—Jones.

DOUBLE, has several shades of signification in Scripture. "A double garment" may mean a lined habit, such as the high-priest's pectoral: or a complete habit, or suit of clothes, a cloak and a tunic, &c. Double heart, double tongue, double mind, are opposed to a simple, honest, sincere heart, tongue, mind, &c. Double, the counterpart to a quantity, which is proposed as the exemplar. Gen. 43: 12, 15.

For the right understanding of Is. 40: 2, "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins," Mr. Taylor says, read, the counterpart—that which is adequate, all things considered, as a dispensation of punishment.

But if this be the sense, how could it be said, "her iniquity is pardoned?" since punishment and pardon, in the very nature of things, seem opposed to each other. Others observe, therefore, that the expression alludes to a common custom in the East of doubling down a leaf in an account book, whenever an account was settled. In this sense, "the double" is equivalent to the discharge. If this be correct, we may read the passage, "her warfare is accomplished, her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand a discharge for all her sins," that is, a complete settlement has taken place. The same seems to be the meaning of this word in other places, (Is. 61: 7.) unless indeed it alludes to a double portion, that is, blessings twice as great as were enjoyed before.—Calmet; Ev. Mag.

DOUBTS and FEARS, are terms frequently used to denote the uncertainty of mind we are in respecting our interest in the divine favor.

The causes of our doubts may be such as these: personal declension; not knowing the exact time, place, or means of our conversion; improper views of the character and decrees of God; the fluctuation of religious experience as to the enjoyment of God in prayer, hearing, &c.; the depth of our affliction; relapses into sin; the fall of professors; and the hidings of God's face.

"It is a sin," says one, "for a believer to live so as not to have his evidences clear; but it is no sin for him to be so earnest and impartial as to doubt, when in fact his evidences are not clear."

Let the humble Christian, however, beware of an extreme. Prayer, conversation with experienced Christians, reading the promises, and consideration of the divine goodness, will have a tendency to remove unnecessary doubts.—Buck on Christian Experience; Fuller's Works.

DOUGLAS, (JOHN,) an eminent divine and critic, was born in 1721, at Pittenweem, in Fife, and educated at Balliol college, Oxford. Having for some years held the minor dignities of canon and dean of Windsor, he was made bishop of Caullis in 1787, and, in 1792, was transferred to Salisbury. He died May 18, 1807. Dr. Douglas was intimate with Dr. Johnson, and all the most celebrated of his contemporaries. As a literary character, he distinguished himself by castigating Lander for his attack on Milton; exposing Alexander Bower; and entering the lists against Hume, by publishing The Criterion, or a Discourse on Miracles, a work of great value. He also edited Cook's Second Voyage.—Davenport.

DOVE. This beautiful genus of birds is very numerous in the East. In the wild state, they generally build their nests in the holes or clefts of rocks, or in excavated trees; but they are easily taught submission and familiarity with mankind; and, when domesticated, build in structures erected for their accommodation, called "dove-cotes." They are classed by Moses among the clean birds; and it appears from the sacred as well as other writers, that doves were always held in the highest estimation among the eastern nations. Rosemuller, in a note upon Bochart, derives the name from the Arabic, where it signifies mildness, gentleness, &c. The dove is mentioned in Scripture as the symbol of simplicity, innocence, gentleness, affection, and fidelity, Hos. 7: 11. Matt. 10: 16.

The following extract from Morier's Persian Travels illustrates a passage in Isaiah:—"In the environs of the city, to the westward, near the Zainderood, are many pigeon-houses, erected at a distance from habitations, for the sole purpose of collecting pigeons' dung for manure. They are large round towers, rather broader at the bottom than the top, and crowned by conical spiracles, through which the pigeons descend. Their interior resembles a honey-comb, pierced with a thousand holes, each of which forms a snug retreat for a nest. More care appears to have been bestowed upon their outside than upon that of the generality of the dwelling-houses; for they are painted and ornamented. The extraordinary flights of pigeons which I have seen alight upon one of these buildings afford, perhaps, a good illustration for the passage in Isa. 60: 8, 'Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?' Their great numbers, and the compactness of their mass, literally look like a cloud at a distance, and obscure the sun in their passage."

The first mention of the dove in the Scripture is Gen. 8: 8, 10—12, where Noah sent one from the ark to ascertain if the waters of the deluge had assuaged. She was sent forth thrice. The first time she speedily returned; having, in all probability, gone but a little way from the ark, as she must naturally be terrified at the appearance of the waters. After seven days, being sent out a second time, she returned with an olive leaf plucked off, whereby it became evident that the flood was considerably abated, and had sunk below the tops of the trees; and thus relieved the fears and cheered the heart of Noah and his family. And hence the olive branch has ever been among the forerunners of peace, and chief of those emblems by which a happy state of renovation and restoration to prosperity has been signified to mankind. At the end of other seven days, the dove, being sent out a third time, returned no more; from which Noah conjectured that the earth was so far drained as to afford sustenance for the birds and fowls; and he therefore removed the covering of the ark, which probably gave liberty to many of the fowls to fly off; and these circumstances afforded him the greater facility for making arrangements for disembarking the other animals. Doves might be offered in sacrifice, when those who were poor could not bring a more costly offering.—Watson.

DOVES' DUNG. It is said, (2 Kings 6: 25.) that during the siege of Samaria, "the fourth part of a cab [little more than half a pint] of doves' dung was sold for five pieces of silver;" about two and a half dollars. It is well known that doves' dung is not a nourishment for man, even in the most extreme famine; and hence Josephus and Theodoret were of opinion, that it was bought instead of salt, to serve as a kind of manure for the purpose of raising esculent plants of quick vegetation. The general opinion since Bochart is, that it was a kind of chich-pea, or tare, which has very much the appearance of doves' dung, whence it might be named; Mr. Taylor remarks, that in the Arab writers the words kali, and ugnen, signify equally the dung of pigeons, and chich-peas. Great quantities of the latter are sold in Cairo, to the pilgrims going to Mecca; and at Damascus, Belon says, "there are many shops where nothing else is done but preparing chich-peas. These, parched in a copper pan, and dried, are of great service to those who take long journeys." This may account for the stock of them stored up in the city of Samaria; and the cab would be a fit measure for this kind of pulse, which was the fare of the poorer class of people.—Calmel.

DOW, (LORENZO;) a well-known itinerant preacher. He was one of the most remarkable men of this age for his zeal and labors in the cause of religion. He was a native of Coventry, Connecticut; and in early life became deeply impressed by the truths of religion, and felt urged, by motives irresistible, to devote his life to the preaching of the gospel in various parts of the world. His eccentric dress, and style of preaching, attracted great attention; while his shrewdness, and quick discernment of character, gave him no inconsiderable influence over the multitudes that attended on his ministry. He travelled extensively in England and Ireland, and repeatedly visited almost every portion of the United States. He had been a public preacher for more than thirty years, and it is probable that more persons have heard the gospel from his lips, than from those of any other individual since the days of Whitefield. He wrote several books, particularly a history of his own life, so singularly eventful, and full of vicissitudes. His purity of purpose, and integrity and benevolence of character, can hardly be questioned. He was a Methodist in principle, and though not in connexion with that society, was held in esteem by many of that body. He died in Georgetown, district of Columbia, February 2, 1834. A wanderer through life, it is believed he was a sincere Christian pilgrim, seeking a heavenly country, and that he now rests in the city of God.—Rel. Narrator.

DOWNE, (JOHN, B. D.) This excellent man was born in 1560, in Devonshire, England, of religious parents, and was educated at the university of Cambridge. Bishops Hall and Jewell were his early contemporaries, and the latter of these excellent men was chosen by Mr. Downe as a sort of model for his own life. Among mere men he could scarce have chosen a better. He was first presented to the vicarage of Winsford in Somerset; but after became rector of Instow, worth about one hundred pounds a year; where he was contented to spend his days in modest obscurity and useful labors, and where he was divinely blessed in turning many to righteousness. He was a man of vigorous intellect. His skill in the languages, particularly Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Italian, was almost unrivalled in the western part of the kingdom, as was also his knowledge of the sciences. His moral, civil, and religious wisdom was in due proportion; for the grace of God was upon him. He was so diligent in catechizing, preaching, and expounding the Scriptures, that in the course of his ministry he went through the whole body of the Bible, from the beginning of Genesis to the end of Revelation. His ardor often carried him beyond his strength; for his maxim was that of bishop Jewell, "that a general should die in the field, and a preacher in the pulpit." Of his preaching it has been quaintly said, "deep it was, and yet clear; rational, and yet divine; perspicuous, yet punctual; artificial, yet profitable; calm, yet piercing; ponderous, yet familiar; so that the ablest of his hearers might always learn something, and yet the simplest understand all." All along, in health and sickness, he was a professed pilgrim and sojourner on earth; and in his last moments, among other things, observed, "that though he saw death approaching, he feared it not; for it was but a dream, and the sting thereof taken out." He died in 1631.—Middleton, vol. iii. 36.

DOWRY. Nothing distinguishes more the nature of marriage among us and in Europe, from the same connexion when formed in the East, than the different methods of proceeding between the father-in-law and the intended bridegroom. Among us, the father usually gives a portion to his daughter, which becomes the property of her husband; and which often makes a considerable part of his wealth; but in the East, the bridegroom offers to the father of his bride a sum of money, or value to his satisfaction, before he can expect to receive his daughter in marriage. Of this procedure we have instances from the earliest times. When Jacob had nothing which he could immediately give for a wife, he purchased her by his services to her father Laban, Gen. 29: 18. So we find Shechem offers to pay any value, as a dowry for Dinah, Gen. 34: 12. In this passage is mentioned a distinction still observed in the East: (1.) "A dowry" to the family, as a token of honor, to engage their favorable interest in the desired alliance. (2.) "A gift" to the bride herself, e. g. of jewels and other decorations, a compliment of honor, as Abraham's servant gave to Rebecca. (See MARRIAGE.)—Calmet.

DOXOLOGY, (from doxa, praise, and logos, word;) a hymn used in the service of the ancient Christians. It was only a single sentence, without a response, running in these words, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen." Part of the latter clause, "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," was inserted some time after the first composition. The fourth council of Toledo, A. D. 633, added the word honor to it, and read it, "Glory and honor be to the Father," &c., because the prophet David says, "Bring glory and honor to the Lord." It is not easy to say, at what time the latter clause was inserted. Some ascribe it to the council at Nice, and pretend it was added in opposition to the Arians. But the first express mention made of it is in the second council of Vaison, A. D. 529, above two centuries later.

There was likewise another hymn, of great note in the ancient church, called the Great Doxology, or Angelical Hymn, beginning with those words which the angels sung at our Savior's birth, "Glory be to God on high," &c. This was chiefly used in the communion service. It was also used daily in private devotions. In the Mozarabic liturgy, it is appointed to be sung before the lessons on Christmas day. Chrysostom often mentions it, and observes, that the Ascetics, or Christians who had retired from the world, met together daily to sing this hymn. Who first composed it, adding the remaining part to the words sung by the angels, is uncertain. Some suppose it to be as ancient as the time of Lucian, about the beginning of the second century. Others take it for the "Gloria Patri;" which is a dispute as difficult to be determined, as it is to find out the first author and original of this hymn.

Both these doxologies have a place in the liturgy of the church of England, and of the Protestant Episcopal church of the United States; the former being repeated after every psalm, the latter used in the communion service.—Hend. Buck.

DRABICIANS, the followers of Nic. Drabicians, a pretended prophet in Hungary, about A. D. 1630, who failed in his attempt to found a permanent sect; it is said, through the timidity of his coadjutor, Comenius; and it is doubtful whether he should be considered rather as an enthusiast, or an impostor; and it is not certain whether he was burned, or saved his life by a flight to Turkey. See Morison's Theol. Dict.—Williams.

DRACHMA. The value of a common drachma was seven pence English, or twelve and a half cents. A didrachma, or double drachma, made very near half a shekel; and four drachmas made nearly a shekel, i. e. nearly half a dollar.—Watson.

DRAGON. This word, which frequently occurs in the English Bible, generally answers to the Hebrew tan, tanin, and tannin, though these words are sometimes rendered serpents, sea-monsters, and whales. The Rev. J. Hurdis, in a "Dissertation upon the true meaning of the word tannin," contends, that in its various forms it uniformly signifies the crocodile; an opinion which can be supported by no authentic facts, and by no legitimate mode of reasoning. Mr. Taylor, who argues at great length for restraining the word to amphibious animals, is of opinion that it includes the class of lizards, from the water-newt to the crocodile, and also the seal, the manati, the morse, &c. His arguments are certainly ingenious and deserving of attention; but they have failed to convince us of the legitimacy of his deductions. The subject is involved in much obscurity, from the apparent latitude with which the word is employed by the sacred writers. In Ex. 7: 9, et seq. Deut.

32: 33. and Jer. 51: 31, it seems to denote a large serpent, or the dragon, properly so called; in Gen. 1: 21. Job 7: 12 and Ez. 29: 3. a crocodile, or any large sea animal; and in Lam. 4: 3. and Job 30: 29. some kind of wild beast, probably the jackal or wolf, as the Arabic teenan denotes. It is to the dragon, properly so called, that we shall now direct our attention.

Three kinds of dragons were formerly distinguished in India. 1. Those of the hills and mountains. 2. Those of the valleys and caves. 3. Those of the fens and marshes. The first is the largest, and covered with scales, as resplendent as burnished gold. They have a kind of beard hanging from their lower jaw, their aspect is frightful, their cry loud and shrill, their crest bright yellow, and they have a protuberance on their heads the color of a burning coal. 2. Those of the flat country are of a silver color, and frequent rivers, to which the former never come. 3. Those of the marshes are black, slow, and have no crest. Their bite is not venomous, though the creatures be dreadful.

The following description of the boa is chiefly abstracted and translated from De La Ceppe, by Mr. Taylor, who considers it as the proper dragon.

The boa is among serpents, what the lion or the elephant is among quadrupeds; he usually reaches twenty feet in length, and to this species we must refer those described by travellers as lengthened to forty or fifty feet, as related by Owen. Kircher mentions a serpent forty palms in length; and such a serpent is referred to by Job Ludolph, as extant in Ethiopia. Jerome, in his life of Hilarion, denominates such a serpent, draco, or dragon; saying, that they were called boas, because they could swallow (boves) beeves, and waste whole provinces. Bosman says, entire men have been frequently found in the gullets of serpents on the gold coast. But the longest serpent I have read of, is that mentioned by Livy, and by Pliny, which opposed the Roman army under Regulus, at the river Bagrada in Africa. It devoured several of the soldiers; and so hard were its scales, that they resisted darts and spears: at length it was, as it were, besieged, and the military engines were employed against it, as against a fortified city. It was a hundred and twenty feet in length.

The boa is not venomous. This serpent, being a very devouring creature, greedy of prey, leaps from among the hedges and woods, and standing upright on its tail, wrestles both with men and wild beasts: sometimes it leaps from the trees upon the traveller, whom it fastens on, and beats the breath out of his body with its tail.

From this account of the boa, Mr. Taylor thinks it probable that John had it in his mind when he describes Satan in his persecuting power under the symbol of a great red dragon. The dragon of antiquity was a serpent of prodigious size, and its most conspicuous color was red; and the apocalyptic dragon strikes vehemently with his tail; in all which particulars it perfectly agrees with the boa. Rev. 12: 4, 15—17.—Calmet.

DRAGON-WELL, THE, (Neh. 2: 13.) lay east of Jerusalem.—Calmet.

DRAGOONING; one of the methods used by papists after the revocation of the edict of Nantz, under Louis XIV., for converting refractory heretics, and bringing them within the pale of their church. If the reader's feelings will suffer him to peruse the account of these barbarities, he will find it under the article PERSECUTION in this work.—Buck.

DREAD; a high degree of fear. (See FEAR.)

DREAM; the excited state of the imagination in sleep, whether from natural or supernatural causes. The Eastern people, and in particular the Jews, greatly regarded dreams, and applied for their interpretation to those who undertook to explain them. We see the antiquity of this custom in the history of Pharaoh's butler and baker, (Gen. 40.) and Pharaoh himself, and Nebuchadnezzar, are also instances. God expressly forbade his people from observing dreams, and from consulting explainers of them. He condemned to death all who pretended to have prophetic dreams, and to foretell events, even though what they foretold came to pass, if they had any tendency to promote idolatry, Deut. 13: 1—3. But they were not forbidden, when they thought they had a significant dream, to address the prophets of the Lord, or the high-priest in his ephod, to have it explained. Saul, before the battle of Gilboa, consulted a woman who had a familiar spirit, "because the Lord would not answer him by dreams, nor by prophets," 1 Sam. 28: 6, 7.

The Lord frequently discovered his will in dreams, and enabled persons to explain them. The Midianites gave credit to dreams, as appears from that which a Midianite related to his companion, and from whose interpretation Gideon took a happy omen, Judg. 7: 13, 15. The prophet Jeremiah (23: 25, 28, 29.) exclaims against impostors who pretended to have had dreams, and absconded the credulity of the people. The prophet Joel (2: 28.) promises from God, that in the reign of the Messiah, the effusion of the Holy Spirit should be so copious, that the old men should have prophetic dreams, and the young men should receive visions.

The word signifies, likewise, those vain images, beheld in imagination while asleep, which have no relation to prophecy, Job 20: 8. Is. 29: 7. See also Eccl. 5: 3, 7. And it ought not to be overlooked, that we now have in the holy Scriptures a complete revelation of divine truth; so that to be expecting new revelations by dreams or visions, is to be carried away with the spirit of error and delusion, 1 John 4: 1—6. The wisest use Christians now can make of dreams is to be admonished by them to attend to the word of God, Jer. 23: 28.

Dreams should be carefully distinguished from visions: the former occurred during sleep, and therefore were liable to much ambiguity and uncertainty; the latter when the person, being awake, retained possession of his natural powers and faculties.—Calmet.

DREAMER, is used as a word of reproach; of Joseph by his brethren, (Gen. 37: 19.) and of Shemaiah, Jer. 29: 24. See chapter 27: 9. and Jude 8. See also Is. 56: 10.—Calmet.

DRELLINCOURT, (CHARLES,) was born in the month of July, 1595, at Sedan, a town of France. His father was a man of piety, and great respectability, and wisely determined on giving his son a liberal education. At Saumur, under the instruction of professor Duncan, he attained an accurate knowledge of theology, moral philosophy, and polite literature. In early life, his religious impressions were deep; and as they became permanent, he determined on devoting his future life to the service of God, as a Christian minister. At the age of twenty-three, he was accordingly admitted minister of the French Protestant Calvinistic church, and officiated near Langres. In 1620, he was called by the church of Paris. In 1625, he was married to the daughter of a rich merchant, residing at Paris, by whom he had sixteen children. About that time he published an excellent book "On the Preparation for the Lord's Supper;" and shortly afterwards, his "Short View of Controversies;" and "Consolations against the Fear of Death." His justly celebrated "Charitable Visits," in five volumes, are of a later date. The work is inimitable: into six different languages it has been translated. Many a pious heart has been cheered by its perusal; many a divine assisted in the discharge of his ministerial functions, by its directions; and many a tear of gratitude and delight has fallen on its pages. If he had never written any other book, Drellincourt would not have lived in vain. His sermons which were published, like those which were merely preached, were pious and affecting. His religion was vital, experimental, and therefore it was operative. It produced an evident and delightful serenity; an amiability of disposition; a kindness of deportment; a warm desire for usefulness, and for the salvation of his species. But his writings were not exclusively practical. When what he regarded to be the cause of truth was concerned, he was bold as a lion, though gentle as a lamb. He wrote many books against the church of Rome; but he was not a persecutor of that church. He was a friend to universal toleration, and only sought to extend the cause of truth, by the influence of knowledge, the preaching of the gospel, and the publication of books calculated to develop the absurdities of its superstitious rites, and of its unscriptural doctrines. His character was generally and justly esteemed; monarchs and princes loved and admired him, cultivated his society, and assisted in distributing his writings; posterity has ratified such approbation, and the name of Drellincourt is loved by every Christian, and by all who value sincerity, candor, generosity, and piety. Happily for the world, his life was long protracted, and that till the age of seventy-four: possessing, to the last, all the faculties of his mind, and the feelings of his heart, he continued to benefit the present and all succeeding generations, by his example, his writings, and his charities. He expired on the 3d of November, 1699, regretted by the good, respected by the worldly, and revered by all men; and left behind him a "good name," which is "better than riches." See Memoirs of Drellincourt.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

DROMEDARY. (See CAMEL.)

DRUIDS; the priests or ministers of religion among the ancient Gauls, Britons, and Germans, who resembled, in many respects, the brahmins of India. They were chosen out of the best families; and the honors of their birth, joined with those of their function, procured them the highest veneration among the people. They were versed in astrology, geometry, natural philosophy, politics, and geography; they were the interpreters of religion, and the judges of all affairs indifferently. Whoever refused obedience to them, was declared impious and accursed. We know but little as to their peculiar doctrines, only that they believed the immortality of the soul, and, as is generally also supposed, the transmigration of it to other bodies; though a late author makes it appear highly probable they did not believe this last, at least not in the sense of the Pythagoreans. The chief settlement of the druids in Britain was in the isle of Anglesey, the ancient Mona, which they might choose for this purpose, as it is well stored with precious groves of their favorite oak. They were divided into several classes or branches, such as the priests, the poets, the augurs, the civil judges, and instructors of youth. Strabo, however, does not comprehend all these different orders under the denomination of druids. He only distinguishes three kinds: baridi, poets; the vates, priests and naturalists; and the druidi, who, besides the study of nature, applied themselves likewise to morality.

Their garments were remarkably long, and when employed in religious ceremonies, they likewise wore a white surplice. They generally carried a wand in their hands, and wore a kind of ornament, encased with gold, about their necks, called the druid's egg. They had one chief, or arch-druid, in every nation, who acted as high-priest, or pontifex maximus. He had absolute authority over the rest, and commanded, decreed, and punished at pleasure. They worshipped the supreme Being under the name of Esus or Hesus, and the symbol of the oak; and had no other temple than a wood or a grove, where all their religious rites were performed. Nor was any person permitted to enter that sacred recess unless he carried with him a chain, in token of his absolute dependence on the Deity. Indeed their whole religion originally consisted in acknowledging that the supreme Being, who made his abode in these sacred groves, governed the universe; and that every creature ought to obey his laws, and pay him divine homage. Mr.

Bryant, however, maintains that they were idolaters, and that the sun was the grand object of their worship. They considered the oak as the emblem, or rather the peculiar residence of the Almighty; and accordingly chaplets of it were worn, both by the druids and people, in their religious ceremonies; the altars were strewed with its leaves, and encircled with its branches. The fruit of it, especially the mistletoe, was thought to contain a divine virtue, and to be the peculiar gift of heaven. It was, therefore, sought for on the sixth day of the moon with the greatest earnestness and anxiety; and when found, was hailed with such rapture of joy, as almost exceeds imagination to conceive. As soon as the druids were informed of the fortunate discovery, they prepared every thing ready for the sacrifice under the oak, (see Ezek. 6: 13.) to which they fastened two white bulls by the horns; then the arch-druid, attended by a prodigious number of people, ascended the tree, dressed in white; and, with a consecrated golden knife, or pruning hook, cropped the mistletoe, which he received in his robe, amidst the rapturous exclamations of the people. Having secured this sacred plant, he descended the tree, the bulls were sacrificed, and the Deity invoked to bless his own gift, and render it efficacious in those distempers in which it should be administered. According to Cæsar, they in some cases offered human victims, and that upon the conviction that human blood was required to atone for human guilt.—Hand. Buck; Williams.

DRUNKENNESS; a well-known and debasing indisposition, produced by excessive drinking. The first instance of intoxication on record is that of Noah, (Gen. 9: 21.) who was probably ignorant of the effects of the expressed juice of the grape. The sin of drunkenness is most expressly condemned in the Scriptures, Rom. 13: 13. 1 Cor. 6: 9, 10. Eph. 5: 18. 1 Thess. 5: 7, 8. Men are sometimes represented as drunk with sorrow, with afflictions, and with the wine of God's wrath, Isa. 63: 6. Jer. 51: 57. Ezek. 23: 33. Persons under the influence of superstition, idolatry, and delusion, are said to be drunk, because they make no use of their natural reason, Isa. 28: 7. Rev. 17: 2. Drunkenness sometimes denotes abundance, satiety, Deut. 32: 42. Isa. 49: 26. To "add drunkenness to thirst," (Deut. 29: 19.) is to add one sin to another. (See INTEMPERANCE.)—Colmet.

DRUSES; a remarkable people and sect, inhabiting different parts of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, and certain other regions of Syria and Palestine, but whose principal seat is Kesroan, a district on mount Lebanon, towards the Mediærranean sea.

The Druses are divided into two classes: 1. The Djahals, ignorant or uninitiated, who compose the greater part, and even the emir himself, who is not permitted to interfere in any way in matters of religion. They appear to have no definite religion whatever, but conform to that which happens to predominate, in order to conceal the fact that they belong to any particular sect. They make no distinction of meats, drink wine, marry wives from among those who are not Druses, and wear a variegated dress. 2. The Akkals, "intelligent, initiated," form a sacred or aristocratic order, who perform the ceremonies of their religion in their oratories, but under circumstances of such profound secrecy, that their character or nature has never been discovered. Should any of the uninitiated happen to witness any part of their religious service, he is instantly put to death. They are excessively rigid as it regards their religion; live temperately, on food peculiar to themselves; eat not with strangers; marry wives of their own order; and never take an oath, but confirm their declarations by the words, "I have said it." From them the spiritual or ecclesiastical head, the imam of the Druses, is chosen, whom both the initiated and uninitiated regard with profound veneration.

According to Malte Brun, the number of the Druses amounts to one hundred and twenty thousand; but Mr. Connor, late a missionary in those parts, rates them at seventy thousand; of whom ten thousand compose the Akkals or sacred order.

With respect to their religious belief, they profess themselves to be Muttawahedin, or Unitarians, who believe in Hakem, to whom they give the characters, "The creator of heaven and earth; the only adorable God in heaven, and the only Lord on earth; the one, the solitary, who is without wife and children; who begets not and is not begotten; who acts according to his sovereign pleasure; who says to all things, Be, and they are; the beginning and the end of all things; the powerful, the excellent, the victorious. I am, he says, the foundation of the new religion, the Lord, the way, the written book, the inhabited house; I am he who knows all things of himself; the Lord of the resurrection and the new life; I am he who animates the creatures, the water of life, the author of prosperity; I give laws and annul them; I cause men to die, and declare martyrdom to be nothing; I am a consuming fire that consumes the proud," &c. They acknowledge seven lawgivers: Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Mahomet, and Said. The first being that follows in rank to Hakem, is Hamsah, who appeared in the time of Adam, by the name of Shatnil; in that of Noah by that of Fitagurus; in Abraham's time by that of David; under Moses he was called Shoab; in the time of Jesus his name was Lazarus; in that of Mahomet, Soliman; and in that of Said, Zalech. These seven lawgivers were inhabited by the same soul, which went from body to body, according to the rules of the metempsychosis. Though Hamsah might have prevented Jesus from carrying his plan into execution, he permitted him to establish his religion, partly in order that it might be the means of overthrowing the Jewish polity, and partly that there might be another predominant religion, under which he and his Unitarians might live concealed. He attempted to teach Christ; but on his rejecting the proffered tuition, he stirred up the Jews against him, and they killed him. Christ was the false, Hamsah the true Messiah. It is of Hamsah the four evangelists write, so that the Christians are completely deceived, and can only be delivered from error and all evil by becoming Unitarians.

Of Mahomet they entertain a worse opinion; maintaining that he was an evil demon, a son of whoredom, and accursed. The Mahometans are the flood which has deluged the world. The Druses do not practice circumcision.

According to their catechism, Hakem first became visible in the year of the Hegira 400, but did not reveal his divinity; in the year 408, his divine nature was manifested, and continued visible for eight years; in the ninth he disappeared, and will not again be revealed till the day of judgment, the time of which is unknown, but its sign is when the Christians have subdued the Mahometans. Judgment will be held on the four classes of men: Christians, Jews, Apostates, and Unitarians. To the Jews are reckoned the Mahometans, and the Apostates are those who desert the faith of Hakem. At the judgment, the Unitarians shall be rewarded with empire and dominion, treasures of gold and silver, and shall be promoted to be emirs, pashas, and sultans. The torments of the Apostates shall be dreadfully severe; those of the Jews and Christians more lenient. They believe in ten incarnations of Hakem; and seven revelations of Hamsah.

The Druses receive the four gospels, only apply what is said of Christ to Hamsah; and they profess to receive the Koran, but only as a cloak to screen them from the Mahometans. Owing, most probably, to their living among the Maronites, several appear of late to have embraced the outward form of Christianity. The present emir, Beshir Shehab, and a portion of his family, have embraced the doctrines of the Maronites.—Hand. Buck.

DRUSILLA, the third daughter of that Herod Agrippa, who put to death the apostle James, and imprisoned Peter, and who was himself judicially smitten in the midst of his oration at Cesarea. She was renowned for her beauty, but was far from being remarkable for either her piety or chastity. She was first promised in marriage to Epiphanes, the son of Antiochus, king of Comagena, upon an assurance from this prince that he would be circumcised; but he refusing to perform the condition, the marriage was broke off, and she was afterwards married to Azizus, king of the Emisseniens. In a little time, however, she left Azizus, to marry Claudius Felix, governor of Judea, by whom she had a son, whose name was Agrippa. Before Drusilla, and her husband Felix, the apostle Paul appeared and defended his Christian profession. Acts 24: 24.—Jones.

DUALIST; a name given to those who held the two original and opposite principles of good and evil, from which all things have sprung.—Hend. Buck.

DUCHOBORTZI, or "WRESTLERS WITH THE SPIRIT;" a sect of Russian dissenters, inhabiting the right bank of the river Moloshnaia, near the sea of Azof. Their number, in the year 1818, amounted to 1153 souls. They have been called the Russian Quakers; and much as the more enlightened members of the society of Friends would find to object to among them, it cannot be denied that in many points they resemble them. Their name indicates the strong bearing which their system has on mystical exercises, in which they place the whole of religion, to the exclusion of all external rites and ceremonies. All their knowledge, they pretend, is traditionary. They profess to have the Bible in their hearts; the light within is sufficient, they need nothing more. Every thing with them is mystical. They speak of Christ, and his death; but they explain both his person and sufferings mystically, and build their hopes entirely on themselves. They make no distinction of days or meats; and marriage, so far from being a sacrament with them, as in the Greek church, is scarcely viewed as a civil institution.—Hend. Buck.

DUDITH, (ANDREW,) one of the most learned and eminent men of the sixteenth century. He was born at Buda, in Hungary, in 1533, and, after having studied in the most famous universities, and visited almost all the countries of Europe, was raised to the bishopric of Tinia by the emperor Ferdinand, and made privy counsellor to that prince. He had, by the force of his genius, and the study of the ancient orators, acquired such a mastery and irresistible eloquence, that in all public deliberations, he carried every thing before him. In the council of Trent, to which he was sent in the name of the emperor, and of the Hungarian clergy, he spoke with such energy against several abuses of the church of Rome, and particularly against the celibacy of the clergy, that the pope, being informed thereof by his legates, solicited the emperor to recall him. Ferdinand complied, but, having heard Dudith's report of what passed in the council, he approved his conduct, and rewarded him with the bishopric of Chonat. Dudith afterwards married a maid of honor of the queen of Hungary, and resigned his bishopric; the emperor, however, still continued his friend and protector. The papal excommunication was levelled at his head; but he treated it with contempt. Tired of the fopperies and superstitions of the church of Rome, he retired to Cracow, when he publicly embraced the Protestant religion, after having been for a considerable time its secret friend. It is said that he showed some inclination toward the Socinian system; some of his friends deny this; others confess it, but maintain that he afterwards changed his sentiments in that respect. He was well acquainted with several branches of philosophy, and mathematics, with physic, history, theology, and civil law. He was in early life such an enthusiastic admirer of Cicero, that he copied over three times, with his own hand, all the works of that immortal author. He had something majestic in his figure, and in the air of his countenance. His life was regular and virtuous; his manners were elegant and easy; and his benevolence warm and extensive. In the latter years of his life, he became a member and an occasional teacher of the Baptist church, in Smia, a town in Poland, which belonged to him. He died at Breslaw in Silesia, in 1589, aged fifty-six.

The greatest man among the Baptists at the Reformation, says Robinson, was the celebrated, the amiable, the incomparable Dudith; a man to be held in everlasting remembrance, much for his rank, more for his abilities and virtues, most of all for his love of liberty. In this, he was altogether in advance of his age. Persecution he abhorred. In a letter to Beza, he observes, "You try to justify the banishment of Ochin, and the execution of others, and you seek to wish Poland would follow your example. God forbid! When you talk of your Augsburg confession, and your Helvetic creed, and your unanimity, and your fundamental truths, I keep thinking of the sixth commandment, Thou shalt not kill!"—Mosheim; Benedict's Hts. Bap.

DUKE. This word, being a title of honor in use among Europeans, and signifying a higher order of nobility, is apt to mislead the reader, who in Gen. 36: 15—43. finds a long list of dukes of Edom; but the word duke, from the Latin dux, merely signifies a leader or chief, and the word chief ought rather to have been preferred in our translation. See 1 Chron. 1: 51.—Calmet.

DULCIMER, (Dan. 3: 5, 10.) an instrument of music, as is usually thought; but the original word, sumpyona, which is Greek, renders it doubtful whether it really mean a musical instrument, or a musical strain, chorus, or accompaniment of many voices, or instruments, in concert and harmony. The rabbins however describe it as a sort of bagpipe; although the real dulcimer is a triangular instrument, of fifty wires, struck by an iron key. It is difficult to account for the introduction of a Greek word into the Chaldee language, unless we suppose that some musicians from Greece, or from western Asia, had been taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar, in his victories over the cities on the coast of the Mediterranean, and that these introduced certain of their own terms of art among the king's band of music; as we now use much of the language of Italy in our musical entertainments.—Calmet.

DULCINISTS; the followers of Dulcinus, a layman of Novara in Lombardy, about the beginning of the fourteenth century. He taught that the law of the Father, which had continued till Moses, was a law of grace and wisdom; but that the law of the Holy Ghost, which began with himself, in 1307, was a law entirely of love, which would last to the end of the world.—Hend. Buck.

DUMAH; a city of Judah, Josh. 15: 52. It is also a shortened form of speaking and writing Idumea. Gen. 25: 14. Isa. 21: 11. (See IDUMEA).—Calmet.

DUMB. (1.) One unable to speak by reason of natural infirmity, Exod. 4: 11. (2.) One unable to speak by reason of want of knowledge what to say, or how to say it; what proper mode of address to use, or what reasons to allege on his own behalf, Prov. 31: 8. (3.) One unwilling to speak, Psal. 39: 9. We have a remarkable instance of this reverential dumbness, or submissive silence, in the case of Aaron, (Lev. 10: 3.) after Nadab and Abihu, his sons, were consumed by fire. "Aaron held his peace!" did not exclaim against the justice of God, but saw the propriety of the divine procedure, and humbly acquiesced in it.—Calmet.

DU MOULIN, (PETER, D. D.) This very celebrated French Protestant minister was born at Vixen in 1568. He imbibed the rudiments of literature at Sedan; but at twenty, was sent to finish his education in England, where he became a member of Christ college, Cambridge. Four years after, he went to Holland, where, being favored by the French ambassador, he obtained from the queen mother the professorship of philosophy at Leyden. This he held six years, and among his scholars was the famous Grotius. He published his "Logic" in 1596. He taught Greek also in the divinity schools, and in his Novitas Papismi, he exposes cardinal Perron's ignorance of that language. In 1599, he went to Paris to be minister of Charenton, and chaplain to Catharine of Bourbon, the king's sister, whom he confirmed in the Protestant faith, in spite of all the efforts of the pope, the king, and his divines. He was however greatly respected by Henry IV. and after the death of that monarch, publicly charged the Jesuits with the plot of his assassination by Ravillac. In 1615, he visited England, at the request of James I. by whom he was received with great affection, and who conferred several honors on him. His incessant controversies with the Jesuits often exposed his life, so that he was obliged at length to have a guard always around him. They had previously tried bribes, but in vain. In 1620, he accepted the professorship of divinity and ministry of the church at Sedan, both which he held till his death, in 1638, at the advanced age of ninety. His death, though full of the deepest christian humility, was most triumphant. Every now and then, when he seemed to slumber, he would whisper out short sentences from an overflowing heart; as, "The Word was made flesh! Death is swallowed up in victory! I desire to depart and be with Christ! O see him! O how beautiful he is!"—Middleton, vol. iii. 369.

DUNG. The directions given to the prophet Ezekiel, (chap. 4: 12—16.) have been much misunderstood, and have also given occasion for many impertinent remarks.

Niebuhr, Tournefort, and Le Bruyn, however, who are describing much the same country, deserve our marked attention, as likely to illustrate the history of the prophet Ezekiel. Le Bruyn assures us that in Persia, human dung is used, to heat ovens for the purpose of baking food, (consequently Mr. Harmer mistakes, when he says, "no nation made use of that horrid kind of fuel,") and against this Ezekiel remonstrates and petitions, till he procures leave to use a fuel, which, though bad enough, is not quite so bad. Does not the prophet's solicitation for his personal relief from that defilement, imply his hope of the same alleviation, in respect to those whom he typified, i. e. the Jewish people?—Calmet.

DUNKERS; a denomination of Seventh-day Baptists, which took its rise in the year 1724. It was founded by Conrad Beissel, a German, who received a regular education at Halle, and took orders as a minister; but being persecuted for his opinions on some points in theology, he left Europe, and retired to an agreeable solitude within fifty miles of Philadelphia, for the more free exercise of religious contemplation. Curiosity attracted followers, and his simple and engaging manners made them proselytes. They soon settled a little colony, called Euphrate, in allusion to the Hebrews, who used to sing psalms on the borders of the river Euphrates. This denomination seem to have obtained their name from their baptizing their new converts by plunging. They are also called Tumblers, from the manner in which they performed baptism, which is by putting the person, while kneeling, head first under water, so as to resemble the motion of the body in the action of tumbling. They use the trine immersion, with laying on the hands and prayer, even when the person baptized is in the water.

Their habit seems to be peculiar to themselves, consisting of a long tunic, or coat, reaching down to their heels, with a sash or girdle round the waist, and a cap, or hood, hanging from the shoulders, like the dress of the Dominican friars. The men do not shave the head or beard. The men and women have separate habitations and distinct governments. For these purposes they have erected two large wooden buildings, one of which is occupied by the brethren, the other by the sisters of the society; and in each of them there is a banqueting-room, and an apartment for public worship; for the brethren and sisters do not meet together, even at their devotions. They used to live chiefly upon roots and other vegetables, the rules of their society not allowing them flesh, except on particular occasions, when they hold what they call a love feast; at which time the brethren and sisters dine together in a large apartment, and eat mutton, but no other meat. In each of their little cells, they have a bench fixed, to serve the purpose of a bed, and a small block of wood for a pillow. They allow of marriage, and aid their poorer brethren who enter the matrimonial state; but they nevertheless consider celibacy as a virtue. The principal tenets of the Dunkers appear to be these: that future happiness is only to be attained by penance and outward mortification in this life; and that as Jesus Christ, by his meritorious sufferings, became the Redeemer of mankind in general, so each individual of the human race, by a life of abstinence and restraint, may work out his own salvation. Nay, they go so far as to admit of works of supererogation, and declare that a man may do much more than he is in justice or equity obliged to do, and that his superabundant works may therefore be applied to the salvation of others. This denomination deny the eternity of future punishments, and believe that the dead have the gospel preached to them by our Savior, and that the souls of the just are employed to preach the gospel to those who have had no revelation in this life. They suppose the Jewish sabbath, sabbatical year and year of jubilee, are typical of certain periods, after the general judgment, in which the souls of those who are not then admitted into happiness are purified from their corruption. If any within those smaller periods are so far humbled as to acknowledge the perfections of God, and to own Christ as their only Savior, they are received to felicity; while those who continue obstinate are reserved in torments until the grand period typified by the jubilee arrives, in which all shall be made happy in the endless fruition of the Deity. They also deny the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity. They disclaim violence even in cases of self-defence, and suffer themselves to be defrauded or wronged rather than go to law.

Their church government and discipline are the same with the Baptists in general, except that every brother is allowed to speak in the congregation; and their best speaker is usually ordained to be the minister. They have deacons and deaconesses from among their ancient widows and exhorters, who are all licensed to use their gifts steadily. The members of the society are now much dispersed, and the members in the adjacent country differ in no respect from their neighbors in dress or manners; though they maintain the faith of their fathers, and are remarked for their exemplary lives and deportment.—Head. Buck.

DUNS, (JONN,) usually known as Duns Scotus, and whose acuteness in disputation gained him the appellation of the Subtle Doctor, was born at Dunstan, in Northumberland, late in the thirteenth century; studied at Merton college, Oxford; and became head of the schools at the university at Paris. He died, at Cologne, about the year 1309. His works, proofs of perverted talent, form twelve folio volumes. He differed from Aquinas on the efficacy of divine grace, and his followers were called Scotists. To him is also attributed the doctrine of the holy virgin's immaculate conception.—Davenport.

DURIN, (LOUIS ELLIES,) an ecclesiastical historian, was born, in Normandy, in 1637; studied at Harcourt college and the Sorbonne; and became professor of divinity in the Royal college. The professorship, however, he lost, in consequence of his religious moderation; and his papers were seized, because he had corresponded with Wake, archbishop of Canterbury, relative to a project for uniting the English and Gallican churches. He was also persecuted by Bossuet and De Harlay, for the candor which he displayed in his great work, The Universal Library of Ecclesiastical Authors, in fifty-eight vols. Besides that work, Dupin wrote many others, and contributed to the Journal des Savans. He died in 1719.—Davenport.

DURA; a great plain near Babylon, where Nebuchadnezzar erected a colossal image of gold to be worshipped, Dan. 3: 1. (See BABYLON).—Calmet.

DURAND, (DAVID,) a Protestant minister, was born, in 1681, at Pargoire, in Lower Languedoc. As chaplain of a regiment of refugees, he was present at the battle of Almanza. Being taken prisoner by the peasants, after the rout of the allies, he narrowly escaped death; and he was, subsequently, in equal danger from the Inquisition. He escaped, however, and became a minister in Holland, whence he was invited to be preacher to the Savoy, in London. He died in 1763. Among his works are, Sermons; a Life of Vanini; a History of the Sixteenth Century; and a Continuation of Rapin.—Davenport.

DURSIANS, or DERUZIANs; a fierce people, formerly inhabiting the wilds of mount Libanus, and in the eleventh century engaged in the holy war. There is evidence that they understood some of the principles, and perhaps made a general profession, of Christianity; but their peculiar tenets were kept so secret, that they cannot now be ascertained with certainty. It is probable, however, from many circumstances, that they were the descendants of the early Druses. This may be inferred from their name, residence, corresponding character, and hatred to the Turks, which was very likely to engage them in such an expedition, though the fact cannot be historically traced. Dr. Mosheim suspects them to be Manichæans; but it seems more likely, they picked up their loose and imperfect notions of Christianity from some of the fanatics engaged in the crusades.—Mosheim's Ecl. Hist. vol. iv. p. 270.—Williams.

DUST, or ashes, cast on the head was a sign of mourning, (Josh. 7: 6.) sitting in the dust, a sign of affliction, Lam. 3: 29. Isaiah 47: 1. The dust also denotes the grave, Gen. 3: 19. Job 7: 21. Psalm 22: 15. It is put for a great multitude, Gen. 13: 16. Numbers 23: 10. It signifies a low or mean condition, 1 Sam. 2: 8. Nahum

3: 18. To shake or wipe off the dust of a place from one's feet, marks the renouncing of all intercourse with it in future. God threatens the Jews with ruin of dust, &c., Deut. 28: 24. An extract from Sir T. Roe's embassy may cast light on this: "Sometimes, in India, the wind blows very high in hot and dry seasons, raising up into the air a very great height, thick clouds of dust and sand. These dry showers most grievously annoy all those among whom they fall; enough to smite them all with present blindness; filling their eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouths too, if not well guarded; searching every place, as well within as without, so that there is not a little key-hole of any trunk or cabinet, if it be not covered, but receives this dust; add to this, that the fields, brooks, and gardens suffer extremely from these terrible showers."

2. In almost every part of Asia, those who demand justice against a criminal throw dust upon him, signifying that he deserves to lose his life, and be cast into the grave; and that this is the true interpretation of the action, is evident from an imprecation in common use among the Turks and Persians, "Be covered with earth!" "Earth be upon thy head." We have two remarkable instances of casting dust recorded in Scripture: the first is that of Shimei, who gave vent to his secret hostility to David, when he fled before his rebellious son, by throwing stones at him, and casting dust, 2 Sam. 16: 13. It was an ancient custom, in those warm and arid countries, to lay the dust before a person of distinction, and particularly before kings and princes, by sprinkling the ground with water. To throw dust into the air while a person was passing, was therefore an act of great disrespect; to do so before a sovereign prince, an indecent outrage. But it is clear that Shimei meant more than disrespect and outrage to an afflicted king, whose subject he was; he intended to signify by that action, that David was unfit to live, and that the time was at last arrived to offer him a sacrifice to the ambition and vengeance of the house of Saul. This view of his conduct is confirmed by the behavior of the Jews to the apostle Paul, when they seized him in the temple, and had nearly succeeded in putting him to death; they cried out, "Away with such a fellow from the earth, for it is not fit that he should live; and as they cried out and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air, the chief captain commanded him to be brought into the castle," Acts 22: 23. A great similarity appears between the conduct of the Jews on this occasion, and the behavior of the peasants in Persia, when they go to court to complain of the governors, whose oppressions they can no longer endure. They carry their complaints against their governors by companies, consisting of several hundreds, and sometimes of a thousand; they repair to that gate of the palace nearest to which their prince is most likely to be, where they set themselves to make the most horrid cries, tearing their garments, and throwing dust into the air, and demanding justice. The king, upon hearing these cries, sends to know the occasion of them: the people deliver their complaints in writing, upon which he informs them that he will commit the cognizance of the affair to such an one as he names; and in consequence of this, justice is usually obtained.—Watson.

DUTY; any action, or course of actions, which flow from the relations we stand in to God or man; that which a man is bound to perform by any natural or legal obligation. The various moral, relative, and spiritual duties are considered in their places in this work.—Hend. Buck.

DUVEIL, (CHARLES MARIA, D. D.) a divine of great reputation in the seventeenth century, was by birth a Jew, but became a convert to Christianity. In his quest of divine truth, after passing through the church of Rome, and the church of England, he embraced the views of the Baptists, and settled as pastor of the Baptist congregation in Grace church street, London. He was much supported, notwithstanding the change in his sentiments, by many of the dignified clergy, among whom were Drs. Stillingfleet, Sharp, Tillotson, Patrick, and Lloyd. Dr. Duvell published a literal exposition of the gospels of Mark and Luke; also of the Acts of the Apostles, and of the minor prophets.—Benedict's Hss. Bap.

DWELL. God dwells in light, in respect of his delight in, and independent possession of his own glorious excellences, and in respect of his glorious residence amid rays of inexpressible glory in heaven. 1 Tim. 6: 16. 1 John 1: 7. He dwells in heaven, in respect of his continued and delightful residence of his presence there. Ps. 123: 1. He dwells in the tabernacle, temple, and city of Jerusalem; there the symbols of his presence were continued. Ps. 132: 14. and 68: 16. He dwells in his church, and in, and with his people, in the continued bestowal of his ordinances, and of his gracious, supporting, and comforting influences. Ps. 9: 11. 1 John 4: 12. Isa. 57: 15. The fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily in Christ; the divine nature personally, perpetually, and truly resides in his human nature, by the closest union with it. Col. 2: 9. Christ dwelt among men in his state of humiliation on earth. John 1: 14. He dwells in our heart by faith, he is united to us as our head and husband; his righteousness is imputed to us, and applied to our conscience; his spirit and grace are fixed in our heart; he loves and delights in us, and furnishes our whole soul with his fulness. Eph. 3: 17. The Holy Spirit dwells in us by personal residence, and gracious influence. Rom. 8: and 9: 2 Tim. 1: 14. 1 Cor. 3: 16. The word of God dwells in us richly, when it is carefully studied, firmly believed, closely applied, and diligently practised. Col. 3: 16. Ps. 119: 11. The saints dwell in God, and in Christ; they are united to, and nourished, supported and comforted by him, and have sweet intimacy and fellowship with him. 1 John 3: 24, and 4: 16. They dwell in love, when they live in the faith of God's redeeming love to them, and in the exercise of love to him and his people. 1 John 4: 15. Wickedness, vengeance, or judgment dwells in or on a person or land, when it long continues there. Job 11: 14, and 18: 15. Isa. 32: 16.—Drown.

DWIGHT, (TIMOTHY, S. T. D., LL. D.) president of Yale college, Connecticut, one of the few men who by uncommon powers of mind, by exalted piety, by peculiar incidents of life, by having exerted a commanding influence on the interests of the public, and acquired an unusual share in their affections, have given their names as a peculiar treasure to the Christian church, to their country, and to posterity.

He was born in Northampton, Massachusetts, May 14, 1752. His father was a respectable and opulent merchant, a man of sincere and unaffected piety, of excellent understanding, and unblemished character. His mother was the third daughter of the celebrated Jonathan Edwards, pastor of the church at Northampton, afterwards president of Nassau hall. She was a woman of vigorous and discriminating intellect, and for extent and variety of knowledge has rarely been exceeded by any of her sex in this country. "It was a maxim with her, the soundness of which her own observation through life fully confirmed, that children generally lose several years in consequence of being considered by their friends as too young to be taught." She began, therefore, the instruction of her son almost as soon as he could speak, and such was his eagerness and capacity for improvement, that he learned the alphabet at a single lesson; and at the age of four, could read the Bible with ease and correctness. "With his father's example before him, enforced and recommended by the precepts of his mother, he was sedulously instructed in the doctrines of religion, as well as the whole circle of moral duties. She taught him from the very dawn of his reason to fear God and to keep his commandments, to be conscientiously just, kind, affectionate, charitable and forgiving, to preserve, on all occasions and under all circumstances, the most sacred regard to truth, and to relieve the necessities, and supply the wants of the poor and unfortunate. She also aimed at a very early period to enlighten his conscience, to make him afraid of sin, and to teach him to hope for pardon only through the righteousness of Christ. The impressions thus made upon his mind in infancy were never erased." His biographer adds, "Her school room was the nursery. Here he had his regular hours for study as in a school; and twice every day she heard him repeat his lessons. He was then for limited periods permitted to read such books as he chose." He often, at these times, read over the historical parts of the Bible, and gave an account of them to his mother. The minutest incidents in them were thus deeply and distinctly fixed in his memory; and to this circumstance we are probably indebted for his epic poem, "The Conquest of Canaan," if not for his fine "Dissertation on the History, Eloquence and Poetry of the Bible," which at the age of twenty procured him so much honor.

From the age of six to twelve, he made such rapid and extraordinary advances in every kind of knowledge, that he would have been ready for admission into Yale college at eight; and when he actually did enter at thirteen, he was already master of history, geography, and the classics.

The last two years of his college life, he devoted fourteen hours each day to close study. His acquisitions were very great; but his sight was irreparably injured by this excessive application. He was graduated in 1769, among the first of his class. For two years afterwards he taught a grammar school at New Haven with great reputation. His time here was regularly divided, and occupied; six hours each day in school; eight in close and secure study; ten in exercise and sleep.

After far outstripping his rivals in the career of literature, he was called to become a tutor in Yale college at the age of nineteen. This office he filled with advantage to the institution and credit to himself. Being licensed as a preacher, he was chosen a chaplain in the American army, in 1777. Soon after this appointment, his father, however, died; and he was compelled to resign his situation, and to take charge of his mother and a large family. Thus he passed five years of his life, during which he twice consented to serve the town as their representative in the state legislature. In May, 1795, he was elected president of Yale college. This was a situation eminently adapted to him, and one in which he was enabled to advance the interests of learning and religion. When Dr. Dwight entered upon his arduous duties, the students were infected with infidelity; but in consequence of the efforts of his wisdom, prudence, zeal, and learning, alike firm and well principled, he succeeded to a great degree, in expelling opinions so inimical to the best interests of society. Afflicted by a disorder in his eyes, he was compelled, in after-years, to employ an amanuensis to pen from his lips his sermons. As a preacher, he was distinguished by the originality and copiousness of his ideas; the simplicity, fulness, and force of his language; and the dignity, propriety, and seriousness of his manner. As a professor of theology, he was equally eminent; and his "Theology explained and defended," in five volumes, octavo, should be possessed by every student in divinity. He also wrote "Travels in New England and New York," four volumes, octavo; two Sermons on "The Dangers of the Infidel Philosophy," and various other discourses. Dr. Dwight continued to discharge the duties of his station, both as a minister, and president of the college, and professor of theology, to the age of sixty-five; when, after a long and painful illness, he expired, on January the 11th, 1817. His last words were, in reference to the 8th of Romans and the 17th of John, which had been read to him at his request, "O what triumphant truths!"

Two volumes of his sermons were published after his death. All his works are in high esteem, both in this country and in Europe.—Memoir; Jones's Chris. Biog.

EAGLE; (nesher), Exod. 19: 4. Lev. 11: 13. The name is derived from a verb which signifies to lacerate, or tear

His eyes discern afar off,
Even his young ones drink down blood;
And wherever is slaughter, there is he.

Alluding to the popular opinion that the eagle assists its feeble young in their flight, by bearing them up on its own pinions, Moses represents Jehovah as saying, "Ye have seen what I did to the Egyptians, and how I bore you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself," Exod. 19: 4. Schencher has quoted from an ancient poet, the following beautiful paraphrase on this passage:—

*Ac velut ailtuum princeps, fultusque tonantis
Armiger, implumes, et adhuc sine robore natus
Sollicita refovet cura, pinguisque ferina
Indulget pastus: mox ut cum viribus alia
Vesticeps crevere, vocat se blandior aura,
Expansa invitat pluma, dorsoque morantes
Excipit, attollitque humeris, plusaque secundo
Pertur in arca, timens oneri, et tamen impete presso
Remigium tentans alarum, incurvaque pinnis
Vela legens, humiles tranat sub nubibus oras.
Hinc sensim supra alta petit, jam jamque sub astra
Erigitur, cursusque leces citius uget in auras,
Omnia percolans late loca, et agmine factus
Perturque refertque suos curia, moremque volandi
Adlocet: illi autem, longa assuetudine docti,
Paulatim incipiunt pennis se credere caelo
Impavidi: tantum a teneris valet addere curam.*

2. When Balaam delivered his predictions respecting the fate that awaited the nations which he then particularized, he said of the Kenites, "Strong is thy dwelling, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock," (Num. 24: 21) alluding to that princely bird, the eagle, which not only delights in soaring to the loftiest heights, but chooses the highest rocks, and most elevated mountains, as desirable situations for erecting its nest, Hab. 2: 9. Obad. 4. What Job says concerning the eagle, which is to be understood in a literal sense, "Where the slain are, there is he," our Savior turns into a fine parable: "Whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together," (Matt. 24: 28.) that is, Wherever the guilty are, and however intermingled with the good, divine justice, with eagle eye, will not fail to detect them, and execute vengeance upon them, Luke 17: 37.

3. The swiftness of the flight of the eagle is alluded to in pieces. The eagle has always been considered as the king of birds, on account of its great strength, rapidity and elevation of flight, natural ferocity, and the terror it inspires into its fellows of the air. Its voracity is so great that a large extent of territory is requisite for the supply of proper sustenance; and Providence has therefore constituted it a solitary animal: two pair of eagles are never found in the same neighborhood, though the genus is dispersed through every quarter of the world. Its sight is quick, strong, and piercing, to a proverb. In Job 39: 27, the natural history of the eagle is finely drawn up:—

Is it at thy voice that the eagle soars?
And therefore maketh his nest on high?
The rock, is the place of his habitation.
He abides on the crag, the place of strength.
Thence he pounces upon his prey.

in several passages of Scripture; as, "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from afar, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth," Deut. 28: 49. In the affecting lamentation of David over Saul and Jonathan, their impetuous and rapid career is described in forcible terms: "They were swifter than eagles; they were stronger than lions," 2 Sam. 1: 23. Jeremiah, when he beheld in vision the march of Nebuchadnezzar, cried, "Behold, he shall come up as clouds, and his chariots shall be as a whirlwind. His horses are swifter than eagles. Woe unto us, for we are spoiled," Jer. 4: 13. To the wide-expanded wings of the eagle, and the rapidity of its flight, the same prophet beautifully alludes in a subsequent chapter, where he describes the subversion of Moab by the same ruthless conqueror: "Behold, he shall fly as an eagle, and spread his wings over Moab," Jer. 48: 40. In the same manner he describes the sudden desolations of Ammon in the next chapter; but, when he turns his eye to the ruins of his own country, he exclaims, in still more energetic language, "Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of the heavens," Lam. 4: 19. Under the same comparison the patriarch Job describes the rapid flight of time: "My days are passed away, as the eagle that hasteth to the prey," Job 9: 26. The surprising rapidity with which the blessings of common providence sometimes vanish from the grasp of the possessor is thus described by Solomon: "Riches certainly make themselves wings: they fly away as an eagle towards heaven," Prov. 23: 5. The flight of this bird is as sublime as it is rapid and impetuous. None of the feathered race soar so high. In his daring excursions he is said to leave the clouds of heaven, and regions of thunder, and lightning and tempest, far beneath him, and to approach the very limits of ether. There is an allusion to this lofty soaring in the prophecy of Obadiah, concerning the pride of Moab: "Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the Lord," Obad. 4. The prophet Jeremiah pronounces the doom of Edom in similar terms: "O thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock, that holdest the height of the hill; though thou shouldst make thy nest high as the eagle, I will bring thee down from thence, saith the Lord," Jer. 49: 16. The eagle lives and retains its vigor to a great age; and, after moulting, renews its vigor so surprisingly, as to be said, hyperbolically, to become young again, Psalm 103: 5, and Isa. 40: 31. It is remarkable that Cyrus, compared, in Isaiah 46: 11, to an eagle, (so the word translated "ravenous bird" should be rendered,) had an eagle for his ensign, according to Xenophon, who uses, without knowing it, the identical word of the prophet, with only a Greek termination to it: so exact is the correspondence betwixt the prophet and the historian, the prediction and the event. Xenophon and other ancient historians inform us that the golden eagle with extended wings was the ensign of the Persian monarchs long before it was adopted by the Romans; and it is very probable that the Persians borrowed the symbol from the ancient Assyrians, in whose banners it waved, till imperial Babylon bowed her head to the yoke of Cyrus. Hos. 8: 1. Jer. 48: 40. 49: 22. Isa. 8: 8.—Watson.

E A R; the organ of hearing. The Scripture uses the term figurately. Uncircumcised ears are ears inattentive to the word of God. To signify God's regard to the prayers of his people, the psalmist says, "His ears are open to their cry," Psalm 34: 15. Among the Jews the slave, who renounced the privilege of being made free from servitude in the sabbatical year, submitted to have his ear bored through with an awl; which was done in the presence of some judge, or magistrate, that it might appear a voluntary act. The ceremony took place at his master's door, and was the mark of servitude and bondage. The psalmist says, in the person of the Messiah, "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened." Heb. "Thou hast digged my ears." This either means, Thou hast opened them, removed impediments, and made them attentive; or, Thou hast pierced them, as those of such servants were pierced, who chose to remain with their masters; and therefore imports the absolute and voluntary submission of Messiah to the will of the Father. "Make the ears of this people heavy," (Isa. 6: 10.) that is, render their minds inattentive and disobedient; the prophets being said often to do that of which they were the innocent occasion.—Watson.

E A R I N G; an agricultural term. There is a passage, (Gen. 45: 6.) which, if it has been occasionally misunderstood stood by a reader, may be pardoned:—"There remain five years, in which shall be neither E A R I N G nor harvest." It seems, that earing is an old English word for ploughing; the original word charish, is that usually rendered "ploughing," and why it should not be so translated here we cannot tell, as earing suggests the idea of gathering ears of corn after they are arrived at maturity; whereas Joseph means to say, "there shall be neither ploughing nor harvest during five years." The reader will perceive that this variation of import implies a totally different course of natural phenomena in Egypt; for the Nile must have risen so little as to have rendered ploughing hopeless; or, its waters must have been so abundant, as to have overflowed the country entirely, and to have annihilated the use of the plough: moreover, if no ploughing, no sowing; that is, harvest was not expected; consequently it was not prepared for, in respect of corn. No doubt but the Nile was deficient, it did not rise; the peasants, therefore, did not plough; and to this agrees the account of an ancient author, that for nine years together, the Nile did not rise to half a harvest. See also 1 Sam. 8: 12. Exod. 34: 21. Isa. 30: 24.—Calmet.

E A R N E S T; somewhat given in hand to give assurance, the what more is promised shall be given in due time. It differs from a pledge, as it is not taken back when full payment is made. The Holy Ghost and his influences are the earnest of our inheritance; are of the same nature, though not degree of application, with our eternal happiness; and they give us assurance that in due time it shall be bestowed upon us. 2 Cor. 1: 22, and 5: 5. Eph. 1: 14.—Brown; Ency. Amer.

E A R - R I N G S, and Nose-Jewels, were the favorite ornaments among the Eastern females. Both are frequently mentioned in Scripture. Sir John Chardin says, "It is the custom in almost all the East, for the women to wear rings in their noses, in the left nostril, which is bored low down in the middle. These rings are of gold, and have commonly two pearls and one ruby between them, placed in the ring; I never saw a girl, or young woman in Arabia, or in all Persia, who did not wear a ring after this manner in her nostril." His testimony is confirmed by that of Egmont and Dr. Russel. Two words are used in the Scriptures to denote these ornamental rings, nezem and agil. Mr. Harmer seems to think they properly signified ear-rings; but this is a mistake; the sacred writers use them promiscuously for the rings both of the nose and of the ears. That writer, however, is probably right in supposing that nezem is the name of a much smaller ring than agil. Chardin observed two sorts of rings in the East; one so small and close to the ear, that there is no vacancy between them; the other so large, as to admit the fore-finger between it and the ear; these last adorned with a ruby and a pearl on each side, strung on the ring. Some of these ear-rings had figures upon them, and strange characters, which he believed were talismans or charms; but which were probably the names and symbols of their false gods. We know from the testimony of Pliny, that rings with the images of their gods were worn by the Romans. The Indians say, they are preservatives against enchantment; upon which Chardin hazards a very probable conjecture, that the ear-rings of Jacob's family were perhaps of this kind, which might be the reason of his demanding them, that he might bury them under the oak before they went up to Bethel.—Watson.

EARTH. The restriction of the term "earth" to Judea is more common in Scripture than is usually supposed; and this acceptance of it has great effect on several passages, in which it ought to be so understood.

Earth in a moral sense is opposed to heaven, and to what is spiritual. "He that is of the earth is earthy, and speaketh of the earth; he that cometh from above is above all," John 3: 31. "If ye then be risen with Christ, set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth," Col. 3: 1, 2.—Watson.

EARTHLY; having the affections fixed on the affairs of this life: it is opposed to heavenly-mindedness. Jam. 3: 15.—Calmet.

EARTHQUAKE. The Scriptures speak of several earthquakes. One happened in the twenty-seventh year of Uzziah, king of Judah, in the year of the world 3221. This is mentioned in Amos 1: 1, and in Zechariah 14: 5. Josephus says that its violence divided a mountain, which lay west of Jerusalem, and drove one part of it four furlongs. A very memorable earthquake is that which happened at our Savior's death, Matt. 27: 51. Many have thought that this was perceived throughout the world. Others are of opinion that it was felt only in Judea, or even in the temple at Jerusalem. St. Cyril of Jerusalem says, that the rocks upon mount Calvary were shown in his time, which had been rent asunder by this earthquake. Maundrell and Saadya testify the same, and say that they examined the breaches in the rock, and were convinced that they were the effects of an earthquake. It must have been terrible, since the centurion and those with him were so affected by it, as to acknowledge the innocence of our Savior, Luke 23: 47. Phlegon, Adrian's freedman, relates that, together with the eclipse, which happened at noon-day, in the fourth year of the two hundred and second Olympiad, or A. D. 33, a very great earthquake was also felt, principally in Bithynia. The effects of God's power, wrath, and vengeance are compared to earthquakes, Psalm 18: 7, 46: 2, 114: 4. An earthquake signifies also, in prophetic language, the dissolution of governments and the overthrow of states.—Watson.

EAST; one of the four cardinal points of the world; namely, that particular point of the horizon in which the sun is seen to rise. The Hebrews express the east, west, north, and south, by words which signify before, behind, left, and right, according to the situation of a man who has his face turned towards the east. By the east, they frequently describe, not only Arabia Deserta, and the lands of Moab and Ammoo, which lay to the east of Palestine, but also Assyria, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea, though they are situated rather to the north than to the east of Judea. Balaam, Cyrus, and the wise men who visited Bethlehem at the time Christ was born, are said to come from the east, Num. 23: 7. Isa. 46: 11. Matt. 2: 1.—Watson.

EASTBURN, (JOSEPH;) a preacher to seamen in Philadelphia, who died January 30, 1828, aged seventy-nine. Many thousands attended his funeral. At the grave, Dr. Green delivered an address. When he began to preach to seamen, about 1820, "we procured," he said, "a sail loft, and on the sabbath hung out a flag. As the sailors came by, they hailed us, 'Ship ahoy!' We answered them. They asked us, 'Where were you bound?' We told them to the port of New Jerusalem—and that they would do well to go in the fleet. 'Well,' said they, 'we will come in and hear your terms.'" This was the beginning of the mariners' church. Mr. Eastman was eminently pious, and devoted to the salvation of seamen.—Allen.

EASTER; an ecclesiastical festival commemorative of the resurrection of Christ. It originated in the circumstance that Christ was typified by the paschal lamb, ordained by Moses to be slain at the feast of the passover; the feast being considered as a continuation, in its fulfilment, of the Jewish festival. The English name Easter, and the German Ostern, are derived from the name of the Teutonic goddess Ostera (Anglo-Saxon Eostre), whose festival was celebrated by the ancient Saxons with peculiar solemnities, in the month of April, and for which, as in many other instances, the first Romish missionaries substituted the paschal feast.

As early as the second century, there were keen disputes respecting the day on which this feast should be kept: the Eastern church persisting in observing it on the same day with the Jews; while the Western celebrated it on Sunday, as the day of Christ's resurrection. The dispute was finally settled at the council of Nice, in 325, which ordained that it should be kept always on a Sunday; only as it was a movable feast, no small difficulty long continued to be felt as to its adjustment. See Bibl. Repos. for Jan. 1834.—Hend. Buck.

EATING. The ancient Hebrews did not eat indifferently with all persons: they would have esteemed themselves polluted and dishonored by eating with people of another religion, or of an odious profession. In Joseph's day they neither ate with the Egyptians, nor the Egyptians with them, (Gen. 43: 32,) nor, in our Savior's time, with the Samaritans, John 4: 9. The Jews were scandalized at Christ's eating with publicans and sinners, Matt. 9: 11. As there were several sorts of meats, the use of which was prohibited, they could not conveniently eat with those who partook of them, fearing to receive pollution by touching such food, or if by accident any particles of it should fall on them. The ancient Hebrews, at their meals, had each his separate table. Joseph, entertaining his brethren in Egypt, seated them separately, each at his particular table; and he himself set down separately from the Egyptians who ate with him; but he sent to his brethren portions out of the provisions which were before him, Gen. 43: 31, &c.

The ancient manners which we see in Homer, we see likewise in Scripture, with regard to eating, drinking, and entertainments: we find great plenty, but little delicacy; and great respect and honor paid to the guests by serving them plentifully. Joseph sent his brother Benjamin a portion five times larger than those of his other brethren. The women did not appear at table in entertainments with the men: this would have been an indecency, as it is at this day throughout the East.

The present Jews, before they sit down to table, carefully wash their hands: they speak of this ceremony as essential and obligatory. After meals they wash them again. When they sit down to table, the master of the house, or the chief person in the company, taking bread, breaks it, but does not wholly separate it; then, putting his hand on it, he recites this blessing: "Blessed be thou, O Lord our God, the King of the world, who producest the bread of the earth." Those present answer, "Amen." Having distributed the bread among the guests, he takes the vessel of wine in his right hand, saying, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, who hast produced the fruit of the vine." They then repeat the twenty-third Psalm. Buxtorf, and Leo of Modena, who have given particular accounts of the Jewish ceremonies, differ in some circumstances: the reason is, Buxtorf wrote principally the ceremonies of the German Jews, and Leo, those of the Italian Jews. They take care that, after meals, there shall be a piece of bread remaining on the table; the master of the house orders a glass to be washed, fills it with wine, and, elevating it, says, "Let us bless him of whose benefits we have been partaking:" the rest answer, "Blessed be He who has heaped his favors on us, and by his goodness has now fed us." Then he recites a pretty long prayer, wherein he thanks God for his many benefits vouchsafed to Israel; beseeches him to pity Jerusalem and his temple, to restore the throne of David, to send Elias and the Messiah, to deliver them out of their long captivity, &c. All present answer, "Amen;" and then recite Psalm 34: 9, 10. Then, giving the glass with the little wine in it to be drunk round, he drinks what is left, and the table is cleared. (See BANQUETS.)

Partaking of the benefits of Christ's sacrifice by faith, is also called eating, because this is the support of our spiritual life, John 6: 53, 56. Hosea reproaches the priests of his time with eating the sins, or rather sin-offerings of the people, (Hosea 4: 8.) that is, feasting on their sacrifices, rather than reforming their manners. John the Baptist is said to have come "neither eating nor drinking," (Matt. 11: 18.) that is, as other men did; for he lived in the wilderness, on locusts, wild honey, and water, Matt. 3: 4. Luke 1: 15. This is expressed, in Luke 7: 33, by his neither eating "bread," nor drinking "wine." On the other hand, the Son of man is said, in Matt. 11: 19, to have come "eating and drinking;" that is, as others did; and that too with all sorts of persons, Pharisees, publicans, and sinners.—Watson.

EBADIANS; certain Arabian Christians, who settled in Hira, a town of Irak, and in its neighborhood, where they built huts, and formed villages, in order to enjoy the free exercise of their religion. The name implies, "Servants of God.—Broughton's Dict.; Williams.

EBAL; a celebrated mountain in the tribe of Ephraim, near Shechem, over against mount Gerizim. These two mountains are within two hundred paces of each other, and separated by a deep valley, in which stood the town of Shechem. The two mountains are much alike in magnitude and form, being of a semi-circular figure, about half a league in length, and, on the sides nearest Shechem, nearly perpendicular. One of them is barren; the other, covered with a beautiful verdure. Moses commanded the Israelites, as soon as they should have passed the river Jordan, to go directly to Shechem, and divide the whole multitude into two bodies, each composed of six tribes; one company to be placed on Ebal, and the other on Gerizim. The six tribes that were on Gerizim were to pronounce blessings on those who should faithfully observe the law of the Lord, and the six others on mount Ebal were to pronounce curses against those who should violate it, Deut. 11: 29, &c. 27: and 28: Josh. 8: 30, 31.—Watson.

EBED-MELECH; a eunuch or servant of king Zedekiah, who, being informed that Jeremiah was imprisoned in a place full of mire, informed the king of it, and was the means of his restoration to safety, though not to liberty. For this humanity he was promised divine protection, and after the city was taken by Nebuzaradan he was preserved, Jer. 38: 7.—Calmet.

EBENEZER; the name of that field wherein the Israelites were defeated by the Philistines, when the ark of the Lord was taken, (1 Sam. 4: 1.) also a memorial stone set up by Samuel to commemorate a victory over the Philistines. The word signifies, the stone of help; and it was erected by the prophet, saying, "Hitherto the Lord hath helped us."—Watson.

EBER. (See HEBER.)

EBIONITES; a sect of the first two or three centuries; but it is not certain whether they received their name from a leader of the name of Ebion, (whom Dr. Lardner considers as a disciple of Cerinthus,) or from the meaning of the Hebrew word ebion, which implies poverty; and if the latter, whether they assumed the name, as affecting to be poor, like the Founder of Christianity; or whether it was conferred on them by way of reproach, as being of the lower orders. The use of the term, also, according to Dr. Horsley, was various and indefinite. Sometimes it was the peculiar name of those sects that denied both the divinity of our Lord, and his miraculous conception. Then its meaning was extended, to take in another party; who admitted the miraculous conception of Jesus, but still denied his divinity, and questioned his previous existence. At last, it seems, the Nazaries, whose error was rather a superstitious severity in their practice, than any deficiency in their faith, were included by Origen in the infamy of the appellation. Dr. Priestley, claiming the Ebionites as Jewish Unitarians, considers the ancient Nazarenes, that is, the first Jewish converts, as the true Ebionites; these, he thinks, were called Nazarenes, from their attachment to Jesus of Nazareth; and Ebionites, from their poor and mean condition, just as some of the Reformers were called Beghards or beggars. The doctor cites the authorities of Origen and Epiphanius, to prove that both these denominations related to the same people, differing only like the Socinians, in receiving or rejecting the fact of the miraculous conception; and neither, as he assures us, were reckoned heretics by any writers of the two first centuries. To this Dr. Horsley replies, that both Jews and heathens called the first Christians Nazarenes, in allusion to the mean and obscure birth-place of their master, Jesus of Nazareth, (Matt. 2: 23. Acts 10: 38.) but insists, and answers every pretended proof to the contrary, that the term Nazarenes was never applied to any distinct sect of Christians before the final destruction of Jerusalem by Adrian. Dr. Semler, a German writer, gives the following opinion: "Those who more rigidly maintained the Mosaic observances, and who were numerous in Palestine, are usually called Ebionites and Nasaræans. Some believe that they ought not to be reckoned heretics; others think that they were united in doctrine, differing only in name; others place them in the second century. It is of little consequence whether we distinguish or not the Nazarenes, or Nasaræans, from the Ebionites. It is certain that both these classes were tenacious of the Mosaic ceremonies, and more inclined to the Jews than to the Gentiles, though they admitted the Messiahship of Jesus, in a very low and judaizing manner. The Ebionites held in execration the doctrine of the apostle Paul." Dr. J. P. Smyth, who quotes this passage from Dr. Semler, adds, "Such, it is apprehended, on grounds of reasonable probability, was the origin of Unitarianism; the child of Judaism misunderstood, and of Christianity imperfectly received."—Watson; Hend. Buck; Williams.

EBODA; a town in Arabia Petrea. Probably Oboda, or Oboth, Num. 21: 10. 33: 43, 44.—Calmet.

EBONY; an Indian wood, black, hard, heavy, and easily taking a beautiful polish. It was anciently regarded as a valuable article of merchandise, Ezek. 27: 15.

ECBATANA; a city of Media, which, according to Herodotus, was built by Dejoces, king of the Medes. It was situated on a gentle declivity, distant twelve stadia from mount Orontes, and was in compass one hundred and fifty stadia, and, next to Nineveh and Babylon, was one of the strongest and most beautiful cities of the East. After the union of Media with Persia, it was the summer residence of the Persian kings. Here is shown the tomb of Mordecai and Esther; as well as that of Avicenna, the celebrated Arabian physician. The sepulchre of the former stands near the centre of Hamadan: the tombs are covered by a dome, on which is the following inscription in Hebrew: "This day, 15th of the month Adar, in the year 4474 from the creation of the world, was finished the building of this temple over the graves of Mordecai and Esther, by the hands of the good-hearted brothers, Elias and Samuel, the sons of the deceased Ismael of Kashan." This inscription, the date of which proves the dome to have been built eleven hundred years, was sent by Sir Gore Ousley to Sir John Malcolm, who has given it in his History of Persia; who also says that the tombs, which are of a black-colored wood, are evidently of very great antiquity, but in good preservation, as the wood has not perished, and the inscriptions are still very legible. Sir R. K. Porter has given a more particular description of this tomb. The inscription upon it is as follows: "Mordecai, beloved and honored by a king, was great and good. His garments were as those of a sovereign. Ahasuerus covered him with this rich dress, and also placed a golden chain around his neck. The city of Susa rejoiced at his honors, and his high fortune became the glory of the Jews." The inscription which encompasses the sarcophagus of Mordecai, is to this effect: "It is said by David, Preserve me, O God! I am now in thy presence. I have cried at the gate of heaven, that thou art my God; and what goodness I have received from thee, O Lord! Those whose bodies are now beneath in this earth, when animated by thy mercy, were great; and whatever happiness was bestowed upon them in this world, came from thee, O God! Their grief and sufferings were many, at the first; but they became happy, because they always called upon thy holy name in their miseries. Thou lifedest me up, and I became powerful. Thine enemies sought to destroy me, in the early times of my life; but the shadow of thy hand was upon me, and covered me, as a tent from their wicked purposes!—MORDECAI." The following is the corresponding inscription on the sarcophagus of Esther: "Praise thee, O God, that thou hast created me! I know that my sins merit punishment, yet I hope for mercy at thy hands; for whenever I call upon thee, thou art with me; thy holy presence secures me from all evil. My heart is at ease, and my fear of thee increases. My life became, through thy goodness, at the last, full of peace. O God, do not shut my soul out from thy divine presence! Those whom thou lovest, never feel the torments of hell. Lead me, O merciful Father, to the life of life; that I may be filled with the heavenly fruits of paradise!—ESTHER." The Jews at Hamadan have no tradition of the cause of Esther and Mordecai having been interred at that place; but, however that might be, there are sufficient reasons for believing the validity of their interment in this spot.

The strongest evidence we can have of the truth of any historical fact is, its commemoration by an annual festival. It is well known, that several important events in Jewish history are thus celebrated; and amongst the rest, the feast of Purim is kept on the 13th and 14th of the month Adar, to commemorate the deliverance obtained by the Jews, at the intercession of Esther, from the general massacre ordered by Ahasuerus, and the slaughter they were permitted to make of their enemies. Now on this same festival, in the same day and month, Jewish pilgrims resort from all quarters to the sepulchre of Mordecai and Esther; and have done so for centuries,—a strong presumptive proof that the tradition of their burial in this place rests on some authentic foundation.

Ecbatana was encompassed with seven walls, of unequal heights; the largest, according to Herodotus, (lib. i. cap. 95.) was equal in extent with those of Athens; that is, one hundred and seventy-eight furlongs, or nearly eight leagues, Thucyd. lib. i. It still subsists, under the name of Hamadan, in latitude, thirty-four degrees and fifty-three minutes north; longitude, forty degrees east. Its inhabitants are stated by Mr. Kinnier to be about forty thousand, including about six hundred Jewish families.—Watson; Calmet.

ECCLESIASTES; a canonical book of the Old Testament. This word is feminine in the Hebrew; but the Greeks and Latins, not regarding the gender, render it Ecclesiastes, an orator, one who speaks in public. Solomon describes himself in the first verse, "The words of Kobleth, (Eng. Vers. 'the Preacher,') the son of David, king of Jerusalem." He mentions his works, his riches, his buildings, and his proverbs, or parables, and that he was the wisest and happiest of all kings in Jerusalem; which description plainly characterizes Solomon. This book is generally thought to be the production of Solomon's repentance, toward the latter end of his life. It proposes the sentiments of the Sadducees and Epicureans in their full force; proves excellently by a philosophical induction from the experience of human life, the vanity of all earthly things, apart from the possession of the divine favor, and the prospects of immortality; the little benefit of men's restless and busy cares, and the unsatisfying nature of all their knowledge; but concludes, "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments, for this is the whole of man." In this, all his obligations terminate; in this his only means to happiness, present and future. In reading this book, care should be taken not to deduce opinions from detached sentiments, but from the general scope and combined force of the whole.—Calmet.

ECCLESIASTICAL; an appellation given to whatever belongs to the church: thus we say, ecclesiastical polity, jurisdiction, history, &c.—Hend. Buck.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY; a narration of the transactions, revolutions, and events that relate to the church. As to the utility of church history, Dr. Jortin, who was an acute writer on this subject, shall here speak for us: he observes, 1. That it will show us the amazing progress of Christianity through the Roman empire, through the East and West, although the powers of the world cruelly opposed it. 2. Connected with Jewish and Pagan history, it will show us the total destruction of Jerusalem, the overthrow of the Jewish church and state; and the continuance of that unhappy nation for seventeen hundred years, though dispersed over the face of the earth, and oppressed at different times by Pagans, Christians, and Mahometans. 3. It shows us that the increase of Christianity produced, in the countries where it was received, the overthrow and extinction of paganism, which, after a feeble resistance, perished about the sixth century. 4. It shows us how Christianity hath been continued and delivered down from the apostolical to the present age. 5. It shows us the various opinions which prevailed at different times amongst the fathers and other Christians, and how they departed, more or less, from the simplicity of the gospel. 6. It will enable us to form a true judgment of the merit of the fathers, and of the use which is to be made of them. 7. It will show us the evil of imposing unreasonable terms of communion, and requiring Christians to profess doctrines not propounded in scriptural words, but inferred as consequences from passages of Scripture, which one may call systems of consequential divinity. 8. It will show us the origin and progress of popery; and, lastly, it will show us, 9. The origin and progress of the Reformation.

Ecclesiastical history is a very important branch of study, but one which is attended with many difficulties. The widely-spread and diversified circumstances of the Christian church, even from the earliest period, render it difficult to arrive at satisfactory views of many events in which it was concerned. Those events were seldom recorded at the time, or by the persons who lived on the spot. The early writers who undertook to give the history of the church, were not well skilled in the laws of historic truth and evidence, nor always well fitted to apply those laws. Opinions and statements scattered over the pages of the fathers and their successors, are often vague, discordant, and unsatisfactory, presenting almost endless perplexity, or matter of debate. While these and other causes contribute to render ecclesiastical history very difficult, they who have devoted themselves to it in modern times, look at the subjects of their investigation through mediums which tend to color or distort most of the facts passing under their review. Their associations and habits of thinking lead them unconsciously to attach modern ideas to ancient terms and usages. The word church, for instance, almost invariably suggests the idea of a body allied to the state, and holding the orthodox creed. The heretics of church history are generally regarded as men of erroneous principles and immoral lives. Councils are bodies representative, and clothed with something approaching to infallible authority. Bishops are not regarded as pastors of particular congregations, but ecclesiastical rulers of provinces. All these things tend greatly to bewilder and perplex an inquirer into the true state of the profession of Christianity during a long succession of ages; and from their distracting influence, even the strongest minds can scarcely be protected. Impartiality is commonly professed, and, in most instances, honestly intended, but very rarely exercised.

ECCLESIASTICAL POLITY; the rules by which churches are governed, as to their spiritual concerns.

It appears that all Protestants immediately after the Reformation, with the exception of the Baptists, whilst they abjured the papal supremacy, were united in holding that the mode of administering the church might be varied, some of them being attached to episcopacy, others to presbytery; but all founding this attachment upon the judgment which they had formed as to the tendency or utility of either of these modes of government. An idea soon was avowed by some of the reformers, that the whole regulation of the church pertained to the magistrate; this branch of power being vested in him no less than that of administering the civil government; and to this opinion the name of Erastianism, from Erastus, who first defended it, was given. Cranmer, in an official reply which he made to certain questions that had been submitted for his consideration, declared, "that the civil ministers under the king's majesty be those that shall please his highness for the time to put in authority under him; as, for example, the lord chancellor, lord great master, &c.; the ministers of God's word under his majesty be the bishops, parsons, vicars, and such other priests as be appointed by his highness to that ministracion; as, for example, the bishop of Canterbury, &c. All the said officers and ministers, as well of the one sort as the other, be appointed, assigned, and elected in every place by the laws and orders of kings and princes." By the great majority of Protestants, however, the tenets of Erastus were condemned; for they maintained that the Lord Jesus had conveyed to his church a spiritual power quite distinct from the temporal; and that it belonged to the ministers of religion to exercise it, for promoting the spiritual welfare of the Christian community. But, whilst they disputed as to this point, they agreed in admitting there was no model prescribed in the New Testament for a Christian church, as there had been in the Mosaic economy for the Jewish church; and that it was a branch of the liberty of the disciples of Christ, or one of their privileges, to choose the polity which seemed to them best adapted for extending the power and influence of religion.

From this fundamental mistake, it is needless to say what confusion and errors have arisen in Christendom. On this very foundation, grew up the whole mass of papal superstitions, and almost all the divisions among Protestants. Never will these divisions be healed, nor those superstitions purged away, until the great principle is universally and fully recognised that there is a divine model of church government prescribed in the New Testament, and that apostolic practice under the law of Christ is designed as a universal pattern. Did ever any man think of a different hypothesis till he found apostolic practice against him? Why else do we observe the first day Sabbath? If the apostolic churches are not a model to them, are descriptions of them, and the directions given to them, are useless to us. Why are we called upon to be followers of the apostles without exception or limitation? And why are the later New Testament churches referred to the earlier as patterns? 1 Cor. 7: 17. 14: 33. 1 Cor. 11: 16. 16: 1. Titus 1: 5.—Watson; Carson.

ECCLESIASTICAL STATES. (See STATES OF THE CHURCH; also, CURIA PAPAL.)

ECCLESIASTICUS; an apocryphal book, so called in Latin, either to distinguish it from Ecclesiastes, or to show that it contains, as well as that, precepts and exhortations to wisdom and virtue. The Greeks call it "The Wisdom of Jesus, the son of Sirach." It contains maxims and instructions, useful in all states and conditions of life. Some of the ancients ascribed this work to Solomon; but the author is much more modern than Solomon, and speaks of several persons who lived after that prince. The translator of it into Greek came into Egypt in the thirty-eighth year of Ptolemy VII. surnamed Evergetes, the second of that name; as he says in his preface. The author of the Latin translation from the Greek is unknown. Jerome says, the church received Ecclesiasticus for edification, but not to authorize any point of doctrine.—Cabnet.

ECDIPPA; (otherwise ACHAZIB: which see.)

ECKING, (SAMUEL) author of a small but excellent volume of essays on theological subjects, was born at Shrewsbury, December the 5th, 1757. He received the rudiments of his education in his native place, at a school kept by a Mr. Boore, who, at the age of fifteen, engaged him in the capacity of usher; a station which he held for two years, until the master's death put an end to the school. He then became usher in a respectable academy, in the same town, kept by Mr. Gentleman, a dissenting minister, with whom he continued till the beginning of 1778, when he opened a school on his own account, and met with considerable encouragement. His parents were of the established church, and there he himself attended on the ministry of the Rev. Richard De Courcy, from whom he imbibed his first relish for the good word of God, and of whom he was an ardent admirer. During the controversy on baptism, however, being led to an investigation of the subject, he embraced the views of the Baptists. He was immersed, on a personal profession of his faith in Christ, and became a member of the Baptist church in Shrewsbury. In 1781, he was invested with the suffrages of his brethren, to preach the gospel of God.

He settled in Chester the following year, and there continued until the period of his death, which took place on the 5th of February, 1785, at the early age of twenty-seven, occasioned by typhus fever. In the preceding year, he published "Three Essays, on Grace, Faith, and Experience; wherein several Gospel Truths are stated and illustrated, and their opposite errors pointed out." A second edition appeared in 1791, with some additions, amongst which was "A short Account of the Author; Considerations on the Faith of Devils; The Confession of Faith delivered at his Ordination; and a few Observations on the Sentiments of Sandeman and Cudworth." A third edition was printed at Liverpool, about ten years after, including "Four Sermons," transcribed, by a friend, from his short-hand notes; and a fourth edition, comprising the whole, was printed at Berwick-upon-Tweed, in 1827. He was a young man of very promising talents; and, had his life been spared, certainly bid fair to become one of the brightest ornaments of the denomination to which he belonged.—Memoir prefixed to his Essays; *Jones's Chris. ELECTICS; a sort of ancient philosophers, who professed to select whatever was good and true from all the other philosophical sects. The Eclectic philosophy was in a flourishing state at Alexandria when our Savior was upon earth. Its founders formed the design of selecting from the doctrines of all former philosophers such opinions as seemed to approach nearest the truth, and of combining them into one system. They held Plato in the highest esteem; but did not scruple to join with his doctrines whatever they thought conformable to reason in the tenets of other philosophers. Potamon, a Platonist, appears to have been the projector of this plan.

The Eclectic system was brought to perfection by Ammonius Saccas, who blended Christianity with his philosophy, and founded the sect of the Ammonians, or New Platonists, in the second century. The moral doctrine of the Alexandrian school was as follows:—The mind of man, originally a portion of the divine Being, having fallen into a state of darkness and defilement, by its union with the body, is to be gradually emancipated from the chains of matter, and rise by contemplation to the knowledge and vision of God. The end of philosophy, therefore, is the liberation of the soul from its corporeal imprisonment. For this purpose, the Eclectic philosophy recommends abstinence, with other voluntary mortifications and religious exercises. In the infancy of the Alexandrian school, not a few of the professors of Christianity were led by the pretensions of the Eclectic sect, to imagine that a coalition might, with great advantage, be formed between its system and that of Christianity. This union appeared the more desirable, when several philosophers of this sect became converts to the Christian faith. The consequence was, that pagan ideas and opinions were by degrees mixed with the pure and simple doctrines of the gospel. (See PLATONISM.)—Watson; Bib. Rep. 1831.

ECLIPSE. The word (eclipse) eclipse, signifies failure, namely, of light. An eclipse of the sun is caused by the intervention of the moon, at new, or in conjunction with the sun, intercepting his light from the earth, either totally or partially. An eclipse of the moon is caused by the intervention of the earth, intercepting the sun's light from the moon, when full, or in opposition to the sun, either totally or partially. A total eclipse of the moon may occasion a privation of her light for an hour and a half, during her total immersion in the shadow; whereas, a total eclipse of the sun can never last in any particular place above four minutes, when the moon is nearest to the earth, and her shadow thickest. Hence it appears, that the darkness which "overspread the whole land of Judea," at the time of our Lord's crucifixion, was preternatural, "from the sixth until the ninth hour," or from noon till three in the afternoon, in its duration, and also in its time, about full moon, when the moon could not possibly eclipse the sun. It was accompanied by an earthquake, which altogether struck the spectators, and among them the centurion and Roman guard, with great fear, and a conviction that Jesus was the Son of God, Matt. 27: 51—54.

Eclipses, says Dr. Hales, are justly reckoned among the surest and most unerring characters of chronology; for they can be calculated with great exactness backwards as well as forwards; and there is such a variety of distinct circumstances of the time when, and the place where, they were seen; of the duration, or beginning, middle, or end of every eclipse, and of the quantity, or number of digits eclipsed; that there is no danger of confounding any two eclipses together, when the circumstances attending each are noticed with any tolerable degree of precision. Thus, to an eclipse of the moon incidentally noticed by the great Jewish chronologer, Josephus, shortly before the death of Herod the Great, we owe the determination of the true year of our Savior's nativity. During Herod's last illness, and not many days before his death, there happened an eclipse of the moon on the very night that he burned alive Matthias, and the ringleaders of a sedition, in which the golden eagle, which he had consecrated and set up over the gate of the temple, was pulled down and broken to pieces by these zealots. This eclipse happened, by calculation, March 13, U. C. 750, B. C. 4. But it is certain from Scripture, that Christ was born during Herod's reign; and from the visit of the magi to Jerusalem "from the East," from the Parthian empire, to inquire for the "true 'born King of the Jews,'" whose star they had seen "at its rising," and also from the age of the infants massacred at Bethlehem, "from two years old and under," (Matt. 2: 1—16.) it is no less certain, that Jesus could not have been born later than B. C. 5, which is the year assigned to the nativity by Chrysostom, Petavius, and Prideaux.—Watson.

ECSTASY, (or EXTASY;) a transport of the mind, which suspends the functions of the senses by the intense contemplation of some extraordinary object.—Hend. Buck.

ECTHESIS; a confession of faith, the form of an edict, published in the year 639, by the emperor Heraclius, with a view to pacify the troubles occasioned by the Eutychian heresy in the Eastern church. However, the same prince revoked it, on being informed that pope Severinus had condemned it, as favoring the Monothelites; declaring, at the same time, that Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, was the author of it. (See EUTYCHIANS.)—Hend. Buck.

ED, (witness;) the name given to the altar erected by the two tribes and a half, who were settled beyond Jordan, Josh. 20: 34. It was probably a copy or repetition of that which was used among the Hebrews, their brethren, and it was built to witness to posterity the interest of these tribes in the altar common to the descendants of the patriarch Israel.—Calmet.

EDAR, (Tower of;) (Gen. 25: 21. Micah 4: 8.) a place of fine pasturage, a mile from Bethlehem.—Malcom.

EDEN; a province in the East, on the banks of the river Euphrates, where Paradise was situated. Gen. 2: 8. (See the article PARADISE.)

There is hardly any part of the world in which it has not been sought: in Asia, in Africa, in Europe, in America, in Tartary; on the banks of the Ganges, in the Indies, in China, in the island of Ceylon, in Armenia; under the equator; in Mesopotamia, in Syria, in Persia, in Babylonia, in Arabia, in Palestine, in Ethiopia, among the mountains of the Moon; near the mountains of Libanus, Antiibanus, and Damascus. Huet places it on the river produced by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, now called the river of the Arabs; below this conjunction and the division of the same river, before it falls into the Persian sea. He selects the eastern shore of this river, which being considered according to the disposition of its channel, and not according to the course of its stream, was divided into four heads, or four different openings, that is, two upwards, the Tigris and Euphrates, and two below, the Pison and Gihon. The Pison, according to him, is the western channel, and the Gihon is the eastern channel of the Tigris, which discharges itself into the Persian gulf. It is said that Bochart was much of the same opinion. Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 4. De Anim. Sacr. Part. ii. lib. v. cap. 6. Other skilful men with more probability, have placed Eden in Armenia, between the sources of the rivers, (1.) Tigris, (2.) Euphrates, (3.) Araxis, (4.) Phasis, taken to be the four rivers described by Moses. Euphrates is expressly mentioned; Hiddekel is the Tigris; the Phasis is Pison; the Gihon is the Araxes.

It may be inferred from a number of circumstances, that Paradise was placed on a mountain, or at least in a country diversified with hills, because only such country could supply the springs necessary to form four heads of rivers; and because all heads of rivers rise in hills, from whence their waters descend to the sea. Such a country has been found in Armenia, with such an elevation, or assemblage of elevations, also, as appeared to be requisite for the purpose. On these principles, the Phasis was the Pison of Moses, and the similarity of sound in the name seemed to confirm the opinion; it was a natural consequence, that the Araxes should be the Gihon; since its waters are extremely rapid, and the Greek name Araxes, like the Hebrew Gihon, denotes the dart, or swift.

The word Eden which, in its primary acceptation, signifies pleasure or delight, is often used by the writers of the Old Testament to denote places which are either more remarkably fruitful in their soil, or pleasant in their situation. (See 2 Kings, 19: 12, 13. Isa. 37: 12. Amos 1: 5.) It is a remarkable circumstance that divine revelation opens and shuts with corresponding subjects; it opens with a view of the earthly Eden, and shuts with a description of its glorious antitype the heavenly Paradise of God. Eden was remarkable for a river which issued from it; in like manner, John sees in the heavenly Eden, a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, issuing from the throne of God and the Lamb. Rev. 22: 1. In each, we also find a tree of life, and various other analogies, from which it appears evidently the design of the Spirit of God to teach us, that the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, will restore all his people to a more perfect state of bliss, than their first parent forfeited.—Bibliotheca Sacra, article EDEN; Jones; Calmet.

II. EDEN. The prophet Amos (chap. 1: 5.) speaks of the "House of Eden," or "Beth-Eden," which is thought to have been a house of pleasure in the mountains of Lebanon, near to the river Adonis, and about midway between Tripoli and Baalbek.—Calmat.

EDIFICATION. This word signifies a building up; hence we call a building, an edifice. Applied to spiritual things, it signifies the advancing, improving, adorning, and comforting the mind. A Christian may be said to be edified, when he is encouraged and animated to fresh progress in the ways and works of the Lord. The means to promote our own edification are, prayer, self-examination, reading the Scriptures, hearing the gospel, meditation, attendance on all appointed ordinances. To edify others, there should be love, spiritual conversation, forbearance, faithfulness, benevolent exertions, and uniformity of conduct.

Edify, and Edification, are terms that often occur in the apostolic writings, and of such high import, that they merit a much more ample illustration than has hitherto been bestowed upon them in works of this nature.

To perceive the full force and propriety of the terms as used by the apostles, it is quite necessary to keep in mind the similitudes by which they generally describe a Christian church; for, an attentive reader of the New Testament may readily observe that it is mostly with a direct reference to that particular object that these expressive terms occur. Thus for instance, we sometimes find them speaking of a church under the figure of a building, Eph. 2: 21. 1 Cor. 3: 9. At others, a house, Heb. 3: 6. 1 Tim. 3: 15. And frequently a temple, 1 Cor. 3: 16, 17. A habitation for God, Eph. 2: 22. Of this building, Jesus Christ is the foundation or chief corner-stone, laid by the doctrine of the apostles and prophets,—he is that living stone, elect, and precious, on which Zion is founded,—and believers in him united together in a church capacity, are consequently spoken of, as "lively stones, built up into a spiritual house," (1 Pet. 2: 5.) thus constituting what Paul calls "the household of God," (Eph. 2: 19.) or "the household of faith," Gal. 6: 10. Now it is obviously in reference to this view of things that the terms under consideration are made use of by the apostles; and when we attempt to explain them in any way detached from the consideration of a Christian church, their meaning almost vanishes into insignificance. I make this remark chiefly on account of the great mistakes which appear to prevail among professed Christians on a subject in which their present peace and immortal interests are deeply involved. Most of our practical treatises of religion are taken up in furnishing directions to believers, considered as so many disconnected individuals, to press after their own individual edification. But all this seems in a great measure aside from the doctrine of Christ and his apostles. The consolations of the Holy Spirit are not promised to disjointed individuals, each taking care separately to frame his heart, in the best manner he can, into an obedience to the will of God; but to brethren walking together in unity; to disciples joined in one body as fellow members one of another, so as by one spirit to mourn and rejoice together. Christ has promised great consolation to his disciples thus united, walking in love, and patiently bearing the hatred of the world. Many professors, and even teachers of religion, not greatly liking such union and its obvious consequences, yet finding much said in the New Testament of the attainments and comforts of the first Christians, have studied to devise means of enjoying these comforts separately. Instead of the objects that chiefly drew the attention of the first believers, they have endeavored to fix the attention of Christians on a multitude of rules respecting the particular conduct of each in his devout exercises, his attendance on ordinances and the frame of his heart therein. But this is a scheme of religion of mere human device. Nothing can be plainer from the whole tenor of the Acts of the Apostles, and their epistles to the churches, than that it is the will of Christ his disciples should unite together, holding fellowship in the institutions of the gospel; and also that, as he in his infinite wisdom and grace has made abundant provision for their comfort, establishment and edification, so these blessings can only be effectually enjoyed in proportion as they obey his will in this respect. Eph. 4: 8—16. See Owen on Hebrews.—Hend. Buck; Jones.

EDOM; a province of Arabia, which derives its name from Edom, or Esau, who there settled in the mountains of Seir, in the land of the Horites, south-east of the Dead sea. His descendants afterwards extended themselves throughout Arabia Petrea, and south of Palestine, between the Dead sea and the Mediterranean. During the Babylonish captivity, and when Judea was almost deserted, they seized the south of Judah, and advanced to Hebron. Hence that tract of Judea, which they inhabited, retained the name of Idumea in the time of our Savior, Mark 3: 8. Under Moses and Joshua, and even under the kings of Judah, the Idumeans were confined to the east and south of the Dead sea, in the land of Seir; but afterwards they extended their territories more to the south of Judah. The capital of East Edom was Bozrah; and that of South Edom, Petra or Jactael.

2. The prophecies respecting Edom are numerous and striking; and the present state of the country, as described by modern travellers, has given so remarkable an attestation to the accuracy of their fulfilment, that a few extracts from Mr. Keith's work, in which this is pointed out, may be fitly introduced.

That the Idumeans were a populous and powerful nation long posterior to the delivery of the prophecies; that they possessed a tolerably good government, even in the estimation of Volney; that Idumea contained many cities; that these cities are now absolutely deserted; and that their ruins swarm with enormous scorpions; that it was a commercial nation, and possessed highly frequented marts; that it forms a shorter route than the ordinary one to India; and yet that it had not been visited by any traveller; are facts all recorded, and proved by Volney himself—in his "Travels"—able but unconscious commentator!

3. A greater contrast cannot be imagined than the ancient and present state of Idumea. It was a kingdom previous to Israel, having been governed first by dukes or princes, afterwards by eight successive kings, and again by dukes, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel, Gen. 36: 31, &c. Its fertility and early cultivation are implied not only in the blessings of Esau, whose dwelling was to be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above; but also in the condition proposed by Moses to the Edomites, when he solicited a passage for the Israelites through their borders, that "they would not pass through the fields nor through the vineyards;" and also in the great wealth, especially in the multitudes of flocks and herds, recorded as possessed by an individual inhabitant of that country, at a period, in all probability even more remote, Gen. 27: 39. Num. 20: 17. Job 42: 12. The Idumeans were, without doubt, both an opulent and a powerful people. They often contended with the Israelites, and entered into a league with their other enemies against them. In the reign of David, they were indeed subdued and greatly oppressed, and many of them even dispersed throughout the neighboring countries, particularly Phœnicia and Egypt. But during the decline of the kingdom of Judah, and for many years previous to its extinction, they encroached upon the territories of the Jews, and extended their dominion over the south-western part of Judea.

4. There is a prediction which, being peculiarly remarkable as applicable to Idumea, and bearing reference to a circumstance explanatory of the difficulty of access to any knowledge respecting it, is entitled, in the first instance, to notice: "None shall pass through it forever and ever. I will cut off from mount Seir him that passeth out, and him that returneth," Isa. 34: 10. Ezek. 35: 7. The ancient greatness of Idumea must, in no small degree, have resulted from its commerce. Bordering with Arabia on the east, and Egypt on the south-west, and forming from north to south the most direct and most commodious channel of communication between Jerusalem and her dependencies on the Red sea, as well as between Syria and India, through the continuous valleys of El Ghor, and El Araba, which terminated on the one extremity at the borders of Judea, and on the other at Elath and Ezion Geber on the Elanitic gulf of the Red sea, Idumea may be said to have formed the emporium of the commerce of the East. A Roman road passed directly through Idumea, from Jerusalem to Akaba, and another from Akaba to Moab; and when these roads were made, at a time long posterior to the date of the predictions, the conception could not have been formed, or held credible by man, that the period would ever arrive when none would pass through it. Above seven hundred years after the date of the prophecy, Strabo relates that many Romans and other foreigners were found at Petra by his friend Athenodorus, the philosopher, who visited it. The prediction is yet more surprising when viewed in conjunction with another, which implies that travellers would "pass by" Idumea: "Every one that goeth by shall be astonished." And the Hadj routes (routes of the pilgrims) from Damascus and from Cairo to Mecca, the one on the east and the other towards the south of Idumea, along the whole of its extent, go by it, or touch partially on its borders, without passing through it. The truth of the prophecy, though hemmed in thus by apparent impossibilities and contradictions, and with extreme probability of its fallacy in every view that could have been visible to man, may yet be tried.

5. Let the reader now turn to Isaiah 34: 5, 10—17. Jeremiah 49: 13—18. and Malachi 1: 3, 4. and he will find other predictions no less circumstantially fulfilled. "Edom shall be a desolation. From generation to generation it shall lie waste," &c. Judea, Ammon, and Moab exhibit so abundantly the remains and the means of an exuberant fertility, that the wonder arises in the reflecting mind, how the barbarity of man could have so effectually counteracted for so many generations the prodigality of nature. But such is Edom's desolation, that the first sentiment of astonishment on the contemplation of it is, how a wide-extended region, now diversified by the strongest features of desert wildness, could ever have been adorned with cities, or tenanted for ages by a powerful and opulent people. Its present aspect would belie its ancient history, were not that history corroborated by "the many vestiges of former cultivation," by the remains of walls and paved roads, and by the ruins of cities still existing in this ruined country. The total cessation of its commerce; the artificial irrigation of its valleys wholly neglected; the destruction of all the cities, and the continued spoliation of the country by the Arabs, while aught remained that they could destroy; the permanent exposure, for ages, of the soil unsheltered by its ancient groves, and unprotected by any covering from the scorching rays of the sun; the unobstructed encroachments of the desert, and of the drifted sands from the borders of the Red sea; the consequent absorption of the water of the springs and streamlets during summer,—are causes which have all combined their baneful operation in rendering Edom "most desolate, the desolation of desolations."

From the borders of Edom, Captains Irby and Mangles also beheld a boundless extent of desert view, which they had hardly ever seen equalled for singularity and grandeur. And the following extract, descriptive of what Burckhardt actually witnessed in the different parts of Edom, cannot be more graphically abbreviated than in the words of the prophet. Of its eastern boundary, and of the adjoining part of Arabia Petraea, strictly so called, Burckhardt writes: "It might, with truth, be called Petraea, not only on account of its rocky mountains, but also of the elevated plain already described, which is so much covered with stones, especially flints, that it may with great propriety be called a stony desert, although susceptible of culture; in many places it is overgrown with wild herbs, and must once have been thickly inhabited; for the traces of many towns and villages are met with on both sides of the Hadj road, between Maan and Akaba, as well as between Maan and the plains of the Hauran, in which direction are also many springs. At present all this country is a desert, and Maan (Teman) is the only inhabited place in it: 'I will stretch out my hand against thee, O mount Seir, and will make thee most desolate. I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and will make it desolate from Teman.'" In the interior of Idumea, where the ruins of some of its ancient cities are still visible, and in the extensive valley which reaches from the Red to the Dead sea, the appearance of which must now be totally and sadly changed from what it was, "the whole plain," says Burckhardt, "presented to the view an expanse of shifting sands, whose surface was broken by innumerable undulations and low hills. The sand appears to have been brought from the shores of the Red sea, by the southern winds; and the Arabs told me that the valleys continue to present the same appearance beyond the latitude of Wady Mousa. In some parts of the valley the sand is very deep, and there is not the slightest appearance of a road, or of any work of human art. A few trees grow among the sand hills, but the depth of sand precludes all vegetation or herbage." "If grape-gatherers come to thee, would not they leave some gleanings grapes? If thieves by night, they will destroy till they have enough; but I have made Esau bare. Edom shall be a desolate wilderness." "On ascending the western plain," continues Mr. Burckhardt, "on a higher level than that of Arabia, we had before us an immense expanse of dreary country, entirely covered with black flints, with here and there some hilly chain rising from the plain." "I will stretch out upon Idumea the line of confusion, and the stones of emptiness." Such is the present desolate aspect of one of the most fertile countries of ancient times! So visibly even now does the withering curse of an offended God rest upon it! And its fate, like that of the children of Israel, remains a monument of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, at which infidelity may well turn pale.—Watson.

EDOMITES. (See ESAU; and ЕДОМ.)

EDREI; a town of Manasseh, east of Jordan, (Josh. 13: 31.) called likewise Edrea and Adrea, and perhaps Edera in Ptolemy, when speaking of the towns in the Batanea. Eusebius places it about twenty-five miles north from Bostris.—Calmet.

EDWARDS, (JOHN, D. D.) a divine of the church of England, who flourished at the latter end of the seventeenth, and beginning of the eighteenth century. He was born at Hertford, February the 26th, 1637. At Cambridge, his superior talents brought on him a train of academical honors; he was elected fellow of the college, admitted to the degree of master of arts, ordained deacon, and appointed, by bishop Saunderson, to preach a sermon at the approaching ordination of priests. We are told that "in his preaching he affected not any flauing eloquence, but studied to be plain, intelligible, and practical, and to edify all his hearers; yet, so as that his discourses were interspersed with choice and uncommon remarks." He exercised his ministerial functions for several years, at Trinity church, Cambridge, where he was attended by many of the gown, and persons of considerable standing in the university; from thence he removed to Bury St. Edmunds; and then to Colchester. After three years, he quitted Colchester, and returned to Cambridge; partly, on account of its affording him access to the university library, and partly for other reasons. In 1699, he was created doctor of divinity, and from this time, he became a voluminous writer, owing, in some measure, to his being afflicted with the gout and other disorders, which determined him to preach the gospel by his pen. He prosecuted his studies and labors till near the period of his decease, which took place on the 16th of April, 1716, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.

It may be questioned whether, since the days of Calvin himself, there has existed a more decided Calvinist than Dr. Edwards. He has been termed the Paul, the Augustine, the Bradwardine, the Calvin of his age. Such was his abhorrence of Arminianism, that he contended, with the old Puritans, that there is a close connexion between it and popery. His writings are very numerous, and they discover extensive learning, deep thought, cogent reasoning, and extraordinary zeal for the doctrines of divine grace. It is said, that all unbiassed and impartial men voted him, by universal consent, to be one of the most valuable writers of his time. The principal of his works are, "Veritas Redux; or, Evangelical Truths Restored," octavo, 1707; "Inquiry into Four remarkable Texts;" "Discourse concerning the Authority, Style, and Perfection of the Books of the Old and New Testament," two volumes, octavo; "A Survey of the several Dispensations of Religion," &c., two volumes, octavo; several distinct treatises against the Socinians; "An Answer to Dr. Whitby's Five Points;" "Animadversions on Dr. Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity;" "Theologia Reformata; or, the Substance and Body of the Christian Religion," London, 1713, two volumes, folio, of which a third volume was published ten years after the author's decease; with many other pieces too tedious to enumerate.—*Biog. EDWARDS, (JONATHAN,) president of New Jersey college, a most acute metaphysician, and distinguished divine, was born at Windsor, Conn., Oct. 5, 1703. He was graduated at Yale college in 1720, before he was seventeen years of age. His uncommon genius discovered itself early, and while yet a boy he read Locke on the Human Understanding with a keen relish. Though he took much pleasure in examining the kingdom of nature, yet moral and theological researches yielded him the highest satisfaction. He lived in college near two years after taking his first degree, preparing himself for the office of a minister of the gospel. In 1722, he went to New York, at the request of a small society of English Presbyterians, and preached a number of months. In 1724, he was appointed a tutor in Yale college, and he continued in that office, till he was invited in 1726, to preach at Northampton, Mass. Here he was ordained as colleague with his grandfather, Mr. Stoddard, February 15, 1727. In 1735, his benevolent labors were attended with very uncommon success; a general impression was made upon the minds of his people by the truths which he proclaimed, and the church was much enlarged. He continued in this place more than twenty-three years. He had been instrumental in cheering many hearts with the joys of religion, and not a few had regarded him with all that affectionate attachment, which is excited by the love of excellence and the sense of obligations, which can never be repaid. But a spirit of detraction had gone forth, in consequence of his strict views of Christian discipline and purity, and a few leading men of outrageous zeal pushed forward men of less determined hostility, and he was dismissed by an ecclesiastical council, June 22, 1750.

In this scene of trouble and abuse, when the mistakes and the bigotry of the multitude had stopped their ears, and their passions were without control, Mr. Edwards exhibited the truly Christian spirit. His calmness, and meekness, and humility, and yet firmness and resolution, were the subjects of admiration to his friends. More anxious for his people, than for himself, he preached a most solemn and affecting farewell discourse. He afterwards occasionally supplied the pulpit at times, when no preacher had been procured; but this proof of his superiority to resentment or pride, and this readiness to do good to those who had injured him, met with no return, except a vote of the inhabitants, prohibiting him from ever again preaching for them. Still he was not left without excellent friends in Northampton, and his correspondents in Scotland, having been informed of his dismissal, contributed a considerable sum for the maintenance of his family.

In August, 1751, he succeeded Mr. Sergeant as missionary to the Housatonic Indians, at Stockbridge, in Berkshire county. Here he continued six years, preaching to the Indians and the white people; and, as he found much leisure, he prosecuted his theological and metaphysical studies, and produced works which rendered his name famous throughout Europe. Thus was his calamitous removal from Northampton the occasion, under the wise providence of God, of his imparting to the world the most important instructions, whose influence has been extending to the present time, and whose good effects may still be felt for ages. In January, 1758, he reluctantly accepted the office of president of the college in New Jersey, as successor of his son-in-law, Mr. Burr; but he had not entered fully upon the duties of this station, before the prevalence of the small pox induced him to be inoculated, and this disease was the cause of his death, March 22, 1758, aged fifty-four. A short time before he died, as some of his friends, who surrounded his bed to see him breathe his last, were lamenting the loss which the college would sustain, he said, to their astonishment, "Trust in God, and ye need not fear." These were his last words. He afterwards expired with as much composure, as if he had only fallen asleep. He left three sons and seven daughters. His wife, Sarah, daughter of Rev. J. Pierpont, New Haven, whom he married in 1727, in her eighteenth year, died also in 1758. She became pious at the age of five.

President Edwards was equally distinguished by his Christian virtues, and by the extraordinary vigor and penetration of his mind. Though his constitution was delicate, he commonly spent thirteen hours every day in his study. He usually rose between four and five in the morning, and was abstemious, living completely by rule. All his researches were pursued with his pen in his hand, and the number of his miscellaneous writings, which he had left behind him, was above fourteen hundred. They were all numbered and paged, and an index was formed for the whole. He was peculiarly happy in his domestic connexions. Mrs. Edwards, by taking the entire care of his temporal concerns, gave him an opportunity of consecrating all his powers, without interruption, to the labors and studies of the sacred office.

As a preacher, he was not oratorical in his manner, and his voice was rather feeble, though he spoke with distinctness; but his discourses were rich in thought; and, being deeply impressed himself with the truths, which he uttered, his preaching came home to the hearts of his hearers.

Mr. Edwards was uncommonly zealous and persevering in his search after truth. He spared no pains in procuring the necessary aids, and he read all the books which he could procure, that promised to afford him assistance in his inquiries. He confined himself to no particular sect or denomination, but studied the writings of men whose sentiments were the most opposite to his own. But the Bible claimed his peculiar attention. From that book he derived his religious principles, and not from any human system. The doctrines, which he supported, were Calvinistic, and when these doctrines were in any degree relinquished, or were not embraced in their whole length and breadth, he did not see, where a man could set his foot down, with consistency and safety, short of deism or atheism itself. Yet with all his strict adherence to what he believed to be the truths of heaven, his heart was kind and tender. When Mr. Whitefield preached for him on the Sabbath, the acute divine, whose mighty intellect has seldom been equalled, wept as a child during the whole sermon.

His Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will, is considered as one of the greatest efforts of the human mind. Those, who embrace the Calvinistic sentiments, have been accustomed to say, that he has forever settled the controversy with the Arminians by demonstrating the absurdity of their principles. On the other hand, there are those, attached to the general theological doctrines embraced by Edwards, who think that the unavoidable consequences of his metaphysical argument are so contradictory to the common judgment of mankind, as to authorize any one "boldly to cut asunder the knot, which he is unable to unloose." However, if the argument of Edwards be a fallacy, "there must be some way to unravel the puzzle."

Remarks were made on the Essay on the Freedom of the Will by James Dana and Samuel West; the latter was answered by Dr. Edwards. His other works, which are most celebrated, are his book on Original Sin in answer to Taylor, his Treatise on the Affections, his dissertation on the Nature of true Virtue, and that on the End for which God created the World. A splendid edition of his works was published in England, and an edition in eight volumes, intended to be a complete collection of his writings, edited by Dr. Austin, was published in 1809. Another edition, with an ample account of his life, edited by his descendant, Sereno Edwards Dwight, was published in ten vols. 8vo. in 1830.—Hopkins' Life of Edwards; Life prefixed to his Works; Middleton's Biog. Evngg. iv. 294—317; Jones's Chr. Bio.; Allen.

EDWARDS, (JONATHAN, D. D.,) president of Union college at Schenectady, in the state of New York, son of the preceding, was born at Northampton, June 6, 1745. In childhood, an inflammation in his eyes prevented him from learning to read till an uncommonly late period.

He was graduated at the college in New Jersey, in 1765. Two years before, at a time, when the students of the college were generally impressed by the truths of religion, he was blessed with the hope of his reconciliation to God through Christ. This was during the presidency and under the impressive preaching of Dr. Finley. He afterwards pursued the study of divinity under the instruction of Dr. Bellamy, and in October, 1766, was licensed to preach the gospel by the association of ministers in the county of Litchfield, Conn. In 1767, he was appointed tutor of Princeton college, and in this office he remained two years. He was ordained pastor of the church at Whitehaven, in the town of New Haven, January 5, 1769, and continued there till May, 1793, when he was dismissed by an ecclesiastical council, at his own request, and at the request of his society. In January, 1796, he was installed pastor of the church at Colebrook, in Litchfield county. In this retired situation, where he was enabled to pursue his theological studies with little interruption, he hoped to spend the remainder of his days. But in June, 1799, he was elected president of the college, which had been recently established at Schenectady, as successor of Mr. Smith. In July, he commenced the duties of the office. From this time, his attention and talents were devoted to the concerns of the seminary, of which he was intrusted with the charge. He died August 1, 1801, aged fifty-six, unexpectedly, but with Christian resignation.

There were several remarkable coincidences in the lives of Dr. Edwards and his father. Both were tutors in the seminaries, in which they were educated; were dismissed on account of their religious opinions; were settled again in retired situations; were elected to the presidency of a college; and, in a short time after they were inaugurated, died at near the same age. They were also remarkably similar in person and character.

Dr. Edwards was a man of uncommon powers of mind. He has seldom been surpassed in acuteness and penetration. His answer to Dr. Chauncey, his dissertation on the liberty of the will in reply to Dr. West, and his sermons on the atonement of Christ, to say nothing of his other publications, are considered as works of great and peculiar merit. He also edited, from the manuscripts of his father, the History of the Work of Redemption, two volumes of sermons, and two volumes of Observations on important theological subjects.—Connect. Evang. Mag., ii. 377—383; Müller, ii. 453; 2 Hist. Col. v. 81—100; Holmes, ii. 321.—Allen.

EFFECTUAL; that which actually answers the end intended. A door for preaching the gospel is effectual, when the opportunity of doing it issues in the conviction and conversion of many, 1 Cor. 16: 9. God works effectually in ministers when he enables them zealously to preach the gospel, and crowns their labors with success, Gal 2: 8. He works effectually in his chosen people, when he converts them to himself, and causes them to bring forth fruits of holiness to his glory, Eph. 3: 7. 4: 16. 1 Thess. 2: 13.

Christ and his cross and promise are said to be of naive effect, that is, of no saving use to men, when they do not believe his promise, embrace his person, religion, righteousness, and yield themselves to Him as their Lord and Master, Gal. 5: 1. 1 Cor. 1: 17. Rom. 4: 14.—Bronn.

EFFRONTES; a sort of heretics, in 1534, who scraped their forehead with a knife till it bled, and then poured oil into the wound. This ceremony served them instead of baptism. They are likewise said to have denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit.—Hend. Buck.

EGEDE, (HANS); a Danish divine, born in 1686, died in 1753, was the founder of the religious missions to Greenland, in which country he resided from 1721 to 1736, displaying a piety, zeal, and benevolence which gained the confidence of the natives. He wrote a description of Greenland.—His son, Paul, who succeeded him, and emulated his virtues, was born in 1708, and died in 1789. He wrote an account of Greenland; composed a dictionary and grammar of the language; and translated into that language a part of the Bible and some other works.—Davenport.

EGG, (bizim, Deut. 22: 6. Job 39: 11. Isa. 10: 14. 59: 5.) oon, Luke 11: 12. Eggs are considered as a very great delicacy in the East, and are served up with fish and honey at their entertainments. As a desirable article of food, the egg is mentioned, (Luke 11: 12:) "If a son ask for an egg, will his father offer him a scorpion?" It has been remarked that the body of the scorpion is very like an egg, as its head can scarcely be distinguished, especially if it be of the white kind, which is the first species mentioned by Ælian, Avicenna, and others. Bochart has produced testimonies to prove that the scorpions in Judea were about the bigness of an egg. So the similitude is preserved between the thing asked, and the thing given.—Watson.

EGINHARD; a celebrated historian, a native of Germany, was a pupil of Alcuin, who recommended him to the notice of Charlemagne. The monarch made him his secretary, and afterwards superintendent of his buildings. He died in 839, abbot of Seligenstadt. The stories relative to his marrying a daughter of Charlemagne, appear to be fables. Eginhard is the author of a Life of Charlemagne; Annals of France, from 741 to 829; and sixty-two Epistles.—Davenport.

EGLAIM; the same as GALLIM, a city beyond Jordan, to the east of the Dead sea, in the land of Moab, Isa. 15: 8. 1 Sam. 25: 44.—Jones.

EGLON; a king of the Moabites, who oppressed the Israelites for eighteen years, Judg. 3: 12—14. Calmet has confounded this servitude of the Hebrews with that under Cushan-Rishathaim, making it to subsist only eight years, viz. from 2591 to 2599; whereas the servitude under Eglon lasted eighteen years, and commenced in the year of the world 2661, which was sixty-two years after they had been delivered by Othniel from their subjection to Cushan-Rishathaim.—Jones.

EGYPT; a much renowned kingdom of antiquity, situated in the north of Africa. It is said to have derived its name from Han, the son of Noah, whence it is frequently in the book of Psalm styled the land of Ham. But the name by which it is generally denoted in Scripture is the land of Mizraim, who was a son of Han; from whence the Arabians and other oriental nations still call it Mesr; but the etymology of the word Egypt is variously accounted for.

Ancient Egypt is by some divided into two parts, the Upper and the Lower Egypt; by others into three; the Upper Egypt, or Thebais, so called from its capital city Thebes; the Middle Egypt, or Heptanomis, so called from the seven districts it contained; and the Lower Egypt, which included what the Greeks called the Delta and all the country lying upon the coasts of the Mediterranean and Red seas.

Thebais, which in Scripture is called Pathros, is the most southerly part of Egypt.

Middle Egypt comprehended all the country on each side of the Nile from Thebais to the point of the Delta, where that river divides itself into those branches by which it enters the sea. This part of Egypt was in ancient times full of large cities, among which was Memphis, the capital, situated on the western side of the Nile, as Grand Cairo, which seems to have succeeded Memphis, is built on the eastern.

The Lower Egypt, extending from the preceding quarter, to the Mediterranean sea, contained not only that part which is encompassed by the arms of the Nile, and from its triangular figure named Delta, but also Mareotis and Alexandria, with some territories towards Arabia to the east. Between these two large branches of the Nile called the Delta, there were several celebrated cities, Naucratis, Sais, Tanis, Canopus, Pelusium, Alexandria, Nicopolis, &c. It was in the country of Tanis that the Israelites are thought to have dwelt. (See the article GOSHEN.)

2. The fertility of Egypt, and the excellence of its productions and fruits, are greatly celebrated by ancient writers, and by Moses himself, Gen. 13: 10. It abounds with grain of all kinds, but particularly rice; inasmuch that it was formerly the granary of Rome. It is now the country which supplies Constantinople. Its fertility depends upon the periodical inundations of the Nile, which, as it is one of the most remarkable circumstances attending this country, will be spoken of under the article NILE.

3. Among all the nations of antiquity, there is none more worthy of attention than Egypt. If not the birth-place, it was the early protector of the sciences, and cherished every species of knowledge, which was known or cultivated in remote times. It was the principal source from whence the Greeks derived their information; and after all its windings and enlargements, we may still trace the stream of our knowledge to the banks of the Nile. Every ancient nation lays claim to a higher origin than legitimate history can sanction; and the Egyptians not only boast of being the most ancient people in the world, but they evidently extend their claims to a fabulous period. This proud nation, fondly conceited of its own antiquity, as Rollin expresses it, thought it glorious to lose itself in an abyss of infinite ages, as though it would carry back its pretensions to eternity. But though such extravagant claims are quite inadmissible, it cannot be denied that Egypt was the cradle of the Hebrew nation. (See GENESIS.)

The invention of alphabetical letters, and the art of writing, is generally attributed by the ancients to the Egyptians.

Egypt was the mother of the sciences as well as the arts. There were four colleges in Egypt, where science was studied and taught: Thebes, which Pythagoras visited; Memphis, where Thales and Democritus consulted the Egyptian priests; Heliopolis, where Plato studied; and Sais, where Solon was instructed in the principles of legislation and government.

The first important discoveries in astronomy were made by the Egyptians. As they were the first people of antiquity who lived by cultivating the ground, they were under a necessity of studying the motions of the stars. Arcturus, Orion, and the Pleiades marked out the several seasons among the early Greeks; and the rising of Sirius with the sun, announced to the Egyptians the overflowing of the Nile, and the customary time of sowing their grain, which was immediately after its retreat.

To sun up their character: Without having attained to elegance in the arts, or perfection in the sciences, the Egyptians struck out the models on which other nations improved; and philosophy owes them that respect which an empire pays to its founders.

4. What history records of their buildings, would surpass credibility, were it not attested by their monuments, which remain to this day. Egypt is a scene of antiquities; walking among ruins, the traveller forgets the present, to contemplate the past, and, amid the traces of a degenerate race, marks the remains of a mighty nation. Their buildings are still sublime. The pyramids of Egypt have always ranked among the wonders of the world. Three of them still remain, at the distance of some leagues from Grand Cairo, where Memphis formerly stood. The largest of the three, called the Great Pyramid, forms a square, each side of whose base is six hundred and sixty feet. The circumference is two thousand six hundred and forty feet. The basis covers eleven acres of ground. The perpendicular height is about four hundred and fifty feet; if measured obliquely, seven hundred feet.

The judgment of the living upon the dead would be striking in every nation, but was calculated to make a particular impression in Egypt, from the prejudices of the people. The Egyptians believed that the soul hovered about the body till putrefaction took place: hence they looked upon the rites of sepulture every where so sacred, as connected with their future felicity: and they hoped, by the secret of embalming which they discovered, to survive for ages in the tomb. Thus the sovereigns of Egypt were accountable to the tribunal of the people; and the very idea of such a solemn trial was a strong additional motive to make them discharge the duty of sovereigns. The monarch who erected a pyramid as his future habitation, would be naturally induced to respect the rights of his subjects, that they might assign him a place in the pyramid which he had erected to perpetuate his future fame. The Jews had a practice somewhat like this. Wicked kings were not buried in the sepulchre of their fathers. This custom prevailed to the time of the Amsonnean princes.

5. Among nations who are not blessed by divine revelation, the luminaries of heaven are the first objects of worship. Diodorus Siculus, mentioning the Egyptians, informs us, "that the first men, looking up to the world above them, and struck with admiration at the nature of the universe, supposed the sun and moon to be the principal and eternal gods." This, which may be called the natural superstition of mankind, we can trace in the animals of the West, as well as of the East; among the inhabitants of the new world, as well as of the old. The sun and moon, under the names of Isis and Osiris, were the chief objects of adoration among the Egyptians.

A superstitious reverence for certain animals, as propitious or disastrous to the human race, was prevalent, though not peculiar to the Egyptians. The cow has been venerated in India from the most remote antiquity. The serpent has been the object of religious respect to one half of the nations of the known world. The Romans had sacred animals, which they kept in their temples, and distinguished with peculiar honors. We need not therefore be surprised, that a nation, so superstitious as the Egyptians, should honor with peculiar marks of respect, the ichneumon, the ibis, the dog, the falcon, the wolf, and the crocodile. These they entertained at great expense, and with much magnificence. Lands were set apart for their maintenance; persons of the highest rank were employed in feeding and attending them; rich carpets were spread in their apartments; and the pomp at their funerals corresponded to the profusion and luxury which attended them when alive. What chiefly tended to favor the progress of animal worship in Egypt, was the language of hieroglyphics. In the hieroglyphic inscriptions on their temples and public edifices, animals, and even vegetables, were the symbols of the gods whom they worshipped. In the midst of innumerable superstitions, the theology of Egypt contained the two great principles of religion, the existence of a supreme Being, and the immortality of the soul. The first is proved by the inscription on the temple of Minerva: "I am that which is, which was, and shall be; no mortal hath lifted up my veil; the offspring of my power is the sun;" the second, by the care with which dead bodies were embalmed, and the prayer recited at the hour of death, by an Egyptian, expressing his desire to be received to the presence of the deities.

6. The splendid temples of Egypt were not built, in all probability, till after the time of Solomon; for the recent progress made in the deciphering of hieroglyphics has disappointed the antiquaries as to the antiquity of these stupendous fabrics. It is well observed by Dr. Shuckford, that temples made no great figure in Homer's time. If they had, he would not have lost such an opportunity of exerting his genius on so grand a subject as Virgil has done in his description of the temple built by Dido at Carthage. The first heathen temples were probably nothing more than mean buildings, which served merely as a shelter from the weather: of which kind was, probably, the house of the Philistine god Dagon. But when the fame of Solomon's temple had reached other countries, it excited them to imitate its splendor; and nation vied with nation in the structures erected to their several deities. All were, however, outdone, at least in massiveness and durability, by the Egyptians; the architectural design of whose temples, as well as that of the Grecian edifices, was borrowed from the stems and branches of the grove temples.

7. It appears to be an unfounded notion, that the pyramids were built by the Israelites: they were, probably, Mr. Faber thinks, the work of the "Shepherds," or Cushite invaders, who, at an early period, held possession of Egypt for two hundred and sixty years, and reduced the Egyptians to bondage, so that "a shepherd was an abomination to the Egyptians" in Joseph's time. The Israelites labored in making bricks, not in forming stones such as the pyramids are constructed with; and a passage in Mr. Jowett's "Researches," before referred to, will throw light upon this part of their history. Mr. Jowett saw at one place the people making bricks, with straw cut into small pieces, and mingled with the clay, to bind it. Hence it is, that when villages built of these bricks fall into rubbish, which is often the case, the roads are full of small particles of straws, extremely offensive to the eyes in a high wind. They were, in fact, engaged exactly as the Israelites used to be, making bricks with straw; and for a similar purpose,—to build extensive granaries for the bashaw; “treasure-cities for Pharaoh.” The same intelligent missionary also observes: “The mollems transact business between the bashaws and the peasants. He punishes them if the peasants prove that they oppress; and yet he requires from them that the work of those who are under them shall be fulfilled. They strikingly illustrate the case of the officers placed by the Egyptian taskmasters over the children of Israel; and, like theirs, the mollems often find their case evil, Exod. 5.”

8. It is not necessary to go over those parts of the Egyptian history which occur in the Old Testament. A part of the prophecies respecting this haughty and idolatrous kingdom, uttered by Jeremiah and Ezekiel, when it was in the height of its splendor and prosperity, were fulfilled in the terrible invasions of Nebuchadnezzar, Cambyses, and the Persian monarchs. It comes, however, again into an interesting connexion with the Jewish history under Alexander the Great, who invaded it as a Persian dependence. (See ALEXANDER and ALEXANDRIA.)

Egypt, indeed, was about to see better days; and, during the reigns of the Ptolemies, enjoyed again, for nearly three hundred years, something of its former renown for learning and power. It formed, during this period, and before the rapid extension of the Roman empire towards the termination of these years, one of the only two ancient kingdoms which had survived the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, and Macedonian empires: the other was the Syrian, where the Seleucidae, another family of one of the successors of Alexander, reigned; who, having subdued Macedonia and Thrace, annexed them to the kingdom of Syria, and there remained, out of the four kingdoms into which the empire of Alexander was divided, these two only; distinguished, in the prophetic writings of Daniel, by the titles of the kings or kingdoms of the north and the south.

9. The prophecies respecting Egypt in the Old Testament have had a wonderful fulfilment. And the literal fulfilment of every prophecy affords as clear a demonstration as can possibly be given, that each and all of them are the dictates of inspiration. Egypt was the theme of many prophecies, which were fulfilled in ancient times; and it bears to the present day, as it has borne throughout many ages, every mark with which prophecy had stamped its destiny: “They shall be a base kingdom. It shall be the basest of kingdoms. Neither shall it exalt itself any more among the nations: for I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule over the nations. I the Lord have spoken it. And there shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt,” Ezek. 30: 5, 7, 12, 13. The sceptre of Egypt shall depart away,” Zech. 10: 11.

Volney and Gibbon are our witnesses of the facts: “Such is the state of Egypt. Deprived, twenty-three centuries ago, of her natural proprietors, she has seen her fertile fields successively a prey to the Persians, the Macedonians, the Romans, the Greeks, the Arabs, the Georgians, and, at length, the race of Tartars distinguished by the name of Ottoman Turks. The Mamelukes, purchased as slaves, and introduced as soldiers, soon usurped the power and elected a leader. If their first establishment was a singular event, their continuance is not less extraordinary. They are replaced by slaves brought from their original country. The system of oppression is methodical. Every thing the traveller sees or hears reminds him he is in the country of slavery and tyranny.” “A more unjust and absurd constitution cannot be devised than that which condemns the natives of a country to perpetual servitude, under the arbitrary dominion of strangers and slaves. Yet such has been the state of Egypt about five hundred years. The most illustrious sultans of the Baharite and Borgite dynasties were themselves promoted from the Tartar and Circassian bands; and the four-and-twenty beys or military chiefs have ever been succeeded, not by their sons, but by their servants.” These are the words of Volney and of Gibbon, scoffers at the Bible, but eye-witnesses of the facts foretold in it two thousand four hundred years before!

10. Egypt has, indeed, lately somewhat risen, under its present spirited but despotic pasha, to a degree of importance and commerce. But this pasha is still a stranger, and the dominion is foreign. Nor is yet there any thing like a general advancement of the people to order, intelligence and happiness. Yet this fact, instead of militating against the truth of prophecy, may, possibly at no distant period, serve to illustrate other predictions. “The Lord shall smite Egypt: he shall smite and heal it; and they shall return to the Lord, and he shall be entreated of them, and shall heal them. In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land,” &c. Isa. 19: 22—25.—Rutherford’s Ancient History; Newton on the Prophecies; Keith on the Evidence of Prophecy; Calmet; Jones; Watson.

EGYPT, (BROOK, or RIVER OF.) This is frequently mentioned as the southern limit of the land of Promise, Gen. 15: 18. 2 Chron. 7: 8. Num. 24: 5. Josh. 15: 4. Calmet is of opinion, that this was the Nile; but most modern interpreters take the river of Egypt, to be the brook Besor, between Gaza and Rhinococura. (See Josh. 15: 47.)—Calmet.

EHUD; son of Gera: a judge of Israel, who slew Eglon, king of Moab, Judg. 3: 15.—Calmet.

EICETÆ; a denomination in the year 680, who affirmed that, in order to make prayer acceptable to God, it should be performed dancing.—Hend. Buck.

EICHORN, (JOHN GOFREY;) one of the most distinguished German scholars in Oriental literature, biblical criticism, and literary and general history. He was born at Dorrenzimmen, in 1752; in 1772, he was appointed professor at Jena; and, in 1788, he was made professor at Gottingen, where he remained till his death, in 1831. At Gottingen, he devoted himself chiefly to biblical studies. The results of his inquiries were published in his Universal Library of Biblical Literature; his Repertory of Biblical and Oriental Literature; and his Introduction to the Old and New Testaments—works which contain much important and valuable information, and sound criticism, but also much of the grossest and most offensive specimens of German neology. His writings have had a great influence on the views of continental divines.—Hend. Buck.

EJACULATION; a short prayer, in which the mind is directed to God, on any emergency. (See PRAYER.)—Hend. Buck.

EKRON; a city of the Philistines, and the seat of government. It was situated near the shore of the Mediterranean, between Azotus and Jamnia. It fell to the tribe of Judah by lot, when Joshua divided the land, but was afterwards given to the tribe of Dan, Josh. 15: 45. and 19: 43. The city was strongly fortified, and it does not appear from history that the Jews were ever sole, peaceable possessors of it. The idol Baalzebub was principally worshipped by the inhabitants of Ekron, and a famous temple was there dedicated to him, 2 Kings 1: 2, &c.—Jones.

ELAM; the eldest son of Shem, who settled in a country to which he gave his name, Gen. 10: 22. It is frequently mentioned in Scripture, as lying to the south-east of Shinar. Susiana, in later times, seems to have been a part of this country, (Dan. 8: 2.) and before the captivity, the Jews seem always to have intended Persia by the name of Elam. Stephanus takes it to be a part of Assyria; but Pliny and Josephus, more properly, of Persia, whose inhabitants, this latter tells us, sprung from the Elamites.—Watson.

ELATH; a sea-port town on the eastern coast of the Red sea. It originally belonged to the Edomites, being situated in the country of Idumea; but when David made a conquest of the latter, and began to establish a commercial intercourse with distant nations, Elath became a place of considerable note. In the reign of Solomon, it was of still more consequence on account of the ships which he there built and fitted out for the purpose of importing gold from Ophir, 2 Chron. 8: 17. It remained in the possession of the Israelites a hundred and fifty years, when, in the reign of Jehoram, the Edomites recovered it, 2 Kings 8: 20. It was however retaken by Uzziah, king of Judah, in the beginning of his reign, who fortified it anew, peopled it with his own subjects, and restored the trade to Ophir, which it continued to enjoy until the wicked reign of Ahaz, when Rezin, king of Damascus, took it by surprise, and having banished the Jews that were settled there, supplanted them with Syrians, and made preparations for carrying on the trade, by which the kings of Judah had been so enriched. The very next year, however, Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, invaded Damascus, conquered Rezin, took possession of Elath, and reserved the right of trade there to himself; so that the Jews from that time never recovered it, which proved very detrimental to their national interests.—Stackhouse's History of the Bible, vol. iii. Svo. b. vi. ch. 1.—June.

EL-BETH-EL, (to the God of Bethel;) the name given by Jacob to an altar which he built, (Gen. 35: 7.) and which stood, probably, in the very spot where he had formerly seen the prophetic dream of the ladder, chap. 28: 22.—Calmet.

ELCESAITES, ELCESAITÆ, ELXIANS, or SAMFSEANS; the followers of Elxai, or Elcesia, a sectary of the second century, but whether Jew or Christian, is by no means certain. They were nearly of the same opinion as the Ebionites and Ossens.—Mosheim's Eccl. Hist. vol. i. p. 216; Lordner's Heretics, p. 424, &c.—Williams.

ELDAD and MEDAD, were appointed by Moses among the seventy elders of Israel, who were to assist in the government; though not present in the general assembly, they were filled with the Spirit of God, equally with those who were there, and began to prophesy in the camp. Joshua would have had Moses forbid them, but he replied, "Enviest thou for my sake? Would to God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them!" Num. 11: 24—29.—Calmet.

ELDER, (presbuteros;) an overseer, ruler, leader. The reverence paid to the aged in the earliest times was doubtless the origin of this title, it being used as a name of office both among Jews and Christians. Dr. Macknight thinks that in the apostolic age it was applied to "all who exercised any sacred office in the Christian church," Acts 20: 17—28.

Elders, or seniors, in ancient Jewish polity, were persons the most considerable for age, experience, and wisdom. Of this sort were the seventy men whom Moses associated with himself in the government: such likewise afterwards were those who held the first rank in the synagogue as presidents.—Elders, in church history, were originally those who held the first place in the assemblies of the primitive Christians. The word presbyter is often used in the New Testament in this signification, and as interchangeable with episcopos; hence the first meetings of Christian ministers were called presbyteria, or assemblies of elders.

Elders, in the Presbyterian discipline, are officers who, in conjunction with the ministers and deacons, compose the kirk sessions, who formerly used to take cognizance not only of all grosser immoralities, such as swearing, drunkenness, lewdness, fighting, scolding, disobedience to parents, absence from public worship, &c. but also what are termed the levities and amusements of life—as dancing, racing, card-playing, and the like. They were authorized, on some occasions, to carry their jurisdiction into the bosoms of families and individuals; to disarm private resentments, and arbitrate in cases of domestic variance. Their principal business now is to take care of the poor's funds. They are chosen from among the people, and are received publicly with some degree of ceremony. In Scotland, there is an indefinite number of elders in each parish, generally about twelve. (See PRESBYTERIANS.)

It has long been a matter of dispute, whether there are any such officers as lay-elders mentioned in Scripture. On the one side it is observed, that these officers are no where mentioned as being alone or single, but always as being many in every congregation. They are also mentioned separately from the brethren. Their office, more than once, is described as being distinct from that of preaching, not only in Rom. 12; where he that ruleth is expressly distinguished from him that exhorteth or teacheth, but also in that passage, 1 Tim. 5: 17. On the other side it is said that, from the above-mentioned passages, nothing can be collected with certainty to establish this opinion; neither can it be inferred from any other passage, that churches should be furnished with such officers, though perhaps prudence, in some circumstances, may make them expedient. "I incline to think," says Dr. Guise, on the passage, (1 Tim. 5: 17.) "that the apostle intends only preaching elders, when he directs double honor to be paid to the elders that rule well, especially those who labor in the word and doctrine; and that the distinction lies not in the order of officers, but in the degree of their diligence, faithfulness, and eminence in laboriously fulfilling their ministerial work; and so the emphasis is to be laid on the word labor in the word and doctrine which has an especially annexed to it."—Hend. Buck.

ELEALEH; a town of Reuben, (Num. 32: 37.) placed by Eusebius a mile from Heshbon.—Calmet.

ELEATICS; a philosophic sect, founded by Xenophanes, at Elia, in Magna Græcia. He was originally a Pythagorean, but added some errors of his own to those of his master. A few fragments only of his writings are in existence; but it appears that he taught the eternity both of God and of the universe, and was a Pantheist.—Engel's Philosophy, vol. i. p. 413, &c.—Williams.

ELEAZER; the third son of Aaron, and his successor in the dignity of high-priest, Exod. 6: 23. He entered into the land of Canaan with Joshua, and is supposed to have lived there upwards of twenty years. The high-priesthood continued in his family till the time of Eli. He was buried in a hill that belonged to the son of Phineas, Josh. 24.

II. ELEAZER; the son of Aminadab, to whose care the ark was committed when it was sent back by the Philistines, 1 Sam. 7. He is thought to have been a priest, or at least a Levite, though he is not mentioned in the catalogue of the sons of Levi.—Watsoo.

ELECT, besides its scriptural and theological use, had also an ecclesiastical meaning, and was sometimes applied to the highest class of catechumens elected to baptism; at other times to the baptized, admitted to the full privileges of their profession, and sometimes called the perfect. The Manichæans were divided into two great classes, the Audientes and Elects.—Lordner's Cred., part II. vol. 6. pp. 87, 299, &c.—Williams.

ELECTA, (elect lady, Eng. Trans.) was, as is generally believed, a lady of quality who lived near Ephesus, to whom John addressed his second Epistle, cautioning her and her children against heretics, who denied the divinity of Christ, and his incarnation. Some think Electa, which signifies chosen, is not a proper name, but an honorable epithet, and that the Epistle was directed to a church. The same apostle salutes Electa, and her children in his third Epistle; but the accounts of this Electa are as perplexed as those of the former.—Calmet.

ELECTION; the act of choice. This word has different applications in the Scriptures. 1. It signifies God's taking a whole nation, community, or body of men, into external covenant with himself, by giving them the advantage of revelation as the rule of their belief and practice, when other nations are without it, Deut. 7: 6, 2. A temporary designation of some person or persons to the filling up of some particular station in the visible church, or office in civil life, John 6: 70. 1 Sam. 10: 24. 3. The gracious act of the Divine Spirit, whereby God actually and visibly separates his people from the world by effectual calling, John 15: 19. (See CALLING.) 4. That eternal, gratuitous, sovereign, and immutable purpose of God, whereby he selected from among all mankind, and of every nation under heaven, all those whom he effectually calls to be sanctified and everlastingly saved by Christ, Eph. 1: 4. 2 Thess. 2: 13. (See DEGREE; and PREDESTINATION.)

With respect to this subject, it is to be observed,—
1. That it is no part of the doctrine of election, that God created a part of mankind merely to damn them. This is often said by those who wish to bring the doctrine into contempt; but it is not true. It is indeed revealed that he will punish multitudes of the human race "with everlasting destruction from his presence;" but he did not bring them into being merely for the sake of punishing them. GOD IS LOVE. There is not one malevolent emotion rankling in his bosom. It is one of the foulest stains that was ever cast upon his spotless character, to admit the thought that he brought creatures into being merely for the purpose of making them forever miserable. In itself, he desires the salvation of every living man. We have his oath, "that he has no pleasure in the death of him that dieth." If he destroys the wicked, it is because their perdition is inseparable from the preservation of his own glory, and the highest good of his kingdom, and not because it is in itself well pleasing to his benevolent mind, or the ultimate object of their creation.

2. It is no part of the doctrine of election, that Christ died exclusively for the elect. Such a representation is an unjustifiable perversion of the doctrine, and exposes it to unnecessary objections. Though there would have been no atonement but for God's design to save the elect, and though there could have been no designs of mercy toward the elect without an atonement; yet the doctrine of atonement and election are two distinct things. Much idle breath and illiberal crimination might have been spared, by giving them that place in the Christian system which they hold in the word of God.

3. It is no part of the doctrine of election, that the elect will be saved, let them do what they will. The immutable law of the divine kingdom has made personal holiness essential to eternal life. It is not less certain that "no man will see the Lord without holiness,"—than that no man will see the Lord unless he be of the "election of grace." The elect cannot be saved unless they possess supreme love to God, sincere contrition for all their sins, and faith unfeigned in the Lord Jesus Christ. The elect can no more enter heaven without being prepared for it than others. If a man continues stupid and secure,—if he never reads the Scriptures,—if he never attends upon the word and ordinances,—if he is never anxious for the salvation of his soul,—if he never repents and believes the gospel,—if he never becomes a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus; he may rest assured there is nothing in the doctrine of election that will save him. "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

4. It is no part of election, that the non-elect will not be saved if they do as well as they can. If sinners "repent and believe the gospel," there is nothing in the doctrine of election that will destroy them. If they become reconciled to God, he will regard them with favor. If they "come to Christ," they shall "in no wise be cast out." Not one will be lost unless he persist in impenitence, reject the offers of mercy, and die in his sins.

5. It is no part of the doctrine of election, that the non-elect cannot comply with the terms of the gospel. We are well aware that the Scriptures represent it to be impossible for men to do what they are unwilling to do. Hence says our Savior,—"No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." His idea doubtless is, that men cannot come to him because they are unwilling to come; for he had just said, in the course of the same address, "and ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life." He supposes that mere unwillingness renders it impossible for them to come. This mode of speaking not only runs through the Bible, but is agreeable to the plainest dictates of reason and common sense. While, therefore, it is proper to say, that men cannot do what they are unwilling to do, it is also proper to say, that they can do what they are willing to do. They are as capable of doing right, if so disposed, as of doing wrong. The doctrine of election leaves them in full possession of all their powers as moral agents, and all possible liberty to choose or refuse the offers of mercy.

But if none of these things belong to the doctrine of election, what is it? For the sake of a clear understanding of the subject, several things must be particularly observed.

1. ALL MANKIND ARE BY NATURE IN A STATE OF SIN AND CONDEMNATION. The "imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." "We have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin."

2. NOTWITHSTANDING THE NATIVE CORRUPTION OF THE HUMAN HEART, AND THE LOST CONDITION OF ALL MANKIND BY NATURE, GOD HAS PROVIDED A FULL AND COMPLETE ATONEMENT FOR ALL THEIR SINS. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life." The atonement of Christ is sufficient for all, adapted to all, offered to all, and irrespective of the divine purpose as to its effectual application, made as much for one man as another.

3. NOTWITHSTANDING THE UNLIMITED PROVISION OF THE GOSPEL, ALL, WHEN LEFT TO THEMSELVES, WITH ONE CONSENT, REJECT THE OFFERTURES OF MERCY, AND WILL NOT COME UNTO CHRIST THAT THEY MIGHT HAVE LIFE. Even when the Spirit strives, they "do always resist the Holy Ghost." No sense of guilt and danger, no consciousness of obligation and duty, no pressure of motives, will constrain a living man to lay down the arms of rebellion, and be reconciled to God. If the Spirit of God does not put forth the power and glory of his grace to wrest the weapons of revolt from his hands, and put a new spirit within him, and make the sinner willing in the day of his power, all are lost, and Christ is dead in vain.

4. THIS SAD RESULT GOD HAS DETERMINED TO PREVENT. He does not mean that all mankind shall finally perish. He does not intend that they shall rob him of the glory of his grace, nor his Son of the reward of his death. Some he saves. These he rescues from themselves and from perdition. This is a simple matter of fact. When in the gall of bitterness and bonds of iniquity, he sends his Spirit to convince them of their lost condition—to show them their need of mercy—to make them feel his word to be quick and powerful—to create them anew in Christ Jesus, and to make them meet for the inheritance of the saints in light. "He works in them both to will and to do." He begins, carries on, and completes the work, and receives them at last to "the glory which is to be revealed."

5. GOD DOES THIS FROM DESIGN. He does nothing without. Much less any thing so great and glorious as this of renewing and saving souls. This design is an eternal design; this determination eternal, and irrevocable as his own unchangeable nature.

6. IN DOING THIS, IT IS IMPORTANT TO REMARK, THAT GOD IS GOVERNED BY A WISE REGARD TO HIS OWN GOOD PLEASURE. He does not have mercy on whom he will have mercy, because they are better than others. Then it would leave ground for boasting. Then it would not be grace. Now it is grace. For when the design of saving them was formed, they were not in being, and "had done neither good nor evil." During the whole of their unregenerate state, they were opposing God and contemning the Son of his love. The moment before their regeneration, they were his enemies. It could not, therefore, have been from regard to any thing in them, that they were taken and others left, but from a regard to the mere good pleasure and wisdom of God. It was a sovereign purpose. It was that all the glory might redound to God's great and holy name.

7. NOR IS IT LESS IMPORTANT TO SUBJOIN, THAT THIS SOVEREIGN AND ETERNAL PURPOSE WAS FORMED IN VIEW OF THE ATONEMENT OF CHRIST. In its practical influence, it regarded men as already fallen by their iniquity, and beyond the possibility of deliverance, except by atonement.

When God determined to save a part of mankind, he had it in prospect to provide such an expiation for the sins of the world, as to justify him in the unlimited offer of pardon, and in the full and complete justification of all who accept it. He owed it to himself, in forming the purpose to save, to devise a consistent method of salvation. It would have been a violation of the rights of moral government, to have received rebels into favor "without the shedding of blood." Hence the elect are said to be "chosen in Christ." In other places they are said to be "Christ's seed." In others, they are represented as "given to him" by his Father. When, in the covenant of peace, he engaged to lay down his life for the sins of the world, a stipulated number was "given him" as his reward. In view of mankind, as already plunged in guilt and ruin, and of Christ as making an adequate atonement, God "chose them to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth."

This is what we suppose the Scriptures mean by the doctrine of election. The apostle represents himself and the Christians at Ephesus to be "chosen"—"chosen in Christ"—"chosen in him before the foundation of the world;" and that not upon condition they would be holy, nor because of any foreseen holiness, but "that they should be holy and without blame before him in love, having predestinated them unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will."

The truth of this doctrine may be evinced, among other arguments,—

1. FROM THE DIVINE IMMUTABILITY. "Do not err, my beloved brethren. Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, or the shadow of turning." He himself claims this exalted character: "I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me; declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times, the things that are not yet done; saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." If we could suppose the Deity to be wiser, and better, and mightier at some times than at others, we might suppose, that with every accession of knowledge, goodness, and power, he would form some new design. But he is always the same; and as his character never alters, so his purposes never alter. Hence the divine immutability secures the doctrine of election. If the divine mind has formed any new purpose with regard to the salvation of men, then he has altered his plans, and is mutable; but if he has always been of the same mind, then, unless he actually saves the whole, he must have formed the purpose of saving a certain part. Every individual he saves, he must have "always meant to save,"—he must have always chosen and determined to save. But this is nothing more nor less than the doctrine of election. All the objections, therefore, that are made against the doctrine of election, are levelled equally against the divine immutability.

2. The doctrine of election may be conclusively argued from the DIVINE FOREKNOWLEDGE.

The mere light of nature is enough to teach us that God knows all things present, past, and to come. It is impossible that a being of infinite wisdom should commence a system of operations without knowing what he is about to do. If God does not know all events before they actually take place, then his knowledge may increase, and he may be wiser to-morrow than he is to-day. In short, if he does not foreknow all things, he may not only from day to day discover things that are new, but he may deduce new results from them, may misjudge in his arrangements, and be frustrated in his purposes. But the Bible puts this question beyond a doubt.—"Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world." It is a settled point, then, that God knew from all eternity every thing that would take place.

God, therefore, knows who will at last be saved. But salvation is his own work in the human soul. How then could this be known, unless it were a determined event? If it were undetermined, it was uncertain; and if uncertain, it could not certainly be known. Let any man but an atheist look at this with an unprejudiced mind, and he must receive the doctrine of election. It is just as certain, therefore, that God determined from eternity who would be saved, as that he knew from eternity who would be saved. "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate." But this is nothing more nor less than the doctrine of election. All the objections which lie against the doctrine of election, lie with equal force against the divine foreknowledge.

3. In proof of this doctrine, we shall make our appeal to the EXPRESS TESTIMONY OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

We consider the doctrine unanswerably demonstrated from the preceding considerations; but "to the law and the testimony." The Scriptures are the word of God, and the infallible rule of faith and practice. Here we have a standard to which every thing must bow. From this oracle there is no appeal. Let us go, then, to the Bible; and let us go—not to alter, not to expunge, not to supply, not to wrest from its plain and obvious meaning a single word; but simply to inquire what the Lord hath spoken, and to yield our preconceived opinions to the paramount authority of eternal truth. Here, if we are not deceived, we find the doctrine of election revealed as plainly as language can reveal it.

Let the reader carefully consult the following passages, and interpret them according to just and fair principles of exegesis, and we leave it to his own judgment to determine whether they do not teach the doctrine of a special election of particular persons to eternal life: Matt. 24: 22, 24. Acts 13: 48. Rom. 8: 28—30. 9: 23. 11: 5, 7. Eph. 1: 4, 5. 1 Thess. 1: 4. 5: 9. 2 Thess. 2: 13. 2 Tim. 1: 9. 2: 10. 1 Pet. 1: 2. The construction which some would force upon these passages, agreeably to which they understand merely the election or designation of nations or bodies of people to external religious privileges, cannot be maintained without unsettling the whole of the New Testament scheme of personal and individual salvation; and, however favorable such an idea may be to certain dogmas relative to the efficacy of a standing in what has been called the visible church, and the opus operatum of its sacraments, it cannot but prove highly prejudicial to the interests of genuine piety, and is, indeed, found to flourish chiefly in regions where that piety has little or no influence.—Hend. Buck.

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL, ("To God the God of Israel,") the name of an altar, built by Jacob in a piece of ground which he bought of Hamor, Shechem's father, Gen. 33: 20.—Calmet.

ELEMENTS, (stoicheia;) the elements or first principles of any art, whence the subsequent parts proceed. The elements or first principles of the Christian doctrine, Heb. 5: 12. St. Paul calls the ceremonial ordinances of the Mosaic law, "worldly elements," (Gal. 4: 3. Col. 2: 8, 20.) "weak and beggarly elements," Gal. 4: 9. Elements, as containing the rudiments of the knowledge of Christ, to which knowledge the law, as a pedagogue, (Gal. 3: 24.) was intended, by means of those ordinances, to bring the Jews; worldly, as consisting in outward worldly institutions, (Heb. 9: 1.) weak and beggarly, when considered in themselves, and set up in opposition to the great realities to which they were designed to lead. But, in Col. 2: 8. the elements or rudiments of the world are so closely connected with philosophy and vain deceit, or an empty and deceitful philosophy, that they must be understood there to include the dogmas of pagan philosophy; to which, no doubt, many of the Colossians were in their unconverted state attached, and of which the Judaizing teachers, who also were probably themselves infected with them, took advantage to withdraw the Colossian converts from the purity of the gospel, and from Christ their living head. And from the general tenor of this chapter, and particularly from verses 18—23, it appears, that these philosophical dogmas, against which the apostle cautioned his converts, were partly Platonic, and partly Pythagorean; the former teaching the worship of angels, or demons, as mediators between God and man; the latter enjoining such abstinence from particular kinds of meats and drinks, and such severe mortifications of the body, as God had not commanded.—Watson.

ELEUTHERUS; a river in Syria, which rises between Libanus and Anti-libanus. After watering the valley between these two mountains, it falls into the Mediterranean sea, 1 Mac. 11: 7.—Calmet.

ELEUTHEROPOLIS; a city of Judea, which, though not mentioned in the sacred writings, must have been very celebrated in the time of Eusebius and Jerome. It was an episcopal city, whence these authors estimated the distances and positions of other cities. Josephus says it was twenty miles from Jerusalem, and Antoninus places it twenty-four miles from Askalon, and eighteen from Lydda. Eusebius says five miles from Gath, six from Lachish, twenty-five from Gerar, twenty from Jattir, and eight from Keilah.—Calmet.

ELEPHANT, the largest of existing quadrupeds, celebrated for his sagacity, faithfulness and prudence.

Calmet is of opinion that the behemoth of Job 11: is the elephant; but this notion is generally held to be untenable. (See BEHEMOTH; and IVORY.)—Calmet.

ELI, a high-priest of the Hebrews, of the race of Ithamar, who succeeded Abdon, and governed the Hebrews, both as priest and judge, during forty years. How Eli came to the high priesthood, and how this dignity was transferred from Eleazar's family to that of Ithamar, who was Aaron's youngest son, we know not. This much, however, is certain, that it was not done without an express declaration of God's will, 1 Sam. 2: 27, &c. In the reign of Solomon, the predictions in relation to Eli's family were fulfilled; for the high priesthood was taken from Abiathar, a descendant of Eli, and given to Zadok, who was of the race of Eleazar, 1 Kings 2: 26. Eli appears to have been a pious, but indolent man, blinded by paternal affection, who suffered his sons to gain the ascendancy over him; and for want either of personal courage, or zeal for the glory of God sufficient to restrain their licentious conduct, he permitted them to go on to their own and his ruin. Thus he carried his indulgence to cruelty; whilst a more dignified and austere conduct on his part might have rendered them wise and virtuous, and thereby have preserved himself and family. A striking lesson for parents! 1 Sam. 4: 12—18.—Watson.

ELIAKIM; son of Hilkiah, steward of the household, or keeper of the temple under king Hezekiah, 2 Kings 18: 18. Calmet thinks, that Eliakim was son of Hilkiah, the high-priest, that he succeeded his father, and was high-priest under Manasseh. He is sometimes called Jehoia-kim; and there is great probability, that he is the Hilkiah mentioned in the reign of Josiah, and afterwards.—Calmet.

ELIAS. (See ELIJAH.)

ELIAS LEVITA, a celebrated Jewish rabbi, a native of Germany, was born at Neustadt, in Brandenburg, in 1172, and died at Venice, in 1549. For many years he was professor of Hebrew at Venice and Padua. Among his works, which are highly valuable, are, a Chaldaic, Talmudic, and Rabbinic Lexicon; a Hebrew Glossary; and a Commentary on the Grammar of Moses Kimchi.—Davenport.

ELIEZER, a native of Damascus, and the steward of Abraham's house. It seems that Abraham, before the birth of Isaac, intended to make him his heir:—"One born in my house," a domestic slave, "is mine heir," Genesis 15: 1—3. He was afterwards sent into Mesopotamia, to procure a wife for Isaac, (Gen. 24: 2, 3,) &c.; which business he accomplished with fidelity and expedition. "It is still the custom in India," says Forbes, "especially among the Mahometans, that in default of children, and sometimes where there are lineal descendants, the master of a family adopts a slave, frequently a Haffshee Abyssinian, of the darkest hue, for his heir. He educates him agreeably to his wishes, and marries him to one of his daughters. As the reward of superior merit, or to suit the caprice of an arbitrary despot, this honor is also conferred on a slave recently purchased, or already grown up in the family; and to him he bequeaths his wealth, in preference to his nephews, or any collateral branches. This is a custom of great antiquity in the East, and prevalent among the most refined and civilized nations. In the earliest period of the patriarchal history, we find Abraham complaining for want of children; and declaring that either Eliezer of Damascus, or probably one born from him in his house, was his heir, to the exclusion of Lot, his favorite nephew, and all the other collateral branches of his family."—Watson.

ELIHU; one of Job's friends, a descendant of Nahor, Job 32: 2. (See JOB.)—Watson.

ELIJAH. Elijah or Elias, a prophet, was a native of Tishbe beyond Jordan in Gilead. Some think that he was a priest descended from Aaron, and say that one Sabaca was his father; but this has no authority. He was raised up by God, to be set like a wall of brass, in opposition to idolatry, and particularly to the worship of Baal, which Jezebel and Ahab supported in Israel. His history may be found in the first and second books of Kings.

2. The Scripture introduces Elijah saying to Ahab, (1 Kings 17: 1, 2,) A. M. 3092, "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." It is remarkable, that the number of years is not here specified; but in the New Testament we are informed that it was three years and six months. By the prohibition of dew as well as rain, the whole vegetable kingdom was deprived of that moisture, without which neither the more hardy, nor more delicate, kinds of plants could shoot into herbage, or bring that herbage to maturity. The Lord commanded Elijah to conceal himself beyond Jordan, near the brook Cherith. He obeyed, and God sent ravens to him morning and evening, which brought him flesh and bread. Scheuzer observes, that he cannot think that the orehim of the Hebrew, rendered "ravens," means, as some have thought, the inhabitants of a town called Oreb, nor a troop of Arabs called orbhim; and contends that the bird called the raven, or one of the same genus, is intended. The word rendered raven, includes the whole genus, among which are some less impure than the raven, as the rook. Rooks living in numerous societies are supposed by some to be the kind of birds employed on this occasion, rather than ravens, which fly only in pairs. But upon all these explanations we may observe, that when an event is evidently miraculous, it is quite superfluous, and often absurd, to invent hypotheses to make it appear more easy.

3. Elijah was one of the most eminent of that illustrious and singular race of men, the Jewish prophets. Every part of his character is marked by a moral grandeur, which is heightened by the obscurity thrown around his connexions and his private history. He often wears the air of a supernatural messenger suddenly issuing from another world, to declare the commands of heaven, and to awe the proudest mortals by the menace of fearful judgments. His boldness in reproof; his lofty zeal for the honor of God; his superiority to softness, ease, and suffering, are the characters of a man filled with the Holy Spirit; and he was admitted to great intimacy with God, and enabled to work miracles of a very extraordinary and unequivocal character. These were called for by the stupid idolatry of the age, and were in some instances equally calculated to demonstrate the being and power of Jehovah, and to punish those who had forsaken him for idols. The author of Ecclesiasticus has an encomium to his memory, and justly describes him as a prophet "who stood up as a fire, and whose word burned as a lamp." In the sternness and power of his reproofs, he was a striking type of John the Baptist, and the latter is therefore prophesied of, under his name. Malachi (4: 5, 6,) has this passage: "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." Our Savior also declares that Elijah had already come in spirit, in the person of John the Baptist. At the transfiguration of our Savior, Elijah and Moses both appeared and conversed with him respecting his future passion, Matt. 17: 3, 4. Mark 9: 4. Luke 9: 30. Many of the Jews in our Lord's time believed him to be Elijah, or that the soul of Elijah had passed into his body, Matt. 16: 14

Mark 6: 15. Luke 9: 8. In conclusion, we may observe, that to assure the world of the future existence of good men in a state of glory and felicity, and that in bodies changed from mortality to immortality, each of the three grand dispensations of religion had its instance of translation into heaven; the patriarchal in the person of Enoch, the Jewish in the person of Elijah, and the Christian in the person of Christ.—Watson.

ELIPHÁZ; one of Job's friends, probably a descendant of Eliphaz, son of Esau, Job 1: 1. He was of Teman, in Idumea, (Jer. 49: 7, 20. Ezek. 25: 13. Amos 1: 11, 12. Obad. 8, 9.) and in the Greek versions of the poem, is described as king of his city. (See Job.)—Calmet.

ELISABETH, the wife of Zachariah, and mother of John the Baptist, was of the daughters of Aaron, or the race of the priests, Luke 1: 5—63.—Calmet.

ELISABETH, (Sr.) of Thuringia, distinguished for her piety and virtue, the daughter of Andrew II. king of Hungary, was born at Presburg, 1207, and, in 1211, was married to Louis, landgrave of Thuringia, who was then eleven years old, and was educated at Wartburg, in all the elegance of the court of Hermann, the abode of music and the arts. When Germany, and especially Thuringia, was oppressed with famine and pestilence, she caused many hospitals to be erected, fed a multitude of the poor from her own table, and supplied their wants with money and clothing. She wandered about, in an humble dress, relieving the sorrows of the wretched. Louis died on a crusade, and her own life terminated November 19, 1231, in an hospital which she had herself established. She was regarded as a saint by her admiring contemporaries, and, four years after her death, this canonization was approved by pope Gregory IX. A beautiful church and a costly monument were erected over her tomb. The latter is now one of the most splendid remains of Gothic architecture in Germany.—Ency. Amer.

ELISEUS; the same as Elisha, in the English translation of the New Testament.—Calmet.

ELISHA, son of Shaphat, and Elijah's disciple and successor in the prophetic office, was of Abelmeholah, 1 Kings 19: 16. Elijah having received God's command to anoint Elisha as a prophet, came to Abelmeholah, and finding Elisha ploughing with twelve pair of oxen, he threw his mantle over him. Elisha left his oxen, and accompanied Elijah, chap. 19: 19—21. Elisha was accompanying his master, when the Lord took him up in a whirlwind; and he inherited Elijah's mantle, with a double portion of his spirit. See his history in the books of Kings.—Calmet.

ELISHA, (THE FOUNTAIN OF,) rises two bow-shots from mount Quarantania, and runs through the plain of Jericho, into the Jordan; passing south of Gilgal, and dividing into several streams. This is said to be the fountain whose waters were sweetened by Elisha, 2 Kings 2: 19—22.—Calmet.

ELISHAH, son of Javan, (Gen. 10: 4.) from whom the isles of Elishah are named, (Ezek. 27: 7.) is believed to have peopled Elis in the Peloponnesus. We find there the province of Elis, and a country called Alisium, by Homer. Ezekiel, above, speaks of the purple of Elishah, brought to Tyre. The fish used in dyeing purple were caught at the mouth of the Eurotas, and the ancients frequently speak of the purple of Laconia.—Calmet.

ELKANAH; second son of Korah, Exod. 6: 24. 1 Chron. 6: 26. The name of his elder brother was Assir, which imports, a close prisoner; this name, Elkanah, (redeemed by God,) appears to have been given in contradistinction, alluding to the approaching deliverance of Israel.—Also, 2. The father of the prophet Samuel; (1 Sam. 1: 1.) perhaps so called in reference to one of the deliverances of Israel recorded in the book of Judges.

Several others of the same name are mentioned in 1 Chron. 6; and other places.—Calmet.

ELKOTH; a village in Galilee, the birth-place of the prophet Nahum, Nah. 1: 1. It was shown in Jerome's time, but almost in ruins. Theophylact says it is beyond Jordan.—Calmet.

ELLASAR. There was a city (mentioned by Ste-phanus, de Urbibus) called Ellas, in Cælo-Syria, on the borders of Arabia, where Arioch, one of the confederate kings, (Gen. 14: 9.) perhaps, commanded.—Calmet.

ELLERIAN, or RONSDOERFIAN, the followers of one Eller, an enthusiast, of Ronsdorf. He pretended to be a messenger from God, who resided in him, to form a new church, on which account he was called "the father of Zion," and his wife the mother. He is charged with being ambitious and luxurious, and died in 1750.—(Grégoire's Hist. vol. i. p. 307.)—Williams.

ELIOT, (JOHN,) minister of Roxbury, Massachusetts, usually called the apostle of the Indians, was born at Naisin, Essex, England, in 1604. His pious parents early imparted to him religious instruction, and it was not without effect. After receiving his education at the university of Cambridge, he was for some time the instructor of youth. In 1631, he came to this country, and was settled as teacher of the church in Roxbury, November 5, 1632.

His benevolent labors were not confined to his own people. Having imbibed the true spirit of the gospel, his heart was touched with the wretched condition of the Indians, and he became eagerly desirous of making them acquainted with the glad tidings of salvation. There were at the time, when he began his missionary exertions, near twenty tribes of Indians within the limits of the English planters. But they were very similar in manners, language, and religion. Having learned the barbarous dialect, he first preached to an assembly of Indians at Nonantum, in the present town of Newton, October 28, 1646. After a short prayer, he explained the commandments, described the character and sufferings of Christ, the judgment day and its consequences, and exhorted them to receive Christ as their Savior and to pray to God. After the sermon was finished, he desired them to ask any questions, which might have occurred. One immediately inquired, whether Jesus Christ could understand prayers in the Indian language. Another asked, how all the world became full of people, if they were all once drowned. A third question was, how there could be the image of God, since it was forbidden in the commandment. He preached to them a second time, November 11, and some of them wept while he was addressing them. An old man asked, with tears in his eyes, whether it was not too late for him to repent and turn unto God. Among the other inquiries were these, how it came to pass, that sea water was salt, and river water fresh; how the English came to differ so much from the Indians in the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ, since they all at first had but one father; and why, if the water is larger than the earth, it does not overflow the earth.

He was violently opposed by the sachems and pawas or priests, who were apprehensive of losing their authority, if a new religion was introduced. When he was alone with them in the wilderness, they threatened him with every evil, if he did not desist from his labors; but he was a man not to be shaken in his purpose by the fear of danger. He said to them, "I am about the work of the great God, and my God is with me; so that I neither fear you, nor all the sachems in the country; I will go on, do you touch me, if you dare." With a body capable of enduring fatigue, and a mind firm as the mountain oaks, which surrounded his path, he went from place to place, relying for protection upon the great Head of the church, and declaring the salvation of the gospel to the children of darkness. "I have considered," said he, "the word of God, (1 Tim. 2: 3.) Endure hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." He made a missionary tour every fortnight, planted a number of churches, and visited all the Indians in Massachusetts and Plymouth colonies, pursuing his way as far as cape Cod.

In 1651, an Indian town was built on a pleasant spot on Charles' river, called Natick. A house of worship was erected, and a form of government was established similar to that, which is mentioned in Exodus 18: 21. He was convinced, that in order to the most permanent success, it was necessary to introduce with Christianity the arts of civilized life. He accordingly made every exertion to persuade the Indians to renounce their savage customs and habits; but he never could civilize those, who went out in hunting parties. The first Indian church, established by the labors of Protestants in America, was formed at Natick, in 1660, after the manner of the congregational churches in New England. Those, who wished to be organized into a Christian body, were strictly examined as to their faith and experience by a number of the neighboring ministers, and Mr. Eliot afterwards administered to them baptism and the Lord's supper. Other Indian churches were planted in various parts of Massachusetts, and he frequently visited them; but his pastoral care was more particularly over that which he first established. He made every exertion to promote the welfare of the Indian tribes; he stimulated many servants of Jesus to engage in the missionary work; and, although he mourned over the stupidity of many who preferred darkness to light, yet he lived to see twenty-four of the copper-colored aborigines fellow preachers of the precious gospel of Christ. In 1661, he published the New Testament in the Indian language, and in a few years the whole Bible, and several other books, best adapted for the instruction of the natives.

He possessed an influence over the Indians, which no other missionary could obtain. He was their shield in 1675, during Philip's war, when some of the people of Massachusetts, actuated by the most infuriate spirit, had resolved to destroy them. He suffered every abuse for his friendship to them; but nothing could quench the divine charity which glowed in his heart. His firmness, his zeal, his benevolence at this period increased the pure lustre of his character.

When he reached the age of fourscore years, he offered to give up his salary, and desired to be liberated from the labors of his office, as a teacher of the church at Roxbury. It was with joy, that he received Mr. Walter as his colleague in 1688. When he was bending under his infirmities and could no longer visit the Indians, he persuaded a number of families to send their negro servants to him once a week, that he might instruct them in the truths of God. He died, May 20, 1690, aged about eighty-six years, saying, that all his labors were poor and small, and exhorting those, who surrounded his bed, to pray. His last words were, "Welcome joy."

Mr. Eliot was one of the most useful preachers in New England. No minister saw his exertions attended with greater effects. He spoke from the abundance of his heart, and his sermons, being free from that labored display of learning, from the quibbles and quaint terms, with which most discourses were at that time infected, were acceptable in all the churches.

His moral and religious character was as excellent, as his ministerial qualifications were great. He carried his good principles with him in every situation, viewing all things in reference to God. He habitually lifted up his heart for a blessing upon every person whom he met, and when he went into a family, he would sometimes call the youth to him, that he might lay his hands upon them, and give them his benediction. In his manner of living he was very simple. One plain dish was his repast at home, and when he dined abroad, he seldom tasted any of the luxuries before him. He drank water; and said of wine, "It is a noble, generous liquor, and we should be humbly thankful for it; but, as I remember, water was made before it." Clothing himself with humility, he actually wore a leathern girdle about his loins. In domestic life he was peculiarly happy. By the prudent management of his wife, who looked well to the ways of her household, he was enabled to be generous to his friends, and hospitable to strangers, and with a small salary to educate four sons at Cambridge, of whom John, and Joseph, ministers of Newton and Guilford, were the best preachers of that age.

In his principles of church government, he was attached to the congregational order.

So remarkable was he for his charities, that the parish treasurer, when he once paid him the money due for his salary, tied the ends of a handkerchief, into which he put it, in as many hard knots as he could, to prevent him from giving away the money before he should reach home. The good man immediately went to the house of a sick and necessitous family, and told them, that God had sent them some relief. Being welcomed by the sufferers with tears of gratitude, he began to untie the knots. After many fruitless efforts, and impatient of the perplexity and delay, he gave the handkerchief and all the money to the mother of the family, saying, "Here, my dear, take it; I believe the Lord designs it all for you."

Mr. Eliot published several works besides his great ones mentioned above. At the end of his Indian Grammar he is said to have recorded this memorable sentence; "PRAYER AND PAINS, THROUGH FAITH IN CHRIST JESUS, CAN DO ANY THING." Mather's Magnalia, iii. 170—211; Eliot's Life and Death; Neal's New England, i. 151, 212, 258; ii. 98; Hist. Col. i. 176; iii. 177—188; Douglass, ii. 113; Hutchinson, i. 162—169, 212; Holmes, i. 431.—Allen.

ELIOT, (ANDREW, D. D.) minister in Boston, was a descendant of Andrew Elliott, as he wrote his name, from Somersetshire, who settled at Beverly about 1683. His father, Andrew, was a merchant in Boston. He was born about the year 1719, and in 1737, was graduated at Harvard college. He early felt the impressions of religion, and was induced to devote himself to the service of the Lord Jesus. He was ordained pastor of the New North church in Boston, as colleague with Mr. Webb, April 14, 1742. Here he continued in high reputation till his death, September 13, 1778, aged fifty-nine years.

He was highly respected for his talents and virtues. While he preached the distinguishing doctrines of the gospel, his sermons were not filled with invectives against those, who differed from him. He was anxious to promote the interests of practical godliness, and, destitute of bigotry, he embraced all, who appeared to have an honest regard to religious truth. He revered the constitution of the churches of New England, and delighted in their prosperity. In 1743, he united with many other excellent ministers in giving his testimony in favor of the very remarkable revival of religion in this country.

When the British took possession of Boston, he sent his family out of the town, with the intention of following them; but a number of the people, belonging to his society and to other societies, being obliged to remain, requested him not to leave them. After seeking divine direction, he thought it his duty to comply with their request, and in no period of his life was he more eminently useful. He was a friend to the freedom, peace, and independence of America. By his benevolent offices he contributed much toward alleviating the sufferings of the inhabitants; he ministered to his sick and wounded countrymen in prison; he went about doing good; and he appeared to be more than ever disengaged from the world, and attached to things heavenly and divine. He was a friend of literature and science, and he rendered important services to Harvard college, both as an individual benefactor, and as a member of the board of overseers and of the corporation. So highly were his literary acquirements and general character estimated, that he was once elected president of the university; but his attachment to his people was such, that he declined the appointment. In his last sickness he expressed unshaken faith in those doctrines of the grace of God, which he had preached to others, and would frequently breathe out the pious ejaculation, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

Besides occasional discourses, he published a volume of twenty sermons, 8vo. 1774.—Thacher's Funeral Sermon; Memoirs of Thomas Hollis; Hist. Col. x. 188; Farmer.—Allen.

ELIOT, (JOHN, D. D.) minister in Boston, the son of Dr. Andrew E., was born May 31, 1754, and graduated at Harvard college in 1772. After preaching a few years in different places, he was ordained, as the successor of his father, November 3, 1779, pastor of the New North church in Boston. He died of an affection of the heart or pericardium, February 14, 1813, aged fifty-eight. During his ministry of thirty-four years, he baptized one thousand four hundred and fifty-four persons; performed the ceremony of marriage eight hundred and eleven times; and admitted one hundred and sixty-one to full communion in the church.

Dr. Eliot was very mild, courteous, and benevolent; as a preacher he was plain, familiar, and practical, avoiding disputed topics, and always recommending charity and peace. For nine years he was one of the corporation of Harvard college. With his friend, Dr. Belknap, he cooperated in establishing and sustaining the Massachusetts Historical society, to the publications of which he contributed many writings. His attention was much devoted to biographical and historical researches. He published a New England Biographical Dictionary, 8vo. 1809; besides various articles in the Historical Collections. 2 Hist. Col. i. 211—248.—Allen.

ELLSWORTH, (OLIVER, L. L. D.), chief justice of the United States, was born at Windsor, Connecticut, April 29, 1745, and was graduated at the college in New Jersey in 1766. He soon afterwards commenced the practice of the law, in which profession he became eminent. His perceptions were unusually rapid, his reasoning clear and conclusive, and his eloquence powerful. He died November 26, 1807, aged sixty-five.

Mr. Ellsworth was an accomplished advocate, an upright legislator, an able and impartial judge, a wise and incorruptible ambassador, and an ardent, uniform, and indefatigable patriot. He moved for more than thirty years in a most conspicuous sphere, unassailed by the shafts of slander. His integrity was not only unimpeached but unsuspected. The purity and excellence of his character are rare in any station, and in the higher walks of life are almost unknown.

If it be asked, to what cause is the uniformity of his virtue to be attributed? The answer is at hand. He was a Christian. He firmly believed the great doctrines of the gospel. Having its spirit transfused into his own heart, and being directed by its maxims and impelled by its motives, he at all times pursued a course of upright conduct. The principles, which governed him, were not of a kind which are liable to be weakened or destroyed by the opportunity of concealment, the security from dishonor, the authority of numbers, or the prospects of interest. He made an explicit confession of Christianity in his youth; and in all his intercourse with the polite and learned world, he was not ashamed of the gospel of Christ. In the midst of multiplied engagements, he made theology a study, and attended with unvarying punctuality on the worship of the sanctuary. The sage, whose eloquence had charmed the senate, and whose decisions from the bench were regarded as almost oracular, sat with the simplicity of a child at the feet of Jesus, devoutly absorbed in the mysteries of redemption. His religion was not cold and heartless, but practical and vital. Meetings for social worship and pious conference he countenanced by his presence. He was one of the trustees of the Missionary society of Connecticut, and engaged with ardor in the benevolent design of disseminating the truths of the gospel. In his last illness he was humble and tranquil. He expressed the submission, the views, and the consolations of a Christian. Panoptist and Miss. Mag. i. 193—197; Brown's Amer. Reg. ii. 95—108; Dwight's Trav. i. 301—304.—Allen.

ELM; this word occurs but once in the English Bible; (Hos. 4: 13;) but the Hebrew aleh, is in every other place rendered oak, which see.—Calmet.

ELNATHAN, son of Achbor, and father of Nehusta, mother of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. He opposed the king's burning of Jeremiah's prophecies; and was sent into Egypt to bring back the prophet Uriah. Jer. 26: 22. 36: 12.—Calmet.

ELOHIM, ELOHI, or ELOI; one of the names of God. Angels, princes, great men, judges, and even false gods, are sometimes called Elohim. The connexion of the discourse assists us in determining the proper meaning of this word where it occurs. It is the same as eloha: one being singular, the other plural. Nevertheless, elohim is often construed in the singular, particularly when the true God is spoken of; when false gods are spoken of, it is rather construed in the plural.

This word, however, has been the subject of so much controversy, and is, in fact, so important, that it may justify a few remarks in illustration of its general idea and application.

Elohim would seem to be second in dignity only to the name JEHOVAH; as that name imports the essential being of the Divinity, so Elohim seems to import the power inherent in Deity; or the manifestation of that power on its relative subjects. Of the creation, the Deity exhibited his attribute of power; he manifested himself to be God Almighty. Compare Ps. 100: 3. Isa. 40: 28. 42: 5. et al. So, on occasion of miracles: "Thou art the God that doest wonders" by thy power. Ps. 77: 14. "Who is like unto thee among the mighty?" (Exod. 15: 11, margin.) implying superior power in the true God above all. And this appears to be attributed in a lower sense to angels, spiritual beings possessing powers superior to those of man. Judg. 13: 21. Ps. 8: 5. 97: 7, 9. Kings have greater power than their subjects; magistrates greater power than those who come before them, to obtain decision of their suits, and application of the laws; and princes, or men of rank, whether in office or not, possess power and influence by their wealth, station, retinue, &c. Idols, also, represented the powers of heaven; that is, celestial influences, or terrestrial influences, as procreative powers, &c. So the golden calf is called Elohim; (Exod. 32: 31.) that is, the power that had brought Israel out of Egypt; so Dagon, (Judg. 16: 23, &c.) Astaroth, Chernosh, and Milcom, (1 Kings 11: 33,) — the powers productive, whether masculine or feminine. So Moses was the depository of power in respect of God, or the source whence power emanated and influenced Aaron; (Exod. 4: 16. 7: 1;) and the ark was thus esteemed by the Philistines; (1 Sam. 4: 7.) that is, as the depository of power, or the sacred symbol whence power might emanate to their injury. (See God, and Gons.)

It is remarkable, that the names Jehovah and Elohim though not interchangeable, are occasionally placed one before the other without scruple; but, perhaps, the critical observer would find, that according to the occasion, the essential being of God, or the manifestative power of God, is pre-eminent in such passages, according to the order of the words.

The Jewish critics find great mysteries in some of these words, Eloi, Elohi, Elohim, &c. which are always written full, while others are written deficient. Whether the word Elohim be singular or plural, adjective or substantive, or whether it have any root in the Hebrew language, they are not agreed.—Calmet.

ELOI. (See ELOHIM.)

I. ELON; a grove of oaks: Elon-Mamre, Elon-More, Elon-Beth-Chanan, the grove—or oak—of Mamre, &c. II. A city of Dan. Josh. 19: 43.—Calmet.

ELOQUENCE, PULPIT. "The chief characteristics of the eloquence suited to the pulpit are these two,—gravity and warmth. The serious nature of the subjects belonging to the pulpit requires gravity; their importance to mankind requires warmth. It is far from being either easy or common to unite these characters of eloquence. The grave, when it is predominant, is apt to run into a dull, uniform solemnity. The warm, when it wants gravity, borders on the theatrical and light. The union of the two must be studied by all preachers, as of the utmost consequence, both in the composition of their discourses, and in their manner of delivery. Gravity and warmth united, form that character of preaching which the French call onction; the affecting, penetrating, interesting manner, flowing from a strong sensibility of heart in the preacher, the importance of those truths which he delivers, and an earnest desire that they may make full impression on the hearts of his hearers." (See DECLAMATION; SERMONS.)

It has been justly remarked, "He who ascends the pulpit hopelessly and heartlessly—who expects his reasonings to fall like the dart of Priam, 'telum imbelles sine ictu,' on the breast of the audience—he, in short, who preaches without faith, is not likely to give the thought, the time, the mind to his sermons which are essential to any high achievement in this department of his labors. But this negligence is extremely culpable.

Let the ministers of the gospel expect, under the divine blessing, larger results from their sermons. Let them not be faithless, but believing; let them throw far from them every suggestion which may minister to the natural and universal sloth of our nature. Let them regard their sermons, as they would the wand of the prophet, designed to draw the waters of contrition from the stony heart. Let them believe that God intends to accomplish much by them, and anxiously labor to fit themselves for their high purpose and destination."—Hend. Buck; *Chris. ELUL; the sixth month of the Hebrew ecclesiastical year, and the twelfth of the civil year, answering to our August and part of September, containing twenty-nine days.—Watson.

ELXAITES; ancient heretics, who made their appearance in the reign of the emperor Trajan, and took their name from their leader, Elxai. They kept a mean between the Jews, Christians, and pagans; they worshipped but one God, observed the Jewish Sabbath, circumcision, and the other ceremonies of the law; yet they rejected the pentateuch and the prophets; nor had they any more respect for the writings of the apostles. Some are of opinion that Elxai ultimately joined the sect of the Ebionites.—Hend. Buck.

ELYMAIS; the capital of Elam, or the ancient country of the Persians. 1 Mac. 6: 1. informs us, that Antiochus Epiphanes, understanding there were very great treasures in the temple at Elymais, determined to plunder it; but the citizens resisted him successfully. 2 Mac. 9: 2. calls this city Persepolis, probably because it formerly had been the capital of Persia; for Persepolis and Elymais were very different cities; the former situated on the Araxes, the latter on the Eulæus. The temple which Antiochus designed to pillage was that of the goddess Nanea, according to Maccabees; Apian says, a temple of Venus; Polybius, Diodorus, Josephus, and Jerome say, a temple of Diana. (See PARTHIANS.)—Calmet.

ELYMAS. (See BAR-JESUS.)

EMANATION, EFFLUX; (from the Latin emanare, to issue, to flow out, to emanate.) Philosophical systems, which, like most of the ancient, do not adopt a spontaneous creation of the universe by a supreme Being, frequently explain the universe by an eternal emanation from the supreme Being. This doctrine came from the East. Traces of it are found in the Indian mythology, and in the old Persian or Bactro-Median doctrine of Zoroaster. It had a powerful influence on the ancient Greek philosophy, as may be seen in Pythagoras. In theology, the doctrine of emanation is the doctrine of the Trinity, which regards the Son and Holy Ghost, &c. as effluxes from the Deity himself.—Ency. Amer.

EMBALMING; the art of preserving dead bodies from putrefaction. (See BURIAL.)

EMBER-WEEKS; weeks of abstinence preceding the Sundays appointed in the church of England for ordination, which are, the first in Lent, the Sunday after Whit-Sunday, after the 14th of September, and 13th of December.—Broughton's Dictionary; Williams.

EMBRACE; kindly to take into one's bosom. Gen. 29: 13. To embrace promises is to trust in them with delight and pleasure. Heb. 11: 13. To embrace wisdom is to receive Jesus and his truth into our heart, and to take pleasure to follow him. Prov. 4: 8.—Bronn.

EMBROIDER. (See BROIDERED.)

EMERALD. Exod. 28: 19. Ez. 27: 16. 28: 13. Rev. 21: 19. Eccl. 32: 6. Tobit 13: 16. Judith 10: 21. It is one of the most beautiful of all the gems, and is of a bright green color, without the admixture of any other. Pliny thus speaks of it: "The sight of no color is more pleasant than green; for we love to view green fields and green leaves; and are still more fond of looking at the emerald, because all other greens are dull in comparison with this. Besides, these stones seem larger at a distance, by tinging the circumambient air. Their lustre is not changed by the sun, by the shade, nor by the light of lamps; but they have always a sensible moderate brilliancy." From the passage in Ezekiel we learn that the Tyrians traded in these jewels in the marts of Syria. They probably had them from India, or the south of Persia. The true oriental emerald is very scarce, and is only found at present in the kingdom of Cambay.—Watson.

EMERODS. The ark having been taken by the Philistines, and being kept at Ashdod, the hand of God afflicted ed them with a painful disease, 1 Sam. 5: 6. Interpreters are not agreed on the signification of the original ophelim; nor on the nature of the disease. The Hebrew properly signifies, that which is obscure and hidden, and most interpreters think, that those painful tumors in the fundamen- are meant, which sometimes turn into ulcers. Ps. 78: 66. The Seventy and Vulgate add to versc 9, that the Philistines made seats of skins, upon which to sit with more ease, by reason of their indisposition. Herodotus seems to have had some knowledge of this history, but has assigned another cause. He says, the Scythians having plundered the temple of Askaloo, a celebrated city of the Philistines, the goddess who was worshipped there afflicted them with a peculiar disease. The Philistines, perhaps, thus related the story; but it evidently passes for truth, that this disease was ancient, and had been sent among them by some avenging deity. To remedy this suffering, and to remove the ravages committed by rats, which wasted their country, the Philistines were advised by their priests and soothsayers to return the ark of God with the following offerings: (1 Sam. 6: 1—18.) five figures of a golden emerald, that is, of the part afflicted, and five golden rats; hereby acknowledging, that this plague was the effect of divine justice. This advice was followed; and Josephus, (Antiq. lib. vi. c. 1.) and others, believed that the five cities of the Philistines made each a statue, which they consecrated to God, as votive offerings for their deliverance. This, however, seems to have originated from the figures of the rats. The heathen frequently offered to their gods figures representing those parts of the body which had been diseased; and such kinds of ex votis are still frequent in Catholic countries; being consecrated in honor of some saint, who is supposed to have wrought the cure: they are images of wax, or of metal, exhibiting those parts of the body in which the disease was seated.—Calmet.

EMERSON, (JOSEPH, minister of Malden, Massachusetts, the son of Edward Emerson, and the grandson of Rev. Joseph Emerson, of Mendon, was born at Chelmsford, April 20, 1790; was graduated at Harvard college in 1717; and ordained October 31, 1721. For near half a century he continued his benevolent labors without being detained from his pulpit but two Sabbaths. He died suddenly, July 13, 1767, aged sixty-seven. His wife was Mary, daughter of Rev. S. Moody, of York. He had nine sons and four daughters. Three of his sons were ministers; Joseph, of Pepperell, William, of Concord, and John, of Conway. He was pious in early life, and his parents witnessed the effect of their instruction and prayers. As a teacher of religion to his fellow men, and their guide to heaven, he searched the Scriptures with great diligence, that he might draw his doctrines from the pure fountains of truth. In the various relations, which he sustained, he was just, amiable, kind, and benevolent. One tenth of his income was devoted to charitable uses. He at stated times every day addressed himself to heaven, and never engaged in any important affair without first seeking the divine blessing. Such was his humility, that when unguarded words fell from his lips, he would ask forgiveness of his children and servants. He published, the Importance and Duty of a timely Seeking of God, 1727; Meat out of the Eater, and Sweetness out of the Strong, 1735; Early Piety encouraged, 1738; at the ordination of his son Joseph, at Groton, now Pepperell, 1747.—Funeral Sermon by his Son; Allen.

EMESA, or HAMATH. (See HAMATH.)

EMLYN, (THOMAS,) a native of Lincolnshire, born at Stamford in 1663, was brought up as a dissenting minister, and, in 1691, settled at Dublin, as assistant to the Rev. Joseph Boyce; but was soon interdicted from his pastoral duties, on suspicion of Arianism. His humble inquiry into the Scripture account of Jesus Christ brought on him a prosecution for blasphemy, and he was heavily fined and imprisoned. On his release, he removed to London, where he died, in 1743. Emlyn's character was amiable and unimpeachable, and he was in habits of friendship with Dr. Clarke, Whiston, and other eminent men. His works have been collected into two volumes 8vo.—Davenport.

EMIMS; ancient inhabitants of the land of Canaan, beyond Jordan, who were defeated by Chedorlaomer and his allies. Gen. 14: 5. Moses tells us that they were beaten at Shaveh-Kirjathaim, which was in the country of Sihon, conquered from the Moabites. Josh. 13: 19—21. The Emims were a warlike people, of a gigantic stature, great and numerous, tall as the Anakims, and were accounted giants as well as they. Deut. 2: 10, 11.—Watson.

EMMANUEL; (God with us.) Isaiah, in his celebrated prophecy (chap. 11.) of the birth of the Messiah from a virgin, says, this child shall be called, that is, really be, "Emmanuel." He repeats this while speaking of the enemy's army, which, like a torrent, was to overflow Judea: "The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Emmanuel." Matthew informs us, that this prophecy was accomplished in Jesus Christ, born of the virgin Mary, in whom the two natures, divine and human, united; so that he was really Emmanuel, or, God with us. (See ALMAH.)—Calmet.

ENMAUS, (hot baths,) a village seven miles and a half north-west of Jerusalem, celebrated for our Lord's conversation with two disciples who went thither on the day of his resurrection. Josephus (de Bello, lib. 8. cap. 27.) says, that Vespasian left eight hundred soldiers in Judea, to whom he gave the village of Emmaus, which was sixty furlongs from Jerusalem. D'Arviux states, (vol. vii. p. 259,) that going from Jerusalem to Rama, he took the right from the high road to Rama, at some little distance from Jerusalem, and "travelled a good league over rocks and flint stones, to the end of the valley of terebinthine trees" till he reached Emmaus. It seems, by the ruins which surrounded it, that it was formerly larger than it was, in our Savior's time.—Calmet.

EMPTY. Persons are empty when they are poor, without wealth, (Ruth 1: 21;) without reward, (Gen. 31: 42.) without an offering, (Exod. 23: 15. 1 Sam. 6: 3.) and, in fine, without any thing good. Luke 1: 53. Ruth 3: 17. To empty, is to pour out, (Zech. 4: 12.) or to take forth, Gen. 43: 35. Moab had not been emptied from vessel to vessel; they had not been tossed from place to place, nor their condition changed, as that of the Jews had been. Jer. 48: 11. The Medes and Chaldeans are called emptiers, because they drained Nineveh of its inhabitants, power, wealth, and glory. Mal. 2: 2.—Brown.

EMULATION; a generous arbor kindled by the praiseworthy examples of others, which impels us to imitate, to rival, and, if possible, to excel them. This passion involves in it esteem of the person whose attainments or conduct we emulate, of the qualities and actions in which we emulate him, and a desire of resemblance, together with a joy springing from the hope of success. The word comes originally from the Greek amilla, contest; whence the Latin emulus; and thence our emulation. In Gal. 5: 20, the word zeloi, rendered "emulations," signifies jealousies, and is classed among "the works of the flesh." Plato makes emulation the daughter of envy; if so, there is a great difference between the mother and the offspring; the one being a virtue, and the other a vice. Emulation admires great actions, and strives to imitate them; envy refuses them the praises that are their due; emulation is generous, and only thinks of equalling or surpassing a rival; envy is low, and only seeks to lessen him. It would, therefore, be more proper to suppose emulation the daughter of admiration; admiration being a principal ingredient in the composition of it.—Hend. Buck.

EN, (ain) signifies a fountain; for which reason we find it compounded with many names of towns and places; as en-dor, en-gedi, en-glaïm, en-shemish, q. d. the fountain of dor—of gedi, &c.—Calmet.

ENAIM; a town of Judah, (Josh. 15: 34,) perhaps mentioned in Gen. 38: 14, where the Vulgate reads, that Tamar sat in a place where two ways met, Heb. She sat at Enaim; LXX. She sat at Enan by the way. English translation, She sat in an open place which is by the way. Others think Enan, or Enaim, signifies a fountain or well; which is most probable. Perhaps even this might be translated, "the two wells," or "the double well;" a very likely place of rendezvous.—Calmet.

ENAN. Ezekiel speaks of Enan, (chap. 48: 1,) or Hazar-Enan, as of a town well known; the northern boundary of the land. See also Num. 34: 9. This may be Gaana, north of Damascus, or Ina, mentioned by Ptolemy, or Aennos in Peutinger's tables, south of Damascus. Possibly likewise the En-hazor of Naphtali. Josh. 19: 37.—Calmet.

ENCENAS; a Spaniard, and a martyr of the twelfth century. He was sent to Rome to be brought up in the papal faith, but there became acquainted with the followers of Arnold of Brescia, the celebrated reformer. They put into his hands several treatises, by means of which he was converted to the Protestant faith. When the fact became known, one of his own relations informed against him, and he was burnt alive by order of the pope and a conclave of cardinals. His brother was arrested about the same time for having a New Testament in the Spanish language in his possession; but, before the day appointed for his execution, he found means to escape from prison, and retired to Germany.—Fox.

ENCOURAGE; to render one hearty, hopeful, cheerful, and ready for acting. Moses encouraged Joshua, by laying before him the goodness of his work, his supernatural assistance and undoubted success. Deut. 1: 28. David encouraged himself in the Lord when his warriors threatened to stone him; he considered God's former kind and wonderful interpositions for him, his continued power, wisdom, and mercy, and his faithful promise and gracious relations to him. 1 Sam. 30: 6.—Brown.

ENCRATITES; a sect in the second century, who abstained from marriage, wine, and animal food.—Hend. Buck.

END. Jesus Christ is the end of the law for righteousness: the law was given to cause men to seek righteousness in him: he perfected the ceremonial law as he was the scope and substance of all its types, and therefore abolished it; through his obedience and death, he fulfilled the moral law, in its precepts and penalty; and in him, as their righteousness, believers enjoy whatever the law, as a covenant, can demand for them. Rom. 10: 4. He is the end of ministers' conversation; he is the scope and substance of all their ministrations, and, in all they do, they ought to aim at the advancement of his glory. Heb. 13: 7. The end of the faith of the saints is what is exhibited in the promise, and they trust to obtain even the eternal salvation of their souls. 1 Pet. 1: 9. An oath is the end of strife, as no further inquiry is to be made in a cause, but all parties are to rest satisfied with the determination made by an oath. Heb. 6: 16.—Brown.

ENDICOTT, (Joux,) governor of Massachusetts. He was sent to this country by a company in England as their agent to carry on the plantation at Naumkeag, or Salem, and arrived in September, 1628. He continued at Salem till 1644, when he was elected governor of Massachusetts, and removed to Boston. He died, March 15, 1665, aged seventy-five. He was a sincere and zealous Puritan, rigid in his principles, and severe in the execution of the laws against sectaries, or those, who differed from the religion of Massachusetts. Two Episcopalians, who accused the members of the church of Salem of being separatists, were sent back to England by his orders. The Quakers and the Baptists had no occasion to remember him with affection. In 1659, during his administration, four Quakers were put to death in Boston.—Neal's New England, i. 139, 364; Hutchinson, i. 8—17, 38, 235; Winthrop; Hist. Col. vi. 245, 261; ix. 5; Holmes; Morton, 81, 188; Mag. ii. 18.—Allen.

ENDOR; a city in the tribe of Manasseh, where the witch resided whom Saul consulted a little before the battle of Gibeon, Joshua 17: 11. 1 Sam. 28: 13. Mr Bryant derives Endor from En-Ador, signifying fons pythois, "the fountain of light," or oracle of the god Ador; which oracle was probably founded by the Canaanites, and had never been totally suppressed. The ancient world had many such oracles; the most famous of which were that of Jupiter-Ammon in Lybia, and that of Delphi in Greece; and in all of them, the answers to those who consulted them were given from the mouth of a female; who, from the priestess of Apollo at Delphi, has generally received the name of Pythia. That many such oracles existed in Canaan, is evident from the number which Saul himself is said to have suppressed; and such an one, with its Pythia, was this at Endor. At these shrines, either as mock oracles, contrived by a crafty and avaricious priesthood, to impose on the credulity and superstition of its followers; or, otherwise, as is more generally supposed, as the real instruments of infernal power, mankind, having altogether departed from the true God, were permitted to be deluded. That, in this case, the real Samuel appeared, is plain both from the affright of the woman herself, and from the fulfilment of his prophecy. It was an instance of God's overruling the wickedness of men, to manifest his own supremacy and justice.—Watson.

ENDOWMENT, ECCLESIASTIAL; a term used in England to denote the settlement of a pension upon a minister, or the building of a church, or the severing a sufficient portion of tithes for a vicar, when the benefice is appropriated.

Among the dissenters, endowments are benefactions left to their place or congregation, for the support of their ministers. Where the congregation is poor or small, these have been found beneficial; but in many cases they have been detrimental. Too often has it tended to relax the exertions of the people; and when such a fund has fallen into the hands of an unsuitable minister, it has prevented his removal; when, had he derived no support from the people, necessity would have caused him to depart, and make room for one more worthy. Scarcely has it been found that any congregation turned Arian or Socinian, but such as enjoyed such endowments.—Hend. Buck.

ENDURE; to continue, to bear with. To endure, referred to God, denotes his constancy, perpetual continuance in being, life, and greatness, (Ps. 9: 7.) or his bearing with persons, in his long-suffering patience. Rom. 9: 22. Referred to men, it signifies, (1.) To bear up under the exercise of the duties of an office, (Exod. 18: 23.) or under any thing that fatigues and presses. Gen. 33: 14. Job 31: 23. (2.) To bear affliction, especially for Christ, with a sensible, calm, and affectionate complacency—the will of God. Heb. 12: 7. 2 Tim. 3: 11. The saints endure to the end; they persevere in their holy profession and practice, notwithstanding manifold opposition and trouble. Matt. 24: 13. Anti-Christians, and other wicked persons, will not endure sound doctrine, they dislike it, they reproach it, persecute it, and endeavor to banish it from them. 2 Tim. 4: 3.—Brown.

ENEMY; one who opposes another, or thwarts his designs. God becomes men's enemy, when he pursues them with his wrathful judgments. 1 Sam. 28: 16. Job supposed him an enemy when he grievously afflicted him. Job 33: 10. Wicked men count faithful teachers their enemies, imagining they act from hatred in reproving and opposing their wicked ways. 1 Kings 21: 20. Col. 4: 16. Satan is an enemy to God and his creatures; he hates them, and seeks their dishonor and ruin. Matt. 13: 25, 28. Wicked men are enemies to God; they hate his true character, and do what in them lies to dishonor his name, and ruin his interest. Rom. 5: 10. Death is called an enemy; it really ruins the wicked, it terrifies the saints, and for a while detains their body from the heavenly glory. 1 Cor. 15: 26.—Brown.

EN-EGGLAIM. Ezekiel (47: 10.) speaks of this place in opposition to En-gedi: "The fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi, even to En-egglaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets." Jerome says, En-egglaim is at the head of the Dead sea, where the Jordan enters it.—Calmet.

ENERGICI; a denomination in the sixteenth century; so called because they held that the eucharist was the energy and virtue of Jesus Christ; not his body, nor a representation thereof.—Hend. Buck.

ENERGUMENS; persons supposed to be possessed with the devil, concerning whom there were many regulations among the primitive Christians. They were denied baptism and the eucharist; at least this was the practice of some churches; and though they were under the care of exorcists, yet it was thought a becoming act of charity to let them have the public prayers of the church, at which they were permitted to be present.—Hend. Buck.

ENFIELD, (WILLIAM) a dissenting minister and general writer, was born at Sudbury in 1741, and, after having been pastor to a congregation at Liverpool, became resident tutor and lecturer on belles lettres at Warrington academy; a situation which he retained till the dissolution of that establishment. He died at Norwich, in 1797. He published an abridged translation of Brucker's History of Philosophy; The Speaker; Exercises on Elocution; Institutions of Natural Philosophy, and various other works, and was one of the principal contributors to Aikin's Biographical Dictionary.—Davenport.

ENGAGE; to bind by promise. How delightful a wonder, that God's Son engaged his heart, or pledged his soul, that he would approach to an offended God, in room of us, sinful men, in order to obey the broken law, and satisfy justice for us! Jer. 30: 21.—Brown.

EN-GEDI. This name is probably suggested by the situation among lofty rocks, which, overhanging the valleys, are very precipitous. A fountain of pure water rises near the summit, which the inhabitants call En-gedi—the fountain of the goat—because it is hardly accessible to any other creature. It was called also Hazazon-Tamar, that is, the city of palm trees, there being a great quantity of palm trees around it. It stood near the lake of Sodom, about thirty miles north-east of Jerusalem, not far from Jericho, and the mouth of the river Jordan. In some cave of the wilderness of En-gedi, David had an opportunity of killing Saul, who was then in pursuit of him. 1 Sam. 24: The vineyards of En-gedi are mentioned, (Cant. 1: 14.) and the hills around it produce, at present, the best wines of the country.—Calmet.

ENGLISH, (GEORGE B.) an adventurer, the son of Thomas English of Boston, was graduated at Harvard college in 1807, and afterwards for a while studied theology. He then became an officer of marine in the navy. Embracing, as is said, Islamism, he entered the service of the Pasha of Egypt, and accompanied an expedition under Ismael to Upper Egypt. He died at Washington, in September, 1828, aged thirty-nine. He published, Grounds of Christianity examined, 12mo. 1813, which was answered by E. Everett and S. Cary; Letter to Mr. Cary on his review; Letter to Mr. Channing on his two sermons on infidelity, 1813; Expedition to Dongola and Senaar, Svo. 1823.—Allen.

ENGRAVING. This art of cutting precious stones and metals is frequently referred to in the Old Testament Scriptures. Its origin and progress, as connected with biblical inquiries, has been investigated and illustrated with much ingenuity by Mr. Landseer, in his "Sabeian Researches," passim. (See SEALS, WRITING.)—Calmet.

EN-HADDAH; a town of Issachar. Josh. 19: 21. Eusebius mentions a place of this name between Eleuthropolis and Jerusalem; ten miles from the former place.—Calmet.

EN-HAZOR; a city of Naphtali. Josh. 19: 37. Whether this be the Atrium Ennon, or Hazar-enan of Ezekiel, (47: 17. 48: 1.) and of Moses, (Num. 34: 9.) it is difficult to determine. (See LEM.)—Calmet.

ENJOY; (1.) To possess with pleasure. Josh. 1: 15. (2.) To have in abundance. Heb. 11: 25. The land of Canaan enjoyed her sabbaths when it lay untillured for want of inhabitants. Lev. 26: 31. God's elect long enjoy the work of their hands, when they receive a long-continued happiness on earth, and everlasting blessedness in heaven, as the gracious reward of their good works. Isa. 65: 22.—Brown.

ENLARGE. To enlarge nations, is to grant them deliverance, liberty, happiness, and increase of numbers, territory, or wealth. Esth. 4: 14. Job 12: 23. Deut. 23: 20. Enlargement of heart imports loosening of spiritual bands, fulness of inward joy, (Ps 119: 32.) or extensive love, care, and joy. 2 Cor. 6: 11. Enlargement of mouth imports readiness to answer reproaches, and to pour forth praise to God for his kindness. 1 Sam. 2: 1. God enlargeth men in trouble, or enlargeth their steps, when he grants them remarkable deliverances, and liberty to go where they please. Ps. 4: 1, and 18: 35. He enlargeth Japheth in giving him a numerous posterity, and a very extensive territory, viz. the north half of Asia, all Europe, and almost all America, to dwell in; or the word may be rendered, God will persuade Japheth; by the preaching of the gospel a multitude of his posterity have been or shall be turned to Christ. Gen. 9: 26. Hell's enlarging itself, imports that the state of the dead, and even the regions of the damned, should quickly receive multitudes of the sinful Jews. Isa. 5: 14.—Brown.

ENLIGHTEN; to give light to. God enlightens his people's darkness when he frees them from trouble, grants them prosperity, and gives them knowledge and joy. Ps. 18: 28. He enlightens their eyes when, by his word and spirit, he savingly teaches them his truth, and shows them his glory. Ps. 13: and 19: 8. Eph. 1: 18. Hypocrites are enlightened with the speculative knowledge of divine truth, and the miraculous though not saving influences of the Holy Ghost. Heb. 6: 4.—Brown.

EN-MISHPAT; (fountain of judgment.) Moses says, (Gen. 14: 7.) that Chedorlaomer, and his allies, having traversed the wilderness of Paran, came to the fountain of Mishpat, otherwise Kadesb. It had not this name till Moses drew from it the waters of strife; and God had exercised his judgments on Moses and Aaron. Num. 20: 13. 27: 14. (See KADESH.)—Calmet.

ENMITY; opposition; very bitter, deep-rooted, irreconcilable hatred and variance. Such a constant enmity there is between the followers of Christ and Satan; nay, there is some such enmity between mankind and some serpents. Gen. 3: 15. Friendship with this world, in its wicked members and lusts, is enmity with God; is opposed to the love of him, and amounts to an actual exerting of ourselves to dishonor and abuse him. James 4: 4. 1 John 2: 15, 16. The carnal mind, or minding of fleshly and sinful things, is enmity against God; is opposed to his nature and will in the highest degree; and, though it may be removed, cannot be reconciled to him, nor he to it. Rom. 8: 7, 8. The ceremonial law is called enmity; it marked God's enmity against sin, by demanding atonement for it; it occasioned men's enmity against God by its burdensome services, and was an accidental source of standing variance between Jews and gentiles; or perhaps the enmity here meant is the state of variance between God and men, whereby he justly loathed and hated them as sinful, and condemned them to punishment; and they wickedly hated him for his holy excellence, retributive justice, and sovereign goodness; both are slain and abolished by the death of Christ. Eph. 2: 15, 16.—Brown.

ENOCH; the son of Cain, (Gen. 4: 17,) in honor of whom the first city noticed in Scripture was called Enoch, by his father Cain, who was the builder. It was situated on the east of the province of Eden.—Watson.

ENOCH; the son of Jared, and father of Methuselah. He was born, A. M. 622, and being contemporary with Adam, more than three hundred years, he had every opportunity of learning from him the story of the creation, the circumstance of the fall, the terms of the promise, and other important truths. An ancient author affirms, that he was the father of astronomy; and Eusebius hence infers, that he is the same with the Atlas of the Grecian mythology.

Enoch's fame rests upon a better basis than his skill in science. The encomium of Enoch is, that he "walked with God." While mankind were living in open rebellion against heaven, and provoking the divine vengeance daily by their ungodly deeds, he obtained the exalted testimony "that he pleased God." This he did, not only by the exemplary tenor of his life, and by the attention which he paid to the outward duties of religion, but by the soundness of his faith, and the purity of his heart and life. (See Heb. 11: 5, 6.) The intent of the apostle, in the discourse containing this passage is, to show that there has been but one way of obtaining the divine favor ever since the fall, and that is, by faith. (See ABEL.)

Enoch is said, by another evangelical writer, to have spoken to the antediluvian sinners of the coming of Christ to judgment. (See Jude 14, 15.) This prophecy is a clear, and it is also an awful, description of the day of judgment, when the Messiah shall sit upon his throne of justice, to determine the final condition of mankind, according to their works; and it indicates that the different offices of Messiah both to save and to judge, or as Prophet, Priest, and King, were known to the holy patriarchs. On what the apostle founded this prediction, has been matter of much speculation and inquiry. Some, indeed, have produced a treatise, called "The Book of Enoch," which, as they pretend, contains the cited passage; but its authority is not proved, and internal evidence sufficiently marks its spurious origin. It is, therefore, reasonable to suppose that the prophecy cited by St. Jude was either traditionally handed down, or had been specially communicated to that apostle.

In the departure of Enoch from this world of sin and sorrow, the Almighty altered the ordinary course of things, and gave him a dismissal as glorious to himself, as it was instructive to mankind. To convince them how acceptable holiness is to him, and to show that he had prepared for those that love him a heavenly inheritance, fifty years after Adam had been laid in the dust, he caused Enoch to be taken from the earth into his glorious presence above, without passing through death. (See ELIJAH.)—Watson; Calmet; Jones.

ENON, (dove's eye, or fountain,) where John baptized, because there was much water there, (John 3: 23,) was eight miles south of Scythopolis, between Shalim and the Jordan.—Calmet.

ENOS, or ENOSH; the son of Seth, and father of Cainan. He was born, A. M. 235. Moses tells us that their "men began to call upon the name of the Lord," (Gen. 4: 26,) that is, such as abhorred the impiety and immorality which prevailed among the progeny of Cain, began to worship God in public, and to assemble together at stated times for that purpose. Good men, to distinguish themselves from the wicked, began to take the name of sons or servants of God; for which reason Moses, (Gen. 6: 1, 2,) says that "the sons of God," or the descendants of Enos, "seeing the daughters of men," &c. The eastern people make the following additions to his history:—that Seth, his father, declared him sovereign prince and high priest of mankind, next after himself; that Enos was the first who ordained public alms for the poor, established public tribunals for the administration of justice, and planted, or rather cultivated, the palm tree.—Watson.

ENRAUDUS, a martyr of the thirteenth century, was a knight of France. Being accused of embracing the opinions of Peter Waldo, he was delivered to the secular power, and burnt at Paris, A. D. 1201.—Fox.

EN-ROGEL; (fuller's eye;) the same as the fountain of Siloam, east of Jerusalem, at the foot of mount Zion.—Calmet.

EN-SHEMESHI, who on the frontiers of Judah and Benjamin, (Josh. 15: 7,) but whether it was a town or a fountain, is questionable. The Arabians give this name to the ancient metropolis of Egypt, which the Hebrews called On, and the Greeks Heliopolis.—Calmet.

ENSIGN; a military token or signal to be followed; a standard. The ancient Jewish ensign was a long pole, at the end of which was a kind of chafing-dish, made of iron bars, which held a fire, and the light, shape, &c. of which, denoted the party to whom it belonged. God says; he would lift up an ensign, Isa. 5: 26. Christ was an "ensign to the people; and to it shall the Gentiles seek," chap. 11: 10. The brazen serpent was lifted up on an ensign pole, and to this our Lord compares his own "lifting up," (John 3: 14,) in consequence of which he will draw all men to him, as men follow an ensign, chap. 12: 32.—Calmet.

ENTER. To enter at the strait gate, and into the kingdom of God, is, by receiving Jesus Christ as our Savior, door, and way to happiness, to become members of God's spiritual family and kingdom in heaven and earth. Matt. 7: 13. John 3: 5. To enter into joy, peace, or rest, is to receive the earnest or the full possession thereof. Matt. 25: 21. Isa. 57: 2. Heb. 4: 3. To enter into other men's labors, is to enjoy the fruit of them. John 4: 38.—Brown.

ENTHUSIASM. To obtain just definitions of words which are promiscuously used, it must be confessed, is no small difficulty. This word, it seems, is used both in a good and a bad sense. In its best sense it signifies a divine afflatus or inspiration. It is also taken for that noble ardor of mind which leads us to imagine any thing sublime, grand, or surprising. In its worse sense it signifies any impression on the fancy, or agitation of the passions, of which a man can give no rational account. It is generally applied to religious characters, and is said to be derived (apo tôn en thusias mainomenôn), from the wild gestures and speeches of ancient religionists, pretending to more than ordinary and more than true communications with the gods, and particularly en thusiasts, in the act or at the time of sacrificing. In this sense, then, it signifies that impulse of the mind which leads a man to suppose he has some remarkable intercourse with the Deity, while at the same time it is nothing more than the effects of a heated imagination, or a sanguine constitution.

That the Divine Being permits his people to enjoy fellowship with him, and that he can work upon the minds of his creatures when and how he pleases, cannot be denied. But, then, what is the criterion by which we are to judge, in order to distinguish it from enthusiasm? It is necessary there should be some rule, for without it the greatest extravagancies would be committed, the most notorious impostors countenanced, and the most enormous evils ensue. Now this criterion is the word of God; by which we are to try all pretences to new revelations, and extraordinary gifts, as in the apostles' time; (1 John 4: 1-6.) Whatever opinions, feelings, views, or impressions we may have, if they are plainly inconsistent with the Word, if they are not accompanied with humility, if they do not influence our temper, regulate our lives, and make us just, pious, honest, and uniform, they cannot come from God, but are evidently the effusions of an enthusiastic brain. On the other hand, if the mind be enlightened, if the will which was perverse be renovated, detached from evil, and inclined to good; if the powers be roused to exertion for the promotion of the divine glory, and the good of men; if the natural corruptions of the heart be suppressed; if peace and joy arise from a view of the gospel of Christ, attended with a spiritual frame of mind, a heart devoted to God, and a holy, useful life,—however this may be branded with the name of enthusiasm, it certainly is from God, because here human efforts, unassisted by him, could never produce such effects as these. Theol. Misc., vol. ii. p. 43; Lacke on Underst., vol. ii. ch. 19; Spect., No. 201, vol. iii.; Wesley's Sermon on Enthusiasm; Mrs. H. More's Hints towards forming the Character of a young Princess, vol. ii. p. 246; Natural History of Enthusiasm.—Hend. Buck.

ENTICE; cunningly to persuade and move one to what is sinful and hazardous. Satan enticed Ahab to go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead by making the false prophets promise him victory. 2 Chron. 18: 20. Whoremongers entice virgins with promises of reward, and hopes of secrecy, in uncleanness. Exod. 22: 16. Our lusts entice to sin for hopes of profit, pleasure, honor, by means of it. Jam. 1: 14. Outward objects entice to sin, as they are occasions of tempting our evil hearts to it. Job 31: 26, 27. False teachers, pretended friends, and wicked companions entice; by their fair speeches and glibful examples, they persuade us to embrace error, commit sin, or rush on snares. Col. 2: 4. Enticing words of man's wisdom are such as please the ear and fancy of hearers, but lead away the heart from the regard of the true matter and scope of divine truth. 1 Cor. 2: 4. Col. 2: 4.—Brown.

ENVY; a sensation of uneasiness and disquiet, arising from the advantages which others are supposed to possess above us, accompanied with malignity towards those who possess them. "This," says a good writer, "is universally admitted to be one of the blackest passions in the human heart. No one, indeed, is to be condemned for defending his rights, and showing displeasure against a malicious enemy; but to conceive ill will at one who has attacked none of our rights, nor done us any injury, solely because he is more prosperous than we are, is a disposition altogether unnatural. Hence the character of an envious man is universally odious. All disclaim it; and they who feel themselves under the influence of this passion, carefully conceal it. The chief grounds of envy may be reduced to three: accomplishments of mind; advantages of birth, rank, and fortune; and superior success in worldly pursuits. To subdue this odious disposition, let us consider its sinful and criminal nature; the mischiefs it occasions to the world; the unhappiness it produces to him who possesses it; the evil causes that nourish it, such as pride and indolence: let us, moreover, bring often into view those religious considerations which regard us as Christians; how unworthy we are in the sight of God; how much the blessings we enjoy are above what we deserve. Let us learn reverence and submission to that divine government which has appointed to every one such a condition as is fittest for him to possess; let us consider how opposite the Christian spirit is to envy; above all, let us offer up our prayers to the Almighty, that he would purify our hearts from a passion which is so base and so criminal."—Buck.

EONIANS, or EONIANES; the followers of Eon, a wild fanatic, of the province of Bretagne, in the twelfth century: he concluded, from the resemblance between eum, in the form for exorcising malignant spirits, viz. per eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos, and his own name Eon, that he was the son of God, and ordained to judge the quick and dead. Eon was, however, solemnly condemned by the council at Rheims, in 1148, and ended his days in a prison. He left behind him a number of followers, whom persecution and death, so weakly and cruelly employed, could not persuade to abandon his cause, or to renounce an absurdity, which, says Moshelm, one would think could never have gained credit but in such a place as bedlam.—Hend. Buck.

EOQUINIANS; a denomination in the sixteenth century; so called from one Eoquinus, their master, who taught that Christ did not die for the wicked, but for the faithful only.—Hend. Buck.

EPAPHRAS was, it is believed, the first bishop or pastor of Colosse. He was converted by Paul, and contributed much to convert his fellow-citizens. He came to Rome while Paul was there in bonds, and was imprisoned with the apostle. Having understood that false teachers, taking advantage of his absence, had sown tares among the wheat in his church, he engaged Paul, whose name and authority were revered throughout Phrygia, to write to the Colossians, to correct them. In this epistle Paul calls Epaphras his "dear fellow-servant, and a faithful minister of Christ," chap. 1: 7.—Calmet.

EPAPHRODITUS, a minister and messenger of the Philippians, who was sent by that church to carry money to the apostle, then in bonds; and to do him service, A. D. 61. He executed this commission with such zeal, that he brought on himself a dangerous illness, which obliged him to remain long at Rome. The year following (A. D. 62) he returned with haste to Philippi, having heard that the Philippians, on receiving information of his sickness, were very much afflicted, and Paul sent a letter to them by him, Phil. 4: 18.—Calmet.

EPARCHY; in the Greek church, the jurisdiction of a bishop, or other high ecclesiastical ruler.—Hend. Buck.

EPEFANOFTSCHINS; a small Russian sect, followers of a monk of Kieff, who got himself ordained a bishop through forged letters of recommendation. Being imprisoned on a discovery of the cheat, he died in confinement, but is by his sect esteemed a martyr. Their sentiments are nearly the same as the Starobudsi, or Old Ceremonialists. Pinkerton's Greek Church, p. 301.—Williams.

EPENETUS; a disciple of Paul; (probably one of the first he converted in Asia;) "the first fruits of Asia;" in the Greek, "first fruits of Achaia;" Rom. 16: 5.—Calmet.

EPHAI; the eldest son of Midian, who gave his name to a city and small extent of land in the country of Midian, situated on the eastern shore of the Dead sea, Genesis 25: 4. This country abounded with camels and dromedaries, Isaiah 60: 6. &c.—Watson.

EPHAH, a measure both for things dry and liquid, in use among the Hebrews. The ephah for the former contained three pecks and three pints. In liquid measure, it was of the same capacity as the bath.—Watson.

EPHER; second son of Midian, and brother of Ephah, 1 Chron. 1: 33. He dwelt beyond Jordan, (1 Kings 4: 10.) and might people the isle of Upher in the Red sea, or the city of Orpha, in the Diarbekr. Jerome cites Alexander Polyhistor and Cleodemus, surnamed Malco, who affirm, that Epher made an incursion into Libya, conquered it, and called it after his own name, Africa. Heracles is said to have accompanied him.—Calmet.

EPHESIANS, (EPISTLE TO THE.) (See EPHESUS.)

EPHESUS, a much celebrated city of Ionia, in Asia Minor, forty-five miles south east of Smyrna, situated upon the river Cayster, and on the side of a hill five miles from the sea. It was the principal mart, as well as the metropolis of the Proconsular Asia, and formerly in great renown among heathen authors on account of its famous temple of Diana. (See DIANA.) The city had a fine prospect to the west, of a lovely plain, covered with groves of tamarisk, and watered and embellished by the mazy windings of the Cayster. It was a place of prodigious resort for various purposes; but so addicted were the inhabitants of the city to idolatry and the arts of magic, that the prince of darkness would seem to have, at that time, fixed his throne in it. Ephes. 2: 2. Ephesus is supposed to have first invented those obscure mystical spells and charms by means of which the people pretended to heal diseases and drive away evil spirits; whence originated the Ephesia grammata, or Ephesian letters, so often mentioned by the ancients.

2. Ephesus was greatly damaged by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who repaired and embellished it. Pliny styles it "the ornament of Asia."<sup>19</sup> The Jews, according to Josephus, were very numerous, and had obtained the privileges of citizenship; as Ephesus was autonomous—governed by its own laws. The entire population was, it is supposed, not less than six hundred thousand souls.

3. The apostle Paul first visited this populous city, A. D. 51; but being then on his way to Jerusalem, he abode there only a few weeks, Acts 18: 19—21. During his short stay, he found a synagogue of the Jews, into which he went, and reasoned with them upon the interesting topics of his ministry, with which they were so pleased that they wished him to prolong his visit. He however declined that, for he had determined, God willing, to be at Jerusalem at an approaching festival; but he promised to return, which he did a few months afterwards, and continued there three years, Acts 19: 10, 20: 31. Such was the success of the gospel, that magical books to the value of more than thirty thousand dollars, were burnt by the converted Ephesians! While the apostle abode in Ephesus and its neighborhood, he gathered a numerous Christian church, to which, at a subsequent period, he wrote that epistle, which forms so important a part of the apostolic writings. He was then a prisoner at Rome, and the year in which he wrote it must have been 60, or 61, of the Christian era. It appears to have been transmitted to them by the hands of Tychicus, one of his companions in travel, Ephesians 6: 21. The critics have remarked that the style of the epistle to the Ephesians is exceedingly elevated; and that it corresponds to the state of the apostle's mind at the time of writing. Overjoyed with the account which their messenger brought him of the steadfastness of their faith, and the ardency of their love to all the saints, (Eph. 1: 15.) and, transported with the consideration of the unsearchable wisdom of God displayed in the work of man's redemption, and of his amazing love towards the gentiles, in introducing them, as fellow-heirs with the Jews, into the kingdom of Christ, he flows into the most exalted contemplation of those sublime topics, and gives utterance to his thoughts in language at once rich and varied. The epistle, says Macknight, is written as it were in a rapture. Grotius remarks that it expresses the sublime matters contained in it in terms more sublime than are to be found in any human language; to which Macknight subjoins this singular but striking observation, that no real Christian can read the doctrinal part of the epistle to the Ephesians, without being impressed and roused by it, as by the sound of a trumpet.

4. Ephesus was one of the seven churches to which special messages were addressed in the book of Revelation. After a commendation of their first works, to which they were commanded to return, they were accused of having left their first love, and threatened with the removal of their candlestick out of its place, except they should repent, Rev. 2: 5. The contrast which its present state presents to its former glory, is a striking fulfilment of this prophecy. Ephesus was the metropolis of Lydia, a great and opulent city, and, according to Strabo, the greatest emporium of Asia Minor. In the times of Christianity it had been favored with the labors of Timothy and the apostle John, and was subsequently the seat of the primate of the Asian diocese. But now a few heaps of stones, and some miserable mud cottages, occasionally tenanted by Turks, without one Christian residing there, are all the remains of ancient Ephesus. It is, as described by different travellers, a solemn and most forlorn spot. The epistle to the Ephesians is read throughout the world; but there is none in Ephesus to read it now. They left their first love, they returned not to their first works! Their "candlestick has been removed out of its place;" and not only the Christian church, but even the great city of Ephesus is no more. Dr. Chandler says, "Its streets are obscured and overgrown. A herd of goats was driven to it for shelter from the sun at noon; and a noisy flight of crows from the quarries seemed to insult its silence. We heard the partridge call in the area of the theatre and the stadium. The glorious pomp of its heathen worship is no longer remembered; and Christianity, which was here nursed by apostles, and fostered by general councils, until it increased to fulness of stature, barely lingers on in an existence hardly visible."—Jones; Wells; Calmet; Watson.

EPHOD; an ornamental part of the dress worn by the Hebrew priests. Ephod comes from aphad, to tie, to fasten, to gird; and the use of the ephod was suitable to this signification, being a kind of girdle, passing from behind over the neck and shoulders, and hanging down before, crossing the stomach, then being carried round the waist, and used as a girdle to the tunic; it went twice round the body, girt about the tunic, and after this the extremities of it fell before, and hung to the ground. There were two kinds of ephod; one plain for the priests, another embroidered for the high-priest. As there was nothing singular in that of the priests, Moses does not describe it; but that belonging to the high-priest, (Exod. 28: 6.) which was composed of gold, blue, purple, crimson, and twisted cotton, was a very rich composition of different colors. On that part of the ephod, which came over the shoulders of the high-priest, were two large precious stones, on which were engraven the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, six names on each stone. Where the ephod crossed his breast, was a square ornament called the pectoral, in which were set twelve precious stones, with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel engraven on them, one on each stone. (See BREAST-PLATE.) Calmet is of opinion, that the ephod was peculiar to priests, and Jerome observes, that we find no mention of it in the Scripture, except when priests are spoken of. But some considerations render dubious this opinion. We find that David wore it at the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem, and Samuel, although a Levite only, and a child, yet wore the ephod, 1 Sam. 2: 18. The Jews held, that no worship, true or false, could subsist without the priesthood, or the ephod. Gideon made an ephod out of the spoils of the Midianites, and this became an offence in Israel. Micah, having made an idol, did not fail to make an ephod, Judg. 8: 27, 17: 5. God foretold, by the prophet Hosea, (3: 5.) that Israel should long remain without kings, princes, sacrifices, altar, ephod, and teraphim. The ephod is often taken for the pectoral; and for the Urim and Thummim also; because these were united to it.—Calmet.

EPHRA, a city of Ephraim, and Gideon's birthplace. Its true situation is unknown; but it is thought to be the same as Ophrah, Judg. 6: 11.—Calmet.

EPHRAIM; Joseph's second son, by Asenath, Poti-pherah's daughter, born in Egypt, about A. M. 2294. Ephraim, with his brother Manasseh, was presented by Joseph, his father, to the patriarch Jacob on his death bed. Jacob laid his right hand on Ephraim, the youngest, and his left hand on Manasseh, the eldest. Joseph was desirous to change this situation of his hands; but Jacob answered, "I know it, my son; he (Manasseh) also shall become a people, and he also shall be great: but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he." Gen. 48: 13—19. The sons of Ephraim having made an inroad on Palestine, the inhabitants of Gath killed them, 1 Chron. 7: 20, 21. Ephraim their father mourned many days for them; and his brethren came to comfort him. Afterwards, he had sons named Beriah, Replah, Resheph, and Tela, and a daughter named Sherah. His posterity multiplied in Egypt to the number of forty thousand five hundred men, capable of bearing arms, Num. 2: 18, 19. Joshua, who was of this tribe, gave the Ephraimites their portion between the Mediterranean sea west, and the river Jordan east, Josh. 16: 5. (See CANAAN.) The ark, and the tabernacle, remained long in this tribe, at Shiloh; and, after the separation of the ten tribes, the seat of the kingdom of Israel being in Ephraim, Ephraim is frequently used to signify that kingdom. Ephrata is used also for Bethlehem, Mic. 5: 2. The tribe of Ephraim was led captive beyond the Euphrates, with all Israel, by Salmaneser, king of Assyria, A. M. 3283, ante A. D. 721.—II. A city of Ephraim, towards the Jordan, whither, it is probable, Jesus retired before his passion, John 11: 51. This Ephraim was a city in the confines of the land of Ephraim, (2 Chron. 13: 19.) and was famous for fine flour. Josephus calls Ephraim and Bethel two small cities; and places the former not in the tribe of that name, but in the land of Benjamin, near the wilderness of Judea, in the way to Jericho. III. A city of Benjamin, eight miles from Jerusalem, according to Eusebius, near Bethel. We believe these two cities have been confounded; for instead of the eight miles in Eusebius, Jerome reckons twenty.—IV. The forest of Ephraim was east of the Jordan, and in it Absalom lost his life, 2 Sam. 18: 6—8. It could not be far from Mahanaim.—Calmet.

EPHRATAH. (See EPHRAIM.)

EPHRATH, Caleb's second wife, who was the mother of Hur, 1 Chron. 2: 19. From her, it is believed that the city of Ephrath, otherwise called Bethlehem, where our Lord was born, had its name; and this city is more than once known in Scripture by the name of Ephrath, Gen. 35: 16.—Watson.

EPICUREANS; the disciples of Epicurus, a Greek philosopher, who flourished about A. M. 3700. This sect maintained that the world was formed not by God, nor with any design, but by the fortuitous concourse of atoms. They denied that God governs the world, or in the least condescends to interfere with creatures below; they denied the immortality of the soul, and the existence of angels; they maintained that happiness consisted in pleasure; but some of them placed this pleasure in the tranquillity and joy of the mind arising from the practice of moral virtue, and which is thought by some to have been the true principle of Epicurus; others understood him in the gross sense, and placed all their happiness in corporeal pleasure. His system found many followers in Rome, among whom Celsus, Pliny the elder, and Lucretius were the most eminent. When Paul was at Athens, he had conferences with the Epicurean philosophers, Acts 17: 18. The word Epicurean is used, at present, for an indolent, effeminate, and voluptuous person, who only consults his private and particular pleasure, and particularly one who is devoted to the enjoyments of the table. (See ACADEMICS.)—Hend. Buck.

EPIPHANES, (splendid, illustrious.) an epithet given to the gods, when appearing to men. Antiochus, brother of Seleucus, coming fortunately into Syria, a little after the death of his brother, was regarded as some propitious deity, and was hence called Epiphaneus, the illustrious. (See ANTIOCHUS IV.)—Calmet.

EPIPHANY; a festival, otherwise called the manifestation of Christ to the gentiles, observed on the sixth of January, in honor of the appearance of our Savior to the three magi, or wise men, who came to adore and bring him presents. In Germany, this feast is called the day of the holy three kings. The Greeks term it Theophany, or appearance of God.—Hend. Buck.

EPISCOPACY; that form of church government in which diocesan bishops are established as distinct from and superior to priests or presbyters.

The controversy respecting episcopacy commenced soon after the Reformation, and has been agitated with great warmth, between the Episcopalians on the one side, and the Presbyterians and Independents on the other. Among the Protestant churches abroad, those which were reformed by Luther and his associates are in general episcopal; whilst such as follow the doctrines of Calvin, have for the most part thrown off the order of bishops as one of the corruptions of popery. In England, however, the controversy has been considered as of greater importance than on the continent. It has been strenuously maintained by one party, that the episcopal order is essential to the constitution of the church; and by others, that it is a pernicious encroachment on the rights of men, for which there is no authority in Scripture. (See article BISHOP.)

I. Episcopacy in the Church of Rome.—In the church of Rome, the pope has the chief right of electing bishops; and even where sovereign princes have reserved to themselves a right of nominating to bishoprics, the pope sends his approbation and bulls to the new bishop.

When a person hears that the pope has raised him in the episcopal dignity, he enlarges his shaven crown, and dresses himself in purple. Three months after his election, he is consecrated in a solemn manner. The officiating bishop sits on the episcopal seat, placed between the middle of the altar, and the bishop elect stands between two assistant bishops. Then one of the assistants addresses himself to the officiating prelate, saying to him, that the Catholic church requires such an one (naming him) to be raised to the dignity of a bishop. Then the officiating prelate demands of him the apostolical mandate; which being read by the notary, the officiating prelate answers at the close of it, "God be praised." This first ceremony concludes with the oath of the candidate, which he takes on his knees; by which he obliges himself to be faithful to the see of Rome, and the Catholic church, &c. We are told in one of the rubrics of the pontifical, that all patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops of Italy are obliged to renew this oath every three years; those of France, Germany, Spain, Flanders, the British islands, Poland, &c. every four years; those of the extremities of Europe and Africa, every five years; and, lastly, those of Asia and America every ten years.

After the oath, the candidate, on his knees, kisses the hand of the officiating prelate. He next receives the pontifical ornaments, and, being full habited, reads the office of the mass at the altar, the two assistant bishops standing on each side of him. This done, he bows to the officiating prelate, who repeats the following words to him, which include the episcopal functions:—"The duty of a bishop is to judge, interpret, consecrate, confer orders, sacrifice, baptize, confirm." After which words, the candidate bishop prostrates himself, and continues some time in that posture, during which the officiating prelate, with his pastoral staff, signs him with the sign of the cross. This done, the officiating prelate and the two assistants lay their hands on his head; and the former, laying the book of the gospels on his shoulders, says, "Receive the Holy Ghost." Then a napkin is put on the neck of the bishop elect, and the officiating prelate anoints his head with the chrism, as also the palms of his hands: next he blesses the pastoral staff, sprinkling it with holy water, and presents it to the new bishop. The book of the gospels, shut, is put into his hands, with this exhortation:—"Receive the Gospel, go, and preach it to the people committed to your charge." After this exhortation, the officiating prelate and the assistant bishops give him the kiss of peace. These ceremonies end with the mystical offerings of the new prelate, which are two lighted torches, two leaves, and two small casks of wine.

The church of Rome early lost many bishoprics by the conquests of the Mohammedans; hence the great number of titular bishops, whose bishoprics lie in partibus infidelium, that is, in countries in the possession of infidels. The Roman see, however, only honors with this title ecclesiastics of a high rank.

II. Episcopacy in England, &c.—The earliest account we have of British bishops, is carried up no higher than the council of Arles, assembled by the emperor Constantine, in the fourth century, at which were present the bishops of London, York, and Caerleon.

Before the Norman conquest, bishops were chosen by the chapters, whether monks or prebendaries. From the Conqueror's time, to the reign of king John, it was the custom to choose bishops at a public meeting of the bishops and barons, the king himself being present at the solemnity, who claimed a right of investing the bishops, by delivering to them the ring and pastoral staff. It is true, the popes endeavored to gain the election of bishops to themselves; and this occasioned great struggles and contests between the Roman pontiffs and the kings. At length, after various disputes between king John and the pope, the former, by his charter, A. D. 1213, granted the right of election to the cathedral churches. A statute, in the reign of Henry VIII., settles the election of bishops as follows:—"The king, upon the vacancy of the see, was to send his coige d'elire to the dean and chapter, or prior and convent, and, in case they delayed the election above twelve days, the crown was empowered to nominate the person by letters patent. And, after the bishop thus elected had taken an oath of fealty to the king, his majesty, by his letters patent under the broad seal, signified the election to the archbishop, with orders to confirm it, and consecrate the elect. And, lastly, if the persons assigned to elect and consecrate deferred the performing their respective offices twenty days, they were to incur a præmunire."

A bishop of England is a peer of the realm, and, as such, sits and votes in the house of lords. He is a baron in a three-fold manner, viz.—feudal, in regard of the temporalities annexed to his bishopric; by writ, as being summoned by writ to parliament; and by patent and creation. Accordingly, he has the precedence of all other barons, and votes both as baron and bishop. But though their peerage never was denied, it has been contested whether the bishops have a right to vote in criminal matters. At present, the bishops have their vote in the trial and arraignment of a peer; but, before sentence of death is passed, they withdraw, and vote by their proxy.

The jurisdiction of a bishop, in England, consists in collating to benefices; granting institutions on the presentation of other patrons; commanding induction; taking care of the profits of vacant benefices for the use of the successors; visiting his diocese once in three years; in suspending, depriving, degrading, and excommunicating; in granting administrations, and taking care of the probate of wills: these parts of his functions depend on the ecclesiastical law. By the common law he is to certify the judges touching legitimate and illegitimate births, and marriages. And to his jurisdiction, by the statute law, belongs the licensing of physicians, chirurgeons, and school-masters, and the uniting small parishes; which last privilege is now peculiar to the bishop of Norwich.

The bishops' courts have this privilege above the civil courts, that writs are issued out from them in the name of the bishop himself, and not in the king's name, as in other courts. The judge of the bishop's court is his chancellor, anciently called ecclēsia causidicus, the church-lawyer.

The Swedish bishops constitute one of the estates of the kingdom, like the English, but have little power. The English church has left to its bishops more authority than the rest, and for this reason has received the name of Episcopal. In Protestant Germany, bishoprics were abolished by the reformation: but they have been restored in Prussia within the last ten years.

In the United States bishops have no civil power. (See PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.)

III. Episcopacy, how introduced.—It is easy to apprehend how episcopacy, as it was in the primitive church, with those alterations which it afterwards received, might be gradually introduced. The apostles seem to have taught chiefly in large cities; they settled ministers there, who, preaching in country villages, or smaller towns, increased the number of converts: it would have been most reasonable that those new converts, which lay at a considerable distance from the large towns, should, when they grew numerous, have formed themselves into distinct churches, under the care of their proper pastors or bishops, independently of any of their neighbors; but the reverence which would naturally be paid to men who had conversed with the apostles, and perhaps some desire of influence and dominion, from which the hearts of very good men might not be entirely free, and which early began to work, (John 3: 9. 2 Thess. 2: 7.) might easily lay a foundation for such a subordination in the ministers of new erected churches to those which were more ancient, and much more easily might the superiority of a pastor to his assistant presbyters increase, till it at length came to that great difference which we own was early made, and probably soon carried to an excess. And if there were that degree of degeneracy in the church, and defection from the purity and vigor of religion, which the learned Vitringa supposes to have happened between the time of Nero and Trajan, it would be less surprising that those evil principles, which occasioned episcopal, and at length the papal usurpation, should before that time exert some considerable influence.

IV. Episcopacy, reduced plan of. Archbishop Usher projected a plan for the reduction of episcopacy, by which he would have moderated it in such a manner as to have brought it very near the Presbyterian government of the Scotch church,—the weekly parochial vestry answering to their church session; the monthly synod to be held by the Chœroepiscopi, answering to their presbyteries; the diocesan synod to their provincial, and the national to their general assembly. The meeting of the dean and chapter, practised in the church of England, is but a faint shadow of the second, the ecclesiastical court of the third, and the convocation of the fourth. *Bingham's Origines Ecclesiasticæ; Stillingfleet's Origines Sacra; Boyse and Howe on Epis.; Benson's Dissertation concerning the first Set. of the Christ. EPISCOPALIAN; one who prefers the episcopal government and discipline to all others. (See last article. Also, CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.)—Head. Buck.

EPISTLES; letters written from one party to another; but the term is eminently applied to those letters in the New Testament which were written by the apostles, on various occasions, to approve, condemn, or direct the conduct of Christian churches. It is not to be supposed that every note, or memorandum, written by the hands of the apostles, or by their direction, was divinely inspired, or proper for preservation to distant ages; those only have been preserved, by the overruling hand of Providence, from which useful directions had been drawn, and might in after-ages be drawn, by believers, as from a perpetual directory for faith and practice;—always supposing that similar circumstances require similar directions. In reading an epistle, we ought to consider the occasion of it, the circumstances of the parties to whom it was addressed, the time when written, the general scope and design of it, as well as the intention of particular arguments and passages. We ought also to observe the style and manner of the writer, his mode of expression, the peculiar effect he designed to produce on those to whom he wrote, to whose temper, manners, general principles, and actual situation, he might address his arguments, &c. The epistles afford many and most powerful evidences of the truth of Christianity; they appeal to a great number of extraordinary facts; and allude to principles, and opinions, as admitted, or as prevailing, or as opposed, among those to whom they are addressed. They mention a considerable number of persons, describe their situations in life, hint at their connexions with the churches, and by sometimes addressing them, and sometimes recommending them by name, they connect their testimony with that of the writer of the epistle; and often, no doubt, they gave a proportionate influence to those individuals. Beside this, it is every way likely, that individuals mentioned in the epistles, would carefully procure copies of these writings, would give them all the authority and all the notoriety in their power, would communicate them to other churches, and, in short, would become vouchers for their genuineness and authenticity. We in the present day, who possess these instructive documents, may learn from them many things for our advantage and our conduct; how to avoid those evils which formerly injured the professors of true religion; and how to rectify those errors and abuses to which time and incident occasionally gave rise, or to whose spread and prevalence particular occurrences or conjunctures are favorable. (See BIBLE, CANON, &c.)

Historical books, like those of the Four Gospels, are evidently not calculated for a full development of the doctrines and precepts of Christianity. They were meant for another purpose; and in order to give a complete view of the real nature, tendency, and scheme of the religion of Christ, to explain its principles, to enforce its injunctions, to impress it upon the hearts and consciences of men, and to preserve the Gospels themselves from the miserable glosses of ignorant expositors, there was wanting some appeal more argumentative and didactic. Such an inestimable appendix to the evangelists is supplied in the Epistles. In them we are favored with a larger exposition of truths already delivered, an exposition flowing from the high authority of our Lord himself. EPOCH. (See ERA.)

EQUANIMITY is an even, uniform state of mind, amidst all the vicissitudes of time and changes of circumstances to which we are subject in the present state. One of this disposition is not dejected when under adversity, nor elated when in the height of prosperity: he is equally affable to others, and contented in himself. The excellency of this disposition is beyond all praise. It may be considered as the grand remedy for all the diseases and miseries of life, and the only way by which we can preserve the dignity of our characters as men and as Christians.—Hend. Buck.

EQUITY is that exact rule of righteousness or justice which is to be observed between man and man. Our Lord beautifully and comprehensively expresses it in these words: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." Matt. 7: 12. This golden rule, says Dr. Watts, has many excellent properties in it. 1. It is a rule that is easy to be understood, and easy to be applied by the meanest and weakest understanding, Isa. 35: 8.—2. It is a very short rule, and easy to be remembered: the weakest memory can retain it; and the meanest of mankind may carry this about with them, and have it ready upon all occasions.—3. This excellent precept carries greater evidence to the conscience, and a stronger degree of conviction in it, than any other rule of moral virtue.—4. It is particularly fitted for practice, because it includes in it a powerful motive to stir us up to do what it enjoins.—5. It is such a rule as, if well applied, will almost always secure our neighbor from injury, and secure us from guilt if we should chance to hurt him.—6. It is a rule as much fitted to awaken us to sincere repentance, upon the transgression of it, as it is to direct us to our present duty.—7. It is a most extensive rule, with regard to all the stations, ranks, and characters of mankind, for it is perfectly suited to them all.—8. It is a most comprehensive rule with regard to all the actions and duties that concern our neighbors. It teaches us to regulate our temper and behavior, and promote tenderness, benevolence, gentleness, &c.—9. It is also a rule of the highest prudence with regard to ourselves, and promotes our own interest in the best manner.—10. This rule is fitted to make the whole world as happy as the present state of things will admit. EQUIVOCATION, the using a term or expression that has a double meaning. Equivocations are said to be expedients to save telling the truth, and yet without telling a falsity; but if an intention to deceive constitute the essence of a lie, which in general it does, I cannot conceive how it can be done without incurring guilt, as it is certainly an intention to deceive.—Hend. Buck.

ERA. (See ÆRA.)

ERASMUS, (DESIDERIUS), one of the greatest scholars of modern times, was born at Rotterdam in 1467. He was the natural son of a person named Gerard. That name signifies amiable in German, and, after his father's decease, he translated it into the equivalent Greek and Latin words, and assumed them as his appellation. He was educated at Deventer. Having embezzled his property, his guardians took him from school, and, by their usage, drove him to enter into a convent. In 1492, he took priest's orders. Having completed his studies at Montaign college, Paris, he subsisted by giving lessons to persons of quality. Among his pupils was lord Mountjoy, on whose invitation, in 1497, he visited England, where he became intimate with More, Colet, and other eminent men. From 1497 till 1510, he spent in France, the Netherlands, and Italy, during which period he published various works, and acquired high reputation. In 1510, he again came to England; wrote his Praise of Folly, while residing with Sir Thomas More; and was appointed Margaret professor of divinity, and Greek lecturer, at Cambridge. Returning to the continent in 1514, he vigorously continued his literary labors. Basil was chiefly the place of his residence. Among the numerous works which he now produced, may be mentioned an edition of the works of St. Jerome; an edition of the New Testament, with a Latin translation; his dialogue entitled Ciceronianus; and his celebrated Colloquies, which, attacking superstition and church abuses, gave such offence to bigoted Catholics, that he was branded by them as having laid the egg which Luther hatched. With Luther, however, whom he had provoked by his treatise on Free Will, he was in open hostility. Erasmus died, July 12, 1536. A complete edition of his works, in ten volumes folio, was published by Le Clerc.

In Erasmus we behold a man who, in his youth, lying under no small disadvantages of birth and education, depressed by poverty, friendless, and ill supported, overcame all these obstacles, and became not only one of the most considerable scholars of his age, but acquired the favor and protection of princes, nobles, and prelates of the greatest names in church and state. He has been accused of Arminianism; but when living he denied the charge, and his works generally support such denial. His style of writing was unaffected, easy, copious, fluent, and clear, but not always classical. It is to be feared, however, that his fame rests more on his literary attainments and labors, than upon the decision or propriety of his religious character. He had stated the necessity of reformation, and had proposed it; but he hesitated whether it were not better to suffer such reformation to be retarded, than to disturb Christendom by such a zeal and spirit as were manifested by Luther. His pacific scheme ended in offending the papists, without obtaining from them even the smallest change, or the shadow of a compliance.—Davenport; Ency. Amr.; Jones's Chr. Biog.; Hend. Buck.

ERASTIANS; so called from Erastus, a German divine of the sixteenth century. The pastoral office, according to him, was only persuasive, like a professor of science over his students, without any power of the keys annexed. The Lord's supper and other ordinances of the gospel were to be free and open to all. The minister might dissuade the vicious and unqualified from the communion; but might not refuse it, or inflict any kind of censure; the punishment of all offenses, either of a civil or religious nature, being referred to the civil magistrate.—Hend. Buck.

ERASTUS. He was chamberlain or treasurer of the city of Corinth. Rom. 16: 23. He resigned his employment, and followed Paul to Ephesus, where he was, A. D. 56, and was sent by Paul to Macedonia with Timothy, probably to collect alms expected from the brethren. They were both with him at Corinth, A. D. 58, when he wrote his epistle to the Romans, whom he salutes in both their names; and it is probable that Erastus afterwards accompanied him till his last voyage to Corinth, in the way to Rome, where he suffered martyrdom; for then Erastus remained at Corinth. 2 Tim. 4: 20.—Calmet.

ERECH; a city of Chaldea, built by Nimrod, grandson of Cush, (Gen. 10: 10,) and probably the Aracca, placed by Ptolemy in the Sasianna, on the river Tigris, below where it joins the Euphrates. Ammianus calls it Arecha. From this city the Aræctean fields, which abound with naphtha, and sometimes take fire, derive their name. The capital of the province, under the Chaldeans and Assyrians, was Babylon; under the princes named Cosroës, it was Madafn; and under the Arabians, Bagdat. It is called Chaldea, or Babylonia, by the Greeks and Latins.—Calmet.

EREMITES. (See HERMITS.)

ERNESTI, (JOHN AUGUSTUS,) an eminent German critic, was born, in 1707, at Tennstadt, in Thuringia, and studied at Leipsic, where he ultimately became professor of ancient literature, rhetoric, and theology. He died in 1781. Among his numerous publications are editions of Homer, Callimachus, Polybius, Xenophon, Cicero, Suetonius, and Tacitus; and a Theological Library, ten volumes 8vo. His nephew, AUGUSTUS WILLIAM, who was born in 1753, and died in 1801, published Opuscula; and editions of Livy, Quintilian, Ammianus, and Pomponius Mela.—Davenport.

ERROR; a mistake of our judgment, giving assent to that which is not true. Mr. Locke reduces the causes of error to four. 1. Want of proofs. 2. Want of ability to use them. 3. Want of will to use them. 4. Wrong measures of probability. In a moral and scriptural sense it signifies sin. (See SIN.)—Douglas on Errors regarding Religion; Fuller's Essay on the Causes of Error—Works, vol. ii. p. 686; Hend. Buck.

ERSKINE, (JOHN, D. D.,) an eminent Scotch divine, was born in 1721, and educated at the university of Edinburgh. His father, a distinguished barrister and professor of law, wished his son to follow the same profession, thinking his talents of an order to make him an ornament to the bar or the bench; but the son preferred the sacred functions of the pulpit, that he might proclaim to perishing sinners "the unsearchable riches of Christ." At the age of twenty, he published an essay on the moral condition of the heathen world, which gained him great reputation. He maintained that their ignorance or disbelief of the divine perfections and of immortality, could be owing to nothing but negligence or perverseness, not to any insufficiency of evidence. Rom. 1: 20. In 1744, he became minister of Kirkintilloch. In 1753, he was translated to Culross; and in 1758, to New Grayfriars' church, Edinburgh. Nine years after, he became the colleague of Dr. Robertson, at Old Grayfriars', where he remained for twenty-six years. He died, January 19, 1803, at the age of eighty-one, leaving behind him a testimony of his worth in his character and writings; which equally display the scholar, the Christian, and the divine. He corresponded with most of the literary men of the day, and among others with Warburton, and enjoyed the friendship of the profound Maclaurin and president Edwards. He was the author of twenty-five different publications, and the editor of twenty more. His "Theological Dissertations," and "Sketches of Church History," are the most highly valued.—Life, by Sir H. M. Wellwood; Joux's Chr. Biog.

ESAR-HADDON; son of Sennacherib, and his successor in the kingdom of Assyria: called Sarzon, or Saragon. Isa. 20: 1. He made war with the Philistines, and took Azoth, by Tartan, his general: he attacked Egypt, Cush, and Edom, (Isa. 20: and 34:) designing, probably, to avenge the affront Sennacherib his father had received from Tirhakah, king of Cush, and the king of Egypt, who had been Hezekiah's confederates. He sent priests to the Cuthæans, whom Salmanser, king of Assyria, had planted in Samaria, instead of the Israelites: he took Jerusalem, and carried king Manasseh to Babylon, of which he had become master, perhaps, because there was no heir to Belesis, king of Babylon. He is said to have reigned twenty-nine or thirty years at Nineveh, and thirteen years at Babylon; in all forty-two years. He died A. M. 3336.—Watson.

ESAU; son of Isaac and Rebekah, born A. M. 2168, B. C. 1836. Gen. 25: 24—26. His history is found in the book of Genesis. (See EDOX.)

On the most important part of his history, the selling of the birthright, we may observe, (1.) That although it was always the design of God that the blessing connected with primogeniture in the family of Abraham should be enjoyed by Jacob, and to exercise his sovereignty in changing the succession in which the promises of the Abrahamic covenant might descend; yet the conduct of Rebekah and Jacob was reprehensible in endeavoring to bring about the divine design by the unworthy means of contrivance and deceit; and they were punished for their presumption by their sufferings. (2.) That the conduct of Esau in selling his birthright was both wanton and profane. It was wanton, because he, though faint, could be in no danger of not obtaining a supply of food in his father's house; and was therefore wholly influenced by his appetite, excited by the delicacy of Jacob's pottage. It was profane, because the blessings of the birthright were spiritual as well as civil. The church of God was to be established in the line of the first-born; and in that line the Messiah was to appear. These high privileges were despised by Esau, who is therefore made by St. Paul a type of all apostates from Christ, who, like him, profanely despise their birthright as the sons of God. (See BIRTHRIGHT.)—Watson.

ESDRAËLON, (PLAIN OF;) in the tribe of Issachar, called, likewise, the Great Plain, in the valley of Jezreel, the plain of Esdrela. Dr. E. D. Clarke observes, it is by far the largest plain in the Holy Land; extending quite across the country, from mount Carmel and the Mediterranean sea to the southern extremity of the sea of Galilee; about thirty miles in length, and twenty in breadth. It is also a very fertile district, abounding in pasture; on which account it has been selected for the purposes of encampment by almost every army that has traversed the Holy Land. Here Barak, descending with his ten thousand men from mount Tabor, which rises like a cone in the centre of the plain, defeated Sisera, with his "nine hundred chariots of iron, and all the people that were with him, gathered from Harosheth of the gentiles unto the river of Kishon." Judges 4. Here Josiah, king of Judah, fell, fighting against Necho, king of Egypt. 2 Kings 23: 29. And here the Midianites and the Amalekites encamped when they were defeated by Gideon. Judges 6.

This plain has likewise been used for the same purpose by the armies of every conqueror or invader, from Nabuchodonosor, king of Assyria, to his imitator, Napoleon Bonaparte, who, in the spring of 1799, with a small body of French, defeated an army of several thousand Turks and Mamelukes. Jews, gentiles, Sarcæns, Christian crusaders, and anti-christian Frenchmen, Egyptians, Persians, Druses, Turks, and Arabs, warriors out of every nation which is under heaven, have pitched their tents in the plain of Esdraelon; and have beheld the various banners of their nations wet with the dews of Tabor and of Hermon. And it is to this day generally found to be the place of encampment of large parties of Arabs.—Watson.

ESDRAS; the name of two apocryphal books which were always excluded the Jewish canon, and are too absurd to be admitted as canonical by the papists themselves. They are supposed to have been originally written in Greek by some Hellenistic Jews; though some imagine that they were first written in Chaldee, and afterwards translated into Greek. It is uncertain when they were composed, though it is generally agreed that the author wrote before Josephus.—Watson.

ESHBAAL, or ISHBOSHETH; the fourth son of Saul. The Hebrews, to avoid pronouncing the word baal, "lord," used bosheth, "confusion." Instead of Mephibaal, they said Mephi-bosheth; and instead of Esh-baal, they said Ish-bosheth. 2 Sam. 2: 8.—Watson.

ESHCOL; one of Abraham's allies, who dwelt with him in the valley of Mamre, and accompanied him in the pursuit of Chedorlaomer, and the other confederated kings, who pillaged Sodom and Gomorrah, and carried away Lot, Abraham's nephew. Gen. 14: 24. Also the valley or brook of Eschol was that in which the Hebrew messengers, who went to spy the land of Canaan, cut a bunch of grapes so large that it was as much as two men could carry. It was situated in the south part of Judah. Num. 13: 24. 32: 9.—Watson.

ESHTAOL; a town of Dan, though it belonged first to Judah. Eusebius says, it was ten miles from Eleuthropolis, towards Nicopolis, (Josh. 15: 33,) between Azotus and Ascalon. Judg. 13: 25. 16: 31. It is called by Jerome, Asco. Eshtaol is thought to be a village, now called by the Arabs Esdad, about fifteen miles south of Yebna. It is a wretched place, composed of a few mud huts.—Calmet.

ESHTEMOTH; a city in the south of Judah. Eusebius says, it was a large town in the district of Eleuthropolis, north of that city. It was ceded to the priests. 1 Chron. 6: 57.—Calmet.

ESOTERIC. Something secret, revealed only to the initiated. In the mysteries or secret societies of the ancients, the doctrines were distinguished into the esoteric and the exoteric; the former for the initiated, who were permitted to enter into the sanctuary itself, (the Esoterics), and the latter for the uninitiated, (the Exoterics), who remained in the outer court. The same distinction is also made, in philosophy, between those doctrines which belong peculiarly to the initiated, and those which are adapted to the limited capacities of the unlearned.—Ency. Amer.

ESPOUSAL, a mutual binding agreement between the two parties, which usually preceded the marriage some considerable time. (See MARRIAGE.) The reader will do well carefully to attend to the distinction between espousals and marriage; as espousals in the East are frequently contracted years before the parties are married, and sometimes in very early youth. This custom is alluded to figuratively, as between God and his people, (Jer. 2: 2,) to whom he was a husband, (21: 32,) and the apostle says, he acted as a kind of assistant (pronuba) on such occasion: "I have espoused you to Christ;" (2 Cor. 11: 2,) have drawn up the writings, settled the agreements, given pledges, &c. of your union. See Isa. 54: 5. Matt. 25: 6. Rev. 19.—Calmet.

ESSENES; a very ancient sect of the Jews, that was spread abroad through Syria, Egypt, and the neighboring countries. They maintained that religion consisted wholly in contemplation and silence. Some of them passed their lives in a state of celibacy; others embraced the state of matrimony, which they considered as lawful, when entered into with the sole design of propagating the species, and not to satisfy the demand of lust. Some of them held the possibility of appeasing the Deity by sacrifices, though different from that of the Jews; and others maintained that no offering was acceptable to God but that of a serene and composed mind, addicted to the contemplation of divine things. They looked upon the law of Moses as an allegorical system of spiritual and mysterious truths, and renounced, in its explication, all regard to the outward letter. The principal ancient writers who give an account of this sect, are Josephus, Philo, and Pliny. In Judea their number amounted to about four thousand. In their mode of life they seem to have been much like the Shakers of our time.—Calmet; Watson; Neander's Church History.

ESTABLISH. God establisheth the work of his people's hands when he gives them direction, assistance, and success in their undertakings. Ps. 90: 17. We establish our own righteousness when we perform it, in order to found our acceptance with God, and persuade ourselves that it is a proper foundation for our hopes of eternal happiness. Rom. 10: 3. We by faith establish the law, presenting to it as a covenant, the law—magnifying righteousness of Jesus Christ, as fulfilled in our stead; and by faith deriving virtue from Christ, we are enabled to fulfil it as a rule of duty. Rom. 3: 31.—Brown.

ESTABLISHMENTS, (RELIGIOUS.) By a religious establishment is generally understood such an intimate connexion between religion and civil government as subsists in all national churches, and by its friends is supposed to secure the best interests and great end of both.

The partisans for religious establishments observe, that they have prevailed universally in every age and nation. The ancient patriarchs formed no extensive nor permanent associations, but such as arose from the relationships of nature. Every father governed his own family, and their offspring submitted to his jurisdiction. He presided in their education and discipline, in their religious worship, and in their general government. His knowledge and experience handed down to them their laws and their customs, both civil and religious; and his authority enforced them. The offices of prophet, priest, and king were throned in the same patriarch. Gen. 18: 19. 17: and 21 14: 18. The Jews enjoyed a religious establishment dictated and ordained by God. In turning our attention to the heathen nations, we shall find the same incorporation of religious with civil government. Gen. 47: 22. 2 Kings 17: 27, 29. Every one who is at all acquainted with the history of Greece and Rome, knows that religion was altogether blended with the policy of the state. The Koran may be considered as the religious creed and civil code of all the Mahometan tribes. Among the Celts, or the original inhabitants of Europe, the druids were both their priests and their judges, and their judgment was final. Among the Hindoos, the priests and sovereigns are of different tribes or castes, but the priests are superior in rank; and in China, the emperor is sovereign pontiff, and presides in all public acts of religion.

Again, it is said, that, although there is no form of church government absolutely prescribed in the New Testament, yet from the associating law, on which the gospel lays so much stress, by the respect for civil government it so earnestly enjoins, and by the practice which followed, and finally prevailed, Christians cannot be said to disapprove, but to favor religious establishments.

Religious establishments, also, it is observed, are founded in the nature of man, and interwoven with all the constituent principles of human society: the knowledge and profession of Christianity cannot be upheld without a clergy; a clergy cannot be supported without a legal provision; and a legal provision for the clergy cannot be constituted without the preference of one sect of Christians to the rest. An established church is most likely to maintain clerical respectability and usefulness, by holding out a suitable encouragement to young men to devote themselves early to the service of the church; and likewise enables them to obtain such knowledge as shall qualify them for the important work.

They who reason on the contrary side observe, that the patriarchs sustaining civil as well as religious offices, is no proof at all that religion was incorporated with the civil government, in the sense above referred to; nor is there the least hint of it in the sacred Scriptures. That the case of the Jews can never be considered in point, as they were under a theocracy, and a ceremonial dispensation that was to pass away, and consequently not designed to be a model for Christian nations. That whatever was the practice of heathens in this respect, this forms no argument in favor of that system, which is the very opposite of paganism.

The church of Christ is of a spiritual nature, and ought not, yea, cannot, in fact, be incorporated with the state without sustaining material injury. In the three first and purest ages of Christianity, the church was a stranger to any alliance with temporal powers; and, so far from needing their aid, religion never flourished so much as while they were combined to suppress it. As to the support which Christianity, when united to civil government, yields to the peace and good order of society, it is observed, that this benefit will be derived from it, at least, in as great a degree without an establishment as with it. Religion, if it have any power, operates on the conscience of men; and, resting solely on the belief of invisible realities, it can derive no weight or solemnity from human sanctions. Human establishments, it is said, have been, and are, productive of the greatest evils; for in this case it is requisite to give the preference to some particular system; and as the magistrate is no better judge of religion than others, the chances are as great of his lending his sanction to the false as the true. The thousands that have been persecuted and suffered in consequence of establishments, will always form an argument against them. Under establishments also, it is said, corruption cannot be avoided. Emolument must be attached to the national church, which may be a strong inducement to its ministers to defend it, be it ever so remote from the truth. Thus, also, error becomes permanent; and that set of opinions which happens to prevail when the establishment is formed, continues, in spite of superior light and improvement, to be handed down, without alteration, from age to age. Hence the disagreement between the public creed of the church and the private sentiments of its ministers.

As to the provision made for the clergy, this may be done without an establishment, as matter of fact shows in hundreds of instances. Dissenting ministers, or those who do not hold in establishments, it is observed, are not without means of obtaining knowledge; but, on the contrary, many of them are equal to their brethren in the establishment for erudition and sound learning. It is not to be dissembled neither, that among those who, in general, cannot agree with human establishments, there are as pious and as useful members of society as others.

Finally, though all Christians should pay respect to civil magistrates as such, and all magistrates ought to encourage the church, yet no civil magistrates have any power to establish any particular form of religion binding upon the consciences of the subject; nor are magistrates ever represented in Scripture as officers or rulers of the church. As Mr. Coleridge observes, the Christian church is not a kingdom, realm, or state of the world; nor is it an estate of any such kingdom, realm, or state; but it is the appointed opposite to them all collectively:—the sustaining, correcting, befriending opposite of the world!—the compensating counterforce to the inherent and inevitable evils and defects of the state as a state, and without reference to its better or worse construction as a particular state: while, whatever is beneficent and humanizing in the aims, tendencies, and proper objects of the state, it collects in itself as in a focus, to radiate them back in a higher quality; or, to change the metaphor, it completes and strengthens the edifice of the state, without interference or commixture, in the mere act of laying and securing its own foundations. And for these services the church of Christ asks of the state neither wages nor dignities; she asks only protection, and to be let alone. These, indeed, she demands; but even these only on the ground that there is nothing in her constitution, nor in her discipline, inconsistent with the interests of the state; nothing resistant or impeding to the state in the exercise of its rightful powers, in the fulfilment of its appropriate duties, or in the effectuation of its legitimate objects. (See CHURCH, and CHURCH REVENUES.)—Works of Rob. Hall; Hend. Buck.

ESTHER. The book of Esther is so called, because it contains the history of Esther, the Jewish captive, who, by her remarkable accomplishments, gained the affection of king Ahasuerus, and by marriage with him was raised to the throne of Persia; and it relates the origin and ceremonies of the feast of Purim, instituted in commemoration of the great deliverance, which she, by her interest, procured for the Jews, whose general destruction had been concerted by the offended pride of Haman.

The book of Esther has always been esteemed canonical both by Jews and Christians; but the authority of those additions in the Latin editions are disputed. Clements of Alexandria, some rabbins, and many commentators suppose the original author of this book to have been Mordecai; and the book itself favors this opinion, saying, that he wrote the history of this event. Others think it was composed and placed in the canon by Ezra, or by the great synagogue. The time of the history is in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, who is believed to be Ahasuerus. (See AHASUERUS, and ECBATANA.)—Watson; Calnet.

ESTRANGED; filled with dislike; rendered like strangers. The wicked are estranged from God; destitute of the knowledge of him or intimacy with him, and filled with dislike of him. (Ps. 58: 3.) but not estranged from their justs; not filled with dislike of it, or turned from the practice of it. Ps. 78: 30. The Jews estranged Jerusalem by turning out the worship of the true God, and bringing in the worship of idols, and the practice of the basest wickedness. Jer. 19: 4.—Brown.

ETAM; a rock to which Samson retired. Judg. 15: 8, 11. Probably near a city of Judah, built by Rehoboam, (1 Chron. 4: 3, 32. 2 Chron. 11: 6,) which lay between Bethlehem and Tekoah. Josephus speaks of a place of pleasure called Hethan, distant from Jerusalem five leagues, to which Solomon frequently retired.—Calnet.

ETERNAL. (See ΑΙΩΝ; ΑΙΩΜΟΣ.)

ETERNALS; a name given to those in the third century who maintained that our globe, being purified by the great conflagration subsequent to the day of judgment, will be regenerated and abide forever, under the form of the new heaven and the new earth described by St. John in the Revelation. This opinion, however, must not be confined to heretics, nor limited to the third century.—Williams.

ETERNITY, with respect to God, is a duration without beginning or end. As it is the attribute of human nature it is a duration that has a beginning, but will never have an end. "It is a duration," says a lively writer, "that excludes all number and computation: days, and months, and years, yea, and ages, are lost in it, like drops in the ocean! Millions of millions of years; as many years as there are sands on the sea-shore, or particles of dust in the globe of the earth, and those multiplied to the highest reach of number—all these are nothing to eternity. They do not bear the least imaginable proportion to it, for these will come to an end as certainly as a day; but eternity will never, never, never, come to an end! it is a line without an end! it is an ocean without a shore! Alas! what shall I say of it; it is an infinite, unknown something, that neither human thought can grasp, nor human language describe!"—Orton on Eternity; Shower on ditto; Davies's Sermons, ser. 11; Savrin's Sermons, vol. iii. p. 370; Hend. Buck.

ETERNITY OF GOD is the perpetual continuance of his being, without beginning, end, or succession. That he is without beginning, says Dr. Gill, may be proved from, 1. His necessary self-existence. Exod. 3: 14. 2. From his attributes, several of which are said to be eternal. Rom. 1: 20. Acts 15: 18. Ps. 103: 17. Jer. 31: 3. 3. From his purposes, which are also said to be from eternity. Isa. 25: 1. Eph. 3: 11. Rom. 9: 11. Eph. 1: 4. 4. From the covenant of grace, which is eternal. 2 Sam. 23: 5. Mic. 5: 2.

That he is without end, may be proved from, 1. His spirituality and simplicity. Rom. 1: 23. 2. From his independency. Rom. 9: 5. 3. From his immutability. 2 Pet. 1: 24, 25. Mal. 3: 6. Ps. 3: 26, 27. 4. From his dominion and government, said never to end. Jer. 10: 10. Ps. 10: 16. Dan. 4: 3.

That he is without succession, or any distinctions of time succeeding one to another, as moments, minutes, &c. may be proved from, 1. His existence before such were in being. Isa. 43: 13. 2. The distinctions and differences of time are together ascribed to him, and not as succeeding one another: he is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Heb. 13: 8. Rev. 1: 4. 3. If his duration were successive, or proceeded by moments, days, and years, then there must have been some first moment, day, and year, when he began to exist, which is incompatible with the idea of his eternity; and, besides, one day would be but one day with him, and not a thousand, contrary to the express language of Scripture. 2 Pet. 3: 8. 4. He would not be immense, immutable, and perfect, if this were the case; for he would be older one minute than he was before, which cannot be said of him. 5. His knowledge proves him without successive duration, for he knows all things, past, present, and to come: "he sees the present without a medium, the past without recollection, and the future without foresight. To him all truths are but one idea, all places but one point, and all times but one moment."

This last idea, however, Mr. Watson regards as a metaphysical refinement. Minutes or moments, he observes, or smaller portions, for which we have no name, may be artificial things, adopted to aid our conceptions; but conceptions of what? Not of any thing standing still, but of something going on. Of duration we have no other conception; and if there be nothing in nature which answers to this conception, then is duration itself imaginary, and we discourse about nothing. If the duration of the Divine Being admits not of past, present, and future, one of these two consequences must follow,—that no such attribute as that of eternity belongs to him,—or that there is no power in the human mind to conceive of it. In either case, the Scriptures are greatly impugned; for "He who was, and is, and is to come," is a revelation of the eternity of God, which is then in no sense true. It is not true, if used literally: and it is as little so, if the language be figurative; for the figure rests on no basis, it illustrates nothing, it misleads. It is, however, to be remembered, that the eternal, supreme cause must of necessity have such a perfect, independent, unchangeable comprehension of all things, that there can be no one point or instant of his eternal duration, wherein all things that are past, present, and to come, will not be as entirely known and represented to him in one single thought or view, and all things present and future be equally entirely in his power and direction, as if there was really no succession at all, but all things were actually present at once.—Gill's Body of Divinity; Paley's Nat. Theology, p. 480; Charnock on the Divine Perfections; Clarke on ditto; Watts's Ontology, chap. 4; Dwight's Theology; Hend. Buck; Watson.

ETERNITY OF THE WORLD. It was the opinion of Aristotle and others, that the world was eternal. But that the present system of things had a beginning, seems evident, if we consider the following things:—1. We may not only conceive of many possible alterations which might be made in the form of it, but we see it incessantly changing; whereas an eternal being, inasmuch as it is self-existent, is always the same. 2. We have no credible history of transactions more remote than six thousand years from the present time; for as to the pretence that some nations have made to histories of greater antiquity, as the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Phenicians, Chinese, &c. they are evidently convicted of falsehood in the works referred to at the bottom of this article. 3. We can trace the invention of the most useful arts and sciences; which had probably been carried farther, and invented sooner, had the world been eternal. 4. The origin of the most considerable nations of the earth may be traced, i. e. the time when they first inhabited the countries where they now dwell; and it appears that most of the western nations came from the east. 5. If the world be eternal, it is hard to account for the tradition of its beginning, which has almost every where prevailed, though under different forms, among both polite and barbarous nations. 6. We have a most ancient and credible history of the beginning of the world—I mean the history of Moses, with which no book in the world, in point of antiquity, can contend.—Stillingfleet's Orig. Sacra, p. 15, 106; Winder's Hist. of Knowledge, vol. ii. passim; Pearson on the Creed, p. 58; Doddridge's Lectures, i. 24; Tillotson's Sermons, ser. 1; Clarke at Boyle's Lectures, pp. 22, 23; Dr. Collyer's Scripture Facts, ser. 2; Bossuet's Universal History; Hend. Buck.

ETHAN; the third station of the Israelites when coming out of Egypt, (Num. 33: 6. Exod. 13: 20,) lay at the extremity of the western gulf of the Red sea.—Calmet.

ETHAN, the Ezrahite, and son of Kishi, was one of the wisest men of his time, except Solomon. 1 Kings 4: 31. Ps. 89. 1 Chron. 6: 44. He was called likewise Idithun, and appears under this name in the titles to several Psalms. Ethan was a principal master of the temple music. 1 Chron. 15: 17, and other places.—Calmet.

ETHANIM; a Hebrew month, (1 Kings 8: 2.) after the captivity called Tizzi. It is supposed to answer to our September, O. S. (See JEWISH CALENDAR.)—Calmet.

ETHELBERT, king of Kent, succeeded his father Herenric, about 560, and soon reduced all the states, except Northumberland, to the condition of his dependants. In his reign, Christianity was first introduced into England. Ethelbert married Bertha, the daughter of Caribert, king of Paris, and a Christian princess, who, stipulating for the free exercise of her religion, brought over with her a French bishop. Her conduct was so exemplary as to prepossess the king and his court in favor of the Christian religion. In consequence, pope Gregory the Great sent a mission of forty monks, headed by Augustine, to preach the gospel in the island. They were well received, and numbers were converted; and the king himself, at length, submitted to be baptized. Civilization and knowledge followed Christianity, and Ethelbert erected a body of laws, which was the first written code promulgated by the northern conquerors. He died in 616, and was succeeded by his son Edbald.—Ency. Amer.

ETHICS; the doctrine of manners, or the science of moral philosophy. The word is formed from ethos, (mores,) "manners," because the scope or object thereof is to form the manner of life. (See MORALS.)—Hend. Buck.

ETHIOPIA. (See CUSH.)

ETHNOPHRONES; a sect of heretics in the seventh century, who made a profession of Christianity, but joined thereto all the ceremonies and follies of paganism, as judicial astrology, sortileges, auguries, and other divinations.—Hend. Buck.

EUCARIST; the sacrament of the Lord's supper. The word in its original Greek (eucharistia), properly signifies giving thanks; from the hymns and thanksgivings which accompanied that holy service in the primitive church. (See LORD'S SUPPER.)—Watson.

EUCHITES, or EUCHITE; (from euché, prayer,) praying persons; a name at different times applied to persons who were, or at least professed to be, eminently pious. In the early ages it was applied to the Paulicians, (which see;) and in the middle ages to the Waldenses, whose simple piety was greatly disgusted with the haughty hypocrisy of the monks and priests of the Roman church. They were also called Massilians and Bogomites, both words of the same import. (See those articles.)—Encyc. Perth., Howell's Church History, vol. ii. p. 222.

Mr. Robinson, however, considers Euchites as a general name for dissenters, equivalent to Puritans and Non-conformists. The following is the substance of his account:

"This general parent stock, called Euchites, or dissenters; it should seem, was divided and subdivided by the clergy, into various classes of heretics. They misrepresented their doctrines, blackened their characters, and, as often as they could, excited princes to persecute them. Some of these dissenters dogmatized, and they became Manichæan, Arian, and Athanasian Euchites. Others were named after the countries where they most abounded, as Bulgarians, Macedonians, Armenians, &c. Others were named after some eminent teacher, as Paulicians, and Paulianists, Novatians, and many more of this class. Simple Euchite, therefore, was a mere non-conformist, in Greece. A Manichæan Euchite was a dissenter of a doctrinal, disputations turn, and so of the rest; if, indeed, the word have any precise meaning at all, which contradictory accounts render very doubtful." See Robinson's Eccles. Researches, pp. 58—9.—Williams.

EUDÆMONISM, EUDÆMONOLOGY; the doctrine of happiness, or that system which makes human happiness its prime object, the highest motive of every duty, and of a virtuous life, and consequently the whole foundation of morals. Eudæmonism is contradistinguished to that morality or pure system of philosophy, which makes virtue itself the chief object, independent of its tendency to promote human happiness.—Ency. Amer.

EUDOXIANS; a sect in the fourth century, so called from their leader, Eudoxius, patriarch of Antioch and Constantinople, a great defender of the Arian doctrine. (See ARIANS.)—Hend. Buck.

EUGENIUS; a bishop of Carthage, in the fifth century. His eminent learning and piety, it is said, brought upon him the hatred of the Arians in general. They took pains to set the king Huneric against him and other orthodox Christians. By this means five thousand of the latter were banished into a desert, where they died. Still bent on persecution, Huneric published an edict, convoking a council of all the clergy in his dominions, at which the orthodox party were shamefully abused; each prelate received a hundred blows, and was turned out of his office unheard; their churches were shut up, and their revenues seized. Eugenius protested against this violence in vain. Another device of their enemies completed the ruin of these unhappy men. They were required to swear to the succession of the king's son Hilderic. Those who did were condemned as transgressing Matt. 5: 34, and those who did not, as enemies to the legal succession. Eugenius was banished to Tripoli, where he was thrown into a lathsome dungeon. He was recalled by Huneric's successor; but by the intrigues of the Arians was again exiled to Languedoc, in France, where he died of his hardships, SEPTEMBER 6, A. D. 505.—For.

EULALIA; a Spanish lady of a Christian family, remarkable in youth for the sweetness of her temper, and the solidity of her understanding. Being apprehended as a Christian, the magistrate attempted by the mildest means to bring her over to paganism; but she answered him with such irony, and ridiculed the heathen deities with such asperity, as provoked him to consign her to the torture; after which she was burned to death, December, A. D. 303.—Fox.

EULER, (LEONARD), one of the most illustrious and fertile mathematicians of the eighteenth century, was born at Basil in 1707, and was a pupil of John Bernoulli. He was one of the learned men whom Catharine the First invited to St. Petersburg, and in that capital he resided, as professor, from 1727 to 1741. In 1741, he removed to Berlin, at the request of the king of Prussia, and he remained there till 1766, when he returned to the Russian capital. He died, of apoplexy, at St. Petersburg, in 1783. For many years previous to his decease he had been blind; but the privation of sight did not put a stop to his labors. Among the works that were produced while he was in a state of darkness were the Elements of Algebra, and the Theory of the Moon. His writings are so numerous, that a mere catalogue of them fills fifty pages. Many of them are to be found in the Memoirs of the Academies of St. Petersburg, Berlin, and Paris, especially in the first two. One of them is devoted to the defence of divine revelation against the sceptics.—Davenport; Ency. Amer.

EULOGY, (eulogia, "blessed," or a "blessing;") a term made use of in reference to the consecrated bread. When the Greeks have cut a loaf or piece of bread, to consecrate it, they break the rest into little bits, and distribute it among the persons who have not yet communicated, or send it to persons that are absent; and these pieces of bread are what they call eulogies.

The Latin church has had something like eulogies for a great many ages; and thence arose the use of their holy bread. The name eulogy was likewise given to loaves or cakes brought to church by the faithful to have them blessed. Lastly, the use of the term passed hence to mere presents made to a person without any benediction.—Hend. Buck.

EUNICE; the mother of Timothy, who was a Jewess by birth, but married to a Greek, Timothy's father. 2 Tim. 1: 5. Eunice had been converted to Christianity by some other preacher, (Acts 16: 1, 2,) and not by St. Paul; for when that apostle came to Lystra, he found there Eunice and Timothy, already far advanced in grace and virtue.—Watson.

EUNOMIANS; another branch of pure Arians, the followers of Eunomius, a man, according to Mosheim, eminent for his knowledge and penetration.—Eclde. History, vol. i. p. 421; Williams.

EUNUCH. The word signifies, one who guards the bed. In the courts of eastern kings, the care of the beds and apartments belonging to princes and princesses, was generally committed to eunuchs; but they had the charge chiefly of the princesses, who lived secluded. The Hebrew saris signifies a real eunuch, whether naturally born such, or rendered such. But in Scripture this word often denotes an officer belonging to a prince, attending his court, and employed in the interior of his palace, as a name of office and dignity. In the Persian and Turkish courts, the principal employments are at this day possessed by real eunuchs. Our Savior speaks of men who "made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven;" (Matt. 19: 12,) that is, who, from a religious motive, renounced marriage or carnal pleasures.—Watson.

EUPHRATES; a river of Asiatic Turkey, which rises from the mountains of Armenia, as some have said, in two streams, a few miles to the north-east of Erzeron, the streams uniting to the south-west near that city; and pursuing a south-west, south, and then south-east direction, falls by two or three mouths into the gulf of Persia, about fifty miles south-east of Bassora; north latitude twenty-nine degrees fifty minutes; east longitude sixty-six degrees fifty-five minutes. The comparative course of the Euphrates may be estimated at about one thousand four hundred English miles. This river is navigable for a considerable distance from the sea. In its course it separates Aladulia from Armenia, Syria from Diarbekir, and Diarbekir from Arabia, and passing through the Arabian Irak, joins the Tigris. The Euphrates and Tigris, the most considerable as well as the most renowned rivers of western Asia, are remarkable for their rising within a few miles of each other, running the same course, never being more than a hundred and fifty miles asunder, and sometimes, before their final junction, approaching within fifteen miles of each other, as in the latitude of Bagdad. The space included between the two is the ancient country of Mesopotamia. But the Euphrates is by far the more noble river of the two. Sir R. K. Porter, describing this river in its course through the ruins of Babylon, observes, "The whole view was particularly solemn. The majestic stream of the Euphrates, wandering in solitude, like a pilgrim monarch through the silent ruins of his devastated kingdom, still appeared a noble river, even under all the disadvantages of its desert-tracked course. Its banks were hoary with reeds; and the grey osier willows were yet there, on which the captives of Israel hung up their harps, and, while Jerusalem was not, refused to be comforted." The Scripture calls it "the great river," and assigns it for the eastern boundary of that land which God promised to the Israelites. Deut. 1: 7. Josh. 1: 4 (See EXEK).—Watson.

EUPHRATESIANS, or PEREJANS; the followers of Euphrates of Pera, in Cilicia, said to believe there were three Fathers, three Sons, and three Holy Ghosts; against whom was formed that clause of the Athanasian creed, which says, that there are "not three fathers, but one Father," &c. Query. Were they not Sabellians, who taught that these names applied to each person of the trinity? or, rather, that they were all names of God in one person. See Bell's Wanderings, p. 319.—Williams.

EUROCLYDON; the Greek name for the north-east wind, very dangerous at sea, of the nature of a whirlwind, which falls of a sudden upon ships. Acts 27: 14. The same wind is now called a Levanter.—Watson.

EUSEBIA, (Greek, piety;) in the modern allegorical sense, the presiding genius of theology.—Ency. Amer.

EUSEBIANS; a denomination given to the Arians, on account of the favor and countenance which Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, showed and procured for them at their first rise.—Hend. Buck.

EUSEBIUS, surnamed Pamphilus, the father of ecclesiastical history; born at Cæsarea, in Palestine, about A. D. 270, and died about 340, was the most learned man of his time. He was a presbyter, and in 314 was appointed bishop in his native city. He was at first opposed to the Arians, but afterwards became their advocate, and with them condemned the doctrines of Athanasius. His Ecclesiastical History, written, like his other works, in Greek, is contained in ten books, and extends from the birth of Christ to the year 324. Of his Chronicon, with the exception of some fragments of the original, we have only an Armenian version and the Latin version of Jerome. Besides these, there are still extant fifteen books of his Preparatio Evangelica, which is particularly valuable for the extracts which it contains from lost philosophical works. Of the twenty books of his Demonstratio Evangelica, in which he shows the superiority of Christianity to Judaism, we have only ten imperfectly preserved; and finally a life, or rather eulogium, of Constantine.—Hend. Buck.

EUSEBIUS, bishop of Samosata, in the fourth century, under the emperor Valens, makes a distinguished figure in ecclesiastical history. The Arians, having advanced Miletas to the see of Antioch, supposing him to be of their party, deposited the public instrument in the hands of Eusebius. Finding their mistake, they persuaded the emperor to displace him, and to require Eusebius to deliver up the instrument. The noble courage displayed by Eusebius on this occasion, surprised the emperor and won his respect. His prudent, laborious, and successful zeal in repressing Arianism, and building up the orthodox churches, at length, however, procured his banishment, much to the grief of his attached people. He was from political motives restored again; but not long afterwards was killed by a tile thrown upon his head, it is reported, from the hand of an Arian woman.—Fox.

EUSTATHIANS; a name given to the Catholics of Antioch, in the fourth century, on occasion of their refusing to acknowledge any other bishop beside St. Eustathius, deposed by the Arians.—Hend. Buck.

EUSTATHIANS; a rigid denomination in the fourth century, so called from Eustathius, a monk, who prohibited marriage, the use of wine and flesh, and obliged his followers to quit all their property, as incompatible with the hopes of heaven. Whether this monk was the Semi-Arian bishop of Sebastia, is uncertain.—Mosheim's E. H. vol. i. p. 360; Williams.

EUSTOCHIUM; a Roman lady of great learning and piety; a disciple of St. Jerome, whom she followed in his travels through Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, to visit places celebrated in the Scriptures. She became a nun at Bethlehem, and died 419.—Betham.

EUSTRATIUS; a Christian martyr under the Diocletian persecution. He was secretary to the governor of Armenia, and was thrown into a fiery furnace for exhorting some Christians who had been apprehended to persevere in their faith. Several of his friends shared a similar fate at Nicopolis.—Fox.

EUTUCHITES; (from eutuchein, to be fortunate or happy;) a sort of religious stoics in the third century, who held that we ought to rejoice equally in all events, because to grieve would be to dishonor our Creator, as well as render ourselves miserable.—Broughton's Dictionary, vol. ii. p. 532; Williams.

EUTYCHIANS; a denomination which arose in the fifth century, and were so called from Eutyches, abbot of a certain convent of monks at Constantinople. The Nestorians having explained the two natures in Christ in such a manner as, in the opinion of many, to make them equivalent to two persons, which was an evident absurdity, Eutyches, to avoid this error, fell into the opposite extreme, and maintained that there was only one nature in Jesus Christ, the divine nature, which, according to him, had so entirely swallowed up the human, that the latter could not be distinguished. Hence it was inferred, that, according to this system, our Lord had nothing of humanity but the appearance.—Watson.

EVANGELICAL; agreeable to the doctrines of Christianity. The term is frequently applied to those who do not rely upon moral duties as to their acceptance with God; but are influenced to action from a sense of the love of God, and depend upon the merits of Christ for their everlasting salvation. In the public documents in Prussia, the word evangelical is now substituted in the room of Lutheran and Calvinist; it having been the aim of the king for some time past to unite the two denominations into one body. There is, in fact, little difference in the religious belief of the two parties; many of the Calvinists, or the Reformed, not holding predestination and other Calvinistic points, and many of the Lutherans do not adhere to the doctrine of consubstantiation.

For an admirable description of evangelical divines, see the Complete Works of Robert Hall, vol. ii. p. 274.—Hend. Buck.

EVANGELIST; one who publishes glad tidings; a messenger or preacher of good news. The persons denominated evangelists were next in order to the apostles, and were sent by them, not to settle in any particular place, but to travel among the infant churches, and ordain ordinary officers, and finish what the apostles had begun. Of this kind were Philip the deacon, Mark, Silas, &c. Acts 21: 8. The office of a modern missionary, in some respects, answers to that of a primitive evangelist. The title is more particularly given to the four inspired writers of our Savior's life.—Hend. Buck.

EVANS, (JONN, D. D.,) an eminent non-conformist divine, author of the "Christian Temper," was born in 1680, at Wrexham, in Denbighshire. His father was minister of Wrexham. His mother was one of those superior women who adorned the Christian church at that period. This son was first placed under the care of Mr. Thomas Rowe, near London, and studied afterwards at the seminary of Mr. Timothy Jollie. He accepted an invitation to settle at Wrexham, where he was ordained the 18th of August, 1702.—Dr. Daniel Williams, of London, hearing that Mr. Evans was invited to Dublin, to prevent his leaving England, sent for him to the metropolis, where he first assisted the doctor, afterwards became co-pastor, and at length succeeded him at his death.

Previously to entering on his new charge, Dr. Evans spent a whole week in devotional retirement. The time was not lost: for the emiaence of his religious and pastoral character was great, and his usefulness, in many instances, extraordinary. In the Arian controversy he refused to subscribe to any articles, but maintained the orthodox sentiments. In the public services of the dissenters he was often called to preside; and was appointed to assist in completing Matthew Henry's Commentary, of which he supplied the notes on the Epistle to the Romans so well, that Dr. Doddridge says, "the exposition of the Romans, begun by Henry, and finished by Dr. Evans, is the best I ever saw." He was for some years preparing to write a history of non-conformity, from the Reformation to the civil wars; but, by his death, the work devolved on Mr. Neal. He died the 16th of May, 1730, in his fifty-first year. In his last illness, he said, "Though I cannot affirm, as a late venerable minister among us, (Mr. W. Lorimer,) a little before his death, that I have no more doubt of my acceptance with God, than I have of my own existence; yet I have a good hope through grace, and such as, I am persuaded, will never make me ashamed. This corruptible shall put on incorruption. O glorious hope!"

His discourses on the Christian Temper form one of the best practical treatises in the English or any other language; and will render his memory dear to many, who will learn from his book the nature and excellence of that spirit, which he exemplified in his life. Dr. Doddridge speaks highly, also, of his Sermons to Young People; and he who renders religion intelligible and lovely to the young, performs a valuable service to the church of God. See Bogue and Bennet's History of Dissenters.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

EVANS, (CALEB, D. D.,) president of the Baptist Education Society, at Bristol, was the son of the Rev. Hugh Evans. He was born at Bristol about the year 1737. In 1767, he became colleague to his father, as pastor of the church; and in 1770 formed "The Bristol Education Society;" the object of which was, that of furnishing the dissenting congregations, and especially those of the Baptist denomination, with a succession of able and evangelical ministers, as well as missionaries for propagating the gospel in the world.

From this time to the period of his death, which took place, August the 9th, 1791, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, Dr. Evans continued to discharge the duties of his high office with honor to himself, and usefulness to the body with which he was associated. He published an answer to Dr. Priestley's Appeal, and a small volume, entitled "Christ Crucified," besides occasional sermons.—Jones's Chr. Biog.

EVARTS, (JEREMIAH,) secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, was born in Sunderland, Vermont, February 3, 1781, and was graduated at Yale college in 1802. During a revival of religion in the college in the beginning of this year, he cherished the hope, that his soul was renewed by the Spirit of God, and became a member of the college church. From 1803 to 1804, he was the instructor of the academy at Peacham, and afterwards studied law with Judge Chauncey, of New Haven, in which city he commenced the practice of the law, in July, 1806. In May, 1810, he removed to Charlestown, near Boston, in order to edit the Panoplist, a religious and literary monthly publication, which had been conducted by Dr. Morse and others four or five years. He was ten years the editor of the Panoplist, ten years the treasurer of the Board of Missions, and ten years corresponding Secretary. In feeble health he took a voyage to the island of Cuba in February, 1831, and thence in April to Charlestown, where, in the house of Rev. Dr. Palmer, he died, May 10th, aged fifty.

While Mr. Everts was on his voyage to Cuba, fully aware of the uncertain continuance of his life, he wrote as follows: "Here, in this sea, I consecrate myself to God as my chief good:—to him as my heavenly Father, infinitely kind and tender of his children:—to him as my kind and merciful Redeemer, by whose blood and merits alone I do hope for salvation:—to him as the beneficent Renewer and Sanctifier of the saved. I implore the forgiveness of my numerous and aggravated transgressions; and I ask that my remaining time and strength may be employed for the glory of God, my portion, and for the good of his creatures." In his last hours his hope of forgiveness and salvation was undiminished and unshaken. He said, "I wish in these dying words to recognise the great Redeemer as the Savior from sin and hell. And I recognise the great Spirit of God as the Renovator of God's elect." When it was said to him, "You will soon see Jesus," he exclaimed, "Wonderful, wonderful, wonderful glory! We cannot understand—we cannot comprehend—wonderful glory!—I will praise, I will praise him! Jesus reigns." This was no feverish excitement, nor dream of enthusiasm, but the triumph of a dying believer.

Mr. Everts combined with a sound judgment, the ardent requisite for the accomplishment of great designs. Besides his labors as editor of the Panoplist, he wrote the ten annual reports of the American Board from 1821 to 1830, the last of which contains a most weighty and valuable discussion on the future growth of this country, and the means of preserving it from ruin. His essays, under the signature of William Penn, on the rights and claims of the Indians, were published in 1829.—Wood's and Spring's Sermons; Miss. Herald; Allen.

EVE; the name of the first woman: Chava in Hebrew, is derived from the same root as chajim, life; because she was to be "the mother of all living." It is believed she was created on the sixth day, after Adam had reviewed the animals. (See ADAM.)—Calmet.

EVEREST, (SOLOMON.) a Christian physician, died at Canton, Connecticut, in July, 1822. He bequeathed ten thousand dollars to religious and missionary purposes.—Davenport.

EVERLASTING; enduring always. (See ΑΙΩΝ, ΑΙΩΝΙΟΣ.)

EVIDENCE, is that perception of truth which arises either from the testimony of the senses, or from an induction of reason. The evidences of revelation, both as it respects the authenticity and the credibility, are divided into internal and external. That is called internal evidence which is drawn from the consideration of those declarations and doctrines which are contained in it: and that is called external which arises from some other circumstances referring to it—such as predictions concerning it, miracles wrought by those who teach it, its success in the world, &c. (See Evidences of Christianity, art. ΟΝΑΣΤΙΑΝΤΩ.) Some add, as a third class, the experimental evidence; meaning by the term that evidence which arises from the healing and happy influence of Christianity in the soul of the true believer. See Abbott's Young Christian, and Fuller's Works, vol. 1. 103.

Moral evidence is that which, though it does not exclude a mere abstract possibility of things being otherwise, yet shuts out every reasonable ground of suspecting that they are so.

Evidences of grace are those dispositions and acts which prove a person to be in a converted state; such as an enlightened understanding; love to God and his people; a delight in God's word; worship and dependence on him; spirituality of mind; devotedness of life to the service of God, &c. Upham's Intellectual Philosophy; Abercrombie's do. Seed's Post. Ser., ser. 2; Dutton on the Resurrection; Bellaamy on Religion, p. 184; Gambier's Introduction to the Study of Moral Evidence, 163; Dwight's Theology, ser. lxxvi. and lxxxviii.—Hebd. Bwk.—(See AFFECTIONS.)

EVIL, is distinguished into natural or moral. Natural evil is whatever destroys or any way disturbs the perfection of natural beings; such as blindness, diseases, death, &c. Moral evil is the disagreement between the actions of a moral agent, and the rule of those actions, whatever it is. Applied to a choice, or acting contrary to the moral or revealed laws of the Deity, it is termed wickedness or sin. Applied to acting contrary to the mere rule of fitness, a fault. (See article SIN.) Dwight's Theology, ser. viii.—Hebd. Bwk.

EVIL MERODACH, (foolish Merodach.) son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. He first governed the kingdom during the indisposition of his father; but after seven years, the old king, having recovered his understanding, re-ascended the throne, and Evil Merodach, as some think, was imprisoned by him. In this confinement, he contracted an acquaintance and friendship with Jehoiakim, king of Judah, so that immediately after the king's death, Evil Merodach, succeeding him, delivered Jehoiakim out of prison, and placed him above all the other kings, who were captives at Babylon. Evil Merodach reigned but one year, according to our chronology, and was immediately succeeded by his son Belshazzar; but according to Josephus and Prideaux, he reigned two years, and was succeeded by Neriglissar, his sister's husband, then by Laborosarkod, and lastly by Belshazzar.—Calmet.

EVIL-SPEAKING; the using language either reproachful or untrue respecting others, and thereby injuring them. It is an express command of Scripture, "to speak evil of no man." Titus 2: 2. James 4: 11. By which, however, we are not to understand that there are no occasions on which we are at liberty to speak of others that which may be considered as evil. 1. Persons in the administration of justice may speak words which in private intercourse would be reproachful. 2. God's ministers may inveigh against vice with sharpness and severity, both privately and publicly. Is. 58: 1. Tit. 1: 13. 3. Private persons may reprove others when they commit sin. Lev. 19: 17. 4. Some vehemence of speech may be used in defence of truth, and impugning errors of bad consequence. Jude 3. 5. It may be necessary, upon some emergent occasions, with some heat of language, to express disapprobation of notorious wickedness. Acts 8: 23. Yet, in all these, the greatest equity, moderation, and candor should be used; and we should take care, 1. Never to speak in severe terms without reasonable warrant or apparent just cause. 2. Nor beyond measure. 3. Nor out of bad principles or wrong ends; from ill will, contempt, revenge, envy, to compass our own ends; from wantonness or negligence, but from pure charity for the good of those to whom, or of whom, we speak.

This is an evil, however, which greatly abounds, and which is not sufficiently watched against; for it is not when we openly speak evil of others only that we are guilty, but even in speaking what is true, we are in danger of speaking evil of others. There is sometimes a malignant pleasure manifested; a studious recollection of every thing that can be brought forward; a delight in hearing any thing spoken against others; a secret rejoicing in knowing that another's fall will be an occasion of our rise. All this is base to an extreme.

The impropriety and sinfulness of evil-speaking will appear, if we consider, 1. That it is entirely opposite to the whole tenor of the Christian religion. 2. Expressly condemned and prohibited as evil. Ps. 64: 3. James 4: 11. 3. No practice hath more severe punishments denounced against it. 1 Cor. 5: 11. 1 Cor. 6: 10. 4. It is an evidence of a weak and distempered mind. 5. It is even indicative of ill breeding and bad manners. 6. It is the abhorrence of all wise and good men. Ps. 15: 3. 7. It is exceedingly injurious to society, and inconsistent with the relation we bear to each other as Christians James 3: 6, 8. It is branded with the epithet of folly. Prov. 18: 6, 7. 9. It is perverting the design of speech 10. It is opposite to the example of Christ, whom we profess to follow. (See SLANDER.) Barrow's Works, vol. i. ser. 16; Tillotson's Ser. ser. 42; Jack's Ser. on Evil Speaking.—Hebd. Bwk.

EWING, (JOHN, D. D.) an eminent American divine and mathematician, was born in Maryland, in 1732. He was graduated at the college in Princeton in 1755, and afterwards served as a tutor in that seminary. In 1759, he undertook the pastoral charge of the first Presbyterian church of Philadelphia, which he continued to exercise until 1773. In 1779, he accepted the station of provost of the university of Philadelphia, which he filled until his death. He was elected vice-president of the American Philosophical Society, and contributed several valuable memoirs to their transactions. His favorite study from an early age was mathematics, and his Lectures on Natural History have obtained considerable reputation. He died in 1802.—Davenport.

EXALT. Men exalt God when, with care and diligence, they advance his declarative glory, and praise his excellencies and works. Exod. 15: 2. Ps. 34: 3, and 99: 5, 9. God exalts Christ in raising him from the dead, receiving him up into heaven, and giving all power and judgment in heaven and earth into his hand. Acts 3: 33. Antichrist exalts himself above every thing called God: he exalts himself above magistrates, pretending to enthrone and depose them at pleasure; above angels, presumptuously requiring them to carry such souls to heaven as he pleaseth, and in ordering devils to leave the persons of the possessed; and above the true God, in pretending to dispense with his laws, give authority to his word, and govern his church by rules of his own, &c. 2 Thess. 2: 4.—(See ANTI-CHRIST.)—Brown.

EXALTATION OF CHRIST, consisted in his rising again from the dead on the third day, in ascending up into heaven; in sitting at the right hand of God the Father, and in coming to judge the world at the last day. (See ARTICLES RESURRECTION; ASCENSION; INTERCESSION; and JUDGMENT-DAY.)—Head. Buck.

EXAMINATION, (SELF.) (See SELF-EXAMINATION.)

EXAMPLE; a copy or pattern, in a moral sense, is either taken for a type, instance, or precedent for our admonition, that we may be cautioned against the faults or crimes which others have committed, by the bad consequences which have ensued from them; or example is taken for a pattern for our imitation, or a model for us to copy after.

That good examples have a peculiar power above naked precepts to dispose us to the practice of virtue and holiness, may appear by considering, "1. That they most clearly express to us the nature of our duties in their subjects and sensible effects. General precepts form abstract ideas of virtue, but in examples, virtues are most visible in all their circumstances.—2. Precepts instruct us in what things are our duty, but examples assure us that they are possible.—3. Examples, by secret and lively incentive, urge us to imitation. We are touched in another manner by the visible practice of good men, which reproaches our defects, and obliges us to the same zeal, which laws, though wise and good, will not effect."

The life of Jesus Christ forms the most beautiful example the Christian can imitate. Unlike all others, it was absolutely perfect and uniform, and every way accommodated to our present state. In him we behold all light without a shade, all beauty without a spot, all the purity of the law, and the excellency of the gospel. Here we see piety without superstition, and morality without ostentation; humility without meanness, and fortitude without temerity; patience without apathy, and compassion without weakness; zeal without rashness, and beneficence without prodigality. The obligation we are under to imitate this example arises from duty, relationship, engagement, interest, and gratitude. (See article JESUS CHRIST.)

Those who set bad examples should consider, 1. That they are the ministers of the devil's designs to destroy souls.—2. That they are acting in direct opposition to Christ, who came to save, and not to destroy.—3. That they are adding to the misery and calamities which are already in the world.—4. That the effects of their example may be incalculable on society to the end of time, and perhaps in eternity; for who can tell what may be the consequence of one sin on a family, a nation, or posterity?—5. They are acting contrary to the divine command, and thus exposing themselves to final ruin. Massillon's Ser., vol. ii. ser. 9, Eng. EXARCH; an officer in the Greek church, whose business it is to visit the provinces allotted to him, in order to inform himself of the lives and manners of the clergy; take cognizance of ecclesiastical causes; the manner of celebrating divine service; the administration of the sacraments, particularly confession; the observance of the canons; monastic discipline; affairs of marriages, divorces, &c.; but, above all, to take an account of the several revenues which the patriarch receives from several churches, and particularly as to what regards collected the same. The exarch, after having enriched himself in his post, frequently rises to the patriarchate himself.

Exarch is also used, in the Eastern church antiquity, for a general or superior over several monasteries, the same that we call archimandrite; being exempted by the patriarch of Constantinople from the jurisdiction of the bishop.—Head. Buck.

EXCELLENCY; preciousness, surpassing value or glory, Ps. 62: 4. Job 40: 10. The excellency of God is the bright, shining, and valuable perfections of his nature, and the glorious displays thereof, Deut. 33: 26. Isa. 35: 2. The excellency of Christ is in the glorious properties of his nature, his offices, righteousness, and fulness, Phil. 3: 8. Saints are more excellent than others; they are united to Christ, have his righteousness on them, his grace in them, and their good works flowing from his indwelling Spirit, regulated by his law, and directed to his glory as their end; and they are more useful, being a blessing in the land, Prov. 12: 26.—Brown.

EXCISION. (See EXCOMMUNICATION.)

EXCLUSION, (BILL OF:) a bill proposed about the close of the reign of Charles II., for excluding the duke of York, the king's brother, from the throne, on account of his being a papist.—Head. Buck.

EXCOMMUNICATION; a penalty, or censure, whereby persons who are guilty of any notorious crime or offence, are separated from the communion of the church, and deprived of all spiritual advantages.

The Jews expelled from their synagogue such as had committed any grievous crime. (See John 9: 22. 12: 42. 16: 2. and Joseph. Antiq. Jud., lib. 9, cap. 22, and lib. 16, cap. 2.) Godwyn, in his Moses and Aaron, distinguishes three degrees or kinds of excommunication among the Jews. The first he finds intimated in John 9: 22. the second in 1 Cor. 5: 5. and the third in 1 Cor. 16: 22.

Excommunication is founded upon a natural right which all societies have of excluding out of their body such as violate the laws thereof, and it was originally instituted by our Lord (Matt. 18: 1 Cor. 5: &c.) for preserving the purity of the church; but ambitious ecclesiastics converted it by degrees into an engine for promoting their own power, and inflicted it on the most frivolous occasions. Let the following facts speak:

The power of excommunication in the middle ages was lodged, contrary to Scripture, in the hands of the clergy, who distinguished it into the greater and less. The less consisted in excluding persons from the participation of the eucharist, and the prayers of the faithful; but they were not expelled the church. The greater excommunication consisted in absolute and entire seclusion from the church, and the participation of all its rites; notice of which was given by circular letters to the most eminent churches all over the world, that they might all confirm this act of discipline, by refusing to admit the delinquent to their communion. The consequences were very terrible. The person so excommunicated was avoided in all civil commerce and outward conversation. No one was to receive him into his house, nor eat at the same table with him; and, when dead, he was denied the solemn rites of burial.

The Romish pontifical takes notice of three kinds of excommunication. 1. The minor, incurred by those who have any correspondence with an excommunicated person.—2. The major, which falls upon those who disobey the commands of the holy see, or refuse to submit to certain points of discipline; in consequence of which they are excluded from the church militant and triumphant, and delivered over to the devil and his angels.—3. Anathema, which is properly that pronounced by the pope against heretical princes and countries. In former ages, these papal fulminations were most terrible things; but latterly they were formidable to none but a few petty states of Italy. The latest instance of the excommunication of a sovereign was that of Napoleon, by Pius VII., in 1809.

Excommunication, in the Greek church, cuts off the offender from all communion with the three hundred and eighteen fathers of the first council of Nice, and with the saints; consigns him over to the devil and the traitor Judas, and condemns his body to remain after death as hard as a flint or piece of steel, unless he humble himself, and make atonement for his sins by a sincere repentance.

The form abounds with dreadful imprecations; and the Greeks assert, that, if a person dies excommunicated, the devil enters into the lifeless corpse; and, therefore, in order to prevent it, the relations of the deceased cut his body in pieces and boil them in wine. It is a custom with the patriarch of Jerusalem annually to excommunicate the pope and the church of Rome; on which occasion, together with a great deal of idle ceremony, he drives a nail into the ground with a hammer, as a mark of malediction.

The causes of excommunication in the church of England are, contempt of the bishops' court, heresy, neglect of public worship and the sacraments, incontinency, adultery, simony, &c. It is described to be two-fold; the less is an ecclesiastical censure, excluding the party from the participation of the sacrament; the greater proceeds farther, and excludes him not only from these, but from the company of all Christians; but it the judge of any spiritual court excommunicates a man for a cause of which he has not the legal cognizance, the party may have an action against him at common law, and he is also liable to be indicted at the suit of the king.

Excommunication, in the church of Scotland, consists only in an exclusion of openly profane and immoral persons from baptism and the Lord's supper; but is seldom publicly denounced, as, indeed, such persons generally exclude themselves from the latter ordinance at least; but it is attended with no civil incapacity whatever.

Among the Independents, Congregationalists and Baptists, there has been a return to primitive simplicity. Among them, the persons who are or should be excommunicated, are such as are quarrelsome and litigious, (Gal. 5: 12.) such as desert their privileges, withdraw themselves from the ordinances of God, and forsake his people, (Jude 19.) such as are irregular and immoral in their lives, railers, drunkards, extortioners, fornicators, and covetous, Eph. 5: 5. 1 Cor. 5: 11. In the United States, these simple principles of church discipline are very generally followed by all evangelical denominations.

"The scriptural exclusion of a person from any Christian church does not affect his temporal estate and civil affairs; it does not subject him to fines or imprisonments; it interferes not with the business of a civil magistrate; it makes no change in the natural and civil relations between husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants; neither does it deprive a man of the liberty of attending public worship; it removes him, however, from the communion of the church, and the privileges dependent on it: this is done that he may be ashamed of his sin, and be brought to repentance; that the honor of Christ may be vindicated, and that stumbling-blocks may be removed out of the way."

Though the act of exclusion be not performed exactly in the same manner in every church, yet (according to the Congregational plan) the power of excision lies in the church itself. The officers take the sense of the members assembled together; and after the matter has been properly investigated, and all necessary steps taken to reclaim the offender, the church proceeds to the actual exclusion of the person from among them, by signifying their judgment or opinion that the person is unworthy of a place in God's house. In the conclusion of this article, however, we must add, that too great caution cannot be observed in procedures of this kind; every thing should be done with the greatest meekness, deliberation, prayer, and a deep sense of our own unworthiness; with a compassion for the offender, and a fixed design of embracing every opportunity of doing him good, by reproving, instructing, and, if possible, restoring him to the enjoyment of the privileges he has forfeited by his conduct. (See CHURCH; and DISCIPLINE.)—Hend. Buck.

EXCUSATI; a term formerly used to denote slaves, who flying to any church for sanctuary, were excused and pardoned by their masters.—Hend. Buck.

EXEGESIS, or EXPOSITION; the practical part of the science of Hermeneutics, or the art of carrying its principles and rules into execution. (See HERMENEUTICS.)—Hend. Buck.

EXERCISE. To exercise one's self, to have a conscience void of offence, is to be at all thought, care, and pains to act up to the rule of God's law, Acts 24: 16. To exercise one's self unto godliness is, with the utmost earnestness and activity, to live by faith on Christ as our righteousness and strength; and, in so doing, habitually to exert all our powers, and improve our time, opportunities and advantages to seek after and promote our fellowship with God, and conformity to him in thoughts, words, and actions, 1 Tim. 4: 7. To be exercised by trouble is to be much afflicted therewith, and led out to a proper improvement of it, Heb. 12: 11. Having the senses exercised to discern good and evil, is to have the powers of the soul carefully and frequently employed till they become skillful in distinguishing the difference between right and wrong, sound and unsound reasoning, Heb. 5: 14.—Brown.

EXHORTATION; the act of laying such motives before a person as may excite him to the performance of any duty. It differs only from suasion, in that the latter principally endeavors to convince the understanding, and the former to work on the affections. It is considered as a great branch of preaching, though not confined to that, as a man may exhort, though he do not preach; though a man can hardly be said to preach, if he do not exhort. There are some, who, believing the inability of man to do any thing good, cannot reconcile the idea of exhorting men to duty, it being, as they suppose, a contradiction to address men who have no power to act of themselves. But they forget, 1. That the great Author of our being has appointed this as a means for inclining the heart to himself, Isa. 55: 6, 7. Luke 14: 17, 23.—2. That they who thus address men, do not suppose that there is virtue in the exhortation itself to effect the end, but that its energy depends on God alone, 1 Cor. 15: 10.—3. That the Scriptures enjoin ministers to exhort men, that is, to rouse them to duty, by proposing suitable motives, Isa. 58: 1. 1 Tim. 6: 2. Heb. 3: 13. Rom. 12: 8.—4. That it was the constant practice of prophets, apostles, and Christ himself, Isa. 1: 17. Jer. 4: 14. Ezek. 37: Luke 13: 3. 3: 18. Acts 11: 23. "The express words," says a good divine, "of scriptural invitations, exhortations, and promises, prove more effectual to encourage those who are ready to give up their hopes, than all the consolatory topics that can possibly be substituted in their place. It is, therefore, much to be lamented that pious men, by adhering to a supposed systematical exactness of expression, should clog their addresses to sinners with exceptions and limitations, which the Spirit of God did not see good to insert. They will not say that the omission was an oversight in the inspired writers; or admit the thought for a moment, that they can improve on their plan; why then cannot they be satisfied to 'speak according to the oracles of God,' without affecting a more entire consistency? Great mischief has thus been done by very different descriptions of men, who undesignedly concur in giving Satan an occasion of suggesting to the trembling inquirer that perhaps he may persevere in asking, seeking, and knocking, with the greatest earnestness and importunity, and yet finally be cast away."—Hend. Buck.

EXISTENCE OF GOD. The methods usually followed in proving the existence of God are two; the first called argumentum à priori, which beginning nih he cause descends to the effect; the other, argumentum à posteriori, which, from a consideration of the effect, ascends to the cause. The former of these hath been particularly labored by Dr. Samuel Clarke; but after all he has said, the possibility of any one's being convinced by it hath been questioned. The most general proofs are the following: 1. "All nations, heathens, Jews, Mahometans, and Christians, harmoniously consent that there is a God who created, preserves, and governs all things. To this it has been objected, that there have been, at different times and places, men who were atheists, and deniers of a God. But these have been so few, and by their opinions have shown that they rather denied the particular providence than the existence of God, that it can hardly be said to be an exception to the argument stated. And even if men were bold enough to assert it, it would not be an absolute proof that they really believed what they said, since it might proceed from a wish that there were no God to whom they must be accountable for their sin, rather than a belief of it, Ps. 14: 1. It has also been objected, that whole nations have been found in Africa and America that have no notion of a Deity: but this is what has never been proved; on the contrary, upon accurate inspection, even the most stupid Hottentots, Saldanians, Greenlanders, Kamtschatkans, and savage Americans, are found to have some idea of a God."

2. It is argued from the law and light of nature, or from the general readiness of mankind arising from their intellectual constitution, to acquiesce in the truth of his existence, whenever they understand the terms in which it is expressed. Whence could this proceed, even in the minds of such whose affections and carnal interests dispose them to believe the contrary, if there were no impression made by the contemplation of nature on their hearts? Admitting that there are no innate ideas in the minds of men, an inspired apostle assures us that even the gentiles, destitute of the law of Moses, have the 'work of the law written in their hearts,' Rom. 2: 15.

3. "The works of creation plainly demonstrate the existence of a God. The innumerable alterations and manifest dependence, every where observable in the world, prove that the things which exist in it neither are nor could be from eternity. It is self-evident that they never could form themselves out of nothing, or in any of their respective forms; and that chance, being nothing but the want of design, never did nor could form or put into order any thing; far less such a marvellous and well-connected system as our world is. Though we should absurdly fancy matter to be eternal, yet it could not change its own form, or produce life or reason. Moreover, when we consider the diversified and wonderful forms of creatures in the world, and how exactly those forms and stations correspond with their respective ends and uses; when we consider the marvellous and exact machinery, form and motions of our own bodies; and especially when we consider the powers of our soul, its desires after an infinite good, and its close union with, and incomprehensible operations on our bodies, we are obliged to admit a Creator of infinite wisdom, power and goodness.

4. "It is argued from the support and government of the world. Who can consider the motions of the heavenly luminaries, exactly calculated for the greatest advantage to our earth, and its inhabitants; the exact balancing and regulating of the meteors, winds, rain, snow, hail, vapor, thunder, and the like; the regular and never-failing return of summer and winter, seed-time and harvest, day and night; the astonishing and diversified formation of vegetables; the propagation of herbs, almost every where, that are most effectual to heal the distempers of animal bodies in that place; the almost infinite diversification of animals and vegetables, and their pertinents, that notwithstanding an amazing similarity, not any two are exactly alike, but every form, member, or even feather or hair of animals, and every pile of grass, stalk of corn, herb, leaf, tree, berry, or other fruit, hath something peculiar to itself; the making of animals so sagaciously to prepare their lodgings, defend themselves, provide for their health, produce and protect and procure food for their young; the direction of fishes and fowls to and in such marvellous and long peregrinations at such seasons, and to such places, as best correspond with their own preservation and the benefit of mankind; the stationing of brute animals by sea or land, at less or greater distances, as are most suited to the safety, subsistence, or comfort of mankind, and preventing the increase of prolific animals, and making the less fruitful ones, which are used, exceedingly to abound; the so diversifying the countenances, voices, and hand-writings of men, as best secures and promotes their social advantages; the holding of so equal a balance between males and females, while the number of males, whose lives are peculiarly endangered in war, navigation, &c., is generally greatest; the prolonging of men's lives, when the world needed to be peopled, and now shortening them when that necessity hath ceased to exist; the almost universal provision of food, raiment, medicine, fuel, &c., answerable to the nature of particular places, cold or hot, moist or dry; the management of human affairs relative to societies, government, peace, war, trade, &c., in a manner different from, and contrary to, the carnal policy of those concerned; and especially the strangely similar but diversified creation, preservation, and government of the Jewish and Christian churches; who, I say, can consider all these things, and not acknowledge the existence of a wise, merciful, and good God, who governs the world, and every thing in it?

5. "It is proved from the miraculous events which have happened in the world; such as the overflowing of the earth by a flood; the confusion of languages; the burning of Sodom and the cities about by fire from heaven; the plagues of Egypt; the dividing of the Red sea; raining manna from heaven, and bringing streams of water from flinty rocks; the stopping of the course of the sun, &c. &c.

6. "His existence no less clearly appears from the exact fulfilment of so many and so particularly circumstantiated predictions, published long before the event took place. It is impossible that these predictions, which were so exactly fulfilled in their respective periods, and of the fulfilment of which there are at present thousands of demonstrative and sensible documents in the world, could proceed from any but an all-seeing and infinitely-wise God.

7. "The existence of God further appears from the fearful punishments which have been inflicted upon persons, and especially upon nations, when their immoralities became excessive, and that by very unexpected means and instruments; as in the drowning of the old world; destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; plagues of Pharaoh and his servants; overthrow of Sennacherib and his army; miseries and ruin of the Canaanites, Jews, Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Saracens, Tartars, and others.

8. "Lastly, the existence of God may be argued from the terror and dread which wound the consciences of men, when guilty of crimes which other men do not know, or are not able to punish or restrain, as in the case of Caligula, Nero, and Domitian, the Roman emperors; and this while they earnestly labor to persuade themselves or others that there is no God. Hence their being afraid of thunder, or to be left alone in the dark," &c.

Moses began his writings by supposing the being of a God; he did not attempt to explain it. Although many of the inspired writers asserted his existence, and to discountenance idolatry, pleaded for his perfections, yet no one of them ever pretended to explain the manner of his being. Our duty is clear. We are not commanded nor expected to understand it. All that is required is this:—"He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Heb. 11: 6. EXODUS, (from ex, out, and odos, a way;) the name of the second book of Moses, and is so called in the Greek version because it relates to the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt. It comprehends the history of about a hundred and forty-five years; and the principal events contained in it are, the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt, and their miraculous deliverance by the hand of Moses; their entrance into the wilderness of Sinai; the promulgation of the law, and the building of the tabernacle. (See PENTATEUCH.)—Watson.

EXORCISM; the expelling of devils from persons possessed, by means of conjurations and prayers. The Jews made great pretences to this power. Josephus tells several wonderful tales of the great success of several exorcists. One Eleazer, a Jew, cured many demons, he says, by means of a root set in a ring. This root, with the ring, was held under the patient's nose, and the devil was forthwith evacuated. The most part of conjurors of this class were impostors, each pretending to a secret nostrum or charm which was an overmatch for the devil. Our Savior communicated to his disciples a real power over demons, or at least over the diseases said to be occasioned by demons. (See DEMONIAIC.)

Exorcism makes a considerable part of the superstition of the church of Rome, the ritual of which forbids the exorcising any person without the bishop's leave. The ceremony is performed at the lower end of the church, towards the door. The exorcist first signs the possessed person with the sign of the cross, makes him kneel, and sprinkles him with holy water. Then follow the litanies, psalms, and prayer; after which the exorcist asks the devil his name, and adjures him by the mysteries of the Christian religion not to afflict the person any more; then, laying his right hand on the demoniac's head, he repeats the form of exorcism, which is this: "I exorcise thee, unclean spirit, in the name of Jesus Christ; tremble, O Satan, thou enemy of the faith, thou foe of mankind, who hast brought death into the world; who hast deprived men of life, and hast rebelled against justice; thou seducer of mankind, thou root of all evil, thou source of avarice, discord, and envy." The Romanists likewise exorcise houses and other places supposed to be haunted by unclean spirits; and the ceremony is much the same with that for a person possessed.—Hend. Buck.

EXORDIUM. (See SERMON.)

EXPEDIENCY; the fitness or propriety of means to the attainment of an end. On expediency as the foundation and rule of morals, see Dwight's Theology, ser. xcix.; and Complete Works of Robert Hall, vol. i. 96. ii. 295. (See OBLIGATION.)—Hend. Buck.

EXPERIENCE; knowledge acquired by sensation, consciousness, or trial, without a teacher. It consists in the ideas of things we have seen and felt, and which the judgment has reflected on, to form for itself a rule or method of proceeding for the future.

Christian experience is that knowledge of the nature and power of Christianity, which is acquired by trial. Nothing is more common than to ridicule and despise what is called religious experience as mere enthusiasm. But if religion consist essentially in love to God and man and divine truths, we would ask how it can possibly exist without experience. We are convinced of, and admit the propriety of the term, when applied to those branches of science which are not founded on speculation or conjecture, but on sensible trial. Why, then, should it be rejected, when applied to religion? It is evident, that however beautiful religion may be in theory, its excellency and energy are only truly known and displayed as experienced. A system believed, or a mind merely informed, will produce little good except the heart be affected, and we feel its influence. To experience, then, the religion of Christ, we must not only be acquainted with its theory, but enjoy its power; tranquillizing the conscience, subduing our corruptions, animating our affections, and exciting us to duty. Hence the Scripture calls experience tasting, Ps. 34: 8, feeling, &c.; 1 Thess. 2: 13, &c.

That our experience is always absolutely pure in the present state, cannot be expected. But if it be genuine, it will not fail, through the exercise of Christian diligence, to become more and more pure. The main point therefore is to guard well against mistaking the illusions of the imagination, for the operation of divine truth on the conscience and the heart, 1 Thess. 2: 13. (See AFFECTIONS.)

The most valuable things are most apt to be counterfeited. But Christian experience may be considered as genuine,—1. When it accords with the revelation of God's mind and will, or what he has revealed in his word. Any thing contrary to this, however pleasing, cannot be sound, or produced by divine agency. 2. When its tendency is to promote humility in us: that experience by which we learn our own weakness, and to subdue pride, must be good. 3. When it teaches us to bear with others, and to do them good. 4. When it operates so as to excite us to be ardent in our devotion, and sincere in our regard to God. A powerful experience of the divine favor will lead us to acknowledge the same, and to manifest our gratitude both by constant praise and genuine piety.

Christian experience, however, may be abused. There are some good people who certainly have felt and enjoyed the power of religion, and yet have not always acted with prudence as to their experience. 1. Some boast of their experiences, or talk of them as if they were very extraordinary; whereas, were they acquainted with others, they would find it not so. That a man may make mention of his experience, is no way improper, but often useful; but to hear persons always talking of themselves, seems to indicate a spirit of pride, and that their experience cannot be very deep. 2. Another abuse of experience is, dependence on it. We ought certainly to take encouragement from past circumstances, if we can; but if we are so dependent on past experience as to preclude present exertions, or always expect to have exactly the same assistance in every state, trial, or ordinance, we shall be disappointed. God has wisely ordered it, that though he never will leave his people, yet he will suspend or bestow comfort in his own time; for this very reason, that we may rely on him, and not on the circumstance or ordinance. 3. It is an abuse of experience, when introduced at improper times, and before improper persons. It is true, we ought never to be ashamed of our profession; but to be always talking to irreligious people respecting experience, which they know nothing of, is, as our Savior says, casting pearls before swine. Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; Buck's Treatise on Experience; Gurnall's Christian Armour; Dr. Owen on Psalm cxxx.; Edwards on the Affections, and his Thoughts on the Revival of Religion in New England; Dorney's Contemplations.—Hend. Buck.

EXPERIENCE MEETINGS, are assemblies of religious persons, who meet for the purpose of relating their experience to each other. They are sometimes called covenant and conference meetings. It has been doubted by some, whether these meetings are of any great utility; and whether they do not, in some measure, force people to say more than is true, and puff up those with pride who are able to communicate their ideas with facility; but to this it has been answered, 1. That the abuse of a thing is no proof of the evil of it. 2. That the most eminent saints of old did not neglect this practice, Ps. 56: 16, Mal. 3: 16. 3. That by a wise and prudent relation of experience, the Christian is led to see that others have participated of the same joys and sorrows with himself; he is excited to love and serve God; and animated to perseverance in duty, by finding that others, of like passions with himself, are zealous, active, and diligent. 4. That the Scriptures seem to enjoin the frequent intercourse of Christians for the purpose of strengthening each other in religious services, Heb. 10: 24, 25. Col. 3: 16. Matt. 18: 20. (See CONFERENCE.)—Hend. Buck.

EXPERIMENTAL RELIGION; the connecting link between doctrinal and practical religion. All experimental religion bears some relation to divine truth. If taken in the most general sense for the exercise of spiritual or holy affections, truth, especially evangelical truth, from its interesting nature, when embraced in the spirit, is here the cause, and these exercises are its immediate effects. 1 Thess. 2: 13. Heb. 4: 12. Or if taken more particularly for that proof or trial which we have of divine things as we pass through the vicissitudes of life, it is still, the truth respecting those divine things which is the object of our experience. Rom. 5: 1—5. John 16: 33. James 1: 3, 12. 2 Cor. 1: 5. Heb. 12: 7—11. 10: 32—39. Nothing can be more obvious than that there are manifold truths taught us in the Scriptures, to which we give our assent, and in this sense may be said to know them; but we do not know them experimentally and thoroughly, till we have proved them true by having made the trial. Of this kind are those which relate to the corruption, weakness, and blindness of the human heart—the evil of sin—the preciousness of the Savior—the faithfulness and mercy of God—the sweetness of his word—his all-sufficiency as our portion and happiness, and the like. On the intimate connexion between doctrinal, experimental, and practical religion, the reader will find many valuable thoughts in Fuller's Works, vol. i. p. 626. (See EXPERIENCE.)

EXPIATION; a religious act by which satisfaction or atonement is made for some crime, the guilt removed, and the obligation to punishment cancelled, Lev. 16. (See ATONEMENT; PROPITIATION.)—Hend. Buck.

EXPOSITION; the opening up and interpreting larger portions of Scripture in public discourses. In Scotland, where the practice has long obtained, and still extensively prevails, it is called lecturing. While the selection of striking and insulated texts, which furnish abundant matter for sermons, are calculated, when judiciously treated, to rouse and fix attention, and the discourses founded on them may be more useful to general hearers, especially the careless and unconverted, expository discourses furnish peculiar advantages as it regards the enlargement of the Christian's views of divine truth, and his consequent advancement in the ways of God. By judiciously expounding the Scriptures, a minister may hope to give a clearer exhibition of the great principles of religion in their mutual connexions and diversified bearings, than could otherwise be done. He will have a better opportunity of unfolding the true meaning of those parts of the Bible which are difficult—of bringing a vast variety of topics before his hearers, which may be of the utmost importance to them, but which he could not so conveniently have treated in preaching from detached texts—of exhibiting the doctrines and duties of Christianity in their relative positions—of successfully counteracting and arresting the progress of dangerous errors—and of storing the minds of his people with correct and influential views of divic things. (See Doddridge on Preaching.)

Such a mode of public instruction cannot but prove of great use to a minister's own mind, by rousing his energies, habituating him to close and accurate research, and saving him much of that indecision in the choice of texts which is so much lamented. Unfortunately there exists a strong prejudice against the introduction of expository discourses in the pulpit; but where it has been effected with judgment and prudence, it has almost invariably been found that the great bulk of hearers have soon become decidedly favorable to it.—Hend. Buck.

EXTORTION; the act or practice of gaining or acquiring any thing by force. Extortioners are included in the list of those who are excluded from the kingdom of heaven, 1 Cor. 10: 6.—Hend. Buck.

EXTREME UNCTION; one of the sacraments of the Romish church, the fifth in order, administered to people dangerously sick, by anointing them with holy oil, and praying over them.—Hend. Buck.

EYE; the organ of sight. The eye of the soul, in the moral sense, is the intention. By an "evil eye" is usually meant envy, jealousy, grudging, ill-judged parsimony. To keep any thing as the apple, or pupil of the eye, is to preserve it with particular care, Deut. 32: 10. "He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye," (Zech. 2: 8.) attempts to injure me in the tenderest part, which men instinctively defend. Eye-service is peculiar to slaves, who are governed by fear only, and is to be carefully guarded against by Christians, who ought to serve from a principle of duty and affection, Eph. 6: 6. Col. 3: 22. The lust of the eyes, or the desire of the eyes, comprehends every thing that curiosity, vanity, &c., seek after; every thing that the eyes can present to men given up to their passions, 1 John 2: 16. "Cast ye away every man the abomination of his eyes," (Ezek. 20: 7, 8.) let not idols seduce you.

2. We read, (Matt. 6: 22.) "the light of the body is the eye; if therefore thine eye be single," (aplaus) "thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be darkened." In the natural eye, if the object of attention be single, and the humors clear, the light will act correctly; but if there be a divided aim, or a film over the cornea, or a cataract, or a skin between any of the humors, the rays of light will never make any distinct impression on the internal seat of sight, the retina. By analogy, therefore, if the moral eye, the intention of the soul, be singly to serve God and to secure heavenly treasures, it may be considered as enlightening and directing the whole of a person's actions; but if it be perverse, malign, biassed by prejudices, or drawn aside by improper views, and especially if it be divided between God and the world, it darkens the understanding, perverts the conduct, and suffers a man to be misled by his unwise and unruly passions.

3. The practice of sealing up the eyes, and stupifying a criminal with drugs, seems to have been contemplated by the prophet Isaiah, 44: 18. "Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes, lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert and be healed." (See BLINDNESS.)

4. Females in the East used to paint their eyes, or rather their eyelids. As large black eyes were thought the finest, the women, to increase their lustre, and to make them appear larger, tinged the corner of their eyelids with the impalpable powder of antimony or of black lead. This was supposed also to give the eyes a brilliancy and humidity, which rendered them either sparkling or languishing, as suited the various passions. The method of performing this among the women in the eastern countries at the present day, as described by Russel, is by a cylindrical piece of silver or ivory, about two inches long, made very smooth, and about the size of a common probe; this is wet with water, and then dipped into a powder finely levigated, made from what appears to be a rich lead ore, and applied to the eye; the lids are closed upon it while it is drawn through between them. This blacks the inside, and leaves a narrow black rim all round the edge. That this was the method practised by the Hebrew women, we infer from Isaiah 3: 22, where the prophet, in his enumeration of the articles which composed the toilets of the delicate and luxurious daughters of Zion, mentions "the wimples and the crising pins," or bodkins for painting the eyes. The satirist Juvenal describes the same practice:—

*Ille supercilium madida fuligine tinctum
Obliqua producit acu, pingitque trementes
Attollens oculos.*

SAT. II.

"These with a tiring-pin their eyebrows dye, Till the full arch give lustre to the eye."

5. The passage, Psalm 123: 2. derives a striking illustration from the customs of the East. Maundrell observes, that the servants in Turkey stand round their master and his guests in deep silence and perfect order, watching every motion. Pococke says, that in Egypt, the master commands them by signs. De la Motraye says, that the eastern ladies are waited on even at the least wink of the eye, or motion of the fingers, and that in a manner not perceptible to strangers.—Watson.

EZEKIEL, like his contemporary Jeremiah, was of the sacerdotal race. He was carried away captive to Babylon with Jeboiachim, king of Judah, B. C. 598, and was placed with many others of his countrymen upon the river Chebar in Mesopotamia, where he was favored with the divine revelations contained in his book. He began to prophesy in the fifth year of his captivity, and is supposed to have prophesied about twenty-one years. The boldness with which he censured the idolatry and wickedness of his countrymen is said to have cost him his life; but his memory was greatly revered, not only by the Jews, but also by the Medes and Persians.

The book which bears his name may be considered under the five following divisions: the first three chapters contain the glorious appearance of God to the prophet, and his solemn appointment to his office, with instructions and encouragements for the discharge of it. From the fourth to the twenty-fourth chapter inclusive, he describes, under a variety of visions and similitudes, the calamities impending over Judea, and the total destruction of the temple and city of Jerusalem, by Nebuchadnezzar, occasionally predicting another period of yet greater desolation, and more general dispersion. From the beginning of the twenty-fifth to the end of the thirty-second chapter, the prophet foretells the conquest and ruin of many nations and cities, which had insulted the Jews in their affliction; of the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, and Philistines; of Tyre, of Sidon, and Egypt; all of which were to be punished by the same mighty instrument of God's wrath, against the wickedness of man; and in these prophecies he not only predicts events which were soon to take place, but he also describes the condition of these several countries in the remote periods of the world. From the thirty-second to the fortieth chapter, he inveighs against the accumulated sins of the Jews collectively, and the murmuring spirit of his captive brethren - exhorts them earnestly to repent of their hypocrisy and wickedness, upon the assurance that God will accept sincere repentance; and comforts them with promises of approaching deliverance under Cyrus; subjoining intimations of some far more glorious, but distant, redemption under the Messiah, though the manner in which it is to be effected is deeply involved in mystery. The last nine chapters contain a remarkable vision of the structure of a new temple and a new polity, applicable in the first instance to the return from the Babylonian captivity, but in its ultimate sense referring to the glory and prosperity of the universal church of Christ. It ought also to be observed, that the last twelve chapters of this book bear a very strong resemblance to the concluding chapters of the Revelation.

The style of this prophet is characterized by bishop Lowth as bold, vehement, and tragical; as often worked up to a kind of tremendous dignity. He is highly parabolical, and abounds in figures and metaphorical expressions. He may be compared to the Grecian Æschylus; he displays a rough but majestic dignity; an unpolished though noble simplicity; inferior perhaps in originality and elegance to others of the prophets, but unequalled in that force and grandeur for which he is particularly celebrated. He sometimes emphatically and indignantly repeats his sentiments, fully dilates his pictures, and describes the idolatrous manners of his countrymen under the strongest and most exaggerated representations that the license of eastern style would admit. The middle part of the book is in some measure poetical, and contains even some perfect elegies, though his thoughts are in general too irregular and uncontrolled to be chained down to rule, or fettered by language.—Watson; Horne.

EZRON-GEBBER. (See ELATHI.)

EZRA, the author of the book which bears his name, was of the sacerdotal family, being a direct descendant from Aaron, and succeeded Zerubbabel in the government of Judea. This book begins with the repetition of the last two verses of the second book of Chronicles, and carries the Jewish history through a period of seventy-nine years, commencing from the edict of Cyrus. It is to be observed, that between the dedication of the temple and the departure of Ezra, that is, between the sixth and seventh chapters of this book, there was an interval of about fifty-eight years, during which nothing is here related concerning the Jews, except that, contrary to God's command, they intermarried with gentiles. This book is written in Chaldee from the eighth verse of the fourth chapter to the twenty-seventh verse of the seventh chapter. It is probable that the sacred historian used the Chaldee language in this part of his work, because it contains chiefly letters and decrees written in that language, the original words of which he might think it right to record; and indeed the people, who were recently returned from the Babylonian captivity, were at least as familiar with the Chaldee as they were with the Hebrew tongue.

Till the arrival of Nehemiah, Ezra had the principal authority in Jerusalem. Josephus says that Ezra was buried at Jerusalem; but the Jews believe that he died in Persia, in a second journey to Artaxerxes. His tomb is shown there in the city of Zamuza. He is said to have lived nearly one hundred and twenty years.

Ezra was the restorer and publisher of the holy Scriptures, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. 1. He corrected the errors which had crept into the existing copies of the sacred writings by the negligence or mistake of transcribers. 2. He collected all the books of which the holy Scriptures then consisted, disposed them in their proper order, and settled the canon of Scripture for his time. 3. He added throughout the books of his edition what appeared necessary for illustrating, connecting, or completing them; and of this we have an instance in the account of the death and burial of Moses, in the last chapter of Deuteronomy. In this work he was assisted by the same Spirit by which they were at first written. 4. He changed the ancient names of several places become obsolete, and substituted for them new names, by which they were at that time called. 5. He wrote out the whole in the Chaldee character; that language having grown into use after the Babylonish captivity. The Jews have an extraordinary esteem for Ezra, and say that if the law had not been given by Moses, Ezra deserved to have been the legislator of the Hebrews. (See BIBLE; CANON).—Watson.

F.

FABIAN; bishop of Rome, in the middle of the third century. He was the first person of eminence who felt the severity of the persecution under the emperor Decius. On account of Fabian's integrity, the deceased emperor Philip had committed his treasure to his care. But Decius not finding so much as his avarice led him to expect, determined to wreak his vengeance on the good bishop. He was accordingly seized, and beheaded, January 20, A. D. 250.—Fox.

FABLE; a fiction, destitute of truth. St. Paul exhorts Timothy and Titus to shun profane and Jewish fables, (1 Tim. 4: 7. Titus 1: 14.) as having a tendency to seduce men from the truth. By these fables some understand the reveries of the Gnostics; but the fathers generally, and after them most of the modern commentators, interpret them of the vain traditions of the Jews; especially concerning meats and other things, to be abstained from as unclean, which our Lord also styles "the doctrines of men," Matt. 15: 9. This sense of the passages is confirmed by the context. It includes also heathen mythology.

In another sense, the word is taken to signify an apology, or instructive tale, intended to convey truth under the concealment of fiction; as Jotham's fable of the trees, (Judges 9: 7—15.) no doubt by far the oldest fable extant. (See PARABLE.)

FABRICIUS, (JOHN ALBERT, D. D.) one of the most learned and laborious men of his age, was born at Leipsic, Nov. 11, 1663. He lost his parents at ten years of age, but was sent to study at Quedlinburg; where, by accidentally reading Barthius' Adversaria, he was inspired with an incredible ardor for letters. After his return from Leipsic, he devoted himself seven years to the ancient authors. He went to Hamburg in 1693, and spent five years with Mr. Mayer, dividing his time between preaching and study, till he was chosen professor of eloquence in that city. In 1719, the landgrave of Hesse Cassel offered him the first professorship of divinity at Giessen, and the place of superintendent over the churches of the Augsburg confession, which he would have accepted, but the magistrates of Hamburg augmented his salary for the sake of keeping him, so that no offer of preferment could afterwards prevail with him to leave them. After a life spent in the severest application to benefit the world, he died at Hamburg, April 3, 1736, with the character of the most amiable, as well as learned of men.

His principal works are Bibliotheca Latina; Bibliotheca Græca; Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti; Bibliographia Antiquaria; Delectus Argumentorum et Syllabus Scriptorum, &c.; Salutaris Lux Evangelii, &c. By these, and many other smaller works, Fabricius has laid the whole learned and religious world under the greatest obligations; since he has contributed more than perhaps any other man ever did to abridge the drudgery of scholars.—Middleton, vol. iv. 258.

FACE. Moses begs of God to show him his face, or to manifest his glory; He replies, "I will make all my goodness pass before thee," and "I will proclaim my name; "but my face thou canst not see; for there shall no man see it and live!" The persuasion was very prevalent in the world, that no man could support the sight of Deity, Genesis 16: 13. 32: 30. Exodus 20: 19. 24: 11.

Judges 6: 22, 23. We read that God spake mouth to mouth with Moses, even apparently, and not in dark speeches, Numbers 12: 8. "The Canaanites have heard that thou art among thy people, and seen face to face," Numbers 14: 14. God talked with the Hebrews "face to face out of the midst of the fire," Deut. 5: 4. All these places are to be understood simply, that God so manifested himself to the Israelites, that he made them hear his voice as distinctly as if he had appeared to them face to face; but not that they actually saw more than the cloud of glory which marked his presence.

The face of God denotes sometimes the frown of his anger: "The face of the Lord is against them that do evil." "As wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish before the face of God," Psalm 68: 2. To turn the face upon any one, especially when connected with the light or shining of the countenance, i. e. the beaming smile, are beautiful representations of the divine kindness and condescension. To regard the face of any one, is to have respect of persons, Prov. 28: 21.

The apostle, speaking of the difference between our knowledge of God here and in heaven, says, "Now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face," (1 Cor. 13: 12.) by which he shows the vast difference between our seeing or knowing God and divine things by an imperfect revelation to faith, and by direct vision. This observation of the apostle is rendered the more striking, when it is recollected that the Roman glass was not fully transparent as ours, but dull and clouded. Of this specimens may be seen in the glass vessels taken out of Pompeii.—Watson.

FAGIUS, (PAULUS,) in the German language called Buchlin, a learned divine, was born at Reinzaubern, in 1504. His studies were pursued at Heidelberg and Strasburgh. At the latter place he was obliged to have recourse to teaching others to support himself. He became a great proficient in Hebrew, a branch of learning which led him into close acquaintance with Capito, Hedio, Bucer, Zellius, and other learned reformers. In 1537, he entered the sacred ministry, and became a sedulous preacher. His Hebrew learning was often employed in confutation of the Jews, so that it was said of him, that "from Paul to Paul, no one had appeared like this Paul."

In 1541, when the plague began to rage in Isna, he publicly rebuked those of the wealthy classes, who forsook the place without making provision for the relief of the poor, and himself visited the sick in person, and administered spiritual comfort to them day and night, and yet escaped the distemper. Capito having fallen a victim at Strasburgh, the senate of that city called Fagius to succeed him, which he did, until Frederic II. the elector palatine, intending a reformation in his churches, called him to Heidelberg, and made him professor there. The emperor however, prevailing against the elector, put a stop to the reformation. Fagius, however, published many books for the promotion of Hebrew learning, which were highly approved, even by Scaliger, who confessed him to be the first Hebrew scholar of his time among Christians. He was also an excellent orator as well as scholar.

His father dying in 1548, and persecution being stirred up against him by the papists, he accepted the invitation of Cramer, and came over to England with Bucer. It was intended to settle them at Cambridge, to carry on together the translation and illustration of the Scriptures; but this plan was frustrated by their sudden death. Fagius died peacefully at Cambridge, November 13, 1550, aged 45.

His character as a Christian was distinguished for humility, meekness, fidelity, and affection. "Pray for me," said he to his friends in time of persecution; "I am but a man, and even Peter fell."—Middleton, vol. i. 260.

FAIL; to grow weak and inefficient; to fall short; to cease; to perish, Gen. 47: 16. Ps. 142: 4. God doth not fail, nor forsake his people; he always directs, supports, and protects them, Josh. 1: 6. Promises would fail if they were not accomplished to their full extent. Josh. 21: 45. Men's hearts or spirits fail, when they are exceedingly grieved, discouraged, and filled with fear. Psalms 40: 12. and 70: 26.—Brown.

FAINT; (1.) to lose vigor, courage, activity, and hope, by reason of hunger, thirst, fear, toil, distress. Ps. 27: 13. Gal. 6: 9. (2.) To long with such earnestness, that one is exhausted by the energy of his desires. Ps. 84: 2. My soul fainteth for thy salvation; I desire it so intensely, that I sink under the delay of it. Ps. 119: 81.—Brown.

FAIR; beautiful, lovely. Christ is fairer than the children of men; in his divine nature he is infinitely lovely; in his human he is transcendently so, it being that holy thing; and in his whole office, relations, appearance, and works, he is unspeakably glorious, and in him the perfections of God shine with unmatched lustre and brightness. The Hebrew word is of a double form, to mark the astonishing degree of his loveliness. Ps. 45: 2.—Brown.

FAIR-HAVENS, (Acts 27: 8.) is called by Stephen, the geographer, "the fair shore." It was, probably, an open kind of road, not so much a port as a bay, which did not afford more than good anchorage for a time, on the south-east part of Crete. Jerome and others speak of it as a town on the open shore.—Calmet.

FAITH, is credit given to a declaration or promise, on the authority of the person who makes it, whether it be directly expressed or only implied. When our Lord said to the nobleman of Capernaum, "Thy son liveth, the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken, and went his way," confident that he would find his son alive and well. John 4: 50. When Jesus said to the blind man, "Go, wash in the pool of Siloam," the man believed the assurance implied in our Lord's injunction, that he would by this means receive his sight; "therefore he went his way, and washed, and came again seeing," John 9: 7. The term faith is used in the same sense in common language. Inquiring the road, I am told that the right hand path is the safest and easiest. On the faith of this information, that is, giving credit to my informant, I take the road recommended to me. A friend sends me a message, requesting me to meet him at a certain place; on the faith of his implied promise that he will meet me there, I repair to the place appointed. A known impostor assures me that, by following his direction, and paying him well for his advice, I shall enjoy long life and prosperity: I have no faith in such assurances; that is, I give no credit to such declarations, therefore I pay no regard to them.

2. The greater part of our knowledge is derived from the information of others, and depends on the credit we give to their testimony. Hence, to believe and to know are sometimes used indiscriminately, (see John 3: 36—compare with John 17: 3.) not as though knowledge and faith were synonymous terms, but because knowledge founded on testimony supposes credit given to testimony.

3. Faith is distinguished from sight or observation. It is one way in which we become acquainted with things "not seen," Heb. 11: 1. The testimony of another, received and credited, is the means by which we obtain the knowledge of things which are not the subject of our own observation. Hence believers are said to "walk by faith, not by sight."

4. Faith is distinguished from presumption, which is confidence without sufficient warrant. When the Israelites travelled through the channel of the Red sea, they believed the divine promise, that they would obtain a safe passage, Exodus 14: 16. But the Egyptians had no such promise given them: they had no declaration to credit; therefore it was not faith, but presumption, that influenced them in adventuring to follow the Israelites through the same route, Heb. 11: 9. While the Israelites believed the divine promise of protection and success, they went boldly on against their enemies. But when they ceased to believe the Lord, (Num. 14: 11.) their courage failed them, Num. 14: 3. And when the divine promise was withdrawn, on account of their unbelief and disobedience, (Num. 14: 42.) it was no longer faith, for they had now no declaration to credit, but presumption, that induced them to go against their enemies, Num. 14: 44.

5. Faith in God is the belief of God's declarations. This may refer to any thing revealed or asserted on divine authority; whether relating to the past, (Heb. 11: 3.) to the present, (Heb. 11: 6.) or to the future, Heb. 11: 7.

Faith in those divine declarations which contain a promise of future good, is the same with trust in God.

6. Faith in Jesus Christ is an exclusive reliance on Him for salvation, founded on the belief of those declarations of Scripture which respect the person, offices, and promises of Christ as the Savior of sinners.

7. If the thing declared and proposed to our faith be a matter of no importance, and fitted to excite no interest, the belief of it will produce no sensible effect, and will admit of no direct evidence. An observer cannot discover whether the thing reported meets with credit or not. But if the matter asserted appear to be of importance, it will, when believed, excite emotion, and perhaps prompt to action. If not believed, whatever be its importance, it will produce neither action nor emotion.

8. The unequivocal expression of the emotions, accompanying the belief of an interesting declaration, or the action prompted by such belief, is the outward evidence of faith. An example of faith, accompanied by corresponding emotion, and that emotion expressed in appropriate language, occurs in Acts 2: 36, 37. Peter had protested to the people of Jerusalem, "Let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." When the multitude heard this declaration, believing its truth, they were "pricked in the heart." This was the emotion that accompanied their belief, and they cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Here was the expression of their emotion, and the evidence of their faith. Again, (Heb. 11: 7.) Noah being warned by God of his determination to punish the wickedness of mankind, and instructed to build an ark, which God assured him would prove the means of preserving himself and his family, believed these divine declarations, and, "being moved with fear" of God's judgments; here was the emotion accompanying his faith; he prepared an ark, &c. Here was the action consequent upon his faith; and both the emotion and the action corresponded to the object of his belief, and evidenced the reality of his faith. A similar instance of faith, and its evidence, we have in the case of the Ninevites, Jon. 3: 5, &c.

9. The want of faith, or, unbelief, is proved by the want of the emotion or action corresponding to the object which is proposed to our belief. Thus, (Gen. 19: 14.) when Lot warned his sons-in-law of the impending destruction of their city, and urged them to consult their safety by a timely departure, they believed him not; therefore they felt no fear of the approaching calamity, nor used any means to escape it. We have a striking example, both of faith and of unbelief, in the same circumstances, evidenced by corresponding, but opposite consequences, in the conduct of the Egyptians, Ex. 9: 20, 21. When Moses had told them that the Lord would send a grievous storm of hail, which would destroy every creature on whom it should fall, and warned them to gather in their servants and cattle from the field, we read that "he that feared the word of the Lord," because he believed Moses' declaration, "made his cattle and servants flee into the houses;" whereas he that did not credit Moses' declaration, and, therefore, "regarded not the word of the Lord, left his servants and cattle in the field."

10. As God's word is true, and his promises sure, whoever believes his word, and trusts his promises, will not be disappointed. Hence there is a constant connexion between faith and success. Of many instances of this kind referred to in Heb. 11: 32-34, we shall notice only one. Gideon was encouraged by an assurance of success against the enemies of his country: "Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites; have not I sent thee?" And afterwards by a more special promise: "By the three hundred men that lapped, will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into your hand." Gideon, confiding in the divine promise, attacked and discomfited his enemies. He believed God, and, accordingly to his faith, he acted, and he succeeded, Judg. 6: 7.

11. A similar connexion subsists between unbelief and failure. The Israelites had a divine promise of conquering and possessing the land of Canaan. Had they uniformly believed this promise, and advanced boldly against the inhabitants, as Joshua and Caleb urged them, (Num. 14:) they would infallibly have prospered. But when they doubted the word of the Lord, and kept back through fear, the consequence was, that they did not attack or expel the Canaanites, nor get possession of their territory. Thus the apostle accounts for their failure: "So we see that they could not enter in, because of unbelief," Heb. 3: 19.

12. They who believed God's promise of temporal blessings, and ventured on it, obtained their object, Heb. 11: 33, 34. So they who believe the doctrines and promises of the gospel, and trust their souls in the Redeemer's hands, shall obtain eternal life, John 3: 14-16.

13. That faith in Christ which in the New Testament is connected with salvation, combines assent with reliance, belief with trust. "Whatsoever ye ask the Father in my name," that is, in dependence upon my interest and merits, "he shall give it you." Christ was preached both to Jews and Gentiles as the object of their trust, because he was preached as the only true sacrifice for sin; and they were required to renounce their dependence upon their own accustomed sacrifices, and to transfer that dependence to his death and mediation,—and "in his name shall the Gentiles trust." He is said to be set forth as a propitiation, "through faith in his blood;" which faith can neither merely mean assent to the historical fact that his blood was shed by a violent death; nor mere assent to the general doctrine that his blood had an atoning quality; but as all expiatory offerings were trusted in as the means of propitiation both among Jews and Gentiles, faith or trust was now to be exclusively rendered to the blood of Christ, as the divinely appointed sacrifice for sin, and the only refuge of the true penitent.

14. This appears to be the plain scriptural representation of this doctrine; and we may infer from it, (1.) That the faith by which we are justified is not a mere assent to the doctrines of the gospel, which leaves the heart unmoved and unaffected by a sense of the evil and danger of sin and the desire of salvation, although it supposes this assent; nor, (2.) Is it that more lively and cordial assent to, and belief in, the doctrine of the gospel, touching our sinful and lost condition, which is wrought in the heart by the Spirit of God, and from which springeth repentance, although this must precede it; nor, (3.) Is it only the assent of the mind to the method by which God justifies the ungodly by faith in the sacrifice of his Son, although this is an element of it; but it is a hearty concurrence of the will and affections with this plan of salvation, which implies a renunciation of every other refuge, and an actual trust in the Savior, and personal apprehension of his merit: such a belief of the gospel by the power of the Spirit of God as leads us to come to Christ, to receive Christ, to trust in Christ, and to commit the keeping of our souls into his hands, in humble confidence of his ability and his willingness to save us.

15. This is that qualifying but not meritorious condition to which the promise of God annexes justification; that without which justification would not take place; and in this sense it is that we are justified by faith; not by the merit of faith, but by faith instrumentally as this condition: for its connexion with the benefit arises from the merits of Christ, and the promise of God. If Christ had not merited, God had not promised; if God had not promised, justification had never followed upon this faith; so that the indissoluble connexion of faith and justification is from God's institution, whereby he hath bound himself to give the benefit upon performance of the condition. Yet there is a fitness in this faith to be the condition; for no other act can receive Christ as a Priest propitiating and pleading the propitiation, and the promise of God for his sake to give the benefit. As receiving Christ and the gracious promise in this manner, it acknowledgeth man's guilt, and so man renounceth all righteousness in himself, and honoreth God the Father, and Christ the Son, the only Redeemer. It glorifies God's mercy and free grace in the highest degree. It acknowledgeth on earth, as it will be perpetually acknowledged in heaven, that the whole salvation of sinful man, from the beginning to the last degree thereof, whereof there shall be no end, is from God's freest love, Christ's merit and intercession, his own gracious promise, and the power of his own Holy Spirit.

16. Faith in Christ, in respect of its reality and efficacy, may be called living faith; whereas its counterfeit, which can have no efficacy, is properly called dead faith, James 2: 17. This dead or unproductive faith is not a different kind of faith from the true; it is, strictly speaking, not faith at all, even as a counterfeit piece of money is not money, or as a dead man is no man. Faith in Christ, in respect of the blessings connected with it, is called justifying, or saving faith, Rom. 5: 1. Eph. 2: 8. In respect of its effects on the heart and dispositions, it is purifying or sanctifying faith, Acts 15: 9. In respect of its object, it is "the faith of the Son of God," or "the faith of Christ," Gal. 2: 16, 20. In respect of its author, "it is the gift of God," Eph. 2: 8. To "live by faith," or "walk by faith," is to have the life regulated by an habitual prevailing regard to those doctrines, and invisible realities which are revealed to us in Scripture. A person may be said to live a life of faith, when the influence of spiritual invisible objects prevails in regulating his judgment, his affections and his conduct.

17. There cannot be a more direct proof of the inveterate blindness and hardness of the human heart than this,—that we do not believe many things which God declares, even when we are convinced that it is he that speaks. Yet that this is the fact, we are assured by him who knows what is in man, and who cannot lie, 1 Cor. 2: 14. John 3: 11, 12. Eph. 2: 8. 4: 18. One cannot conceive more audacious impiety than thus to discredit the God of truth, and, in effect, to "make him a liar;" 1 John 5: 10.

18. Though there is much guilt and depravity in unbelief, it does not follow that there is merit in faith. A man cannot claim reward for simply believing that to be true, which he knows God has affirmed. So that when our justification is made to depend on our believing the truth, nothing can more expressly preclude every plea of merit on our part, Rom. 4: 16.

19. Faith, in Scripture, is sometimes taken for the truth and faithfulness of God, Rom. 3: 3; and it is also taken for the persuasion of the mind as to the lawfulness of things indifferent, Rom. 14: 22, 23; and it is likewise put for the doctrine of the gospel, which is the object of faith, Acts 24: 24. Phil. 1: 27. Jude 3; for the belief and profession of the gospel, Rom. 1: 8; and for fidelity in the performance of promises.—*Hend. FAITH; a Christian female of Acquaintain, in France, and a martyr of the third century. Being informed that Dacian, the Roman governor of Gaul, in the time of Maximian, who was very active in persecuting the Christians, designed to apprehend her, she voluntarily surrendered herself as a prisoner. Continuing on trial inflexible in her faith, she was ordered to be broiled alive on a gridiron, and then beheaded. This horrible sentence was executed, A. D. 287.—Foz.

FAITH, (ARTICLE OF.) (See MERITS.)

FAITH, (CONFESSION OF.) (See CONFESSION.)

FAITH, (FATHERS OF THE,) an ecclesiastical order founded by Paccanari, a Tyrolese enthusiast, and formerly a soldier of the pope, under the patronage of the archduchess Mariana. It was composed mostly of Jesuits, and put in operation at Rome, as a new form of the society of Jesus; but they were never recognised by the secret superiors of the ancient Jesuits as their brethren.—Hend. Buck.

FAITH, (IMPLICIT.) (See IMPLICIT FAITH.)

FAITHFUL, an appellation given in Scripture to professing Christians, to all who had been baptized in token of the obedience of faith; and it is used to this day in that application in ecclesiastical language. See 1 Cor. 4: 17. Eph. 6: 21. Col. 4: 9. 1 Pet. 5: 12. Acts 16: 1, 15. 2 Cor. 6: 15. 1 Tim. 5: 16. and many other passages.—Calnet.

FAITHFULNESS. (See FIDELITY.)

FAITHFULNESS, (MINISTERIAL.) (See PASTOR.)

FAITHFULNESS OF GOD, is that perfection of his nature whereby he infallibly fulfils his designs, or performs his word. It appears, says Dr. Gill, in the performance of what he has said with respect to the world in general, that it shall not be destroyed by a flood, as it once was, and for a token of it has set his bow in the clouds; that the ordinances of heaven should keep their due course, which they have done for almost 6000 years, exactly and punctually; that all his creatures should be supported and provided for, and the elements all made subservient to that end, which we find to do so according to his sovereign pleasure, Gen. 9. Isa. 54: 9. Ps. 145. Deut. 11: 14, 15. 2 Pet. 3.

2. It appears in the fulfilment of what he has said with respect to Christ. Whoever will take the pains to compare the predictions of the birth, poverty, life, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, with the accomplishment of the same, will find a striking demonstration of the faithfulness of God.

3. It appears in the performance of the promises which he has made to his people. In respect to temporal blessings, 1 Tim. 4: 8. Ps. 84: 11. Is. 33: 16. 2. To spiritual, 1 Cor. 1: 9. In supporting them in temptation, 1 Cor. 10: 13. Encouraging them under persecution, 1 Pet. 4: 12, 13. Isa. 41: 10. Sanctifying afflictions, Heb. 12: 4—12. Directing them in difficulties, 1 Thess. 5: 24. Enabling them to persevere, Jer. 31: 40. Bringing them to glory, 1 John 2: 25.

4. It appears in the fulfilling of his threatenings. The curse came upon Adam according as it was threatened. He fulfilled his threatening to the old world in destroying it. He declared that the Israelites should be subject to his awful displeasure, if they walked not in his ways; it was accordingly fulfilled, Deut. 28. (See IMMUTABILITY.)—Hend. Buck.

FALASHAS; an independent government of Jews, which has long existed in the west of Abyssinia. The name signifies exiles, and the state is called Falashjan. They have their own government, which is allowed by the Nagush of Abyssinia, on condition of their paying a certain tribute. Bruce found there a Jewish king, Gideon,—and a queen, Judith, and about one hundred thousand effective men. They have lost all knowledge of the Hebrew, and use the Old Testament as furnished them in the Gheez language.—Hend. Buck.

FALL OF MAN; the loss of those perfections and that happiness which his Maker bestowed on him at his creation. (See ADAM.) In addition to what is stated on this subject under the article Adam, it may be necessary to establish the literal sense of the account given of man's fall in the book of Genesis.

1. Those who have denied the literal sense entirely, and regarded the whole relation as an instructive mythos, or fable, have, as might be expected, when all restraint of authority was thus thrown off from the imagination themselves adopted very different theories. Thus we have been taught, that this account was intended to teach the evil of yielding to the violence of appetite and to its control over reason; or the introduction of vice in conjunction with knowledge and the artificial refinements of society; or the necessity of keeping the great mass of mankind from acquiring too great a degree of knowledge, as being hurtful to society; or to consider it as another version of the story of the golden age, and its being succeeded by times more vicious and miserable; or as designed, enigmatically, to account for the origin of evil, or of mankind. This catalogue of opinions might be much enlarged: some of them have been held by mere visionaries; others by men of learning, especially by several of the semi-infidel theologians and biblical critics of Germany; nor has our own country been exempt from this class of bold expositors. How to fix upon the moral of "the fable" is, however, the difficulty; and the great variety of opinion is a sufficient refutation of the general notion assumed by the whole class, since scarcely can two of them be found who adopt the same views, after they have discarded the literal acceptation.

2. But that the account of Moses is to be taken as a matter of real history, and according to its literal import, is established by two considerations, against which, as being facts, nothing can successfully be urged. The first is, that the account of the fall of the first pair is a part of a continuous history. Either then the account of the fall must be taken as history, or the historical character of the whole five books of Moses must be unsettled; and if none but infidels will go to the latter consequence, then no one who admits the Pentateuch to be a true history generally, can consistently refuse to admit the story of the fall of the first pair to be a narrative of real events, because it is written in the same style, and presents the same character of a continuous record of events. So conclusive has this argument been felt, that the anti-literal interpreters have endeavored to evade it, by asserting that the part of the history of Moses in question bears marks of being a separate fragment, more ancient than the Pentateuch itself, and transcribed into it by Moses, the author and compiler of the whole. This point is examined and satisfactorily refuted in Holden's learned and excellent work, entitled, "Dissertation on the Fall of Man;" but it is easy to show, that it would amount to nothing, if granted, in the mind of any who is satisfied on the previous question of the inspiration of the holy Scriptures. For two things are to be noted, first, that the inspired character of the books of Moses is authenticated by our Lord and his apostles, so that they must necessarily be wholly true, and free from real contradictions; and, secondly, whether it be an embodied tradition, or the insertion of a more ancient document, (though there is no foundation at all for the latter supposition,) it is obviously a narrative, and a narrative as simple as any which precedes or follows it.

3. The other indisputable fact to which we just now adverted, as establishing the literal sense of the history, is that, as such, it is referred to and reasoned upon in various parts of Scripture. Job 20: 4, 5. 31: 33. 15: 14.

"Eden" and "the garden of the Lord" are also frequently referred to in the prophets. We have the "tree of life" mentioned several times in the Proverbs and in the Revelation. "God," says Solomon, "made man upright." The enemies of Christ and his church are spoken of, both in the Old and New Testaments, under the names of "the serpent," and "the dragon;" and the habit of the serpent to lick the dust is also referred to by Isaiah.

If the history of the fall, as recorded by Moses, were an allegory, or any thing but a literal history, several of the above allusions would have no meaning; but the matter is put beyond all possible doubt in the New Testament, unless the same culpable liberties be taken with the interpretation of the words of our Lord and of St. Paul as with those of the Jewish lawgiver. Matt. 19: 4, 5. 1 Cor. 15: 22. 2 Cor. 11: 3. 1 Tim. 2: 13, 14. Rom. 5: 12—19. When, therefore, it is considered, that these passages are introduced, not for rhetorical illustration, or in the way of classical quotation, but are made the basis of grave and important reasonings, which embody some of the most important doctrines of the Christian revelation, and of important social duties and points of Christian order and decorum; it would be to charge the writers of the New Testament with the grossest absurdity, nay, with even culpable and unworthy trifling, to suppose them to argue from the history of the fall as a narrative, when they knew it to be an allegory. And if we are, therefore, compelled to allow that it was understood as a real history by our Lord and his inspired apostles, those speculations of modern critics, which convert it into a parable, stand branded with their true character of infidel and semi-infidel temerity.

4. The effect of the sin or lapse of Adam, was to bring him under the wrath of God; to render him liable to pain, disease, and death; to deprive him of primeval holiness; to separate him from communion with God, and that spiritual life which was before imparted by God, and on which his holiness alone depended, from the loss of which a total moral disorder and depravation of his soul resulted; and finally to render him liable to everlasting misery. (See ADAM, and ORIGINAL SIN.)

Infidels, it is true, have treated the account of the fall and its effects with contempt, and considered the whole as absurd; but their objections to the manner have been ably answered by a variety of authors; and as to the effects, one would hardly think any body could deny.

5. For that man is a fallen creature, is evident, if we consider his misery as an inhabitant of the natural world;

the disorders of the globe we inhabit, and the dreadful scourges with which it is visited; the deplorable and shocking circumstances of our birth; the painful and dangerous travail of women; our natural uncleanness, helplessness, ignorance, and nakedness; the gross darkness in which we naturally are, both with respect to God and a future state; the general rebellion of the brute creation against us; the various poisons that lurk in the animal, vegetable, and mineral world, ready to destroy us; the heavy curse of toil and sweat to which we are liable; the innumerable calamities of life, and the pangs of death. Again, it is evident, if we consider him as a citizen of the moral world,—his commission of sin, his omission of duty, the triumph of sensual appetites over his intellectual faculties, the corruption of the powers that constitute a good head, the understanding, imagination, memory, and reason; the depravity of the powers which form a good heart,—the will, conscience, and affections; his manifest alienation from God; his amazing disregard even of his nearest relatives; his unaccountable unconcern about himself; his detestable tempers; the general outbreaking of human corruption in all individuals; the universal overflowing of it in all nations. Some striking proofs of this depravity may be seen in the general propensity of mankind to vain, irrational, or cruel diversions; in the universality of the most ridiculous, impious, inhuman, and diabolical sins; in the aggravating circumstances attending the display of this corruption; in the many ineffectual endeavors to stem its torrent; in the obstinate resistance it makes to divine grace in the unconverted; the amazing struggles of good men with it; the testimony of the heathens concerning it; and the preposterous conceit which the unconverted have of their own goodness. FALSEHOOD; untruth, deceit. (See LYING.)
FALSE CHRISTS. (See MESSIAH.)
FAME, sometimes signifies common talk; public report; (Gen. 45: 16.) but ordinarily it means a widely-spread report of one's excellence and of glorious deeds. Zeph. 3: 19. (See REPUTATION.)—Brown.

FAMILIARS OF THE INQUISITION; persons who assist in apprehending such as are accused, and carrying them to prison.—They are assistants to the inquisitor, and called familiars, because they belong to his family. In some provinces of Italy, they are called cross-bearers; and in others, the scholars of St. Peter the Martyr; and wear a cross before them on the outside garment.—They are properly bailiffs of the Inquisition; and the vile office is esteemed so honourable, that noblemen in the kingdom of Portugal have been ambitious of belonging to it. Nor is this surprising, when it is considered that Innocent III. granted very large indulgences and privileges to these familiars; and that the same plenary indulgence is granted by the pope to every single exercise of this office, as was granted by the Lateran council to those who succored the Holy Land. When several persons are to be taken up at the same time, these familiars are commanded to order matters that they may know nothing of one another's being apprehended; and it is related, that a father and his three sons and three daughters, who lived together in the same house, were carried prisoners to the Inquisition, without knowing any thing of one another's being there till seven years afterwards, when they, that were alive were released by an act of faith. (See article, ACT OF FAITH.)—Hend. Buck.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS. (See DIVINATION.)

FAMILY PRAYER. (See PRAYER.)

FAMILY OF LOVE, or FAMILISTS. (See LOVE.)

FAMINE. Scripture records several famines in Palestine, and the neighboring countries, Gen. 12: 10. 26: 1. The most remarkable one was that of seven years in Egypt, while Joseph was governor. It was distinguished for continuance, extent, and severity; particularly, as Egypt is one of the countries least subjected to such a calamity, by reason of its general fertility. (See Prof. Robinson's Bibl. Repository, for Oct. 1832.)

Famine is sometimes a natural effect, as when the Nile does not overflow in Egypt, or rains do not fall in Judea, at the customary seasons, spring and autumn; or when caterpillars, locusts, or other insects destroy the fruits. The prophet Joel notices these last causes of famine. He compares locusts to a numerous and terrible army ravaging the land, Joel 1. Famine was sometimes an effect of God's anger, 2 Kings 8: 1, 2. The prophets frequently threaten Israel with the sword of famine, or with war and famine, evils that generally go together. Amos (8: 11.) threatens another sort of famine: "I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord."—Calmet.

FAN; an instrument used in the East for winnowing corn. Fans are of two kinds; one having teeth, with which they throw up the corn to the wind, that the chaff may be blown away; the other is formed to produce wind when the air is calm, Isa. 30: 24. An allusion to this instrument is found in Matt. 3: 12. to illustrate our Lord's discriminating character as a preacher and as a judge.—Calmet.

FANATICS; enthusiasts, who combine the malign emotions with the fictitious fervors of the imagination, especially those who pretend to revelation and inspiration. The ancients called those fanatici who passed their time in temples (fana), and being often seized with a kind of enthusiasm, as if inspired by the divinity, burst into wild and antic gestures, cutting and slashing their arms with knives, shaking the head, &c. Hence the term was applied to the Quakers, &c. at their first rise, and is now an epithet given to modern false prophets, and enthusiasts; but unjustly to those persons who possess zeal and fervency of devotion, united to Christian benevolence. (See "Fanaticism," by the Author of the Natural History of Enthusiasm.)—Hend. Bock.

FANINUS; a learned Italian of the twelfth century, who embraced the reformed religion, as taught by Peter de Bruis, and Arnold of Brescia. When first apprehended, he was so wrought upon by the persuasions of his friends and family, as to gain his release from prison by a recantation. But the bitter reproaches of conscience he soon found more intolerable than the chains of a prison. He returned from his temporary apostasy to a more zealous avowal and defence of the truths of the reformation, and was again imprisoned. He was offered liberty and life as before, but refused. Being asked why he would persist in a course which would leave his wife and children without a protector, he replied, "I shall not leave them in distress. I have recommended them to the care of an excellent trustee."—"What trustee?"—"Jesus Christ! I think I could not commit them to the care of a better." On the way to execution, being reproached by his enemies for his cheerfulness, when Christ was exceeding sorrowful at the approach of death, he answered, "Christ sustained all manner of pangs and conflicts with death and hell on our account; and by his sufferings freed those who really believe in Him from the fear of them." He was then strangled, his body burnt, and his ashes scattered to the wind.—For.

FAR. God is far from the wicked; he has no friendship with them, is perpetually angry with, and is averse to deliver them, Prov. 15: 29. He is far from their reins; he is not seriously and affectionately thought of, esteemed, loved, or desired by them, Jer. 12: 2. He seems far from his own people when he appears angry with them, hides the comforting views of his countenance, and continues to deny them assistance or relief, Ps. 22: 1. 10: 1. He removes our transgressions far from us when he fully and finally forgives them, that they can never come into judgment against us, Ps. 103: 12. He set the Jewish people far from them when he permitted the Chaldeans to carry them captives into Babylon, a place about six hundred miles east of Jerusalem, Ezek. 7: 20.—Brown.

FAREL, (WILLIAM.) This learned minister of the Protestant church, and most intrepid reformer, was born in Dauphiny, in France, in 1489. He studied at Paris with great success, and was for some time teacher in the college of cardinal Le Moine. He was invited to preach by Bricconnet, bishop of Meaux, in 1521, but in 1523 persecution obliged him to seek his safety out of France.

He retired to Strasburg, where Bucer and Capito welcomed him as a brother; as he was afterwards at Zurich by Zuinglius, at Berne by Haller, and at Basil by Oecolampadius. He was advised to carry the reformed religion into Montbellecard, and succeeded most happily, the duke of Wittenberg giving him his support. He was a man of the most lively zeal, which sometimes led him to excess, and provoked Erasmus against him. In 1528, he was successful in the city of Aigle and the bailiwick of Morat, and also was the means of establishing the reformed religion in Neufchatel in 1530. He was sent as a deputy to the synod of the Waldenses, held in the valley of Angrogne. Hence he went to Geneva and labored with Viret, but was forced to retire till 1534, when he was recalled by the inhabitants who had then renounced popery. He was the great means of fixing Calvin in this city. Both, however, were banished in 1538, and after struggling with a thousand difficulties and dangers, Farel returned to Neufchatel, and resumed his pastoral labors. Here he continued till his death, Sept. 13, 1565, having survived Calvin about one year. He was a man of invincible courage, great piety, learning, innocence of life, and unassuming modesty. He was not so much a writer as a preacher; swords were drawn and bells rung while he was preaching, but in vain; and such was his ardor and force of expression, that "he seemed rather to thunder than to speak." His prayers also were wonderful; his heart seemed to lift the heart of his hearers to heaven.—Middleton, vol. ii. 97.

FARELISTS; a name given by the Papists to the Reformed, on account of their attachment to Farel. (See FAREL.)

FARMER, (REV. HUBB) a learned and eminently useful minister of the Independent denomination, was born in 1714, near Shrewsbury. His ancestors, who were natives of North Wales, were held in high estimation for their religion and virtue. He entered upon his academic studies, under the superintendance of the celebrated Dr. Philip Doddridge. He was one of the doctor's first pupils; and gained his entire esteem and approbation. On leaving Northampton, he became assistant to Mr. David Some. His services, however, proving acceptable to the dissenters in the neighborhood of Walthamstow, a place of worship was soon built, and a congregation assembled, which rapidly increased.

For many years Mr. Farmer labored at Walthamstow, with increasing popularity; many of the more opulent dissenters either took houses or lodgings in the neighborhood, for the purpose of attending on his ministry; so that it was soon found necessary to enlarge the meeting-house in which he preached. Most of this time he occupied both parts of the day; but, on being joined by a suitable colleague, he gave up the afternoon service. As Mr. Farmer declined in years, he gradually relinquished his engagements as a preacher. In 1772 he resigned the afternoon lecture at Salters' Hall, and eight years after, he gave up the Tuesday morning sermon; but he did not leave his church at Walthamstow till a few years later, when he gave up pulpit exercises entirely. He was still in full possession of his mental faculties, and his powers of address had not failed him; he, however, thought some ministers continued too long to exercise their public functions; and through excessive delicacy, he was so unnecessarily anxious to avoid this fault, that he fell into the opposite error. After his retirement from his public labors, he usually spent part of his winters at Bath, from the waters of which he had experienced great benefit. As Mr. Farmer lived for years at a small expense, being never married, and received considerable legacies from some of his deceased friends, as well as liberal supplies from his congregation, it need not excite wonder, that his circumstances were very easy, especially in the latter part of his life. He died on the 5th of February, 1787, aged 72, manifesting to all around his deep humility, lively faith, and animated hope of a blessed immortality.

Mr. Farmer was the author of several works, in which he displayed much learning and critical sagacity, particularly his "Dissertation on Miracles;" "An Inquiry into the Nature and Design of Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness;" and "An Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament," in which he endeavored to prove that these were not cases of real possession, but of persons afflicted with disorders usually attributed to such influence. This publication was answered by the late Mr. Fell, one of the tutors of Homerton academy; and a controversy ensued, in which much acrimony of temper was discovered on both sides. Mr. Farmer was rather of a high spirit and hasty temper; but abating these defects, he was a most estimable man. (See Memoirs of his Life and Writings, by Michael Dodson, Esq.—Jones' Chris. Biog.)

FARNOVIANS; a sect of Socinians, so called from Stanislaus Farnovius, who separated from the other Unitarians in the year 1568. He asserted that Christ had been engendered or produced out of nothing by the Supreme Being, before the creation of this terrestrial globe, and warned his disciples against paying religious worship to the Divine Spirit. This sect did not last long; for having lost their chief, who died in 1615, it was scattered, and reduced to nothing.—Hend. Buck.

FARTHING; a piece of brass money used by the Romans. Our translators give this English to both ASSARION and QUADRANS; but these were different; the assarion was the tenth part of a Roman penny, or about three farthings sterling, being little more than one cent, Matt. 10: 29. The quadrans was equal to two mites, and so is about the fifth part of an English farthing, or half a mill, Mark 12: 42.—Brown.

FASHION. A pattern or form, Ex. 16: 30. To fashion a thing is to give it being or form, Job 10: 8. Ex. 32: 11. To fashion one's self according to former lusts, is to live under their power, and to act according to their sinful inclinations and motions, 1 Pet. 1: 14.—Brown.

FASTING; abstinence from food. Religious fasting consists, 1. "In abstinence from every animal indulgence, and from food, as far as health and circumstances will admit.—2. In the humble confession of our sins to God, with contrition or sorrow for them.—3. An earnest deprecation of God's displeasure, and humble supplication that he would avert his judgments.—4. An intercession with God for such spiritual and temporal blessings upon ourselves and others as are needful." It does not appear that our Savior instituted any particular fast, but left it optional. Any state of calamity and sorrow, however, naturally suggests this.

2. The propriety of it may appear, 1. From many examples recorded in Scripture.—2. By plain and undeniable inferences from Scripture, Matt. 6: 16. 3. From divine commands given on some occasions, though there are no commands which prescribe it as a constant duty.—4. It may be argued from its utility. The end or uses of it are these, 1. A natural expression of our sorrow.—2. A help to devotional exercises.—3. Keeping the body in subjection.—4. It may be rendered subservient to charity.

3. How far or how long a person should abstain from food, depends on circumstances. The great end to be kept in view is, humiliation for, and abstinence from sin.—"It," says Marshall, "abstinence divert our minds, by reason of a gnawing appetite, then you had better eat sparingly, as Daniel in his greatest fast." Dan. 10: 2, 3. They, however, who in times of public distress, when the judgments of God are in the earth, and when his providence seems to call for humiliation, will not relinquish any of their sensual enjoyments, nor deny themselves in the least, cannot be justified; since good men in all ages, more or less, have humbled themselves on such occasions; and reason, as well as Scripture, evidently prove it to be our duty.

4. Although the first Christians, says Dr. Neander, did not by any means retire from the business of life, yet they were accustomed to devote many separate days entirely to examining their own hearts, and pouring them out before God, while they dedicated their life anew to him with uninterrupted prayers, in order that they might again return to their ordinary occupations with a renovated spirit of zeal and seriousness, and with renewed powers of sanctification. These days of holy devotion, days of prayer and penitence, which individual Christians appointed for themselves, according to their individual necessities, were often a kind of fast-days. In order that their sensual feelings might less distract and impede the occupation of their heart with its holy contemplations, they were accustomed on these days to limit their corporeal wants more than usual, or to fast entirely. In the consideration of this, we must not overlook the peculiar nature of that hot climate in which Christianity was first promulgated. That which was spared by their abstinence on these days was applied to the support of the poorer brethren. Matt. 9: 15. 1 Cor. 7: 5. Bennet's Christ. Orat., vol. ii. pp. 18, 25; Tillotson's Sermons, ser. 39; Simpson's Essay on Fasting; Marshall on Sanc. pp. 273, 274.—(See ΡΟΔΑΤΙΟΝ; LENT.)—Hend. Buck; Watson.

FAT. God forbade the Hebrews to eat the fat of beasts offered in sacrifice: "All the fat is the Lord's." It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations, throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood," Lev. 3: 17.

In the Hebrew style, fat signifies not only that of beasts, but also the richer or prime part of other things: "He should have fed them with the finest" (in Hebrew, the fat) "of the wheat." Fat denotes abundance of good things: "I will satiate the souls of the priests with fatness," Jer. 31: 14. "My soul shall be satisfied with marrow and fatness," Psalm 63: 5. The fat of the earth implies its fruitfulness: "God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine," Gen. 27: 28.—Watson.

FATE, (fatum) denotes an inevitable necessity depending upon a superior cause. The word is formed a fando, "from speaking," and primarily implies the same with effatum, viz. a word or decree pronounced by God, or a fixed sentence whereby the Deity has prescribed the order of things, and allotted to every person what shall befall him. The Greeks called it eimarmenē, as it were a chain or necessary series of things indissolubly linked together. (See PROVIDENCE; NECESSITY.)—Hend. Buck.

FATHER. This word, besides its common acceptance, is taken in Scripture for grandfather, great-grandfather, or the founder of a family, how remote soever. So the Jews in our Savior's time called Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob their fathers. Jesus Christ is called the Son of David, though David was many generations distant from him. By father is likewise understood the institutor, teacher, or prime example of a certain profession. Jabal "was father of such as dwell in tents, and such as have cattle." Jubal "was father of all such as handle the harp and organ," or flute, &c. Gen. 4: 20, 21. On a somewhat similar principle, the devil is called the father of the wicked, and the father of lies, John 8: 44. He deceived Eve and Adam; he introduced sin and falsehood; he inspires his followers with his spirit and sentiments. On a like principle, Abraham is the father of the faithful, the father of the circumcision. He is called also the "father of many nations," because many people sprung from him; as the Jews, Ishmaelites, Arabs, &c. (See ΑΝΘΡΩΠΟΣ, ΑΒΡΑ.)—Watson.

FATHERS; a term of honor applied to the first and most eminent writers of the Christian church. Those of the first century are called apostolical fathers; those of the first three centuries, and till the council of Nice, Antenicene; and those later than that council, Post-Nicene.

Learned men are not unanimous concerning the degree of esteem which is due to these ancient fathers. Some represent them as the most excellent guides, whilst others place them in the very lowest rank of moral writers, and treat their precepts and decisions as perfectly insipid, and, in many respects, pernicious. It appears, however, incontestable, that, in the writings of the primitive fathers, are many sublime sentiments, judicious thoughts, and several things well adapted to form a religious temper, and to excite pious and virtuous affections. At the same time, it must be confessed, that, after the earliest age, they abound still more with precepts of an excessive and unreasonable austerity, with stoical and academical dogmas, with vague and indeterminate notions, and, what is still worse, with decisions absolutely false, and in evident opposition to the commands of Christ. Though the judgment of antiquity in some disputable points may certainly be useful, yet we ought never to consider the writings of the fathers as of equal authority with the Scriptures. In many cases they may be deemed competent witnesses, but we must not confide in their verdict as judges. As biblical critics they are often fanciful and injudicious, and their principal value consists in this, that the succession of their writings enables us to prove the existence and authenticity of the sacred books, up to the age of the apostles.

The following is a list of the entire fathers: Contemporaries of the apostles, Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp. Papias, A. D. 116; Justin Martyr, 140, Dionysius of Corinth, 170; Tatian, 172; Hegesippus, 173; Melito, 177; Irenæus, 178; Athenagoras, 178; Miltiades, 180; Theophilus, 181; Clement of Alexandria, 194; Tertullian, 200; Minutius Felix, 210; Ammonius, 220; Origen, 230; Firmilian, 233; Dionysius of Alexandria, 247; Cyprian, 248; Novatus, or Novatian, 251; Arnobius, 306; Lactantius, 306; Alexander of Alexandria, 313; Eusebius, 315; Athanasius, 326; Cyril of Jerusalem, 348; Hilary, 354; Epiphanius, 368; Basil, 370; Gregory of Nazianzen, 370; Gregory of Nyssa, 370; Optatus, 370; Ambrose, 374; Philaster, 380; Jerome, 392; Theodore of Mopstestia, 394; Rufinus, 397; Augustine, 398; Chrysostom, 398; Sulpitius Severus, 401; Cyril of Alexandria, 412; Theodoret, 423; and Gennadius, 494.

FATHOM, a measure of six feet length. Our sailors have three kinds of fathoms: that of war-ships is six feet; that of merchantships is five and a half; and that of fly-boats and fishing-vessels, it is said, is five feet, Acts 27: 28.—Brown.

FAULT, a slight defect or crime which subjects a person to blame, but not to punishment; a deviation from, or transgression of a rule in some trifling circumstance.

FAVOR OF GOD. (See GRACE.)

FAWCETT, (JOHN, D. D.) was born at Lidget Green, near Bradford, in Yorkshire, Jan. 6th, 1739. Having been early initiated in the common branches of learning, he soon manifested a fondness for reading, eagerly devouring whatever came in his way. Soon after his father's death, at the age of twelve, he was put apprentice to a person in Bradford. The celebrated George Whitefield was at this time in the zenith of his popularity, and young Fawcett had the opportunity of hearing him preach, which made an impression on his mind that was never obliterated. At the age of nineteen, he was baptized on a personal profession of his faith, March 11th, 1758, and became a member of the Baptist church, in Bradford.

He was ordained over a church at Wainsgate, in February, 1764. Here a field of usefulness presented itself, and he made many acquaintances with persons who have since distinguished themselves in the religious world; among whom were Mr. Venn, of Huddersfield; the late Henry Foster, of Clerkenwell; John Thornton, Esq. of Clapham; Dan Taylor, of Mile End, &c. &c.

In 1772, he visited London, to supply for Dr. Gill, who then, through age and infirmities, was incapacitated for public preaching. He continued in London about two months, and preached fifty-eight times. The doctor dying soon afterwards, Mr. Fawcett was invited to return to London, with a view to a permanent settlement; but though his income from the church at Wainsgate was only 25*l.* per annum, he resisted the tempting offer, and continued with his flock. To help out his scanty pittance of income, however, he now began to take pupils; and in a course of time succeeded in raising a very respectable seminary. Numbers of young ministers had recourse to him for the purpose of improving their education, among whom were the late Mr. Ward, of Serampore, and Mr. Sutcliff, of Olney. In 1774, Mr. Fawcett published "The Sick Man's Friend; or, Views of Death and Eternity realized;" occasioned by an attack of the stone, which brought him to the brink of the grave. On his recovery from this illness, he removed his residence from Wainsgate to Brearley Hall, a much preferable situation for his academy. The increase of the congregation at Wainsgate also led to the erection of a new and more suitable place of worship at Hebden Bridge, in 1777.

Mr. Fawcett had a talent for poetry. In 1792, he published a small volume of "Hymns adapted to Public Worship and Private Devotion." In 1788, he published, "An Essay on Anger," an invaluable little volume. George III. on being presented with a copy, was so much gratified with its contents, that he made the amiable author an offer of serving him in any way he might point out. Mr. Fawcett at the time modestly declined availing himself of the royal munificence; but a most distressing occurrence some time afterwards imposed upon him the painful task of petitioning for the life of a youth, the son of one of his most intimate friends; who, in an unguarded hour, had committed a forgery, for which he was tried and condemned by the laws of his country. The sovereign received the petition, recollected his offer, and graciously extended pardon to the unhappy youth.

Mr. Fawcett afterwards published several other valuable works. And it deserves recording, that most of them were issued from a small printing-office, which he had established in his own house; so that, as occasion served, he was alternately the author, the printer, and the binder, of his literary productions. But the greatest of his undertakings was the "Devotional Family Bible," which he commenced in the month of November, 1807, and completed in about four years; the work forming two large quarto volumes. He died the 25th July, 1817.

Dr. Fawcett was, in a considerable degree, like his brethren, Booth, McLean, and Fuller, self-taught.—He could read the sacred writings in their original languages, and criticise the force of a Greek or Hebrew term; but beyond this, he did not aspire. As a Christian minister, it is scarcely possible to speak of him beyond his merits. His doctrinal sentiments were those of moderate Calvinism; equally free from a tendency to foster pharisaic pride, and to encourage Antinomian licentiousness. And if, as Cicero tells us, "true glory consists in doing what deserves to be written, and in writing what deserves to be read," this honor is due to the character of John Fawcett.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

FEAR, is that uneasiness of mind which arises from an apprehension of danger, attended with a desire of avoiding it. "Fear," says Dr. Watts, "shows itself by paleness of the cheek, sinking of the spirits, trembling of the limbs, hurry and confusion of the mind and thoughts, agonies of nature, and fainting. Many a person has died with fear. Sometimes it rouses all nature to exert itself in speedy flight, or other methods to avoid the approaching evil; sudden terror has performed some almost incredible of this kind."

Fear is of different kinds: 1. There is an idolatrous and superstitious fear, which is called deisdaimonia, a fear of demons, which the city of Athens was greatly addicted to. "I perceive," says the apostle Paul, "that in all things ye are too superstitious," or given to the fear and worship of false deities. 2. There is an external fear of God, an outward show and profession of it, which is taught by the precepts of men; as in the men of Samaria, who pretended to fear the Lord, as the priest instructed them, and yet served their own gods; and such an external fear of God, Job's friends supposed was all that he had, and that even he had cast that off. 3. There is an hypocritical fear, when men make a profession of religion; but only serve him for some sinister end and selfish view, which Satan insinuated was Job's case. "Doth Job fear God for nought?" Job 1: 9. 4. There is a servile fear which they possess who serve God from fear of punishment, and not from love to him. 5. There is a filial fear, such as that of a son to his father. 2 Cor. 7: 1.

Fear is sinful when—1. It proceeds from unbelief or distrust of God. 2. When it ascribes more to the creature than is due; or when we fear our enemies without considering they are under God. 3. When we fear that in God that is not in him, or that he will break his promise, &c. 4. When our fear is immoderate, so as to distract us in our duty. (See next article.) Hend. Buck.

FEAR OF GOD, is that holy disposition or gracious habit formed in the soul by the Holy Spirit, whereby we are inclined to obey all God's commands; and evidences itself—1. By a dread of his displeasure. 2. Desire of his favor. 3. Regard for his excellencies. 4. Submission to his wdl. 5. Gratitude for his benefits. 6. Sincerity in his worship. 7. Conscientious obedience to his commands, Prov. 8: 13. Job 28: 28. Bates's Works, page 913; Gill's Body of Divinity; Dwight's Theology.—Hend. Buck.

FEAR OF DEATH. (See DEATH.)

FEARS. (See DOUBTS.)

FEARFUL. The fearful who shall have their portion in hell, are such as, being destitute of a holy awe of God, have such a slavish fear of him, that they will not dare to come boldly to a throne of grace, and receive his Son and the blessings of the new covenant in him; or those who fear man more than God, Rev. 21: 8. Matt. 10: 28.—Brown.

FEAST, in a religious sense, is a ceremony of feasting and thanksgiving.

The principal feasts of the Jews were the feasts of trumpets, of expiation, of tabernacles, of the dedication, of the passover, of Pentecost, and that of purification. Feasts, and the ceremonies thereof, have made great part of the religion of almost all nations and sects; hence the Greeks, the Romans, Mahometans, and Christians, have not been without them.

Feasts, in the established churches of Christendom, are innovations upon the simplicity of the gospel, which ordains but one Christian feast, viz. the Lord's supper. They are either immovable or movable. Immovable feasts are those constantly celebrated on the same day of the year. The principal of these are Christmas-day, Circumcision, Epiphany, Candlemas, or Purification; Lady-day or the Annunciation, called also the Incarnation and Conception; All Saints and All Souls; besides the days of the several apostles, as St. Thomas, St. Paul. Movable feasts are those which are not confined to the same day of the year. Of these the principal is Easter, which gives law to all the rest, all of them following and keeping their proper distances from it. Such are Palm Sunday, Good Friday, Ash Wednesday, Sexagesima, Ascension day, Pentecost, and Trinity Sunday.

Besides these feasts, which are general, and enjoined by the church, there are others local and occasional, enjoined by the magistrate, or voluntarily set on foot by the people; such are the days of thanksgiving for delivery from war, plagues, &c. such also are the vigils or wakes in commemoration of the dedication of particular churches.

The prodigious increase of feast-days in the Christian church commenced towards the close of the fourth century, occasioned by the discovery that was made of the remains of martyrs, and other holy men, for the commemoration of whom they were established. These, instead of being set apart for pious exercises, were abused, in indolence, voluptuousness, and criminal practices. Many of them were instituted on a pagan model, and perverted to similar purposes. (See HOLY DAY).—Hend. Buck.

FEAST OF ASSES. This was a festival in the Romish church, and was celebrated at Beauvais. They chose a young woman, the handsomest in the town; made her ride on an ass richly harnessed, and placed in her arms a pretty infant. In this state, followed by the bishop and clergy, she marched in procession from the cathedral to the church of St. Stephen; entered into the sanctuary, placed herself near the altar, and then celebrated mass; not forgetting to explain the fine qualities of the animal, and exhorting him to make a devout genuflexion, with a variety of other fooleries.—Hend. Buck.

FEASTS OF LOVE. (See AGAPE.)

FEAULTY, (DANIEL, D. D.) a learned divine of the seventeenth century, was born at Charlton, upon Otmore, March, 1582. While fellow of Corpus Christi college, where he received his education, his admirable method of preaching, his skill in disputation, and other rare accomplishments, were such, that Sir Thomas Edmunds, ambassador of king James to France, chose him as his chaplain. There he spent three years, and did great honor to the English nation and the Protestant cause. His most learned papal antagonists gave him the titles of acutissimus and acerrimus. After his return, he became successively rector of Northill in Cornwall, of Lambeth in Surrey, and of All-hallows in London. This last he soon changed for Acton in Middlesex, and then became provost of Chelsea college.

In 1626, he published his Ancilla Pietatis, or "The Handmaid to Private Devotion," and soon after, "The Practice of Extraordinary Devotion," and from that time devoted himself to authorship and disputation, till the civil war in 1642. He was attached to the king's party, and in consequence narrowly escaped from the fury of the parliament soldiers who sought his destruction.

In 1643, he was appointed one of the assembly of divines, and was a witness against archbishop Land. Dr. Heylin has said of him, that he always was a Calvinist in his heart, but he never showed it openly till then. He was, however, a great opposer of the covenant, and a letter of his to archbishop Usher on this subject, being intercepted, he was regarded as a traitor, and thrown into prison, where he remained six months, and there he chiefly composed his celebrated answer to the Jesuit's challenge, published under the name of "Roma Ruens." Nearly at the same time he wrote his book against the Baptists, called "The Dipper Dipt." His sufferings in prison brought on the dropsy, of which he died, April 1, 1645. His will begins thus, "First, for my soul I commend it to him, whose due it is by a three-fold right: My Creator, who infused it into me: My Redeemer, who freely ransomed it with his dearest blood: My Sanctifier, who assisted me now in my greatest and latest assaults of temptation." &c. He was the author of nearly forty works, chiefly controversial.—Middleton, vol. iii. 166.

FEED, is a metaphor taken from flocks, and is expressive both of the eating of the flock and of the care of the shepherd to provide their food. Christ feeds his people; he wisely and kindly applies to their souls his supporting, strengthening, comforting word, blood, and spirit: he rules and protects them, and will forever render them happy in the enjoyment of himself and his fulness. Isa. 40: 1. Rev. 7: 17. (See PASTOR and SHEPHERD).—Brown.

FEEL. Christ has a feeling of our infirmities; having endured the like, he tenderly sympathizes with us in our troubles. Heb. 4: 15. Such as keep God's commandments feel no evil, meet with nothing that really tends to their hurt. Eccl. 8: 3. The heathen feel after God when, amid great ignorance and mistake, they search out and perceive his existence, and some of his perfections. Acts 17: 27. They are past feeling, who have their consciences so seared that they can commit the most horrid crimes without the least conviction or remorse. Eph. 4: 19.—Brown.

FEELINGS, (RELIGIOUS), are those sensations or emotions of the mind produced by the views we have of religion. While some enthusiasts boast of, depend on, and talk much of their feelings, there are others who are led to discard the term, and almost to abandon the idea of religious feeling; but it is evident, that however many have been misguided and deceived by their feelings, yet there is no such thing as religion without them. For instance, religion consists in contrition, repentance, and devotion; now what is contrition but a feeling of sorrow for sin? what is repentance but a feeling of hatred to it, with a relinquishing of it? what is devotion but a feeling of love to God and his ways? Who can separate the idea of feeling from any of these acts? The fact is this: religious feelings, like every thing else, have been abused; and men, to avoid the imputation of fanaticism, have run into the opposite evil of lukewarmness, and been content with a system without feeling its energy. (See AFFECTION; ENTHUSIASM; EXPERIENCE).—Hend. Buck.

FEE. (See FOOT.)

FEIGN; deceitfully to forge, (Neh. 6: 8.) to put on appearance of what is not real. Feigned lips are such as utter what the heart thinks not. Ps. 17: 1. Feigned obedience is what proceeds not from a sincere and good will. Ps. 80: 14. Feigned words are such as represent persons and things otherwise than as they really are, 2 Pet. 2: 3. Unfeigned is that which is sincere, true, and candid; so faith unfeigned is that whereby the heart, with sincerity and candor, receives Christ and all his fulness, as offered in the gospel. 1 Tim. 1: 5.—Brown.

FELICITAS; a lady of Lyons, and a Christian martyr of the second century, who suffered in company with Perpetua. (See PERPETUA.)

FELICITATUS, an illustrious Roman lady, who suffered martyrdom under the emperor Aurelius. She was of noble descent, and the most shining virtues adorned her Christian profession. She had seven sons, whom she educated in the most exemplary piety. They were all arrested on the charge of being Christians. Publius, the Roman governor, sought to prevail on the mother to relinquish Christianity, hoping through her to influence her sons. She was equally inflexible to persuasion and menace. The sons were then tried separately, but each was found faithful to Christ, in consequence of which the whole family was ordered to execution. The mother, after beholding her sons put to death with various modes of barbarity, calmly yielded her own neck to the sword of the executioner.—Fox.

FELIX, (CLAUDIUS,) succeeded Cumanus in the government of Judea, in the days of the apostles. He married Drusilla, the sister of the young king Agrippa, having prevailed on her to leave her former husband, Azizus, king of the Emessians. (See DRUSILLA.) The character of Felix as delineated by his contemporaries, is far from reflecting any honor upon his memory. He was so oppressive, says Tacitus, that "he exercised the authority committed to him with all manner of cruelty and lewdness." He resided at the city of Cæsarea, when Paul was brought there for safety under an escort of the Roman soldiers. Acts 23: 26, 27. 21: 1, &c.

The apostle's address before him and his adulterous paramour, has been universally admired both for its being strikingly adapted to the characters and circumstances of his audience, and for the boldness with which this illustrious prisoner must have uttered it, though standing before the tribunal of a man who might have sentenced him to death.

Mark the impression, which the apostle's reasoning made upon the conscience of the man to whom it was directed. Neither the flattering harangue of Tertullus before, nor the presence of his Drusilla now, nor the conscious dignity of his office as Cæsar's viceroy, could shield him from that conviction, which, like a flash of lightning, darted the evidence of truth, with an irresistible force, on his mind. And what makes the instance before us so remarkable is, that the inward perturbation of Felix's conscience became so visible, that his courage and command of countenance apparently forsook him; and he, at whose tribunal others had been accustomed to tremble, now sat a trembling spectacle of conscious guilt, pallid and confused at the sight of a prisoner, armed with no other weapon than the voice of honest truth. But the voice of truth and the voice of God are one, whether they speak by the mouth of an apostle, or that of an angel; by the sound of the gospel, or the voice of thunder.

Yet so unwilling was Felix to be delivered from the tyranny of his passions, that he gave the apostle the most abrupt dismissal, saying, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will send for thee." Alas! that season never arrived in a sense correspondent with the wishes of Paul, or consistent with the feelings of a man trembling under a sense of guilt, and solicitous about his everlasting salvation. For, though he sent for the apostle afterwards, from a hope that his friends would advance a considerable sum for his release; yet he inquired no more "concerning the faith in Christ," and he trembled no more, his conscience returning to a deeper stupefaction, and the sinner to a deeper guilt—the usual consequence of slighting the gospel and stifling conviction, after the terrors of a temporary impression. He returned to his Drusilla, and threw away his honor and his salvation in the arms of a base woman, the very name and sight of whom, it is to be feared, he would have cause to execrate to all eternity.

Unhappy man! to consult the favor of the world, at the expense of truth, justice, and religion! and to throw away in guilty supineness and unbelief the golden opportunity which Providence afforded him of hearing the truth, from the mouth of the chief of the apostles. See De Courcy's Christ Crucified; Atterbury's Sermons; Saurin's Sermons.

Felix was recalled to Rome in the year of Christ 60, and many of the Jews followed him thither to complain of the extortion and various acts of violence by which his administration in Judea was disgraced, the consequence of all which would have been fatal to him, had not his brother

Pallas interceded for him with the emperor, and by his interest rescued him from the effects of his indignation. And as to the lascivious Drusilla, we are told by Josephus, that, along with her son, the fruit of their illicit amour, she was consumed in an eruption of mount Vesuvius. Felix was succeeded in the government of Judea, by Portius Festus. Joseph. Antiq. b. xx. ch. 5.—Jones.

FELL, (JOHN, D. D.) bishop of Oxford, an eminently learned divine, was born at Longworth, in Berks, June 23d, 1625, and graduated as master of arts in 1613. During the protectorate, he continued in obscurity; but on the restoration he obtained a stall at Chichester, whence he was preferred to a more valuable one at Christ church, and soon after became dean of that society. In 1666, he served the office of vice-chancellor of the university, and ten years after was raised to the see of Oxford, retaining his deanery. As a prelate he was distinguished equally by his learning and munificence. Several valuable works from his pen are extant, among others, a Latin translation of Wood's "History and Antiquities of Oxford," in two volumes, folio; "A Life of Dr. Hammond," published in 1660; another of Dr. Allestree; an edition of Cyprian's Works; St. Clement's two Epistles to the Corinthians, in Greek and Latin; "Artis Logice Compendium;" "A Paraphrase on St. Paul's Epistles;" a new edition of the Greek Testament with notes, and a collection of the various readings; and several sermons. His death took place in 1686.—Biog. Brit.; Jones.

FELLOWSHIP; joint interest, or the having one common stock. The fellowship of the saints is two-fold:—1. With God. 1 John 1: 3. 1 Cor. 1: 9. 1 Cor. 13: 14.—2. With one another. 1 John 1: 7.

Fellowship with God consists in knowledge of his will. Job 22: 21. 1 John 17: 3. Agreement in design. Amos 3: 2. Mutual affection. Rom. 8: 35, 39. Enjoyment of his presence. Ps. 4: 6. Conformity to his image. 1 John 2: 6. 1 John 1: 6. Participation of his felicity. 1 John 1: 3, 4. Ephes. 3: 14—21. 2 Cor. 13: 14.

Fellowship of the saints may be considered as a fellowship of duties. Rom. 12: 6. 1 Cor. 12: 1. 1 Thess. 5: 17, 18. James 5: 16. Of ordinances. Heb. 10: 24. Acts 2: 46. Of graces, love, joy, &c. (See COMMUNION.)—Hend. Buck.

FELTHAM, (OWEN,) a valuable writer, of whom nothing is known but that he was a native of Suffolk, lived many years in the earl of Thonond's family, and died about 1678. His only work is, Resolves, Divine, Political, and Moral. It has passed through thirteen editions, and its merit justifies our lamenting that Feltham wrote no more.—Davenport.

FENCED CITIES; walled round about; fortified and so made strong and difficult to be taken or hurt. 2 Chron. 11: 10. Job 10: 11.—Brown.

FENCING TABLES; the designation of a sacramental rite among the Scotch Presbyterians, which takes place almost immediately before the distribution of the elements, and consists in the minister's pointing out the character of those who have, and of those who have not, a right to sit down at the table. This address is followed up by the reading of several passages of Scripture, descriptive of the character of saints and sinners.—Hend. Buck.

FENELON, (FRANCIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTTE,) one of the most able of French writers and virtuous of men, was born, in 1651, at the castle of Fenelon, in Perigord;

studied at Cahors and Paris; and entered into holy orders at the age of twenty-four. The archbishop of Paris appointed him superior of the newly-converted female Catholics, and his success in this office, and the merit of his treatises on Female Education and on the Ministry of Pastors, induced Louis XIV. to send him on a mission to Poitou to convert the Protestants. This post Fenelon accepted only on the express condition that force should not be employed in aid of his efforts. In 1689, he was selected by M. de Beauvilliers to be tutor to the duke of Burgundy and his younger brothers. It was for the use of his royal pupil that he composed his Telemachus. In 1694, he was raised to the archbishopric of Cambray. He did not, however, long enjoy in peace his well-merited preferment. Having espoused the cause of Madam Guyon, and published a work, The Maxims of the Saints, which was considered as teaching her doctrine of quietism, he was bitterly attacked by Bossuet, and his book was ultimately censured by the pope. Fenelon himself read his recantation in his own cathedral. The anger of Louis XIV. was still more roused against him by the appearance of Telemachus, which was surreptitiously published by a servant, to whom it had been intrusted for transcription. It was looked upon by the haughty and ambitious monarch as a covert satire upon his own misgovernment and criminal love of war. Fenelon was, in consequence, kept at a distance from the court. But, though discountenanced by his own sovereign, a just tribute was paid to his merit by foreigners. The lands of his diocese were exempted from pillage, and his person was treated with the utmost respect by the duke of Marlborough, and the other generals of the allies.

His conduct through life was consistent with his doctrines and principles. Habitually cheerful and amiable, he endeavored to imitate his master, Jesus Christ. He slept little; ate little; and allowed himself no pleasure, but what he enjoyed in the accomplishment of duties. The exercises of walking or riding were his only recreations during the whole time he was archbishop of Cambray. When he went out, he spent his time in useful conversation with his friends, or in benevolent visits to the people of his diocese; conversing seriously with the poor; entering their houses and admonishing, reproving, or consoling them, as their several circumstances and characters required. He gave almost all his revenue to hospitals; clergymen whom he educated; monasteries of nuns in distress; decayed gentlemen, and persons of all ranks, who, during the time of war, were within the reach of his generosity. He died in 1715, at the age of sixty-three, leaving behind him an imperishable reputation, as an eloquent writer, a conscientious prelate, and an amiable, enlightened, and virtuous man. Calm and composed on the verge of eternity, reposing on the Savior, his only language amidst the severest sufferings was, "Not my will, but thine be done!"

His productions form nine volumes in quarto. The principal of them, besides those already mentioned, are, Dialogues on Eloquence; Dialogues of the Dead; Demonstration of the Existence of a God; and Spiritual Works.—Butler's Life of Fenelon; *New Edin. FERDINANDO; a Protestant martyr of Seville in Spain. He was a teacher of youth, and was apprehended on the charge of instructing his pupils in the principles of the Protestant faith. He was condemned to the torture and the stake. While in prison awaiting the day of execution, a monk, who had abjured the errors of popery, was his fellow-prisoner. This unhappy man, through fear of death, offered to return to the Romish communion. Ferdinando on hearing this, exerted himself to show him the guilt and danger of such a course after being enlightened; and with such success that the monk solemnly renounced his weak intention, calmly submitted to the sentence of the inquisitors, and was burnt to death at the same time with his more courageous friend.—Fox, p. 135.

FERRAR, (ROBERT,) bishop of St. David's, one of the sufferers in the reign of queen Mary. He received his education at Oxford, where he became a regular canon and bachelor of divinity. The duke of Somerset, lord protector in the reign of Edward VI. was his friend and patron, and employed him in carrying on the important work of reformation. He was one of the committee nominated to compile the English liturgy. The zeal of Ferrar, who was consecrated bishop in 1547, soon procured him many enemies among the papists, and after the fall of his eminent patron, he was under a false charge committed to prison, some time before the death of the king. On the accession of Mary, he was tried on the new charge of heresy as a Protestant, degraded from his ecclesiastical functions, and, in company with Hooper, Bradford, Rogers, Saunders, and others, delivered over to the secular power for punishment. So much for the union of church and state!

A little before this good bishop suffered, a young gentleman who visited him, lamented the severity of the kind of death he was about to undergo. Ferrar, with all the firmness of the primitive martyrs, immediately replied, "If you see me once to stir, while I suffer the pains of burning, then give no credit to those doctrines for which I die." By the grace of God he was enabled to make good this assertion; for so patiently he stood, says Mr. Fox, that he never moved, until he was struck down in the flames by a blow on his head. Bishop Ferrar was burnt at Carmarthen, in Wales, March 30, 1555.—Midleton, vol. i. 346.

FERRARA, (RENATA, DUCHESS OF,) famous for her virtues and attachment to the reformed church, was the daughter of Louis XII. and Anne of Brittany. She was born at Blois in 1510. In 1527, she was married to Hercules d'Este, duke of Ferrara and Modena. She is said to have been mistress of immense erudition, excelling in all parts of the mathematics, but especially in astronomy. Her husband died in 1559, and the next year she left Italy on account of her religion, and returned to France, where she was permitted to profess the Protestant faith. She resided at Montargis, and there gave protection to as many as were persecuted, till she was obliged to do so no longer. It was with great regret she yielded to so rigorous a restraint; and if her courage appeared on this occasion, her charity was no less conspicuous; for during the troubles of France, she fed and maintained a great number of Protestants in her castle, who had fled to her for refuge. She interceded strongly for the prince of Conde, when he was imprisoned at Orleans in the time of the young king Francis; but was afterwards displeased with him, because neither she nor her ministers approved of the Protestants taking up arms. This Christian princess died at Montargis in 1575.—Betham.

FERRET; a sort of weasel, which Moses declares to be unclean, Lev. 11: 30. The Greek musgalē is composed of mus, a rat, and gale, a weasel, because this animal has something of both. The Hebrew anaca, is by some translated hedge-hog, by others leech, or salamander; by Bochart, lizard.—Calmet.

FERVENT; earnest, warm, burning, all in a glow. Rom. 12: 11. 2 Cor. 7: 7. 1 Pet. 4: 8, and 1: 22. Col. 4: 12. James 5: 6.—Eron.

FESTUS, (PORCIUS,) succeeded Felix in the government of Judea, A. D. 60. Finding how much robbing abounded in Judea, Festus very diligently pursued the thieves; and he also suppressed a magician, who drew the people after him into the desert. To oblige the Jews, Felix, when he resigned his government, had left Paul in bonds at Cæsarea in Palestine, (Acts 24: 27.) and when Festus arrived, he was entreated by the principal Jews to condemn the apostle, or to order him up to Jerusalem; they having conspired to assassinate him in the way. Festus, however, answered, that it was not customary with the Romans to condemn any man without hearing him, and promised to hear their accusations at Cæsarea. But Paul appealed to Cæsar; and so secured himself from the prosecution of the Jews, and the intentions of Festus, whom they had corrupted. Festus died in Judea, A. D. 62, and Albinus succeeded him.—Calmet.

FETISH; an idol. This word, now frequently met with in the French and German languages, was first brought into use by De Brosse, in his work Du Culte des Dieux Fetiches, (1760,) and is derived either from the Portuguese fetisso, a block adored as an idol, or, according to Winterbottom, from fetizeira, an enchantress. The Portuguese gave this name to the idols of the negroes, on the Senegal, and afterwards the word received a more extensive meaning. The general signification now given to fetish seems to be an object worshipped, not representing any living figure. Hence stones, arms, vessels, &c. are fetishes. The negroes of Guinea suppose a fetish to preside over every canton or district, and one also over every family, and each individual, which the individual worships on the anniversary of his birth-day. Those of the better sort have, besides this, weekly festivals, on which they kill a cock or sheep. They believe the material substances which they worship to be endowed with intelligence, and the power of doing them good or evil; and also that the fetishers, or priest, being of their council, is privy to all that those divinities know, and thence acquainted with the most secret thoughts and actions of men. The household, or family fetish, narrowly inspects the conduct of every individual in the house, and rewards or punishes each according to his deserts. The rewards consist in the multiplication of the slaves and wives of the worshipper, and the punishment in their diminution; but the most terrible punishment is death. At Cape Coast there is a public guardian fetish, supreme in power and dignity. This is a rock which projects into the sea from the bottom of the cliff, on which the castle is built. To this rock annual sacrifices are presented, and the responses given through the priests are rewarded by the blinded devotees.—Hend. Buck.

FETTERS; shackles or chains, for binding prisoners and madmen. With such were Joseph's feet hurt in the prison. Ps. 105: 18. The saints bind nobles with fetters of iron, when, by prayer and the exercise of the power that God gives them, they restrain them from accomplishing their wicked designs. Ps. 149: 8.—Brown.

FEVER; a well-known species of disease, consisting in the fermentation of the blood, accompanied with a quick pulse and excessive heat. Deut. 28: 22.—Brown.

FEUILLANTINES; a reformed order of Cistercian monks, who went barefoot, lived only on herbs, and practised astonishing austerities. Their congregation was afterwards divided into two by pope Urban VIII. in 1630, who separated the French from the Italians, and gave them two generals.—Hend. Buck.

FIDELITY; faithfulness, or the conscientious discharge of those duties of a religious, personal, and relative nature, which we are bound to perform. (See an excellent sermon on the subject in Dr. Erskine's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 304.)—Hend. Buck.

FIELD. (See FURROWS.)

FIELD, (RICHARD, D. D.) an eminent divine of the Church of England, was born at Hampstead, Hertfordshire, in 1561, and educated at Oxford. He continued seven years at Magdalen hall, where he was distinguished as a great divine, a great preacher, and an acute disputant. He was afterwards reader of divinity at Lincoln's Inn, London, and rector of Burrowclere in Hampshire. Here he refused the offer of St. Andrew's, in Holborn, London, a much more valuable living, that he might serve God, and pursue his studies, in a more retired situation. In 1598, queen Elizabeth made him one of her chaplains, and he formed a warm friendship with Richard Hooker, a man of kindred spirit. In 1609, he was made dean of Gloucester, and published an enlarged edition of his celebrated work, the Four Books of the Church. He was esteemed a perfect oracle in this kind of learning. Divines, even of the first order, scarce ever went to him without loading themselves with questions. Fuller calls him, "that learned divine, whose memory smelleth like a field which the Lord hath blessed." When King James heard him preach the first time, he said, "This is a FIELD for God to dwell in." His majesty retained so good an opinion of him, that he designed to raise him to the bishopric of Oxford; but God was pleased, as Mr. Wood remarks, to prefer him for a better place, for, on the twenty-first of November, 1616, he died, aged fifty-five years, leaving behind him a character equally great and amiable.—Midleton, vol. ii. 374.

FIFTH-MONARCHY-MEN; a denomination which arose in the seventeenth century. They derived their name from maintaining that there will be a fifth universal monarchy under the personal reign of Jesus Christ upon earth. This sentiment is similar to that of Origen and the Millenarians; but with this important difference in practice, that the latter were willing to wait till Christ came to assume the government, whereas the former attempted to take possession of it in his name. They were equally enemies to the protector and the king. Their first plan was to blow up Cromwell, at Whitehall; afterwards they plotted against his son Richard; and, soon after the restoration of Charles II., they raised an open rebellion against him.

Their leader in all these attempts, was Thomas Venner, a wine-cooper, who was also a preacher, and had a meeting-house in Coleman street. One Sunday morning, (January 6, 1661,) having raised the passions of his hearers by an inflammatory discourse, they sallied out, to the number of fifty or sixty, with appropriate standards, crying out, "No King but Christ." Some of them were weak enough to expect the King of Heaven would come down to head them. The lord mayor first drew up some of the trained bands to oppose them; and afterwards, general Monk marched his regiment into London. At first they fought with a desperate valor, and killed several; but being completely subdued, after two or three days skirmishing, Venner, and about twenty others, were taken, tried, and most of them executed for high treason.—Bishop Burnett's Own Times, vol. i. book ii. anno 1660; Wilson's Dissent. Churches, vol. ii. p. 427; Benedict; Williams.

FIG-TREE. Gen. 3: 7. Num. 13: 23. Matt. 7: 16. 21: 19. 24: 32. Mark 11: 13, 20, 21. 13: 28. Luke 6: 44. 13: 6, 7. 21: 29. John 1: 48. James 3: 12. Rev. 6: 13. This tree was very common in Palestine. It becomes large, dividing into many branches, which are furnished with leaves shaped like those of the mulberry, and affords a friendly shade. Accordingly, we read, in the Old Testament, of Judah and Israel dwelling, or sitting securally, every man under his fig-tree, 1 Kings 4: 25. Micah 4: 4. Zech. 3: 10. 1 Mac. 14: 12. And, in the New Testament, we find Nathanael under a fig-tree, probably for the purposes of devotional retirement, John 1: 49—51. Hasselquist, in his journey from Nazareth to Tiberias, says, "We refreshed ourselves under the shade of a fig-tree, where a shepherd and his herd had their rendezvous; but without either house or hut." The fruit which it bears is produced from the trunk and large branches, and not from the smaller shoots, as in most other trees. It always precedes the leaves, and is soft, sweet, and very nourishing. The first ripe fig is still called boççore in the Levant, which is nearly its Hebrew name, Jer. 24: 2. Thus Dr. Shaw, in giving an account of the fruits in Barbary, mentions, "the black and white boççore, or early fig," which is produced in June, though the kermes, or kermouse, the "fig," properly so called, which they preserve and make up into cakes, is rarely ripe before August." And on Nahm 3: 12, he observes, that "the boççores drop as soon as they are ripe, and, according to the beautiful allusion of the prophet, fall into the mouth of the eater upon being shaken." Farther, "it frequently falls out in Barbary," says he, "and we need not doubt of the like in this hotter climate of Judea, that, according to the quality of the preceding season, some of the more forward and vigorous trees will now and then yield a few ripe figs six weeks or more before the full season. Something like this may be alluded to by the prophet Hosea, when he says, 'I saw your fathers as the first ripe in the fig-tree, at her first time.'" Hosea 9: 10. Such figs were reckoned a great dainty." (See Isaiah 28: 4.)

2. The account of our Savior's denunciation against the barren fig-tree, (Matt. 21: 19. Mark 11: 13,) has occasioned some of the boldest cavils of infidelity; and the vindication of it has needlessly exercised the ingenuity of several of the most learned critics and commentators. The whole difficulty arises from the circumstance of his disappointment in not finding fruit on the tree, when it is expressly said, that "the time of figs was not yet." While it was supposed that this expression signified, that the time for such trees to bring forth fruit was not yet come, it looked very unaccountable that Christ should reckon a tree barren, though it had leaves, and curse it as such, when he knew that the time of bearing figs was not come; and that he should come to seek figs, on this tree, when he knew that figs were not used to be ripe so soon in the year. But the expression does not signify the time of the coming forth of figs, but the time of the gathering in of ripe figs, as is plain from the parallel expressions. Matt. 21: 34. Mark 12: 2. Luke 20: 10. St. Mark, by saying, "For the time of figs was not yet," does not design to give a reason for "his finding nothing but leaves;" but he gives a reason for what he said in the clause before, "He came, if haply he might find any thereon;" and it was a good reason for our Savior's coming and seeking figs on the tree, because the time for their being gathered was not come. St. Matthew informs us that the tree was "in the way," that is, in the common road, and therefore, probably, no particular person's property.

Jesus was pleased to make use of this miracle to prefigure the speedy ruin of the Jewish nation, on account of its unfruitfulness under greater advantages than any other people enjoyed at that day; and, like all the rest of his miracles, it was done with a gracious intention, namely, to alarm his countrymen, and induce them to repent. In the blasting of this barren fig-tree, the distant appearance of which was so fair and promising, he delivered one more awful lesson to a degenerate people, of whose hypocritical exterior, and flattering but delusive pretensions, it was a just and striking emblem.—Watson; Jones; Abbott.

FIGHT. The violent and irreconcilable struggle between the saints' inward grace and corruption, and their striving against the temptations of Satan, are called a war, or warfare. Rom. 7: 23. 1 Pet. 2: 11. Eph. 6: 11, 12. Both are the good fight of faith, carried on by the exercise of the grace of faith, or Christ's word and power; and in maintenance of the doctrine of faith: and it is good in respect of their cause, captain, and the manner and end of their conflict. 1 Tim. 6: 12. 2 Tim. 4: 7. Outward opposition, trouble, and distress, are likened to a fight or warfare. 2 Cor. 7: 5. Isa. 40: 2. (See BATTLE).—Brown.

FIGURES. (See TYPES.)
FILIAL PIETY, is the affectionate attachment of children to their parents, including in it love, reverence, obedience, and relief. Justly has it been observed, that these great duties are prompted equally by nature and by gratitude, independent of the injunctions of religion; for where shall we find the person who hath received from any one benefits so great, or so many, as children from their parents? And it may be truly said, that if persons are unfaithful to their parents, they seldom prove good to any other relation. (See article CHILD).—Hend. Buck.

FILIATION, OF THE SON OF GOD. (See SON OF GOD.)

FILL. To fill up what is behind of the sufferings of Christ, is to bear the troubles assigned by him to his followers, and which are borne for his sake. Col. 1: 24. To fill up the measure of sin, is to add one iniquity to another, till the patience of God can no longer suffer them to escape unpunished. Matt. 23: 32. 1 Thess. 2: 16. Satan fills the heart when he strongly inclines and emboldens it to sin. Acts. 5: 3. Sinners are filled with their own devices, with their own ways, with drunkenness, and have their faces filled with shame, when God, to punish their wicked acts and designs, brings dreadful and confounding calamities upon them. Prov. 1: 31. 14: 14. 12: 21. Ezek. 23: 33. Ps. 83: 16. Christ filleth all in all: he is every where present; is in all their churches; and their true members; he is the great substance of all the blessings of the new covenant, and of all the graces and duties of his people. Eph. 1: 23.—Brown.

FILIOQUE, a term signifying "and from the Son," which the Greeks accuse the Latin church of introducing into the ancient creed, relative to the procession of the Holy Spirit: the former maintaining that his procession is from the Father only. At what time this introduction took place cannot be ascertained, but Augustine has the expression, procedere ab utroque; and the synod of Toledo, in 589, declares every one to be a heretic, who does not believe, a pater filioque procedere Spiritum sanctum. Every attempt to reconcile the two churches, with respect to this point, has proved abortive, so that it continues to be a mark of distinction between them.—Hend. Buck.

FILTHY LUCRE, is gain basely and sinfully gotten; as when ministers make their benefice their great aim in their work. Tit. 1: 7, 11. 1 Pet. 5: 2.—Brown.

FIND, to meet with, is used sometimes for to attack, to surprise one's enemies, to light on them suddenly, &c. so Anah, "found the Emim," Gen. 36: 24. (See EMIM.) To find favor in the sight of any one, is an expressive form of speech common in Scripture.—Calmet.

FINGER. The finger of God, denotes his power, his operation. Pharaoh's magicians discovered the finger of God in some of the miracles of Moses, Exod. 8: 19. That legislator gave the tables written with the finger of God, to the Hebrews, Exod. 31: 18. The heavens were the work of God's fingers, Psalm 8: 3.

To put forth one's finger, is a bantering gesture, or an insulting gesture, Isa. 59: 8. Some take this for a menacing gesture, as Nicanor stretched out his hand against the temple, threatening to burn it, 2 Mac. 14: 33.—Hend. Buck.

FINISH, means to bring to pass, to accomplish, to perfect, or to put an end to any thing. One of the evangelists relates that when Jesus was suspended upon the cross, and immediately prior to his giving up the ghost, "he cried with a loud voice, IT IS FINISHED!"

1. The ministry which his heavenly Father had committed unto him, when he sanctified him and sent him into the world to publish the glad tidings of peace to guilty men, was now fulfilled. John 17: 4.

2. His awful and complicated sufferings were ended. The whole of his life had corresponded to the prophetic delineation of his character. "He was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." Isa. 53: 3.

3. An end was now virtually put to the Levitical dispensation. That economy, founded in divine appointment, and which had subsisted during a period of fifteen hundred years, having answered the great purposes for which it was instituted, now obtained its consummation. Col. 2: 14, 15. Eph. 2: 14, 15. Heb. 9: 10. But,

4. The work of purchasing our redemption was now finished. The justice of God obtained full satisfaction, for the dishonor which sinners had done to his violated law, so that now "God is just even in justifying the ungodly who believe in Jesus," at whose hands he hath received ample satisfaction for all their sins. Rom. 3: 24—26. These are some of the important things that are indicated in that memorable saying, "IT IS FINISHED."—Jones.

FINLEY, (SAMUEL, D. D.) president of the college of New Jersey, was born in the county of Armagh, Ireland, in 1715, of pious parents, and was one of seven sons, who were all pious. Very early in life it pleased God to awaken and convert him. He arrived at Philadelphia, Sept. 28, 1734. He was ordained Oct. 13th by the presbytery of New Brunswick. The first part of his ministry was spent in fatiguing, itinerant labors. He contributed his efforts with Gilbert Tennent and Mr. Whitefield in promoting the revival of religion, which was at that period so remarkable throughout this country. His benevolent zeal sometimes brought him into trying circumstances. His exertions were greatly blessed in a number of towns in New Jersey, and he preached for six months with great acceptance in Philadelphia. In June, 1744, he accepted an invitation from Nottingham, Maryland, where he continued near seven years, faithfully and successfully discharging the duties of his office. Here he established an academy, which acquired great reputation. Upon the death of president Davies, of Princeton, Mr. Finley was chosen his successor. The college flourished under his care; but it enjoyed the benefit of his superintendance but a few years. He died July 17, 1766, aged 50, and was buried by the side of his friend, Gilbert Tennent.

During his last sickness he was perfectly resigned to the divine will; he had a strong faith in his Savior; and he frequently expressed an earnest desire of departing, that he might dwell with the Lord Jesus. A short time before his death he sat up, and prayed earnestly, that God would enable him to endure patiently to the end, and keep him from dishonoring the ministry. He then said, "Blessed be God, eternal rest is at hand. Eternity is but long enough to enjoy my God. This, this has animated me in my severest studies; I was ashamed to take rest here. O, that I might be filled with the fulness of God!" He then addressed himself to all his friends in the room, "O, that each of you may experience what, blessed be God, I do, when you come to die; may you have the pleasure in a dying hour to reflect, that with faith and patience, zeal and sincerity, you have endeavored to serve the Lord; and may each of you be impressed, as I have been, with God's word, looking upon it as substantial, and not only fearing but being unwilling to offend against it." On being asked how he felt, he replied, "Full of triumph! I triumph through Christ! Nothing clips my wings, but the thoughts of my dissolution being delayed. O, that it were to-night! My very soul thirsts for eternal rest." When he was asked, what he saw in eternity to excite such vehement desires, he said, "I see the eternal love and goodness of God; I see the fulness of the Mediator; I see the love of Jesus. O, to be dissolved, and to be with him! I long to be clothed with the complete righteousness of Christ." Thus this excellent man died in the full assurance of salvation.

He published a number of sermons and pamphlets.—Allen.

FINLEY, (ROBERT, D. D.), president of the university of Georgia, was born at Princeton in 1772, and graduated at Princeton college in 1787. He was the minister of Basking-Bridge, New Jersey, from June 1795 until 1817. Deeply interested in the welfare of the free blacks, he formed a plan of sending them to Africa and may be considered as the father of the Colonization society. In Dec. 1816, he went to Washington, and succeeded in calling a meeting of gentlemen, Dec. 21, at which addresses were made by Mr. Clay and Mr. Randolph. The next week a constitution was adopted and Judge Washington chosen president. On his return, Dr. Finley caused the establishment of an auxiliary society at Trenton. Being at this period chosen president of Franklin college, at Athens, Georgia, he repaired to that place in 1817, and in a few months died there, Oct. 3, 1817, aged 45, leaving a wife and nine children. He published several sermons.—Memoirs of Finley.—Allen.

FIR, (Heb. berosh.) an evergreen tree, of beautiful appearance, whose lofty height and dense foliage afford a spacious shelter and shade. It has a very strait trunk, and its wood is of great use in furniture, &c. The LXX have rendered it, for want of established principles of natural history—cypress, fr. myrtle, juniper. The Chaldees read it constantly; and, as Mr. Taylor remarks, it is likely this translator should be quite as well acquainted with the subject as any foreigner.

In 2 Sam. 6: 5. it is said, that "David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir-wood," &c. Take the following passage from Dr. Burney's history of music; "This species of wood, so soft in its nature and sonorous in its effects, seems to have been preferred by the ancients, as well as the moderns, to every other kind, for the construction of musical instruments, particularly the bellies of them, on which their tone chiefly depends. Those of the harp, lute, guitar, harpsichord, and violin, in present use, are constantly made of fir-wood."—Calmet.

FIRE. God, to represent to man the glory of his majesty and the terrors of his justice, hath often appeared in fire, and encompassed with fire, as when he showed himself in the burning bush, and descended on mount Sinai, in the midst of flames, thunders, and lightning; Ex. 3: 2. 19: 18. Hence fire is a symbol of the Deity, and of his just and jealous regard to his glory. "The Lord thy God is a consuming fire," Deut. 4: 24. The Holy Ghost is compared to fire; "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire," Matt. 3: 11. Acts 2: 3. It is the work of the Holy Spirit to enlighten, purify, and sanctify the soul; and to inflame it with love to God, and zeal for his glory. (See BAPTISM OF THE HOLY GHOST.)

2. The fire which came down from heaven, first upon the altar in the tabernacle, and afterwards descended anew upon the altar in the temple of Solomon, at its consecration, was there constantly fed and maintained by the priests, day and night, in the same manner as it had been in the tabernacle. At the destruction of the temple, it was extinguished: and in the time of the second temple, nothing was made use of for all their burnt offerings but common fire only.

3. The word of God is compared to fire: "Is not my word like a fire?" Jer. 23: 20. It is full of life and efficacy; like a fire it warms, expands, and melts, and is powerful to consume the dross, and burn up the chaff and stubble. Fire is likewise taken for the rage of persecution, dissension, and division; "I am come to send fire on earth;" Luke 12: 49. as if he had said, Upon my coming and publishing the gospel, there will follow, through the devil's malice and corruption of men, fearful persecution to the professors thereof, and manifold divisions in the world, whereby men will be tried, whether they will be faithful or not.

4. The torments of hell are described by fire, both in the Old and New Testament. Our Savior makes use of this similitude, to represent the punishment of the damned, Mark 9: 44. He likewise speaks frequently of the eternal fire prepared for the devil, his angels, and reprobate, or wicked men. Matt. 25: 41. The sting and remorse of conscience is generally thought to be the worm that will never die; and the wrath of God upon their souls and bodies, the fire that shall never go out. There are writers, however, who maintain, that by the worm is to be understood a living and sensible, not an allegorical and figurative worm; and by fire, a real elementary and material fire. Among the abettors of this opinion are Austin, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Jerome, &c.—Watson.

FIRE PHILOSOPHERS. (See THEOSOPHISTS.)

FIRMAMENT. It is said, (Gen. 1: 7.) that God made the firmament in the midst of the waters, to separate the inferior from the superior. The word used on this occasion properly signifies expansion, or something expanded. This expansion is properly the atmosphere, which encompasses the globe on all sides, and separates the water in the clouds from that on the earth.—Watson.

FIRST. Our Savior required his disciples "to seek first the kingdom of God;" i. e. before all things; (Matt. 6: 33.) and Paul says, that God displayed his mercy towards him, "who was the chief [first] of sinners;" and that in him the first, "he showed forth all long-suffering, for a pattern," &c. 1 Tim. 1: 15, 16.—Calmet.

FIRST-BORN. (See BIRTHRIGHT.)

FIRST FRUITS, among the Hebrews were oblations of part of the fruits of the harvest, consecrated to God as an acknowledgment of his sovereign dominion. In this sense of special consecration to God, it is, that the regenerate are called "a kind of first fruits of his creatures," James 1: 18. It may mean also that the first Christians were converted as an earnest of the future conversion of the whole world. There was another sort of first fruits which was paid to God. When bread was kneaded in a family, a portion of it was set apart, and given to the priest or Levite who dwelt in the place. If there were no priest or Levite there, it was cast into the oven, and consumed by the fire. These offerings made a considerable part of the revenues of the priesthood. Lev. 23: Exod. 22: 29. Chron. 23: 19. Num. 15: 19, 20.

The first fruits of the Spirit are such communications of his grace on earth, as fully assure us of the full enjoyment of God in heaven, Rom. 8: 23. Christ is called the first fruits of them that slept; for as the first fruits were earnest to the Jews of the succeeding harvest, so Christ as the first fruits of the resurrection, or the earnest of a future resurrection; that as he rose, so shall believers also rise to happiness and life, 1 Cor. 15: 20.

First fruits are mentioned in ancient writers as one part of the church revenue.

First fruits, in the church of England, are the profits of every spiritual benefice for the first year, according to the valuation thereof in the king's book.—Head. Buck.

FISH, (Heb. dag, Greek ichthys, Matt. 7: 10. 17: 27. Luke 5: 6. John 21: 6, 8, 11,) occurs very frequently. This appears to be the general name in Scripture of aquatic animals. Boothroyd, in the note upon Num. 11: 4. says, "I am inclined to think that the word here rendered flesh, denotes only the flesh of fish, as it certainly does in Lev. 11: 11; and indeed the next verse seems to support this explication: 'We remember how freely we ate fish.' It was then, particularly, the flesh of fish, for which they longed, which was more relishing than either the beef or mutton of those regions, which, unless when young, is dry and unpalatable. Of the great abundance and deliciousness of the fish of Egypt, all authors, ancient and modern, are agreed." Hence we may see how distressing to the Egyptians was the infliction which turned the waters of the river into blood, and occasioned the death of the fish, Exod. 7: 18—21. Their sacred stream became so polluted as to be unfit for drink, for bathing, and for other uses of water to which they were superstitiously devoted, and themselves obliged to nauseate what was the usual food of the common people, and held sacred by the priests, Exod. 2: 5. 7: 15. 8: 20.—Watson.

FISK, (PLINY) missionary to Palestine, was born at Shelburne, Mass., June 24, 1792, became pious at 16, and was graduated in 1811 at Middlebury college. Such was his poverty that for two years he lived on bread and milk, carried his corn to mill on his shoulders, and a good woman baked his loaf for him. He studied theology at Andover, was employed as an agent for the American Board of foreign missions one year, and then sailed for Palestine with Mr. Parsons, Nov. 3, 1819. On arriving at Smyrna, Jan. 15, 1820, they engaged in the study of the eastern languages; but in a few months removed to Scio, in order to study modern Greek under professor Bambas. The college at Scio then had seven or eight hundred students. But in 1821, the island was desolated by the barbarous Turks. In 1822, he accompanied to Egypt his fellow laborer, Mr. Parsons, and witnessed his death, and buried him in the Greek convent. From Egypt he proceeded in April, 1823, through the desert to Judea, accompanied by Mr. King and Mr. Wolf. Having visited Jerusalem, he went to Beyroot, Balbec, Damascus, Aleppo, and Antioch. He made a third visit to Jerusalem with Mr. King. When he withdrew from Jerusalem, in the spring of 1825, he retired to the mission family of Mr. Goodell and Mr. Bird, at Beyroot, where he died of a prevailing fever, Sabbath morning, Oct. 23, 1825, aged 33.

Mr. Fisk was eminently qualified to be a missionary in the East. He was a preacher in Italian, French, Modern Greek, and Arabic. His various communications are found in several volumes of the Missionary Herald.—Bond's Memoir of Fisk.—Allen.

FISKE, (JOHN) first minister of Wenham and Chelmsford, Mass., was born in England, in 1601, and was educated at Cambridge. He came to this country in 1637, and being in the same ship with John Allen, they preached two sermons almost every day during the voyage. He was for some time the teacher of a school at Cambridge. As his property was large, he made considerable loans to the province. He lived almost three years at Salem, preaching to the church, and instructing a number of young persons. When a church was gathered in Enon, or Wenham, Oct. 8, 1614, he was settled the minister, and here he continued till about the year 1656, when he removed to Chelmsford, then a new town, with the majority of his church. Having been an able and useful preacher in this place twenty years, he died, Jan. 14, 1677. He was a skilful physician, as well as an excellent minister. His son Moses, was minister of Braintree. Among the severest afflictions, to which he was called, says Dr. Mather, was the loss of his concordance; that is, of his wife, who was so expert in the Scriptures, as to render any other concordance unnecessary. He published a catechism, entitled The Olive Branch Watered.—Magnalia, iii. 111—143. Hist. Col. v. 239, 249.—Allen.

FITCHES, or VETCHES; a kind of tare. There are two words in Hebrew which our translators have rendered fitches, retsach and resmet: the first occurs only in Isaiah 28: 25—27, and must be the name of some kind of seed; but the interpreters differ much in explaining it. Jerome, Maimonides, R. David Kimchi, and the rabbins, understand it by the gith. The gith was called by the Greeks nulanthion, and by the Latins nigella; and is thus described by Bal-lester; "It is a plant commonly met with in gardens, and grows to a cubit in height, and sometimes more, according to the richness of the soil. The leaves are small, like those of fennel, the flower blue, which disappearing, the ovary shows itself on the top, like that of a poppy, furnished with little horns, oblong, divided by membranes into several partitions, or cells, in which are inclosed seeds of a very black color, not unlike those of the leek, but of a very fragrant smell." And Ausonius observes, that its pungency is equal to that of pepper:—

Est inter fruges morsu piper aequiparens git.

Pliny says it is of use in bakehouses, pistrinis, and that it affords a grateful seasoning to the bread. The Jewish rabbins also mention the seeds among condiments, and mixed with bread. For this purpose it was probably used in the time of Isaiah; since the inhabitants of those countries, to this day, have a variety of rusks and biscuits, most of which are strewn on the top with the seeds of sesamum, coriander, and wild garden saffron.

The other word is rendered fitches in our translation of Ezek. 4: 9; but in Exod. 9: 32. and Isaiah 28: 25, "rye."

Some think the word the speltz; and this seems to be the most probable meaning of the Hebrew word; at least it has the greatest number of interpreters from Jerome to Celsius. There are not, however, wanting, who think it was rye; among whom, R. D. Kimchi, followed by Luther, and our English translators: Dr. Geddes, too, has retained it, though he says that he is inclined to think that the speltz is preferable.

Dr. Shaw thinks that this word may signify rice. Haselquist, on the contrary, affirms that rice was brought into cultivation in Egypt under the Caliphs. This, however, may be doubted. One would think from the intercourse of ancient Egypt with Babylon and with India, that this country could not be ignorant of a grain so well suited to its climate.—Watson.

FIVE POINTS, are the five doctrines controverted between the Arminians and Calvinists. (See CALVINISM.)—Head. Buck.

FIX. The heart is fixed when it is powerfully captivated by love of Christ; firmly depends on God's promises, perfections, and new covenant relations, and has its thoughts and desires firmly settled on him. Ps. 62: 5. 112: 7.—Brown.

FLACIANS; the followers of Matthias Flacius Illyricus, who flourished in the sixteenth century. He taught that original sin is the very substance of human nature; and that the fall of man was an event which extinguished in the human mind every virtuous tendency, every noble faculty, and left nothing behind it but universal darkness and corruption.—Head. Buck.

FLAG, (Heb. achu) occurs Gen. 41: 2, 18. Job 8: 11. and suph, weeds, Exod. 2: 3, 5. Isaiah 19: 6. John 2: 5 The word achu, in the first two instances, is translated "meadows," and in the latter, "flag." It probably denotes the sedge, or long grass, which grows in the meadows of the Nile, very grateful to the cattle.

The word suph is called by Aben Ezra, "a reed growing on the borders of the river." Bochart, Fuller, Rivetus, Ludolphus, and Junius and Tremellius, render it by juncus, carex, or alga; and Celsius thinks it the fucus or alga, "sea-weed." Dr. Geddes says there is little doubt of its being the sedge called sari, which, as we learn from Theophrastus and Pliny, grows on the marshy banks of the Nile, and rises to the height of almost two cubits. This, indeed, agrees very well with Exod. 2: 3, 5. and the thickets of arundineous plants, at some small distances from the Red Sea, observed by Dr. Shaw; but the place in Jonah seems to require some submarine plant.—Watson.

FLAGELLANTS, (from the Latin flagellare, to beat,) the name of a fanatical sect in the thirteenth century, who thought that they could best expiate their sins by the severe discipline of the scourge. Rainer, a hermit of Perugia, is said to have been its founder, in 1260. He soon found followers in nearly all parts of Italy. Old and young, great and small, ran through the cities, scourging themselves, and exhorting to repentance. Their number soon amounted to ten thousand, who went about, led by priests, bearing banners and crosses. They went in thousands from country to country, begging alms. In 1261, they broke over the Alps in crowds into Germany, showed themselves in Alcatia, Bavaria, Bohemia, and Poland; and found there many imitators. In 1296, a small band of Flagellants appeared in Strasburg, who, with covered faces, whipped themselves through the city, and at every church. The princes and higher clergy were little pleased with this new fraternity, although it was favored by the people. The shameful public exposure of the person by the Flagellants offended good manners; their travelling in such numbers afforded opportunity for seditious commotions, and irregularities of all sorts; and their extortion of alms was a tax upon the peaceful citizen. On this account, both in Germany and in Italy, several princes forbade these expeditions of the Flagellants. The kings of Poland and Bohemia expelled them with violence from their states, and the bishops strenuously opposed them. In spite of this, the society continued under another form in some of the fraternities of the Beghards, in Germany and France, and in the beginning of the fifteenth century, among the Brothers of the Cross, so numerous in Thuringia, (so called from wearing on their clothes a cross on the breast and on the back,) of whom ninety-one were burnt at once at Sangershausen, in 1414. The council, assembled at Constance, between 1414 and 1418, was obliged to take decisive measures against them. Since this time nothing more has been heard of a fraternity of this sort.—Hend. Buck.

FLAGELLATION, has almost always been used for the punishment of crimes. Its application as a means of religious penance is an old oriental custom, admitted into corrupt churches, partly because self-torment was considered salutary as the mortifying of the flesh, and partly because both Christ and the apostles underwent scourging. It became general in the eleventh century, when Peter Damiani, of Ravenna, abbot of the Benedictine monastery near Gubbio, afterwards cardinal bishop of Ostia, zealously recommended scourging as an atonement for sin, to Christians generally, and in particular to the monks. His own example, and the fame of his sanctity, rendered his exhortations effective. Clergy and laity, men and women, began to torture themselves with rods, and thongs, and chains. They fixed certain times for the infliction of this discipline upon themselves. Princes caused themselves to be scourged naked by their father confessors. It was considered as equivalent to every sort of expiation for past sins. Three thousand strokes, and the chanting of thirty penitential psalms, were deemed sufficient to cancel the sins of a year; thirty thousand strokes, the sins of ten years, &c. An Italian widow, in the eleventh century, boasted that she had made expiation by voluntary scourging for one hundred years, for which, as the requisite number, she had inflicted on herself no fewer than three hundred thousand stripes. The opinion was prevalent, likewise, that, however great the guilt, hell might be escaped by self-inflicted pain, and the honor of peculiar holiness acquired. By this means, flagellation obtained a charm in the sight of the guilty and ambitious, which raised them above the dread both of sinning and suffering, till these vain deceits of hypocrisy vanished before the clearer light of the gospel, of civilization, and knowledge. See Fanaticism, by the author of the Nat. Hist. of Enthusiasm.—Hend. Buck.

FLAGONS. In Cant. 2: 5. the bride says, "stay me with flagons; comfort me with apples." Mr. Taylor suggests that some kind of fruit seems to be intended. As one kind of gourd is by us called flagon, so might another kind, but of a similar genus, be formerly called. The word occurs here without the insertion "of wine," which is added by our translators; but in Hosea 3: 1. is added "of grapes;"—"Loving measures—flagons of grapes." Might these be grapes gathered into gourds? Or do they mean wine, as our translators have rendered them here; and have inserted the word wine in the other places—thereby fixing them to this sense?—Calmet.

FLAMINES; an order or class of priests among the ancient Romans, instituted, according to Plutarch, by Romulus, and according to Livy, by Numa. They were chosen by the people, and their inauguration was performed by the sovereign pontiff. Their number was originally three, but was afterwards increased to fifteen, the three first of whom, being taken from the senate, were called Flamines Majores; and the twelve others, taken from the people, Flamines Minors. When the emperors were deified, they also had flamens, as flamen Augusti. Their ordinary duties were to see that the ancient and customary honors were paid to the publicly acknowledged deities, and that all due respect was paid to the religion of the state; but, in the opinion of the superstitious, they were invested with interest and influence with the gods, which enabled them to maintain and exercise a powerful dominion over the minds of the vulgar.—Hend. Buck.

FLATTERY; a servile and fawning behavior, attended with servile compliances and obsequiousness, in order to gain a person's favor.—Hend. Buck.

FLAVEL, (JOHN,) a pious and popular divine, was born in Worcestershire, England, in 1627. He was in early life religiously educated by his father, and completed his public education at Oxford. Having devoted himself to the gospel ministry, he was settled at Deptford, in 1650, as assistant to Mr. Walplate. He applied himself here with great diligence to pastoral duties, while at the same time his assiduity in reading, meditation, and prayer, raised him to a high eminence in ministerial qualifications. On Mr. Walplate's death, he succeeded to the rectory. His first wife dying in childbirth, he married again a year or two afterwards, and in this connexion was very happy; she also being removed, he married a third, and subsequently a fourth time. In 1655, he accepted a unanimous and pressing call to remove to Dartmouth, where he received a much smaller stipend, but had a larger field of usefulness. In 1656, Mr. Allen Gear, was settled as his assistant, by an order from Whitehall, with whom Mr. Flavel lived in great harmony, the labors of the ministry being divided between them. Of his preaching at this time, one of his most judicious hearers remarked, "that persons must have a very soft head, or a very hard heart, or both, that could sit under Mr. Flavel's ministry unaffected."

Mr. Flavel was master of the various controversies of the day on all points of importance in theology. He was well acquainted with the school divinity. In the oriental languages, he was singularly well versed and exact. He had one way of improving his knowledge worthy of imitation: whenever in conversation, any remarkable fact, or statement was related, and he was familiar with the relater, he would request him to repeat it again, and insert it in his common-place book. By this method, among others, he accumulated rich materials for the pulpit, and the press. In prayer, his gift was excellent, and he always brought to it, a broken heart, and moving affections.

When the act of uniformity turned him out of his situation, he did not forsake his flock, but seized every opportunity of ministering to their spiritual necessities. His colleague dying soon after, the whole care devolved on him. On the execution of the Oxford act, he was compelled to remove five miles from Dartmouth to Slapton, where he was out of the reach of legal disturbance, and where many of his former flock, in spite of severity of the laws, resorted to him, and he at times stole into the town to visit them. He was invited to preach in a wood near Exeter, but scarcely was the sermon begun, before the enraged enemies broke in, and he narrowly escaped. Many of his hearers were taken and fined, but the rest, undismayed, took Mr. Flavel to another wood, where he preached to them without interruption. When a respite occurred he returned to Dartmouth and preached freely; but persecution being renewed, he went to London During his passage, a violent storm arose, and prevailed, so that all hope was extinguished without a change of the wind, which, while Mr. Flavel was supplicating in the cabin, was granted; for no sooner had he ceased, than one came down from the deck exclaiming, "Deliverance! Deliverance! God is a God hearing prayer! In a moment the wind is become fair west!" Arriving safely in London, Mr. Flavel found many friends, much work, and great encouragement; but being sought after, narrowly escaped arrest, and returned to Dartmouth. He had afterward urgent calls to settle in London, from two large and wealthy congregations; but he decided to stay with his poor people in Dartmouth.

In 1687, when James II. thought best to dispense with the penal laws, Mr. Flavel came forth from obscurity, and shone like a beacon of flame on the summit of a hill. He allowed himself little recreation: for time now seemed truly a precious jewel to be improved at any rate. But he was equally zealous in the closet, as in the pulpit. He was a mighty wrestler with God, especially for a blessing on his sermons and books, that they might be the means of the conversion of sinners: and he frequently had letters announcing the joyful fact that his labors were not in vain. He lived to see the union between the Presbyterian and Independent churches, in 1691, but while rejoicing in that event, he found the hand of death upon him, and calmly saying, "I know that it will be well with me," expired without a groan. He is best known by his works on "Keeping the heart," "Token for Mourners," "Husbandry Spiritualized," and "Navigation Spiritualized."—Middleton, vol. iv. 48.

FLAX; (Heb. phastah, Exod. 9: 31. Levit. 13: 47, 48, Judges 15: 14. Prov. 31: 13. Isaiah 19: 9. 42: 3. 43: 17. Jer. 13: 1. Ezek. 40: 8. 44: 17, 18. Hosea 2: 5, 9. Gr. linon, Matt. 12: 20. Rev. 15: 6;) a plant very common, and too well known to need a description. It is a vegetable upon which the industry of mankind has been exercised with the greatest success and utility.

On passing a field of it, one is struck with astonishment when he considers that this apparently insignificant plant may, by the labor and ingenuity of man, be made to assume an entirely new form and appearance, and to contribute to pleasure and health, by furnishing us with agreeable and ornamental apparel. This word, Mr. Parkhurst thinks, is derived from the verb phastah, to strip, because the substance which we term flax is properly the bark or fibrous part of the vegetable, piled or stripped off the stalks. From time immemorial, Egypt was celebrated for the production or manufacture of flax. Wrought into garments, it constituted the principal dress of the inhabitants, and the priests never put on any other kind of clothing. The fine linen of Egypt is celebrated in all ancient authors, and its superior excellence mentioned in the sacred Scriptures. The manufacture of flax is still carried on in that country, and many writers take notice of it. Rabbi Benjamin Tudela mentions the manufactory at Damiatia; and Egmont and Heyman describe the article as being of a beautiful color, and so finely spun that the threads are hardly discernible.—Watson.

FLEA; (Heb. phrosh, 1 Sam. 24: 14. 26: 20.) It seems, says Mr. Parkhurst, an evident derivative from phra, free, and rosh, to leap, bound, or skip, on account of its agility in leaping or skipping. David likens himself to this insect; importing that while it would cost Saul much pains to catch him, he would obtain but very little advantage from it.—Watson.

FLECHIER, (ESPRIT,) a celebrated French prelate and preacher, was born in 1632, at Pernes, near Avignon. He first became known in the capital of France by a Latin poem, on the famous Carousal, given by Louis XIV. in 1662. His Sermons and Funeral Orations soon raised him to such a pitch of reputation, that the duke of Montausier recommended him to fill the office of reader to the dauphin. It was not till 1685, that he obtained the bishopric of Lavaur. When the monarch gave it to him, he said, "Do not be surprised that I have been so tardy in rewarding your merit; I was loath to be deprived of the pleasure of hearing you preach." In 1687, he was removed to the bishopric of Nimes. In his Episcopal character he gained the love of even the Protestants of his diocese, by his uniform piety, charity, and mildness. He died in 1710. Flechier has been called the French Isocrates; his eloquence partakes, indeed, of the beauties and defects of that of the Grecian orator. His principal works are, A History of Theodosius the Great; A Life of Cardinal Ximenes; Funeral Orations; and Sermons.—Davenport.

FLECHIERE, DE LA, (REV. JOHN WILLIAM,) was born at Nyon, in Switzerland, on the 12th of September, 1729. He was very early the subject of serious impressions, which, however, (as is too frequently the case,) imperceptibly wore off. His youth was marked by his great love of learning. After spending the whole of the day in reading and study, his nights were frequently devoted to meditation; and, by means of memorandums, he retained much of what he had perused during the day. This mode of proceeding gave him that classical taste, and that accumulated and extensive knowledge, for which he was so justly celebrated. His parents, perceiving his principles to be good, and his mind comprehensive, designed him for a minister of the establishment of the church of England, but he preferred a military life. When his father refused to grant permission to his going into the army, he set off to Lisbon, accepted of a captain's commission, and engaged to serve the king of Portugal, on board a man of war which was going to Brazil; but, by the interposition of Providence, was prevented; for the morning on which the vessel was to sail, the servant, on waiting on him, scalded Mr. Flechiere's leg so much, that he was unable to move from his bed for several weeks. Thus his hopes being cut off, he gave up all idea of becoming a soldier. In the year 1754, his views began to change, and, as his mind became more impressed with a sense of divine goodness, he determined on devoting his life to the glory of God; and accordingly, as soon as he could, he consulted with the Rev. Mr. Wesley, and other pious men, on that important subject, who advised him to follow the dictates of his conscience. He therefore dedicated himself to the important work of the ministry; and in March, 1757, received deacon's orders, and priest's orders on the same month, from the hands of the bishop of Bangor. He now began to preach both in English and French. Three years after his ordination, Mr. Flechiere was presented to the living of Madely; a place for which, by his rare endowments, he was highly qualified. There he performed the work of an evangelist, and lost no opportunity of declaring the truths of the gospel. Those who endeavored to escape his vigilance, he pursued to every corner of his parish, warning and entreating them to flee from the wrath to come. Some made it an excuse for not attending the church service on a Sunday morning, that they could not wake early enough to get their families ready; which inconvenience he remedied by "taking a bell in his hand, and, at five o'clock in the morning, going round the most distant parts of the parish, and inviting all the inhabitants to the house of God." Notwithstanding the evident pains he took, he saw but little fruit of his labor; and was much persecuted by some of the private gentlemen, by some of the neighboring clergy, and even by magistrates. Placards were posted on the church doors, charging him with rebellion and schism, and of being a disturber of the public peace. Notwithstanding these continued revilings, he reviled not again, but bore his persecutions with the mildness and resignation of a Christian. His daily walks were among the fatherless, and the widows, and the oppressed.

In the summer of 1709, Mr. Flechiere, with Mr. Ireland, one of his most intimate friends, visited France, Italy, and Switzerland. Passing through the south of France, he went on foot to see the Protestants in the Cevennes mountains, whose fathers had suffered so much in the cause of truth. Towards the close of the summer he returned to England; when, at the request of Lady Huntingdon, he undertook the superintendence of her seminary for educating young men for the ministry, at Trevecka, in Wales. In 1770, he went there to reside, but shortly afterwards resigned that situation, on account of some difference with Lady Huntingdon; and he then labored with eminent success among the Wesleyan Methodists. Soon after this event his health became so bad as to oblige him again to visit Switzerland. That journey he therefore undertook; and after finding great benefit from the change of climate, he returned to England, when he was introduced to the presence of a lady with whom he had been previously acquainted, and was so much pleased with her piety and good sense, that he offered her his hand; and in 1781, they were united, and soon after returned to Madely. Mr. Flechiere had for many years seen, with regret and pain, the disconsolate condition of poor children who were uneducated; and accordingly opened a school-room for them in Madely Wood, which was the last public work in which he was employed. The health of Mr. Flechiere now declined, and on the 14th of August, 1655, he expired, in a sure and certain hope of a joyful resurrection. In him the world lost a man possessed of many accomplishments; and the Christian church a member, whose piety, lowliness of mind, and meek and quiet spirit, entitled him to the esteem of posterity.—See Benson's Life of Flechiere.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

FLEETWOOD, (WILLIAM,) an eminent prelate, and eloquent preacher, surnamed "The silver tongued," was born in 1656, in the Tower of London, where his father resided; was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge; and, after having held several valuable but minor preferments, was made bishop of St. Asaph, in 1706. From St. Asaph he was translated to Ely, in 1714. He died in 1723. He is said to have excelled in every virtue that constitutes a wise man, and in all the graces that adorn the Christian. In his political sentiments he was liberal, clashing with Hoadley and Tillotson. He was very learned, though chiefly distinguished as an antiquary. His principal works are, An Essay on Miracles; Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge; Chronicon Pretiosum, or an Account of English Money; and Practical Discourses.—Jones's Chris. Biog.; Davenport.

FLEMING, (ROBERT.) This extraordinary man was born at Bathens, Scotland, in 1630, of pious parents, who took great care of his early education. He studied philosophy at the university of Edinburgh, and divinity at St. Andrews, under the excellent Rutherford. His faculties were rich and profound, and his attainments of a correspondent order; but all learning was valued by him only as it conducted him to the knowledge of God; to whom he had at a very early age consecrated his heart. For in the language of his biographer, "It was but a little time that he had dwelt in this world, before God dwelt in him, and he in God, and that so evidently in the exercise of Christian graces, that little more doubt was made of his being born again from above, than of his being born of woman." His first pastoral charge was at Cambuslang, in Clydesdale. He was one of four hundred ministers rejected by the Glasgow act after the Restoration of Charles II. He had then a wife and seven children to support; but he committed them with himself to the providential care of his heavenly Master, and found him faithful. He was imprisoned in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, in 1673, but after a while being liberated, he went to Holland, where he succeeded the famous Mr. Brown, as pastor of the Scots congregation at Rotterdam. Here, as his activity was great, so was his success in winning souls. "The sun stood still," says his biographer, "all the time in which he had no design for God's glory on foot." He died July 15, 1694, aged sixty-three; leaving behind him several works, of which the most remarkable is "The Fulfilling of the Scriptures."—Middleton, vol. iv. 69.

FLEMINGIANS, or FLANDRIANS; a set of rigid Anabaptists, who acquired this name in the sixteenth century because most of them were natives of Flanders, by way of distinction from the Waterlandians. (See WATERLANDIANS).—Hend. Buck.

FLESH; a term of great moment in the Scriptures. An eminent critic has enumerated no less than six different meanings which it bears in the sacred writings, and for which, he affirms, there will not be found a single authority in any profane writer: 1. It sometimes denotes the whole body considered as animated, as in Matt. 26: 41, "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak." 2. It sometimes means a human being, as in Luke 3: 6, "All flesh shall see the salvation of God." 3. Sometimes a person's kindred collectively considered, as in Rom. 11: 14, "If by any means I may provoke them which are my flesh." 4. Sometimes any thing of an external or ceremonial nature, as opposed to that which is internal and moral, as in Gal. 3: 3, "Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect in the flesh?" 5. The sensitive part of our nature, or that which is the seat of appetite, as in 2 Cor. 7: 1, "Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit;" where there can be no doubt that the pollutions of the flesh must be those of the appetites, being opposed to the pollutions of the spirit, or those of the passions. 6. It is employed to denote the inward principle of moral pravity of whatever kind. Thus among the works of the flesh, (Gal. 5: 19—21,) are numbered not only adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, drunkenness, and revellings, which all relate to criminal indulgence of appetite, but idleness, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, and murders, which are manifestly vices of a different kind, and partake more of the diabolical nature than of the beastly. Hence "in the flesh," is a phrase used to denote the condition of all who are not renewed by the Spirit of God. John 3: 6. Rom. 7: 18. 8: 1.—Watson; Jones.

FLEURY, (CLAUDE, ABBE,) a divine and historian, born at Paris, in 1640, was an advocate, but subsequently took orders, became preceptor to the princes of Conti, and the count de Vermandois, and sub-preceptor to the duke of Burgundy and his royal brothers. In his character he greatly resembled his celebrated associate, the pious, humble, and amiable Fenelon. He obtained the abbey of Loc Dieu, and the priory of Argenteuil, and was for six years confessor to the youthful Louis XV. Many other preferments were offered him, but he refused them; not wishing to expose himself to the temptations of a more public life. Of Fleury, it has been truly said, "Glorificavit illum Deus in conspectu regum." He died in 1722. His most important works are, Ecclesiastical History, thirteen vols. 4to; Manners of the Israelites; Manners of the Christians; and a Treatise on Public Law.—Jones's Chris. Biog.; Davenport.

FLEES. The kinds of flies are exceedingly numerous; some with two, and some with four, wings. They abound in warm and moist regions, as in Egypt, Chaldea, Palestine, and in the middle regions of Africa; and during the rainy seasons are very troublesome. In the Hebrew Scriptures, or in the ancient versions, are seven kinds of insects, which Bochart classes among musca, or flies.

2. M. Sonnini, speaking of Egypt, says, "Of insects there the most troublesome are the flies. Both man and beast are cruelly tormented with them. No idea can be formed of their obstinate rapacity when they wish to fix upon some part of the body. It is in vain to drive them away; they return again in the self-same moment; and their perseverance wears out the most patient spirit. They like to fasten themselves in preference on the corners of the eye, and on the edge of the eyelid; tender parts, towards which a gentle moisture attracts them." The Egyptians paid a superstitious worship to several sorts of flies and insects. If then, such was the superstitious homage of this people, nothing could be more determinate than the judgment brought upon them by Moses. They were punished by the very things they revered; and though they boasted of spells and charms, yet they could not ward off the evil.

3. How intolerable a plague of flies can prove, is evi dent from the fact, that whole districts have been laid waste by them. Such was the fate of Myuns in Ionia, and of Alarnæ. The inhabitants were forced to quit these cities, not being able to stand against the flies and gnats with which they were pestered. Trajan was obliged to raise the siege of a city in Arabia, before which he had sat down, being driven away by the swarms of these insects. Hence different people had deities whose office it was to defend them against flies. Among these may be reckoned Baalzebub, the fly-god of Ekron: Hercules muscarum abactor, "Hercules, the expeller of flies;" and hence Jupiter had the titles of apomnios, muigros, muichoros, because he was supposed to expel flies, and especially to clear his temples of these insects.

4. Solomon observes, "Dead flies cause the apothecary's ointment to stink," Eccles. 10: 1. "A fact well known," says Schencher; "wherefore apothecaries take care to prevent flies from coming to their syrups and other fermentable preparations. For in all insects there is an acrid volatile salt, which, mixed with sweet or even alkaline substances, excites them to a brisk intestine motion, disposes them to fermentation, and to putrescence itself; by which the more volatile principles fly off, leaving the grosser behind: at the same time, the taste and odor are changed, the agreeable to fetid, the sweet to insipid." This verse is an illustration, by a very appropriate similitude, of the concluding assertion in the preceding chapter, that "one sinner destroyeth much good," as one dead fly spoils a whole vessel of precious ointment, which, in eastern countries, was considered as very valuable, 2 Kings 20: 13. The application of this proverbial expression to a person's good name, which is elsewhere compared to sweet ointment, (Eccles. 7: 1. Cant. 1: 3.) is remarkably significant. As a fly, though a diminutive creature, can taint and corrupt much precious perfume; so a small mixture of folly and indiscretion will tarnish the reputation of one who, in other respects, is very wise and honorable; and so much the more, because of the malignity and ingratitude of mankind, who are disposed rather to censure one error, than to commend many excellencies, and from whose minds one small miscarriage is sufficient to blot out the memory of all other deserts. It concerns us, therefore, to conduct ourselves unblamably, that we may not by the least oversight or folly blemish our profession, or cause it to be offensive to others.—Watson.

FLOOD. (See SHEPHERD.)

FLOOD. (See DELUGE; ARK.)

FLOOR, for threshing grain, or threshing-floor, is frequently mentioned in Scripture. This was a place in the open air, in which grain was threshed, by means of a cart or sledge, or some other instrument, drawn by oxen. The threshing-floors among the Jews were only, as they are to this day in the East, round level plats of ground in the open air, where the grain was trodden out by oxen. Thus Gideon's floor appears to have been in the open air, (Judges 6: 37;) and also that of Araunah the Jebusite, (2 Sam. 24:) otherwise it would not have been a proper place for erecting an altar, and offering sacrifices. In Hosea 13: 3, we read of the chaff "which is driven by the whirlwind from the floor. The circumstance of the threshingfloor's being exposed to the agitation of the wind seems to be the principal reason of its Hebrew name. It appears therefore, that a threshing-floor, which is rendered in our textual translation, "a void place," might well be near the entrance of the gate of Samaria, and a proper situation in which the kings of Israel and Judah might hear the prophets, 1 Kings 22: 10. 2 Chron. 18: 9.

An instrument sometimes used in Palestine and the East, to force the corn out of the ear, and bruise the straw, was a heavy kind of sledge, made of thick boards, and furnished beneath with teeth of stone or iron, Isa. 41: 15. The sheaves being laid in order, the sledge was drawn over the straw by oxen, and at the same time threshed out the grain, and cut or broke the straw into a kind of chaff. An instrument in the East is still used for the same purpose. This sledge is alluded to in 2 Sam. 12: 31. Isa. 28: 27. 41: 15. Amos 1: 3. Dr. Lowth, in his Notes on Isaiah 28: 27, 28, observes, that four methods of threshing are mentioned in this passage, by different instruments; the flail, the drag, the wain, and the treading of the cattle. The staff, or flail, was used for the inferiorem seminam, the grain that was too tender to be treated in the other methods. The drag consisted of a sort of frame of strong planks, made rough at the bottom with hard stones or iron; it was drawn by horses or oxen over the sheaves on the floor, the driver sitting upon it. The wain was nearly similar to this instrument, but had wheels with iron teeth, or edges, like a saw. The last method is well known from the law of Moses, which forbids the ox to be muzzled when he treadeth out the corn.

Niebuhr, in his Travels, gives the following description of a machine which the people of Egypt use at this day for threshing out their grain: "This machine," says he, "is called nawrdjsj. It has three rollers, which turn on their axles; and each of them is furnished with some irons, round and flat. At the beginning of June, Mr. Forskall and I several times saw, in the environs of Dsjise, how corn was threshed in Egypt. Every peasant chose for himself, in the open field, a smooth plat of ground, from eighty to a hundred paces in circumference. Hither was brought, on camels or asses, the corn in sheaves, of which was formed a ring of six or eight feet wide, and two high. Two oxen were made to draw over it again and again the sledge, traineau, above mentioned; and this was done with the greatest convenience to the driver; for he was seated in a chair fixed on the sledge. Two such parcels or layers of corn are threshed out in a day, and they move each of them as many as eight times, with a wooden fork of five prongs, which they call meddre. Afterwards they throw the straw into the middle of the ring, where it forms a heap, which grows bigger and bigger. When the first layer is threshed, they replace the straw in the ring, and thresh it as before. Thus the straw becomes every time smaller, till at last it resembles chopped straw. After this, with the fork just described, they cast the whole some yards from thence, and against the wind; which driving back the straw, the corn and the ears not threshed out fall apart from it, and make another heap. A man collects the clods of dirt, and other impurities to which any corn adheres, and throws them into a sieve. They afterwards place in a ring the heaps, in which a good many entire ears are still found, and drive over them, for four or five hours together, ten couple of oxen joined two and two, till by absolute trampling they have separated the grains, which they throw into the air with a shovel to cleanse them."—Watson.

FLORINIANS, or FLORINIANI, so called from Florinus, a priest of Rome, said to be a disciple of Polycarp. This sect was a branch of the Valentinians in the second century. (See VALENTINIANS.)—Williams.

FLORUS, (GESSIUS), succeeded Albinus in the government of Judea, A. D. 54. His excesses exasperated the Jews beyond patience, and forced them to rebel against the Romans, A. D. 66. He is thought to have left Judea, when Vespasian went there, A. D. 67.—Calmet.

FLOUR. (See BREAD; CAKES; OFFERINGS; &c.)

FLOURISH; to bud, spring forth; appear beautiful as a flower, Sol. Song 7: 12. Christ's crown flourisheth when his authority and glory are signally displayed, and many become his faithful, loving, and obedient subjects,

Ps. 132: 18. The church flourisheth when the ordinances are pure and powerful, her ministers faithful, wise, and diligent, and her members mightily increase, and walk as becomes the Gospel, Sol. Song 6: 11. Men in general flourish when they appear gay in youth, and prosper and increase in wisdom, honor, wealth, or pleasure, Ps. 90: 6, and 92: 7. Saints flourish when their grace, comforts, and good works more and more abound, Isa. 66: 14.—Brown.

FLOWERS. (1.) A running of blood. Lev. 15: 21. (2.) The open, fragrant, and beautiful huds of some vegetables. Flowers are very delightful, but easily and quickly fade, James 1: 10. Men in general are like flowers: in youth and prosperity how blooming, delightful, and glorious! but how quickly does trouble or death mar their beauty, and bereave them of wealth, honor, or life, Job. 14: 2. Isa. 40: 6, and 28: 1. Jam. 1: 10, 11.—Brown.

FLUTE; a musical instrument, sometimes mentioned in Scripture by the names Chalil, Machalath, Masrokoth, and Huggab. The last word is generally translated organ; but Calmet thinks it was nothing more than a flute; though his description of it corresponds to "the Pandean pipes," which are extremely ancient, and were perhaps the original organ.

There is notice taken in the gospels, of players on the flute, [Eng. Trans. minstrels,] who were collected at funerals; See Matt. 9: 23, 24. The rabbins say, that it was not allowable to have less than two players on the flute, at the funeral of persons of the meanest condition, beside a professional woman hired to lament; and Josephus relates, that a false report of his death being spread at Jerusalem, several persons hired players on the flute, by way of preparation for his funeral. In the Old Testament, however, we see nothing like it. The Jews probably borrowed the custom from the Romans. When it was an old woman who died, they used trumpets; but flutes when a young woman was to be buried.—Calmet.

FLUX, (BLOODY,) another name for the dysentery, Acts 28: 8.

FOAM; to cast forth as a raging sea. Foaming at the mouth is expressive of rage, or tormenting inward pain. Mark 9: 16. Seducers foam out their own shame, when, from a corrupt heart, and with rage against Christ and his ways, they publish their vain and erroneous doctrines, and indulge themselves in shameful practices, Jude 13. The king of Samaria was cut off as the foam of water. Some of their last kings were basely murdered; and Hoshea, the last, was easily and quickly destroyed, and reduced to abject slavery, Hos. 10: 7.—Brown.

FOLD; a house, or small enclosure, for flocks to rest together in by night or at noon, Isa. 13: 20. The country which a nation possesseth and dwelleth together in, is called their fold, Jer. 23: 3. The church and ordinances of Christ are as a fold: there his sheep or people are gathered together; they enter by him as the door, and have strict union, and delightful society, and pleasant refreshment and rest together, and are surrounded with his protection and laws, John 10: 1.—Brown.

FOLLOW. To follow the Lord is to choose him as our portion, observe his laws, imitate his perfections, and cleave to his worship, Jer. 17: 16. To follow Christ, the Lamb of God, is, under the direction and influence of his word and Spirit, to depend on his righteousness and strength, imitate his example, and cleave close to his truth and ordinances, (Rev. 14: 4;) or to die with him, John 13: 36. To follow false gods is idolatrously to honor and worship them, Judg. 2: 12. God's goodness and mercy follow the saints; in the exercise thereof he constantly attends, supports, and relieves them; forgives their sins, protects them from danger, and bestows on them grace and glory, Ps. 23: 6. Our good works follow us into heaven; though they do not go before, to purchase our entrance, yet we there obtain the pleasant and gracious reward of them, Rev. 13: 14.—Brown.

FO, FOE, FOHI, is revered in China as the founder of a religion, which was introduced into China in the first century of the Christian era. According to tradition, he was born in Cashmere, about the year B. C. 1027. While his mother was in travail, the stars were darkened, and nine dragons descended from heaven. He was born from her right side, and immediately after the birth she died.

At the moment of his entrance into the world, he stood upright on his feet, stepped forward seven paces, and pointing one hand to heaven, and the other to the earth, spoke distinctly these words:—"None in heaven or earth deserves adoration besides me." In his seventeenth year he married three wives, and became the father of a son; but in his nineteenth year he left his family, and went with four wise men into the wilderness. When thirty, he was deified; and, confirming his doctrines by pretended miracles, collected an immense number of disciples round him, and spread his doctrines throughout the East. His priests and disciples were called in China Seng, in Tartary Lamas, in Siam Talopouts, and in Europe Bonzes. In the seventy-ninth year of his age, perceiving that his end was approaching, Fo declared to his disciples, "That hitherto he had spoken only in enigmatical and figurative language; but that now, being about to take leave of them, he would unveil to them the mysteries of his doctrine. Know then," said he, "that there is no other principle of all things but the void and nothing; that from nothing all things have sprung, and to nothing all must return; and there all our hopes must end." This final declaration of Fo divided his disciples into three sects. Some founded on it an atheistical sect; the greater part adhered to his ancient doctrines; while others made a distinction between an exoteric and an esoteric doctrine, which they endeavored to bring into harmony.

The exoteric doctrine of Fo contains his system of morality. It distinguishes between good and evil: he who has done good during his life will be rewarded after death; and he who has done evil will be punished. He gave his followers only these five precepts:—Not to kill any living creature; not to take the property of another; to avoid impurity and unchastity; not to speak falsely; and to abstain from wine. They are taught the practice of charity; the merit accruing from the building of temples and convents; and the punishment of their souls entering into the bodies of the vilest and most unclean animals if they commit sin.

The principal esoteric or secret doctrines, into which but few are initiated, are the following:—The origin and end of all things is the void and nothing. The first human beings have sprung from nothing, and are returned to nothing. The void constitutes our being. All things, living and inanimate, constitute one whole; differing from each other not in essence, but only in form and qualities. The original essence of all things is pure, unchangeable, highly subtle, and simple, and, because it is simple, the perfection of all other beings. It is perfect, and therefore exists in an uninterrupted quiet, without possessing virtue, power, or intelligence; nay, its very essence consists in the absence of intelligence, activity, and want or desire. Whoever desires to be happy, must constantly endeavor to conquer themselves, and become like the original essence. To accomplish this, he must accustom himself not to act, desire, feel, nor think. The great precept was—endeavor to annihilate thyself; for, as soon as thou ceasest to be thyself, thou becomest one with God, and returnest into his being. The other followers of Fo adopt the doctrine of the void and nothing, and the transmigration of souls; but teach that they enter ultimately the class of Samanœans, and finally appear in the bodies of perfect Samanœans, who have no more crimes to expiate, and need no longer to revere the gods, who are only the servants of the Supreme God of the universe. This Supreme unoriginated Being cannot be represented by any image; neither can he be worshipped, because he is elevated above all worship; but his attributes may be represented, adored, and worshipped. Hence the source of the worship of images by the natives of India, and of the multitude of particular tutelary deities in China. All the elements, the changes of the weather, &c. have each its particular genius; and all these gods are servants or officers of the Supreme God, Seng-wang-Man.

The public worship of Fo, which became a national religion, is called, in India, Brahminism.—Hend. Buck.

FOLLY, according to Mr. Locke, consists in the drawing of false conclusions from just principles, by which it is distinguished from madness, which draws just conclusions from false principles. But this seems too confined a definition. Folly, in its most general acceptation, denotes a weakness of intellect or apprehension, or some partial absurdity in sentiment or conduct. (See FOOL; FOOLISH SPEAKING; EVIL; SIN.)—Hind. Buck.

FOOD. Questions concerning meats and drinks have occasioned much angry and bitter contention, both in the Jewish and Christian church. Undue importance has often, no doubt, been attached to certain distinctions in these matters, and many have been scrupulously nice about what they might eat and drink, while they seem to have forgotten that the kingdom of heaven consisted of righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Others, however, have erred on the other hand, by despising all attention to such things, as too trifling to deserve regard. But it must certainly be admitted, that the food by which man is supported and nourished, is not in itself of small importance. He who made all things for the use of man, best knows what is good for food, and what is fitted to serve other purposes. He has an undoubted right to grant or to withhold the use of his creatures; and if he has interfered in this matter, it becomes us to bow with deference to his authority. That particular kinds of food may be productive of certain physical and moral effects on the human constitution, is not to be denied; in this point of view, therefore, the importance of divine enactments respecting their use may be shown. And if distinctions in the use of animals were connected with important religious institutions, and intended to illustrate some interesting doctrines of morality, their propriety may be still further defended. That laws and regulations have been given by the Almighty to guide mankind in this affair, must be obvious to every man who looks into the Bible; and an investigation of the nature of these laws will be found interesting both to the philosopher and the Christian.

That we may have the whole subject before us at once, it may be proper to place, under its proper head, the several grants or laws which have been made on these matters at different times. See Grant to Adam, Gen. 1: 29. 2: 16. Grant to Noah, Gen. 9: 3, 4. Jewish Law, Lev. 17: 10, 11. Christian Law, Acts 15: 28, 29. Jewish Restrictions, Lev. 11. Christian Liberty, Acts 10: 9, 15. 1 Cor. 10: 25, 26. 1 Tim. 4: 4, 5. Gen. 2: 16. 9: 3, 4. Lev. 17: 10, 11. Acts 15: 28, 29. Lev. 11. Acts 10: 9, 15. 1 Cor. 10: 25, 26. 1 Tim. 4: 4, 5.

In these passages we have a general view of the law of Scripture on the subject of meats, from the earliest period to the present time. It is evident there has been a considerable difference in it during the several dispensations. At first, the grant of food was very limited; it afterwards was greatly extended; by the Mosaic law it was restricted in a peculiar manner, and now again we enjoy a high degree of liberty.

ON THE GRANT TO ADAM we would observe:

1. That in the state of original innocence, neither man nor beasts seem to have been intended to live upon animals. Man was allowed vegetables and fruit; beasts were restricted to the use of the green herb.

2. Whatever is not mentioned in the grant, must be considered as excluded from it: for Adam could have no experience of the fitness or unfitness of any thing for food, but what he was told by God. He would, therefore, judge every thing improper or unlawful which he was not expressly permitted to use.

3. To the general use of fruits there was one particular exception;—the fruit of the tree of knowledge, which was intended to answer certain important moral purposes.

4. The first grant, we have no doubt, was fully adequate to all the wants of the first race of men; and sufficient to nourish them under a genial climate, and with the small degree of labor which they had to undergo.

5. The slaughtering of animals would perhaps have been inconsistent with a state of innocence. The sorrows and death of the brute creation are connected with a state of sin, as well as our own. Even the heathen excluded the use of animals from their golden age. "During the reign of Saturn, that is, the golden age," says Diacærethus, quoted by Jerome, "when the ground poured forth in abundance, no flesh was eaten, but all lived on vegetables and fruits, which the earth brought forth spontaneously."

So Ovid:

*At vetus illa ætas, cui fecimus aurea nomen,
Fætibus arboris, et quas humus educat herbas
Fortunata fuit, nec polluit ora uruere.—l. xv.*

And Plato tells us "men all then lived from the earth, for they had abundance of trees and fruits; the soil being so fruitful that it supplied those fruits with its own accord, without the labor of agriculture."—Gale, C. C. p. i. 336.

6. It is impossible to say from Scripture whether the antediluvians used animal food or not. It is by no means improbable they transgressed this as well as other divine precepts; that they had not received permission so to do is evident, both from this, and also from THE GRANT TO NOAH; on which we now observe:

1. That this is the first revealed grant of animals for food. They had already been slain in sacrifice, but not for meat. The reasons assigned by Bochart and Grotius for being of a different opinion have little weight, and have been repeatedly answered.

2. There is in the second grant a plain allusion to the first, which is quite inexplicable on the ground of any previous permission to use animal food. "Even as the green herb have I given you all things." Had animal food been allowed in the grant to Adam, would not a grant to Noah have been unnecessary?

3. The grant of animal food was now probably given on account of the physical changes produced both on the world and the human constitution by the flood. Men are now subjected to a greater degree of bodily labor; they of course require more nourishing aliment than vegetable; and perhaps the vegetable productions themselves are less nutritious than they were before; and in many parts of the earth a sufficiency of vegetable food could not be procured; such are all the cold northern and southern regions of the globe. By having a choice of food we are enabled to suit it to our health and circumstances, and to resist the debilitating effects of changeable and unfriendly atmospheres. Merciful are all the appointments of God.

4. As in the first, so also in the second grant, is there an exception, or limitation:—"Flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat." This limitation we understand to contain two things; first, it prohibits eating the flesh of a living animal; and, next, the blood of a creature by itself; for this plain reason, that the blood was the life of the animal. The first will generally be granted, because the practice is repugnant to our feelings and to humanity; the latter, however, has been a subject of dispute. (See ANIMAL; and BLOOD.)

ON THE JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN LAW upon this subject, it appears that they both unite in prohibiting the same thing—blood, whether in or out of the animal; for things strangled seem to relate to things strangled for the sake of keeping the blood in them.

It deserves to be noticed, that the Christian prohibition is absolute. The decree assigns neither one reason nor another. Its language is as pointed with regard to blood as to fornication; and no man has any right to add reasons limiting the prohibition to particular times or circumstances, where the Holy Spirit has been silent. That which had never before been granted, this decree undoubtedly does not sanction.

The Christian law prohibits also "meats offered to idols," or "pollutions of idols." "Meats were polluted by idolatrous worship when the whole had been previously offered in sacrifice, and a part afterwards converted into a feast, or when a part was taken from table and put into the fire, with an invocation of the idol. Now, as meats are "sanctified by the word of God and prayer," (1 Tim. 4: 3, 5;) so meats are polluted by the name of idols, and prayer to them. From the first epistle to the Corinthians, ch. 8: 10, it appears that the Gentile brethren were not always very willing to admit this truth, but were sometimes inclined to feast with their heathen neighbors, not only in private houses, but even in the temples of idols. It was necessary, therefore, to write unto them to abstain from those pollutions. This prohibition is inculcated and defended by Paul, at great length, in the passages just mentioned of his epistle to the Corinthians, which afford an excellent illustration of this clause in the decree, and of the manner in which Christians are bound to observe it. Some have thought that Paul departs from the strict letter of this injunction, because, in ch. 8, he argues merely from the effect of example. But his doctrine, when fully examined, will be found exactly the same with that of James. It still amounts to a prohibition; for although he allows all meats to be indifferent in themselves, he expressly condemns the practice of eating meats offered to idols, especially in ch. 10, where he shows it to be inconsistent with fellowship at the table of the Lord, with regard for the conscience of other men, and with the duty of a Christian, whether he eats or drinks, or whatsoever he does, to do all to the glory of God. Wherever meats, therefore, are polluted by idolatrous worship, Christians, when they know the fact, are to testify their abhorrence of idolatry by abstaining from such meats."—Ewing's Lect. on Acts 15.

It is not unworthy of observation, that Mahomet prohibits his followers from eating the same things which are forbidden by the Jewish and Christian laws.—Hend. Buck.

FOOL; one who has not the use of reason or judgment. In Scripture, wicked persons are often called fools, or foolish, because such act contrary to reason, trust to their own hearts, violate the laws of God, and prefer things vile, trifling, and temporal, to such as are important, divine, and eternal.

Our Lord seems to have used the term in a sense somewhat peculiar, in Matt. 5: 22. "Whosoever shall say to his brother, thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire." But the whole verse shows the meaning to be, that when any one of his professed disciples indulges a temper and disposition of mind opposite to charity, or that peculiar love which the brethren of Christ are bound by his law to have towards each other, (John 13: 34,) not only evincing anger against another without a cause, but also treating him with contemptuous language, he shall be in danger of eternal destruction.—Hend. Buck; Jones.

FOOLISH SPEAKING; such kind of conversation as includes folly, and can no ways be profitable and interesting, Eph. 5: 4. Facetiousness, indeed, is allowable, when it ministers to harmless diversion, and delight to conversation; when it is used for the purpose of exposing things which are base and vile; when it has for its aim the reformation of others; when used by way of defence under unjust reproach. But all such kind of speaking as includes profane jesting, loose, wanton, scurrilous, injurious, unseasonable, vain-glorious talk, is strictly forbidden. See Barrow's excellent Sermon on this subject in his Works, vol. 1. ser. 14.—Hend. Buck.

FOOLS, (FEAST OF.) Festivals under this name were regularly celebrated from the fifth to the sixteenth century, in several countries of Europe, by the clergy and laity, with the most absurd ceremonies, and form one of the strangest phenomena in the history of mankind. They were an imitation of the Saturnalia, or heathen festivals, and like these were celebrated in December. The chief celebration fell on New Year, or Innocents' Day; but the feast continued from Christmas to the last Sunday of Epiphany. At first only the boys of the choir, and young sacristans, played the principal part in them; but afterwards all the inferior servants of the church, whilst the bishop, or highest clergymen of the place, with the canons, formed the audience. The young people, who played the chief parts, chose from their own number a bishop or archbishop of fools, as he was called, and consecrated him, with many ridiculous ceremonies, in the principal church of the place. This officer then took the usual seat of the bishop, and caused high mass to be said, unless he preferred to read it himself, and to give the people his blessing. During this time the rest of the performers, dressed in different kinds of masks and disguises, engaged in indecent songs and dances, and practised all possible follies in the church. These incongruous practices were condemned by popes and councils, and forbidden by the Sorbonne in 1444; but they continued to be stoutly defended till the time of the reformation.—Hend. Buck.

FOOT. Anciently it was customary to wash the feet of strangers coming off a journey, because generally they travelled barefoot, or wore sandals only, which did not secure them from dust or dirt. Jesus Christ washed the feet of his apostles and thereby taught them to perform the humblest services for one another. Feet, in the sacred writers, often mean inclinations, affections, propensities, actions, motions: "Guide my feet in thy paths." "Keep thy feet at a distance from evil." "The feet of the debauched woman go down to death." "Let not the foot of pride come against me." "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day," (Isa. 58: 13;) if thou forbearest walking and travelling on the sabbath-day, and do not then, thine own will. We know that journeys were forbidden on the sabbath-day, Matt. 24: 20. Acts 1: 12. To be at any one's feet, signifies obeying him, listening to his instructions and commands. Moses says that "the Lord loved his people; all his aints are in thy hand: and they sat down at his feet," Dent. 33: 3. St. Paul was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel. Mary sat at our Savior's feet, and heard his word, Luke 10: 39.

2. To be under any one's feet, to be a footstool to him, signifies the absolute subjection of enemies; but not their reconciliation or willing obedience. It is a phrase which is illustrated by the history of the five kings of Canaan, and is clearly an allusion to it. See Josh. 10: 24, compared with Ps. 110: 1.

3. It is said that the land of Canaan is not like Egypt, "where thou sowest thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot," Deut. 11: 10. Palestine is a country which has rains, plentiful dews, springs, rivulets, brooks, &c., that supply the earth with the moisture necessary to its fruitfulness. On the contrary, Egypt has no river except the Nile: there it seldom rains, and the lands which are not within reach of the inundation continue parched and barren. To supply this want, ditches are dug from the river, and water is distributed throughout the several villages and cantons: there are great struggles who shall first obtain it; and, in this dispute, they frequently come to blows. Notwithstanding these precautions, many places have no water; and, in the course of the year, those places which are nearest the Nile require to be watered again by means of art and labor. This was formerly done by the help of machines, one of which is thus described by Philo: It is a wheel which a man turns by the motion of his feet, by ascending successively the several steps that are within it. This is what Moses means in this place by saying, that, in Egypt, they water the earth with their feet. The water is thus conveyed to cisterns; and when the gardens want refreshment, water is conducted by trenches to the beds in little rills, which are stopped by the foot, and turned at pleasure into different directions.—Watson.

FOOTSTOOL. The common manner of sitting, in the Eastern countries, is upon the ground, or floor, with the legs crossed. People of distinction have the floors of their chambers covered with carpets for this purpose; all round the chamber broad couches, raised a little above the floor, spread with mattresses handsomely covered, which are called sofas. When sitting is spoken of as a posture of more than ordinary state, it is quite of a different kind; and means sitting on high, on a chair of state or throne; for which a footstool was necessary, both in order that the person might raise himself up to it, and for supporting the legs when he was placed in it. "Chairs," says Sir John Chardin, "are never used in Persia, but at the coronation of their kings, when the monarch is seated in a chair of gold set with jewels, three feet high. The chairs which are used by the people in the East are always so high as to make a footstool necessary; and this proves the propriety of the style of Scripture which always joins the footstool to the throne, Isa. 66: 1. Ps. 110: 1." Chardin's Travels in Persia.—Jones.

FORBEARANCE, is the act of patiently enduring provocation or offence. The following may be considered as the most powerful incentives to the exercise of this disposition:—1. The consideration that we ourselves often stand in need of it from others, Gal. 6: 1. 2. The express command of Scripture, Eph. 4: 2. Col. 3: 13. 3. The felicity of this disposition. It is sure to bring happiness at last, while resentment only increases our own misery. 4. That it is one of the strongest evidences we can give of the reality of our religion, John 13: 35. 5. The beautiful example of Christ, Heb. 12: 3. 1 Pet. 2: 21—23.—Hend. Buck.

FORBEARANCE OF GOD. (See PATIENCE OF GOD.)

FORDYCE, (JAMES, D. D.) an admired Scotch divine, was born, in 1720, at Aberdeen; was educated at Marischal college; and was, successively, minister at Brechin, Alloa, and Monkwell street, London. In 1782, he relinquished the pastoral office, and retired first to Hampshire, and afterwards to Bath. He died at Bath, in 1796. Dr. Fordyce is said to have been a warm hearted evangelical Christian. His compositions are elegant, but not eminently distinguished for gospel truth, if we except his excellent charge to his successor, Dr. Lindsay. He wrote Sermons to Young Women; Addresses to Young Men; Addresses to the Deity; and some single Sermons. His brother, David, born in 1711, and died in 1750, was also in orders; and wrote Dialogues concerning Education; Theodorus, a Dialogue on the Art of Preaching; and the Treatise on Moral Philosophy, in Doddsley's Preceptor.—Davenport; Jones's Chris. Biog.

FOREHEAD, (MARK ON THE,) Ezekiel 9: 4. Mr. Maurice, speaking of the religious rites of the Hindoos, says, before they can enter the great pagoda, an indispensable ceremony takes place, which can only be performed by the hand of a brahmin; and that is, the impression of their foreheads with the tiluk, or mark of different colors, as they may belong either to the sect of Veesnu, or Seeva. If the temple be that of Veesnu, their foreheads are marked with a longitudinal line, and the color used is vermilion. If it be the temple of Seeva, they are marked with a parallel line, and the color used is tumeric, or saffron. But these two grand sects being again subdivided into numerous classes, both the size and the shape of the tiluk are varied, in proportion to their superior or inferior rank. In regard to the tiluk, I must observe, that it was a custom of very ancient date in Asia to mark their servants in the forehead. It is alluded to in these words of Ezekiel, where the Almighty commands his angels to "go through the midst of the city, and set a mark on the foreheads of the men who sigh for the abominations committed in the midst thereof." The same idea occurs also in Rev. 7: 3. 22: 4.—Watson.

FOREKNOWLEDGE OF GOD, is his foresight or knowledge of every thing that is to come to pass, Acts 2: 23. This foreknowledge, says Charnock, was from eternity. Seeing he knows things possible in his power, and things future in his will, if his power and resolves were from eternity, his knowledge must be so too; or else we must make him ignorant of his own power, and ignorant of his own will from eternity, and consequently not from eternity blessed and perfect. His knowledge of possible things must run parallel with his will. If he willed from eternity, he knew from eternity what he willed; but that he did will from eternity we must grant, unless we would render him changeable, and conceive him to be made in time of not willing, willing. The knowledge God hath in time was always one and the same, because his understanding is his proper essence, as perfect as his essence, and of an immutable nature.

"To deny this (says Saurin) is to degrade the Almighty; for what, pray, is a God who created beings, and who could not foresee what would result from their existence? A God who formed spirits united to bodies by certain laws, and who did not know how to combine these laws so as to foresee the effects they would produce? A God forced to suspend his judgment? A God who every day learns something new, and who doth not know to-day what will happen to-morrow? A God who cannot tell whether peace will be concluded, or war continue to ravage the world; whether religion will be received in a certain kingdom, or whether it will be banished; whether the right heir will succeed to the crown, or whether the crown will be set on the head of an usurper? For according to the different determinations of the wills of men, of king, or people, the prince will make peace, or declare war; religion will be banished or admitted; the tyrant or the lawful king will occupy the throne: for if God cannot foresee how the volitions of men will be determined, he cannot foresee any of these events. What is this but to degrade God from his Deity, and to make the most perfect of all intelligences a being involved in darkness and uncertainty like ourselves." (See OMNISCIENCE.)

The whole plan of man's redemption resolves itself into the Divine foreknowledge; and every minute circumstance pertaining to it was regulated thereby, Rom. 8: 29, 30. Eph. 1: 3—12. 2 Tim. 1: 9. All the heirs of salvation are said to have been foreknown to God; for "whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate," Rom. 8: 29. To know in Scripture, often includes the idea of special favor and good will, as in Exod. 33: 17. John 10: 14, 15; and God's foreknowledge of his people is evidently used in this sense by the apostle, when he says, "God hath not cast away his people whom he foreknew," Rom. 11: 2. "He hath not appointed them to wrath; but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for them, that whether they wake or sleep they should live together with him," 1 Thess. 5: 9, 10. (See the articles ELECTION and PREDESTINATION.)—Itud. Buck; Jones.

FORE-ORDAIN, is to appoint before hand to some specific end or purpose. Thus the apostle says, "Christ was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world," 1 Pet. 1: 20; that is, he was appointed, or destined, in the Divine eternal counsels, to the great work of redeeming sinners, which in due time he accomplished by the shedding of his own precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, ver. 18, 19. See also Ps. 40: 6—8. Heb. 10: 5—10.—Jones.

FORE-RUNNER, (Gr. prodromos;) precursor, denotes a person who hastens before to some particular place, with the view of arranging certain important concerns belonging to others that are coming after. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews applies the title to Christ, in that well-known passage, ch. 6: 20: "Whither the fore-runner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high-priest forever after the order of Melchisedek." There is, probably, in this adoption of the term, an allusion to Christ's own consolatory words before he left the world: "I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you to myself; that where I am, there ye may be also," John 14: 2, 3. He is gone into heaven not only as the High-priest but also as the Head of the Christian church, and as such to make way for the entrance of all his people after him.—Jones.

FORESKIN. (See CIRCUMCISION.)

FOREST; a woody tract of ground. There were several such tracts in Canaan, especially in the northern parts. The chief of these were,

THE FOREST OF EPHRAIM, near Mahanaim.

THE FOREST OF HARETH, in Judah.

THE FOREST OF LIBANUS. In addition to the proper forest of Libanus, where the cedars grow, Scripture thus calls a palace, which Solomon built at Jerusalem, contiguous to the palace of the king of Egypt's daughter; and in which he usually resided. All the vessels of it were of gold. It was called the house of the forest of Libanus, probably from the great quantity of cedar used in it, 1 Kings 7: 2. 10: 27.

FORGET. Men forget God when they neglect to think of and worship him; when they break his laws, and pour contempt on any thing pertaining to him, Judg. 3: 7. Men forget Jerusalem when they are thoughtless and unconcerned how things go in the church, Ps. 137: 5. God's elect forget their father's house and their own people; in embracing Christianity, the Jews quitted their own ceremonies and temple; in receiving Christ, every one quits his natural dispositions, false persuasions, self-righteousness, and sinful customs; and parts with natural relations so as to prefer Christ to all, Ps. 45: 10. Saints forget the things behind when they disesteem their works and attainments, and think of, and press after further knowledge of, intimacy with, and conformity to, Christ, Phil. 3: 15.—Brown.

FORGIVENESS, (CHRISTIAN;) the pardon of any offence committed against us. The Christian lawgiver, while forbidding the retaliation of injuries, hath suspended the exercise of forgiveness among his disciples, upon the repentance of the transgressor, or on an acknowledgment of having done wrong. "If he repent, forgive him," Matt. 18: 15—35, comp. with Luke 17: 3, 4. But when the sin or trespass is confessed, the forgiveness must be prompt and from the very heart; free from all mental reservation; no grudging, no evil surmising must be entertained; in their manner of forgiving, Christians must imitate that divine pattern which their heavenly Father hath set them, when, "for Christ's sake he forgave them," Col. 3: 12, 13. Eph. 4: 32. And he has bound them in the most solemn manner to the exercise of this duty under the awful penalty of not having their own daily trespasses forgiven, and themselves rejected in the great day of account, Matt. 6: 12, 14, 15. 18: 21—35. To all which may be added, that Christianity, in the most pointed manner, forbids its friends to retaliate injuries which they may sustain from the unbelieving world; but, on the contrary, they are to "love their enemies; to bless those that curse them; to do good to such as hate them; and to pray for those who despitefully use and persecute them," Matt. 5: 44. "This," says an ingenious writer, "was a lesson so new and utterly unknown, till taught by his doctrines and enforced by his example, that the wisest moralists of the wisest nations and ages represented the desire of revenge as a mark of a noble mind. But how much more magnanimous, how much more beneficial to mankind, is forgiveness! It is more magnanimous, because every generous and exalted disposition of the human mind is requisite to the practice of it; and it is the most beneficial, because it puts an end to an eternal succession of injuries and retaliations." It has been truly said, "The feuds and animosities in families, and between neighbors, which disturb the intercourse of human life, and collectively compose half the misery of it, have their foundation in the want of a forgiving temper, and can never cease but by the exercise of this virtue on one side, or on both." Paley's Mor. Phil. vol. i. p. 271; Saane Jenyn's Int. Evid. pp. 67, 68; Clarke's Ser., ser. ii. vol. x.; Tillotson's Ser., vol. viii. p. 254.—Massillon's Sermons; Hend. Buck; Jones.

FORGIVENESS OF SINS. (See PARDON; MERCY.)

FORM, is generally taken for the figure, shape, or likeness of a thing. Thus one of Job's friends, alluding to a nocturnal spectre, says, "I could not discern the form thereof;" Job 4: 16. Sometimes it is taken for a draught or pattern of any thing. So the apostle says to Timothy, "Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me," (2 Tim. 1: 13.) that is, let all thy discourses correspond exactly to "the faith once delivered to the saints," and adhere closely to the original pattern. It is also taken to denote external splendor, pomp, and dignity. Hence the prophet says of the Messiah, "He hath no form, nor comeliness," (Isa. 53: 2.) that is, he possessed no such outward state and splendor as the Jews expected in their Messiah. But the most remarkable passage in which this term occurs is Phil. 2: 6, where the apostle, speaking of Christ, says, that "being in the form of God, he thought it no robbery to be equal with God, but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of man."—Jones.

FORM OF GOD. Phil. 2: 6. This remarkable expression has been made the subject of endless criticism, and for very opposite purposes; but as it is incompatible with a work of this nature to go at large into matters of controversy, we shall content ourselves with subjoining Dr. Macknight's Note on the place. "As the apostle is speaking of what Christ was before he took the form of a servant, the form of God, of which he is said to have divested himself, (ver. 7.) when he became man, cannot be any thing which he possessed during his incarnation, or in his divested state; consequently, neither the opinion of Erasmus, that "the form of God" consisted in those sparks of divinity which Christ, during his incarnation, manifested his Godhead; nor the opinion of the Socinians, that it consisted in the power of working miracles, is well founded. For Christ did not divest himself either of the one or the other, but possessed both, all the time of his public ministry. In like manner, the opinion of those, who by "the form of God" understand the Divine nature, and the government of the world, cannot be admitted; since Christ, when he became man, could not divest himself of the nature of God. And with respect to the government of the world, we are led by what the apostle says, (Heb. 1: 3.) to believe he did not part with that; but in his divested state still "upheld all things by the word of his power." The opinion of Whitby, therefore, and others, seem better founded, who, by "the form of God," understand that glorious state in which the Deity is said to dwell, (1 Tim. 6: 16.) and in which he manifested himself to the patriarchs of old, (Deut. 5: 22—24.) and which was commonly accompanied with a numerous retinue of angels, (Ps. 68: 17.) and which in Scripture is called the similitude, (Num. 12: 8.) the face, (Ps. 31: 16.) the presence, (Exod. 33: 15.) and the shape of God, John 5: 37. This interpretation is supported by the term morphe here used, which signifies a person's external appearance, and not his nature or essence, Mark 16: 12. Matt. 17: 2. Farther, this interpretation agrees with the fact: "The form of God," that is, the visible glory, and the attendance of angels above described, the Son of God enjoyed with his Father, before the world was, (John 17: 5.) and on that, as on other accounts, he is "the brightness of the Father's glory," Heb. 1: 3. But he divested himself thereof when he assumed human nature.—Lastly, this sense of the words morphe theou is confirmed by the meaning of morphē doulou, (ver. 7.) which evidently denotes the state, or appearance and behavior of a servant." See Macknight's Translation of the Apostolic Epistles. Note on Phil. 2: 6. See also M'Lean's Commentary on Heb. 1: 3, in his Works, vol. v. p. 16—18; and Works of Robert Hall, vol. iii. 24 and 34.—Jones.

FORMALIST, one who places his dependence on the outward ceremonies of religion, or who is more tenacious of the form of religion than the power of it, 2 Tim. 3: 5.—Hend. Buck.

FORMS OF PRAYER. (See PRAYER.)

FORNICATION, or whoredom, or the act of incontinency between single persons; for if either of the parties be married, it is adultery. While the Scriptures give no sanction to those austerities which have been imposed on men under the idea of religion, so, on the other hand, they give no liberty for the indulgence of any propensity that would either militate against our own interest or that of others. It is in vain to argue the innocency of fornication from the natural passions implanted in us, since "marriage is honorable in all," and wisely appointed for the prevention of those evils which would otherwise ensue; and, besides, the existence of any natural propensity in us, is no proof that it is to be gratified without any restriction. That fornication is both unlawful and unreasonable, may be easily inferred, if we consider, 1. That our Savior expressly declares this to be a crime, Mark 7: 21, 23. 2. That the Scriptures declare that fornicators cannot inherit the kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 6: 9. Heb. 12: 16. Gal. 5: 19—22. 3. Fornication sinks into a mere brutal commerce, a gratification which was designed to be the cement of a sacred, generous, and tender friendship. 4. It leaves the maintenance and education of children, as to the father, at least, utterly unsecured. 5. It strongly tempts the guilty mother to guard herself from infamy by methods of procuring abortion, which not only destroys the child, but often the mother. 6. It disqualifies the deluded creatures to be either good wives or mothers, in any future marriage, ruining that modesty which is the guardian of nuptial happiness. 7. It absolutely disqualifies a man for the best satisfactions,—those of truth, virtue, innocent gratifications, tender and generous friendship. 8. It often propagates a disease which may be accounted one of the sorest maladies of human nature, and the effects of which are said to visit the constitution of even distant generations.—Hend. Buck.

FORSAKE. Men forsake God and his law when they disregard and contemn him, and disobey his law, deny his truth, neglect his worship, and depend not on his fulness, Jer. 17: 3. 9: 13. God seemingly forsakes his people when he withdraws his sensible presence, and withholds his assistance and comfort, (Ps. 71: 11. 22: 1. Isa. 49: 14.) but he never forsakes them as to real love, or such influence as is absolutely necessary for the subsistence of their graces, Heb. 13: 5. Ps. 37: 28. (See DESERTION.)—Brown.

FORTITUDE, is a virtue or quality of the mind generally considered the same with courage; though, in a more accurate sense, they seem to be distinguishable. Courage resists danger,—fortitude supports pain. Courage may be a virtue or vice, according to the circumstances; fortitude is always a virtue: we speak of desperate courage, but not of desperate fortitude. A contempt or neglect of dangers may be called courage; but fortitude is the virtue of a rational and considerate mind, and is founded in a sense of honor, and a regard to duty.

Christian fortitude may be defined that state of mind which arises from truth and confidence in God; enables us to stand collected and undisturbed in the time of difficulty and danger; and is at an equal distance from rashness on the one hand, and pusillanimity on the other. Fortitude takes different names, according as it acts in opposition to different evils; but some of those names are applied with considerable latitude. With respect to danger in general, fortitude has been called intrepidity; with respect to the dangers of war, valor; with respect to pain of body, or distress of mind, patience; with respect to labor, activity; with respect to injury, forbearance; with respect to our condition in general, magnanimity.

Christian fortitude is necessary to vigilance, patience, self-denial, and perseverance; and is requisite under affliction, temptation, persecution, desertion, and death. The noble cause in which the Christian is engaged, the glorious Master whom he serves, the provision that is made for his security, the illustrious examples set before him, the approbation of a good conscience, and the grand prospect he has in view, are all powerful motives to the exercise of this grace. Watts's Ser., ser. 31; Evans's Ser., ser. 19, vol. i.; Steele's Christian Hero; Mason's Ser., vol. i. ser. 5.—Heul. Buck.

FORTUNATUS. Paul calls Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, the first-fruits of Achaia, and set for the service of the church and saints. They carried Paul's first epistle to Corinth, 1 Cor. 16: 15, 17.—Calmet.

FOSTER, (JAMES, D. D.) an eloquent dissenting minister of England, was born, in 1697, at Exeter. He quitted the Independent sect to become a General Baptist. He succeeded Dr. Gale as preacher at the Barbican, and was afterwards minister at Pinner's Hall, and lecturer at the Old Jewry. Such were his talents as a pulpit orator, that crowds flocked to hear him, and even Pope sang his praise. He died in 1752. He wrote an Essay on Fundamentals; Tracts on Heresy; Discourses on Natural and Social Virtue; and other works.—Davenport.

FOSTER, (BENJAMIN, D. D.) pastor of the first Baptist church in the city of New York, was born at Danvers, Mass. June 12th, 1750. His parents were pious members of the Congregational church in that town, whose cares in his Christian education were rewarded by evidence of his early piety. At the age of eighteen, he was sent to Yale college, Conn. where, under president Dagget, he soon distinguished himself, no less as a Christian, than as a scholar. While there, the subject of baptism being agitated, Mr. Foster was appointed to defend infant sprinkling; but after an anxious examination, he astonished the college by avowing himself a convert to Baptist principles. After graduating in 1772, he was baptized by the Rev. Dr. Stillman, of Boston, with whom he afterwards pursued his theological studies. He was settled in the ministry at Leicester, Mass. whence he removed to Danvers, and Newport, R. I. and in 1788, to New York. There he labored with fidelity, honor, and usefulness, till his lamented death, during the yellow fever, in 1798, aged forty-nine years.

As an oriental scholar, an evangelical divine, and indefatigable preacher, Dr. Foster left few superiors behind him. He published a learned Dissertation on the Seventy Weeks of Daniel; The Divine Rite of Immersion; and Primitive Baptism Defended.—Erndt's, vol. ii. 301.

FOUNDATION; the groundwork or lowest part of a building, and that upon which the superstructure rests; thus we speak of the foundation of a house, of a castle, of a fort, or tower, &c. The word is frequently used by the prophets and apostles, but almost always in reference to Christ, and his church and kingdom, or the heavenly state. Thus the prophet, "Behold I lay in Zion, for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation," Is. 38: 16. This text is quoted by the apostle Peter, and expressly applied to Christ, 1 Pet.

2: 6. He is the alone ground of hope to guilty men; the only true foundation of peace, comfort, wisdom, and holiness. All the great and precious promises which God hath made to men, centre in him; for "they are all yea and amen in Christ;" sure and stable, being ratified by his blood and their accomplishment infallibly secured to the heirs of promise, 2 Cor. 1: 20.

Christ is also the foundation of the church; the cornerstone which unites the whole building and all its several parts. In him there is neither Jew nor Greek, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ is all, and in all, Col. 3: 11. He hath broken down the middle wall of partition which formerly separated Jews and Gentiles, destroyed the enmity which had so long subsisted between them, reconciling both of them unto God and to one another, in virtue of his death upon the cross, and by means of the influence of the Gospel upon their minds, through the power of the Holy Spirit; and hence they became united in one church, under him, their head and governor, "are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; in whom all the building fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord, a habitation of God, through the Spirit," Eph. 2: 20—22. That the apostle in this passage had the temple of Diana at Ephesus in his eye, and intended to contrast with it the Christian church as the temple of God, is too obvious to require proof, and the felicity of the allusion has been admired even by the lord Shaftesbury.

The inhabitants of Ephesus gloried exceedingly in the honor which their city derived from its being adorned with so magnificent a structure, and were intoxicated with the splendor of its worship. (See DIANA.) The apostle, therefore, to lessen in his Christian brethren of that city, their admiration of that famous temple, and to wean them from the worship of the lifeless image of an idol, contrasts with it the Christian church, which is a temple much more magnificent and beautiful; being built, not upon the foundation of wooden piles driven deep into the earth, like the temple of Diana, but upon the more sure foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; a temple, too, not constructed of stones and other lifeless materials, but of living men, whose hearts, being purified by faith, were rendered capable of offering up spiritual worship; a temple, not dedicated to an idol, but to the living and true God, who fills with his presence every part of it, Eph. 3: 19.—Jones. The Corner Stone, by J. Abbott.

FOUNDER. God and his prophets are likened to a founder, because, by the judgments declared by the prophets, and executed by God, nations are melted with trouble, to purge off their dross, and form them into a conformity to his will, Jer. 6: 29.—Brown.

FOUNTAIN; is properly the source or spring-head of waters. There were several celebrated fountains in Judea, such as that of Rogel, of Gihon, of Siloam, of Nazareth, &c. &c. and allusions to them are often to be met with in both the Old and New Testament. Dr. Chandler, in his travels in Asia Minor, says, "the reader, as we proceed, will find frequent mention of fountains. Their number is owing to the nature of the country and the climate. The soil, parched and thirsty, demands moisture to aid vegetation; and a cloudless sun, which inflames the air, requires for the people the verdure, with shade and air, its agreeable attendants. Hence fountains are met with not only in the towns and villages, but in the fields and gardens, and by the sides of the roads, and of the beaten tracks on the mountains. Many of them are the useful donations of humane persons, while living, or have been bequeathed as legacies on their decease."

As fountains of water were so extremely valuable to the inhabitants of the eastern countries, it is easy to understand why the inspired writers so frequently allude to them, and thence deduce some of their most beautiful and striking similitudes, when they would set forth the choicest spiritual blessings. Thus Jeremiah calls the blessed God, "the fountain of living waters," ch. 2: 13. As those springs or fountains of water are the most valuable and highly prized, which never intermit or cease to flow, but are always sending forth their streams, such is Jehovah to the souls of his people; he is a perennial source of felicity, John 17: 3. Ps. 36: 7, 9. 16: 11. Rev. 7: 17. Zechariah, pointing in his days to the atonement which was to be made in the fulness of time, by the shedding of the blood of Christ, describes it as a fountain that was to be opened, in which the inhabitants of Jerusalem might wash away all their iniquities. "In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness," Zech. 13: 1. Joel. 3: 18. (See ABOVE.)

The word fountain is sometimes taken to denote children or posterity, as in Prov. 5: 16. "Let thy fountains be dispersed abroad;" that is, may thy posterity be numerous. Again, in Dent. 33: 28, it is said, "the fountain of Jacob shall be upon a land of corn and wine;" that is, the people that proceed from Jacob. In these and other passages, fountains are put for streams or rivers flowing from them, by a metonymy of the cause for the effect.—Jons.

FOWL. The Hebrew ouph, which we translate fowl, from the Saxon flean, to fly, is a word used to denote birds in general. (See BIRDS.)—Calmet.

FOX, or JACKAL. This animal is called in Scripture shual, probably from his burrowing, or making holes in the earth, to hide himself, or to dwell in. The LXX render it by άλφειξ, the fox; so the Vulgate, vulpes, and our English translation, fox. But still it is no easy matter to determine, whether the animal intended be the common fox, or the jackal, the little eastern fox, as Hasselquist calls him. Several of the modern Oriental names of the jackal, from their resemblance to the Hebrew, favor the latter interpretation; and Dr. Shaw, and other travellers, inform us, that while jackals are very numerous in Palestine, the common fox is rarely to be met with.

We shall be safe, perhaps, under these circumstances, in admitting, with Shaw, Taylor, and other critics and writers on natural history, that the Hebrew shual is the jackal of the East. We shall first describe this animal, and then notice those passages of Scripture in which he is spoken of.

The jackal, or thaleb, as he is called in Arabia and Egypt, is said to be of the size of a middling dog, resembling the fox in the hinder parts, particularly the tail; and the wolf in the fore parts, especially the nose. Its legs are shorter than those of the fox, and its color is of a bright yellow. There seems to be many varieties among them; those of the warmest climates appear to be the largest, and their color is rather of a reddish brown, than of that beautiful yellow by which the smaller jackal is chiefly distinguished.

Although the species of the wolf approaches very near to that of the dog, yet the jackal seems to be placed between them; to the savage fierceness of the wolf, it adds the impudent familiarity of the dog. Its cry is a howl, mixed with barking, and a lamentation resembling that of human distress. It is more noisy in its pursuits than the dog, and more voracious than the wolf. The jackal never goes alone, but always in a pack of forty or fifty together. These unite regularly every day, to form a combination against the rest of the forest. Nothing then can escape them; they are content to take up with the smallest animals; and yet, when thus united, they have courage to face the largest. They seem very little afraid of mankind, but pursue their game to the very doors, testifying neither attachment or apprehension. They enter insolently into the sheepfolds, the yards, and the stables, and, when they can find nothing else, devour the leather harness, boots, and shoes, and run off with what they have not time to swallow. They not only attack the living, but the dead. They scratch up with their feet the new-made graves, and devour the corpse, how putrid soever. In those countries, therefore, where they abound, they are obliged to beat the earth over the grave, and to mix it with thorns, to prevent the jackals from scraping it away. They always assist each other as well in this employment of exhumation as in that of the chase, and while at their dreary work, exhort each other by a most mournful cry, resembling that of children under chastisement; and when they have thus dug up the body they share it amicably between them. Like all other savage animals, when they have once tasted human flesh, they can never after refrain from pursuing mankind. They watch the burying grounds, follow armies, and keep in the rear of caravans. They may be considered as the vulture of the quadruped kind; every thing that once had animal life seems equally agreeable to them; the most putrid substances are greedily devoured; dried leather, and any thing that has been rubbed with grease, how insipid soever in itself, is sufficient to make the whole go down. Such is the character which naturalists have furnished of the jackal, or Egyptian fox: let us see what references are made to it in Scripture. To its carnivorous habits there is an allusion in Ps. 63: 9, 10. "Those that seek my soul, to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth: they shall fall by the sword; they shall be a portion for foxes;" and to its ravages in the vineyard, Solomon refers in Cant. 2: 15. "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes." In Scripture, says professor Paxton, the church is often compared to a vineyard; her members to the vines with which it is stored; and by consequence, the grapes may signify all "the fruits of righteousness" which those mystical vines produce. The foxes that spoil these vines must therefore mean false teachers, who corrupt the purity of doctrine, obscure the simplicity of worship, overturn the beauty of appointed order, break the unity of believers, and extinguish the life and vigor of Christian practice.

2. At the feast of Ceres, the goddess of corn, celebrated annually at Rome about the middle of April, there was the observance of this custom. To fix burning torches to the tails of a number of foxes, and to let them run through the circus till they were burnt to death. This was done in revenge upon that species of animals, for having once burnt up the fields of corn. The reason, indeed, assigned by Ovid, is too frivolous an origin for so solemn a rite; and the time of its celebration, the seventeenth of April, it seems, was not harvest time, when the fields were covered with corn, vestitis messibus agros; for the middle of April was seed time in Italy, as appears from Virgil's Georgics. Hence we must infer that this rite must have taken its rise from some other event than that by which Ovid accounted for it; and Samson's foxes are a probable origin of it. The time of year agrees exactly. Wheat-harvest in Palestine happened about the middle of April; the very time in which the burning of foxes was observed at Rome.—Calmet; Watson.

FOX, (JOHN,) author of the celebrated Book of Martyrs, was born, in 1517, at Boston, in Lincolnshire, was educated at Oxford, and elected a fellow of Magdalen college. From his fellowship he was expelled in 1545, for having espoused the doctrines of the Reformation, and, till he was restored to it by Edward VI., he subsisted by acting as a tutor, first to the family of Sir Thomas Lucy, and afterwards to the children of the imprisoned earl of Surrey. During the reign of Mary, he sought an asylum at Basil. Returning, on the accession of Elizabeth, he was taken into the house of the duke of Norfolk, and Cecil obtained for him a prebend in the cathedral of Salisbury. His conscientious scruples as to church ceremonies prevented his farther promotion. He died in 1587.

Mr. Fox was no ordinary man. His piety was sincere and deep, his zeal ardent, his love of truth and of mankind active and inextinguishable. His great work is the Acts and Monuments of the Church, usually known by the name of Fox's Book of Martyrs; the merits and demerits of which have been a source of violent dispute between Protestant and Catholic writers. To the credit of Fox it must be recorded, that he strenuously, though vainly, endeavored to prevail upon Elisabeth not to disgrace herself by carrying into effect the sentence which condemned two Baptists to the flames as heretics.—Davenport; Middleton.

FOX, (GEORGE,) the founder of the society of Friends, or Quakers, was born, in 1624, at Drayton, in Leicestershire; and was the son of a weaver, a pious and virtuous man, who gave him a religious education. Being apprenticed to a grazier, he was employed in keeping sheep; an occupation, the silence and solitude of which were well calculated to nurse his naturally enthusiastic feelings. When he was about nineteen, he believed himself to have received a divine command to forsake all, renounce society, and dedicate his existence to the service of religion. For five years he accordingly led a wandering life, fasting, praying, and living secluded; but it was not till about 1648, that he began to preach his doctrines. Manchester was the place where he first promulgated them. Thenceforth he pursued his career with untiring zeal and activity, in spite of frequent imprisonment and brutal usage. It was at Derby that his followers were first denominated Quakers, either from their tremulous mode of speaking, or from their calling on their hearers to "tremble at the name of the Lord." The labors of Fox were crowned with considerable success; and, in 1669, he extended the sphere of them to America, where he spent two years. He also twice visited the continent. He died in 1690. His writings were collected in three volumes, folio. Whatever may be thought of the tenets of Fox, there can be no doubt that he was sincere in them, and that he was a man of strict temperance, humility, moderation, and piety.—Davenport.

FRAME OF MIND. This word is used to denote any state of mind a man may be in; and, in a religious sense, is often connected with the word feeling, or used synonymously with it. (See FEELING.)

"If our frames are comfortable," says one, "we may make them the matter of our praise, but not of our pride; we may make them our pleasure, but not our portion; we may make them the matter of our encouragement, but not the ground of our security. Are our frames dark and uncomfortable? they should humble us, but not discourage us; they should quicken us, but not obstruct us in our application for necessary and suitable grace; they should make us see our own emptiness, but not make us suspect the fulness of Christ; they should make us see our own unworthiness, but not make us suspect the willingness of Christ; they should make us see our own weakness, but not cause us to suspect the strength of Christ; they should make us suspect our own hearts, but not the firmness and freeness of the promises."—Hend. Buck.

FRANCISCANS, an order of Friars, founded in 1209, by St. Francis, of Assisi, who, having led a dissolute life, was reclaimed by a fit of sickness, and fell into an extreme of false devotion. Absolute poverty was his fundamental rule, and rigorously enjoined on all his followers. Some years afterward, this rule was relaxed, by the indulgence of several successive Popes; but this occasioned a schism in the order, about the end of the thirteenth century, and divided them into two parties; many adhering strictly to their founder's rule, and extolling him as equal to Jesus Christ himself. These were called, in ridicule, Fraticelli, or Little Brothers; which name Francis himself had assumed out of humility, and prescribed to his followers. They were also called Spiritual, while the others were called Brethren of the community, or Observantine friars; and in France they were called Cordeliers, from girding their habit with a cord. The Franciscans maintained that the Virgin Mary was born without original sin, which the Dominicans denying, occasioned a contention, which ended much to their disgrace. (See DOMINICANS.)—Mosheim's E. H. vol. iii. p. 196, &c.; C. Butler's Confess. p. 131; Williams.

FRANKE, (AUGUSTUS HERMANN,) founder of the Orphan house at Halle, and of several institutions connected with it, distinguished in the annals of Christian philanthropy and zeal. He was born at Lubeck, March 23, 1663, and studied so assiduously that, in his fourteenth year, he was ready to enter the university. He studied theology and the languages at Erfurt, Kiel, and Leipsic. In 1681, he began to lecture at the latter university, on the practical interpretation of the Scriptures, and, by the divine blessing, met with so much success, that the enemies of genuine and spiritual religion were roused against him, and attacked him on all sides; but he was defended by the celebrated Thomasius, then residing at Leipsic. Franke then accepted an invitation to preach at Erfurt, where his sermons attracted such numbers, among whom were many Catholics, that the elector of Mentz, to whose jurisdiction Erfurt then belonged, ordered him to leave the city within twenty-four hours. On this he went to Halle, as professor in the new university, at first of the oriental languages, and afterwards of theology. At the same time he became pastor of Glaucha, a suburb of Halle, the inhabitants of which he found sunk in the deepest ignorance and wretchedness, and for whose benefit he immediately began to devise schemes of usefulness. He first instructed destitute children in his own house, and gave them alms; he then took into his house some orphans, the number of whom rapidly increased. In this charitable work he was aided by some benevolent citizens of Halle; and his charitable institutions increased from year to year. In 1698, was laid the first stone of the buildings which now form two rows, eight hundred feet long. Sums of money poured in to him from all quarters; and frequently, when reduced to the utmost embarrassment in meeting the expense, the providence of God, in which he implicitly trusted, appeared for his relief. A chemist, whom he visited on his death-bed, left him the recipe for compounding several medicines, which afterwards yielded an annual income of from twenty thousand to thirty thousand dollars, by which he was enabled to prosecute his benevolent undertakings without any assistance from government. What is commonly called "Franke's Institution," comprises, 1. An Orphan Asylum. 2. The Royal Pedagogium. 3. The Latin School. 4. The German School. 5. The Constein Bible Press, founded by Baron Constein, a pious friend of Franke's, from which upwards of two million copies of the whole Bible, and one million of the New Testament, have been issued at low prices. 6. A library, and collections of natural history and philosophy.

The whole establishment forms one of the noblest monuments of Christian faith, benevolence, and zeal; and the philological and exegetical labors of Franke are gratefully acknowledged by biblical scholars of the present day, whose views of the doctrines of revelation widely differ from his. In his "Collegia Biblica," or Biblical Lectures, delivered at Halle, there was a return from human forms and systems to the sacred Scriptures, as the pure and only source of faith, and the substitution of practical religion for scholastic subtleties and unfruitful speculations. Thus Scripture interpretation again became, as among the first reformers, the basis of theological study. After a life of eminent usefulness, this excellent man died, June 8, 1727, at the age of sixty-four years.—Jones; Hend. Buck.

FRANKINCENSE; an odoriferous gum, anciently much burnt in the temples, and now used in medicine. It exudes from incisions made in the tree during the heat of summer; the largest and best trees are called male incense. Some frankincense is still brought from the East Indies, but that of Arabia or Syria is much preferred to it. The form of the tree from which it is extracted, does not appear to be distinctly ascertained. Frankincense is mentioned, figuratively, no doubt, among the articles of merchandise in which Babylon traded, Rev. 18: 13.—Jones.

FRATERNITY, in the Roman Catholic countries, signifies a society for the improvement of devotion. Of these there are several sorts, as—1. The fraternity of the Rosary, founded by St. Dominic. It is divided into two branches, called the common rosary, and the perpetual rosary; the former of whom are obliged to confess and communicate every first Sunday in the month, and the latter to repeat the rosary continually. 2. The fraternity of the Scapulary, whom it is pretended, according to the Sabbatine bull of Pope John XXII. the Blessed Virgin has promised to deliver out of hell the first Sunday after their death. 3. The fraternity of St. Francis's girdle are clothed with a sack of a grey color, which they tie with a cord; and in processional walk barefooted, carrying in their hands a wooden cross. 4. That of St. Austin's leathern girdle comprehends a great many devotees. Italy, Spain, and Portugal, are the countries where are seen the greatest number of these fraternities, some of which assume the name of arch-fraternity. Pope Clement VII. instituted the arch-fraternity of charity, which distributes bread every Sunday among the poor, and gives portions to forty poor girls on the feast of St. Jerome, their patron. The fraternity of death buries such dead as are abandoned by their relations, and causes masses to be celebrated for them.—Hend. Buck.

FRATRICELLI, or LITTLE BROTHERS. Though this name, as above-observed, was originally given to the reformed and spiritual Franciscans, (not less than two thousand of whom are recorded to have been burned by the Inquisition,) it was afterwards given to a multitude of sects which inundated Europe in the thirteenth century; and particularly to the Carthari and Waldenses, among whom many of the purer Franciscans were probably incorporated.—Morison's Th. Dict.; Bell's Wanderings, p. 216; Williams.

FRAUDS, (Pious;) artifices and falsehoods made use of in propagating religion, under the pretence of promoting the spiritual interests of mankind. These have been more particularly practised in the Church of Rome, and considered not only as innocent, but commendable. Neither the terms nor the thing signified, however, can be justified. The terms pious and fraud form a solecism; and the practice of doing evil that good may come, is directly opposite to the injunction of the sacred Scriptures, Rom. 3: 8.—Hend. Buck.

FREE. (1.) Without price; out of mere favor, Rom. 5: 15, and 3: 24. (2.) Without constraint or obligation, Ps. 54: 6. Rom. 8: 2. (3.) Without restraint or hindrance, 2 Thess. 3: 1. God's spirit is free, voluntary, or princely; he is freely bestowed on sinners; and, in a princely and liberal manner, he influences, convinces, instructs, draws, and comforts men's souls, Ps. 51: 12. God's blessings of the new covenant are free; though purchased by Christ, yet they are given to sinful men without money or price on our part, and are to be received as gifts of mere grace and favor, Rom. 5: 18. Rev. 22: 17. A free heart is one disposed to bestow freely and willingly, 2 Chron. 29: 31. Free, or free-will offerings, were those given without any obligation of God's law, Exod. 36: 3. Lev. 22: 21. Persons are free when in no slavish bondage, or exempted from paying tribute, (Deut. 15: 13. Matt. 17: 26.) or not obliged to maintain parents, Matt. 15: 6. The saints are free, or freed from the law, or freed from sin: they are, by the grace of God in Christ, delivered from the yoke of the broken law, the dominion of sin, and the slavery of Satan; and now, under the gospel, from the Jewish ceremonies, are entitled to all the privileges of the children of God, Rom. 8: 2. 6: 22. John 8: 34, 36, and Gal. 5: 1. Sinners are free from righteousness, quite destitute of, and no way influenced by, a holy principle, Rom. 6: 20. To be free among the dead, is to be in a miserable case on earth, as if a citizen of the grave, Ps. 88: 5.—Bron.

FREE AGENCY, is the power of choosing between good and evil, and following one's inclination. Many and long have been the disputes on this subject; not that man has been denied to be a free agent; but the dispute has been in what it consists. (See articles LIBERTY, and WILL.) A distinction is made by writers between free agency and what is called the Arminian notion of free will. The one consists merely in the power of following our prevailing inclination; the other in a supposed power of acting contrary to it, or at least of changing it. The one predicates freedom of the man; the other, of a faculty in man, which Mr. Locke, though an anti-necessarian, explodes as an absurdity. The one goes merely to render us accountable beings; the other arrogantly claims a part, yea, the very turning point of salvation. According to the latter, we need only certain helps or assistances, granted to men in common, to enable us to choose the path of life; but, according to the former, our hearts by nature being wholly depraved, our choice, though free, is opposed to holiness, so that we need an Almighty Power to renew them. (See NECESSITY.)—Hend. Buck.

FREEDOM. (See LIBERTY.)

FREE, or FIGHTING QUAKERS. During the revolutionary war in America, some Friends, less rigid than others, took part in the contest, and fought for their independence; among whom was the celebrated general Green. These, being expelled by their brethren, formed a separate congregation, which still exists in Philadelphia; and they are called, by way of distinction, Free, or Fighting Quakers.—Grégoire's Hist. tom. i. p. 133; H. Adams's V. last ed. under Quakers; Williams.

FREETHINKERS; a name assumed by Deists and Sceptics, to express their boasted freedom from religious prejudices, and from any religious system. The term originated in the eighteenth century, and contains a sneer at believers, like the French esprit fort, and the German rationalist. Free-thinking first appeared in England in the reigns of James II. and William III. In 1718, a weekly paper, entitled the "Free-thinker," was published. Collins, Toland, Tindal, and Morgan, rank among the champions of the sect; but Bolingbroke and Hume are the most distinguished. In France, Voltaire, D'Alembert, Diderot, and Helvetius, led the opposition against revealed religion. In Germany the same spirit became fashionable in the reign of Frederic the Great, and obtained a most extensive influence through the medium of the press, the universities, and even of the pulpit. Colton, in his "Lacon," has keenly observed, that in modern times free-thinking seems to be only another name for freedom from thinking. (See ATHEISTS; DEISTS.)—Hend. Buck.

FREETHINKING CHRISTIANS; a name adopted by a society which had its origin in the end of the year 1796, and has ever since regularly assembled in London, calling itself a Church of God, founded on the principles of free inquiry. Their first members separated from a congregation of Trinitarian Universalists, in Parliament-court Chapel, Bishopsgate-street. They rejected the doctrine of the Trinity, the atonement, and other points of Calvinism; then the sacraments, and the immateriality of the soul; and, lastly, the inspiration of the Scriptures, and public worship; for they have neither singing nor prayer in their assemblies, and regard the Bible only as an authentic history!—Williams.

FREE-WILL BAPTISTS.* In North America, in the year 1780, the first church of this denomination was organized at New Durham, in New Hampshire, under the pastoral charge of Elder Benjamin Randall. They have since spread into various parts of the country; and now have churches in twelve different states, and in the Canadas. From the latest accounts of their numbers, (Jan. 1834,) there are eight yearly meetings, and forty-six quarterly meetings: and, including about three thousand General Baptists, in North Carolina, who have lately taken the name of Free-Will Baptists, about seven hundred churches; five hundred and sixty preachers; and thirty thousand, five hundred communicants. The net increase in numbers, for three years past, has been seven and one third per cent.

External Polity. 1. They have held the Holy Scriptures to be their only rule of religious faith and practice, to the exclusion of all written creeds, covenants, rules of discipline, or articles of organization. Some, however, think no religious order can be maintained on the basis of Scripture, without, at least, an implied agreement in their understanding of the Scriptures, and believe it better that this understanding be definitely expressed and known; and they have, in some instances, adopted written articles of organization, in the form of a constitution. 2. Government is vested primarily in the churches; which are usually composed of such believers as can meet together for worship. These send delegates to the quarterly meetings; the quarterly meetings to the yearly meetings; the yearly meetings to the general conference. In cases of difficulty, appeals are made from one body to another, for advice and instruction. 3. The officers in the church, supposed to be designated in Scripture, are elders and deacons. After having been licensed and proved, the elders are ordained, jointly by the church to which they belong, and the quarterly meeting acting by a council. They are authorized to baptize believers, administer the Lord's supper, assist in ordinations, and to organize churches: they are amenable to the church and the presbytery. In each quarterly and yearly meeting, is an elders' conference; which, with the general conference, regulates the affairs of the ministry, so far as the presbytery is concerned. No inferiority of rank is acknowledged in the ministry. They consider piety, and a call to the work, to be the essential qualifications for a minister; and maintain, that one having a call to preach, ought not to delay for want of an education, or theological study; nor neglect preaching to acquire literature and science.

Doctrine. The Free-Will Baptists reject the peculiarities of Calvinism formerly denominated the "Five Points," so far as they represent the happiness or misery of man, as resulting from a divine decree, and not influenced by the personal actions of men; believing them, as they have understood them to have been held, unscriptural. They believe, that by the death of Christ, salvation was provided for all men; that, through faith in Christ, and sanctification of the Spirit, though by nature entirely sinners, all men may, if they improve every means of grace in their power, become new creatures in this life, and, after death, enjoy eternal happiness;—that all, who, having actually sinned, die in an unrenewed state, will suffer eternal misery. Respecting the divine attributes of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, they in substance agree with the Calvinistic Baptists, and other orthodox Christians. Yet some individuals, for want of properly knowing the Scriptures, or from adhering to such professing Christians, and such authors, as advocate unitarian, or Arian views of Christ, and the Holy Spirit, have imbibed Arian notions. This is a departure from the faith of the first Free-Will Baptists, and of the connection as a body. From a neglect to extirpate such doctrines, by sound discipline, and from the repeated attempts of the Christian Society to assimilate the two denominations, the Free-Will Baptists have lost much prosperity at home, and much reputation among others. They are a people distinct from the Christian Society, and ought always to be so distinguished. They essentially differ from the Christians in several important points of faith and church government.

Institutions; benevolent, literary, &c. A Foreign Mission society has lately been incorporated, and has received some donations. Numerous societies have been formed to promote temperance. Sunday schools are supported in various churches; and in several places charitable societies have been instituted. Till lately, no literary institution existed in the connection. About a year since, an academy, located at Parsonsfield, Me. was incorporated; it is now in a flourishing state. It must be understood, however, that all these benevolent operations are yet in their infancy. One printing press is employed by the connection, and the Morning Star, a weekly paper, is published at Dover, N. H. A Register, containing the statistics of the denomination, is also issued annually. See the Morning Star; Buzzell's Magazine; and D. Mark's Narrative.

FRIAR, or BROTHER; a term common to the monks of all orders. In a more peculiar sense, it is restrained to such monks as are not priests; for those in orders are usually dignified with the appellation of father.—Hend. Buck.

FRIENDSHIP, is the state of minds united by mutual affection, and abounding in acts of reciprocal kindness. "To live in friendship," says a heathen writer, "is to have the same desires, and the same aversions." So many qualities, indeed, are requisite to the possibility of friendship among men, and so many favorable circumstances must concur to its rise and continuance, that the greatest part of mankind content themselves without it, and supply its place as they can with interest and dependence. The generality of mankind are unqualified for a constant and warm interchange of benevolence, as indeed they are incapacitated for any other elevated excellence, by perpetual attention to their own interests and unresisting subjection to their depraved passions. An inveterate selfishness predominates in their mind, and all their actions are tainted with a sordid love of gain. But there are many varieties of disposition, as well as this hateful and confirmed corruption, that may exclude friendship from the heart. Some persons are ardent enough in their benevolence, who nevertheless are constitutionally mutable and uncertain, soon attracted by new objects, disgusted without offence, and alienated without enmity. Others are soft and flexible; easily influenced by reports and whispers, ready to catch alarms from every dubious circumstance, and to listen to every suspicion which envy or flattery may suggest. Some are impatient of contradiction; more willing to go wrong by their own judgment, than to be indebted for a better or a safer way to the sagacity of another. Too many are dark and involuntarily anxious to conceal their purposes, and pleased when they can show their design only in its execution. Some are universally communicative, alike open to every eye and equally profuse of their own secrets and those of others, without the necessary vigilance of caution, ready to accuse without malice, and to betray without treachery. Each of these are unfit for close and tender intimacies. "He cannot properly be chosen for a friend, whose kindness is exhaled by its own warmth, or frozen by the first blast of slander; nor can he be a useful counsellor who will hear no opinion but his own; that man will not much invite confidence whose principal maxim is to suspect; nor can his candor and frankness be much esteemed, who makes every man without distinction a denizen of his bosom."

2. That friendship may be at once ardent and lasting, there must not only be a congeniality of disposition, but there must be equal virtue on each part; not only must the same end be proposed, but there must be a similarity of pursuit in its attainment. We are often induced to love those whom we cannot esteem; we are sometimes compelled to esteem those whom we cannot love. But true friendship is compounded of esteem and love; it derives its tenderness from one, and its permanence from the other. It therefore requires that its candidates should not only gain the judgment, but attract the affection; they should be firm in the day of adversity, and participate in the joy of prosperity; their presence should communicate cheerfulness as well as courage, and dispel alike the gloom of fear and of melancholy.

3. Among all the honors which God conferred upon his servant Abraham, and those were neither few nor small, there was none equal to that of calling him his friend, 2 Chron. 20: 7, with Isa. 41: 8. "Thou art the seed of Abraham my friend." The apostle James takes notice of it, in this view, "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness, and he was called the friend of God," James 2: 23. How amazing is the condescension to which infinite goodness can stoop! We are sometimes led to express surprise when we see one human being, who happens to be raised a little above the rest of his species, descending from his elevated station to enter into familiar converse with one that is beneath him, and more especially to select such an one for his friend. But how do all such acts of condescension dwindle into insignificance, when we are led to think of the majesty of heaven deigning to confer upon a guilty mortal the appellation of friend! Yet this honor was not peculiar to Abraham. The Son of God, in the days of his flesh, thus addressed his disciples: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends; ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you: henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth, but I have called you FRIENDS; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you," John 15: 13—15. What a fund of interesting comment would this passage afford, were this the place to indulge in it! It would lead us to contemplate the friendship of Christ towards his people, demonstrated by the highest evidence it was possible for him to afford: "He laid down his life for them."

He redeemed them to God at the expense of his blood! 1 Pet. 1: 18, 19. And then, their friendship towards him. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." Would we know what is necessary to evince our friendship to the Savior? His next words plainly inform us: "These things I command you, that ye love one another," ver. 17. All pretensions, therefore, to be the friends of Christ, which are not justified by love to the brethren, must evidently be futile and vain, 1 John 4: 20, 21. And as one of the first dictates of friendship is a concern for the honor and reputation of those who are the objects of our esteem, it must follow that if we are the friends of Jesus, we shall feel deeply interested about his character; we shall resent, with becoming indignation, all the efforts of his enemies to tarnish his honors, and degrade him to the level of a mere human being; to set aside his atoning sacrifice, and despoil him of the glory which is justly due to him as the Savior of his guilty people.

4. The book of Proverbs abounds with the praises of friendship, and with encomiums on its value. "A friend loveth at all times," ch. 17: 17. "There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother," (ch. 18: 24;) the meaning of which probably is, that real friendship is more operative than natural affection. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend," ch. 27: 6. "As ointment and perfume rejoice the heart, so does the sweetness of a friend by hearty counsel," ver. 9. "As iron sharpeneth iron, so doth a man the countenance of his friend," ver. 17.

5. The genius and injunctions of the Christian religion also inculcate this virtue; for it not only commands universal benevolence to men, but promotes the strongest love and friendship between those whose minds are enlightened by divine grace, and who behold in each other the image of their Divine Master. As friendship, however, is not enjoyed by every one, and as the want of it arises often from ourselves, we shall here subjoin, from an eminent writer, a few remarks, by way of advice, respecting it. 1. We must not expect perfection in any with whom we contract fellowship.—2. We must not be hurt by differences of opinion arising in intercourse with our friends.—3. It is material to the preservation of friendship, that openness of temper and obliging manners on both hands be cultivated.—4. We must not listen rashly to evil reports against our friends.—5. We must not desert our friends in danger or distress. Blair's Ser. ser. 17, vol. iv.; Ep. Porteus's Ser. vol. i. ser. 15; *W. FRIENDS, (SOCIETY OF.) (See QUAKERS.)

FRITH, (JOHN,) a learned divine, and protestant martyr, was born at Sevenoak, in Kent, educated at Cambridge, and afterwards chosen a junior canon of Oxford. In 1525, he became acquainted with Tindal, who was the instrument of sowing the seed of the pure gospel in his heart. His principles becoming known, he was imprisoned for a time with several others, some of whom died with severe usage. Being released, in 1528, he went to the continent, where he spent two years, and became greatly confirmed in the protestant faith. Two years after, leaving his wife and children in a place of safety, he ventured to visit England; where, after a while, he was arrested by Sir Thomas More, (whose work on Purgatory he had confuted,) and committed to the tower. On the 20th of June, 1533, he underwent a public examination at St. Paul's, before the assembly of bishops, and for his fearless and inflexible defence of protestant principles, was condemned to be burnt at Smithfield. A young man named Andrew Hunt, suffered with him. With a courage that astonished the spectators, Frith embraced the faggot and the stake, smiling amidst the flames, and praying for the forgiveness of his enemies. He suffered in the prime of life, July 4, 1533.

It is said that there was a time when, owing to the impression made by his excellent character on the servants who had charge of him, he might have escaped; but to an offer of the kind, he replied, "Before I was seized, I would fain have enjoyed my liberty, for the benefit of the church of God; but now being taken by the higher power, and delivered into the hands of the bishops, to give testimony to that religion and doctrine, which, under pain of damnation, I am bound to maintain and defend; if therefore I should now start aside and run away, I should run away from my God, and from the testimony of his word."

He was, says bishop Bale, a polished scholar as well as master of the learned languages. He was the author of seven or eight valuable treatises, and was the first man in England that professedly wrote against Christ's bodily presence in the sacrament. His works were reprinted at London, in 1753, in folio.—Middleton, vol. i. 123.

FRITIGILA, queen of the Marcomans, became famous in 396. Being instructed in Christianity, by the writings of Ambrose, she embraced it herself, and by her influence her husband, and then the whole nation, were led to embrace it also. By her persuasion they entered into a durable alliance with the Romans, so that in the various irruptions of the barbarians on the empire, the Marcomans are never mentioned as among them, though separated only by the Danube.—Gifford's France; Bethan.

FROG; a small and well-known amphibious animal. Frogs were unclean: Moses, indeed, does not name them, but he includes them by saying, Ye shall not eat of any thing that moves in the waters, unless it have fins or scales, Lev. 11: 9. John (Rev. 16: 13.) says, he saw three unclean spirits issuing out of the false prophet's mouth like frogs; and Moses brought on Egypt a plague of frogs, Exod. 8: 5, &c.—Cabnet.

FRONTLETS, are thus described by Leo of Modena: the Jews take four pieces of parchment, and write with an ink made on purpose, and in square letters, these four passages, one on each piece: (1.) "Sanctify unto me all the first born," &c. Exod. 13: to the 10th verse. (2.) From verse 11 to 16: "And when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites," &c. (3.) Deut. 6: 4, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," to verse 9. (4.) Deut. 11: 13, "If you shall hearken diligently unto my commandments," to verse 21. This they do in obedience to the words of Moses: "These commandments shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes." These four pieces are fastened together, and a square formed of them, on which the letter Shin is written; then a little square of hard calf's skin is put at the top, out of which come two leathern strings an inch wide, and a cubit and a half, or thereabouts, in length. This square is put on the middle of the forehead, and the strings being girt about the head, make a knot in the form of the letter Resh; they are then brought before, and fall on the breast. It is called Teffin-schel-Rosch, the Tephila of the head. The most devout Jews put it on both at morning and noon-day prayer; but the generality wear it only at morning prayer. Only the chanter of the synagogue is obliged to put it on at noon, as well as morning.

It has been much disputed whether the use of frontlets, and phylacteries, was literally ordained by Moses. Before the Babylonish captivity, no traces of them appear in the history of the Jews; the prophets never inveigh against the neglect of them; nor was there any question concerning them in the reformation of manners at any time among the Hebrews. The almost general custom in the East of wearing phylacteries and frontlets, determines nothing for the obligation or usefulness of the practice. Christ did not absolutely condemn them; but he condemned the abuse of them in the Pharisees, their wearing them with affectation, and larger than other Jews. The Caraites Jews, who adhere to the letter of the law, and despise traditions, call the rabbinical Jews "bridled asses," because they wear these tephilin and frontlets. (See MEZUZOTH, and PHYLACTERIES.)—Cabnet.

FRUGALITY, is the keeping due bounds in our expenses; the happy mean between parsimony on the one hand, and prodigality on the other. The example of Christ, (John 6: 12;) the injunctions of God's word, (Luke 15: 1. Prov. 18: 9;) the evil effects of inattention to it, (Luke 11: 1, 13;) the peace and comfort which arise from it, together with the good which it enables us to do to others, should operate as motives to excite us to the practice of it. Wood's Sermon on Frugality, 1795; Robinson's Mor. Ez. ex. 3; Ridgley's Body of Div. p. 546; Buckminster's Sermons.—Hend. Buck.

FRUIT. The fruit of the lips is the sacrifice of praise or thanksgiving, Heb. 13: 15. The fruit of the righteous, that is, the counsel, example, instruction, and reproof of the righteous, is a tree of life, is a means of much good, both temporal and eternal; and that not only to himself, but to others also, Prov. 11: 30. Solomon says, in Prov. 12: 14, "A man shall be satisfied with good by the fruit of his mouth;" that is, he shall receive abundant blessings from God as the reward of that good he has done, by his pious and profitable discourses. "Fruits meet for repentance," (Matt. 3: 8;) is such a conduct as befits the profession of penitence.

2. The fruits of the Spirit are those gracious habits which the Holy Spirit of God produces in those in whom he dwelleth and worketh, with those acts which flow from them, as naturally as the tree produces its fruit. The apostle enumerates these fruits in Galatians 5: 22, 23. The same apostle, in Eph. 5: 9, comprehends the fruits of the sanctifying Spirit in these three things; namely, goodness, righteousness, and truth. The fruits of righteousness are such good works and holy actions as spring from a renewed heart: "Being filled with the fruits of righteousness," Phil. 1: 11. Fruit is taken for a charitable contribution, which is the fruit or effect of faith and love: "When I have sealed unto them this fruit," (Rom. 15: 28;) when I have safely delivered this contribution. When fruit is spoken of good men, then it is to be understood of the fruits or works of holiness and righteousness; but when of evil men, then are meant the fruits of sin, immorality, and wickedness. This is our Savior's doctrine, Matt. 7: 16—18.—Watson.

FRUITFULNESS, in the divine life, stands opposed to an empty, barren, unproductive profession of religion; or that state of things to which Christ adverts when addressing the church in Sardis: "I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead," Rev. 3: 1. The writers of both the Old and New Testaments speak much upon this subject; at one time encouraging the people of God to press after it, as the end which is to be accomplished in them by means of their attendance on divine ordinances; at another, solemnly warning them of the awful consequences of remaining unfruitful under the advantages of religious instruction with which they may be privileged. See in particular relative to this, Ps. 92: 12—15. Hosea 14: 5—9. Matt. 13: 3—9. Heb. 5: 12—14, and 6: 7, 8. But the subject is more especially insisted upon, and most strikingly illustrated by our Lord, in John, ch. 15: where he not only states its vast importance to all his disciples, if they would promote the glory of God; but, under the beautiful similitude of a vine and its branches, points out to them the only possible way of attaining it. "I am the vine," says he; "ye are the branches; as the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; but without (or severed from) me, ye can do nothing," ver. 4, 5. To understand this, it must be remembered that in Christ, the "one mediator between God and men," it hath "pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell," Col. 1: 19. (See the article FULNESS.) He is made of God unto them, "wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption," 1 Cor. 1: 30. By believing the divine testimony concerning him, as the Son of God, who was "delivered (unto death) for the offences of the guilty, and raised again for their justification," they become virtually united to him, as the branches are united to the vine, and so are said to be "in him," 1 John 5: 20. He is not only the object of their faith, and hope, and love, but the very life of their souls also, Gal. 2: 20. Col. 3: 3, 4. And as believers live in him, or, which is the same thing, live "by the faith of the Son of God," and upon that fulness which is treasured up in him, so it is by means of his words, or the doctrine concerning him, dwelling in them richly through the power of the Holy Spirit, that he lives and abides in them, (ver. 7.) quickens them at first from a death in trespasses and sins, to a life of obedience acceptable to God, (Eph. 2: 1, 5, 6,) and makes them fruitful in every good word and work, John 15: 8, 16.

Fruitfulness in religion, must necessarily include in it a growth in knowledge, Col. 1: 9, 10. It stands opposed to that state of childhood which the apostle alludes to and blames in many professors, Eph. 4: 14. Heb. 5: 12. But there must also be a growth in faith, in love, and in conformity to the will of God, or to the image of his Son Jesus Christ. See Eph. 4: 13—16. So we find the apostle Peter exhorting his brethren, who had obtained like precious faith with himself, to "give all diligence," by a continual increase in every Christian virtue, to make their calling and election sure—"for if these things be in you and abound," says he, "if they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ;" and with this he connects their enjoying "an abundant entrance into his everlasting kingdom," 2. Pet. 1: 5—11. (See the words ANN. EDIFICATION, and GROWTH IN GRACE).—Jones.

FRUSTRATE; to disappoint, to render vain or abortive, to annul or make void. Thus when Jehovah is said to "frustrate the tokens of the liars, and make diviners mad," (Isa. 44: 25;) it means, that as all events are under his sovereign control, he renders abortive all the prognostications of the soothsayers, or magicians, and disappoints their purposes.

When the apostle said to the Galatians, "I do not frustrate the grace of God, for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain," (Gal. 2: 21.) his language evidently implies two things; first, that it was the express end and purpose of the death of Christ to procure righteousness or justification for his people; and secondly, that the teachers, who sought to impose circumcision and other observances of the law of Moses upon believing Gentiles, with a view to their obtaining acceptance with God, virtually annulled the grace of God, rendering it of no effect. And his conclusion is demonstrable; for as justification by grace, and justification by the works of the law, whether moral or ceremonial, are in direct opposition to each other, so in whatever proportion or degree men seek to obtain the favor of God through the medium of the latter, they destroy the efficacy of the former. But even this is not all; for the apostle labors to show that such is the nature of grace that it disdains any compromise, for "if the blessing be by grace, then it is no more of works, otherwise grace is no more grace; but if it be of works, then it is no more of grace, otherwise work is no more of work," Rom. 11: 6.—Jones.

FUEL. In preparing their victuals, the Orientals are, from the extreme scarcity of wood in many countries, reduced to use cow-dung for fuel. At Aleppo, the inhabitants use wood and charcoal in their rooms, but heat their baths with cow-dung, the parings of fruit, and other things of a similar kind, which they employ people to gather for that purpose. (See BAKING, and DRUG.)

Wood, however, and even any other combustible substance, is preferred when it can be obtained. The inhabitants of Aleppo, according to Russel, use thorns, and fuel of a similar kind, for those culinary purposes which require haste, particularly for boiling, which seems to be the reason that Solomon mentions the "crackling of thorns under a pot," rather than in any other way. The same allusion to the use of thorns for boiling occurs in other parts of the sacred volume: thus, the Psalmist speaks of the wicked, "Before your pots can feel the thorns, he shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath." The Jews are sometimes compared in the prophets to a "brand plucked out of the burning," (Amos 4: 11. Zech. 3: 2;) a figure which Chardin considers as referring to vine twigs, and other brush-wood, which the Orientals frequently use for fuel, and which, in a few minutes, must be consumed if they are not snatched out of the fire; and not to those battens, or large branches, which will lie a long time in the fire before they are reduced to ashes. If this idea be correct, it displays in a stronger and more lively manner the seasonable interposition of God's mercy, than is furnished by any other view of the phrase. The same remark applies to the figure by which the prophet Isaiah describes the sudden and complete destruction of Rezin, and the son of Remaliah; "Take heed and be quiet; fear not, neither be faint-hearted for the two tails of these smoking firebrands, for the fierce anger of Rezin with Syria, and of the son of Remaliah," Isa. 7: 4. It is not easy to conceive an image more striking than this; the remains of two small twigs burning with violence at one end, as appears by the steaming of the other, are soon reduced to ashes; so shall the kingdoms of Syria and Israel sink into ruin and disappear.

2. The scarcity of fuel in the East obliges the inhabitants to use, by turns, every kind of combustible matter. The withered stalks of herbs and flowers, the tendrils of the vine, the small branches of myrtle, rosemary, and other plants, are all used in heating their ovens and bagnios. We can easily recognize this practice in these words of our Lord: "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you, that Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" Matt. 6: 28—30. The grass of the field, in this passage, evidently includes the lilies of which our Lord had just been speaking, and by consequence, herbs in general; and in this extensive sense the word chortos is not unfrequently taken. These beautiful productions of nature, so richly arrayed, and so exquisitely perfumed, that the splendor even of Solomon is not to be compared with theirs, shall soon wither and decay, and be used as fuel to heat the oven and the bagnio. Has God so adorned these flowers and plants of the field, which retain their beauty and vigor but for a few days, and are then applied to some of the meanest purposes of life; and will he not much more clothe you who are the disciples of his own Son, who are capable of immortality, and destined to the enjoyment of eternal happiness?—Watson.

FULFIL. (See PROPHECY, and QUOTATION.)

FULLER, (DR. THOMAS), a learned historian and divine, was the son of the minister of Aldwinkle, in Northamptonshire, at which place he was born, in 1608. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge; was appointed minister of St. Bennet's parish, Cambridge; and acquired great popularity as a pulpit orator. He received further preferment in the church, of which, however, he was deprived during the civil war, in consequence of his activity on the side of the monarch. Between 1640, and 1656, he published nearly the whole of his works. In 1648, he obtained the living of Waltham, in Essex, which, in 1658, he quitted for that of Cranford, in Middlesex. At the restoration he recovered the prebend of Salisbury, was made D. D. and king's chaplain, and was looking forward to a mitre, when his prospects were closed by death, in 1661. Dr. Fuller possessed a remarkably tenacious memory. It is said among other things, that he could recite a sermon verbatim, after he had heard it once. He had also a considerable portion of wit and quaint humor, which he sometimes allowed to run riot in his writings. Among his chief works are, A History of the Holy War; The Church History of Britain; The History of the University of Cambridge; and The History of the Worthies of England.—Davenport.

FULLER, (ANDREW), first secretary of the Baptist Missionary society, and one of the most extraordinary men of this, or any other age, was born at Wicken, in Cambridgeshire, Feb. 6, 1754. His pious father occupied a small farm at that place, and was the parent of three sons, of whom Andrew was the youngest. He received the common rudiments of an English education at the free school of Soham; and, till the age of twenty, was engaged in husbandry. When about sixteen years of age, his mind became enlightened; he sincerely repented of his past transgressions; he forsook his former evil ways, was publicly immersed, on a profession of his faith; and from that time he continued to make an honorable and consistent profession of Christianity. For the two succeeding years, he occasionally preached at Soham. In January, 1774, he received a unanimous invitation from that congregation to become their pastor, and was ordained in May, 1775. The income of Mr. Fuller being very small, he opened a seminary in 1779, but which, in the succeeding year, he relinquished; and not being able comfortably to provide for his increasing family, and the conduct of some of the members of the church at Soham being lukewarm and unsatisfactory to him, he accepted an invitation from a Baptist congregation at Kettering, to become their pastor.

Mr. Fuller's removal to Kettering, in 1783, formed a new era in his life. It brought him into contact with a number of ministers of his own denomination, to whom he was greatly attached, and who were equally ardent with himself in the investigation of truth. Here his labors took a wider range, and were determined towards a more definite object. The prevailing system of doctrine among the Baptist churches, at this period, was ultra-calvinism—a system which denies true faith to be the duty of every one to whom the gospel comes; and which, consequently, must paralyze the efforts of ministers to "go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature; commanding all men everywhere to repent" at the peril of their souls. Mr. Fuller saw the baneful effects of this unscriptural system, and set himself to oppose and refute it with all his might. With this view he drew up and published a small volume, entitled, "The Gospel of Christ worthy of all Acceptation; or, The Obligations of Men, fully to credit, and cordially to approve whatever God makes known: wherein is considered the Nature of Faith in Christ, and the Duty of those where the Gospel comes in that Matter." This valuable treatise operated powerfully, and set thousands upon examining their received principles. A host of opponents presently rose up to oppose this new doctrine, as it was termed; and our author had to defend himself on every side, which he did with no ordinary dexterity; taking his stand on the word of God, with the meekness of wisdom, but with the lion heart of Luther.

In 1790, he composed his "Dialogues and Letters on the Fundamental Principles of the Gospel;" and a celebrated work "On the Calvinistic and Socinian Systems, Examined and Compared as to their Moral Tendency." This work deservedly ranks among the ablest and most useful of Mr. Fuller's literary productions; having done more to stem the torrent of Socinianism in England, than any one book of modern times. It consists of a series of letters, each occupying a particular subject, and the whole forming a storehouse of sound observations, scriptural principles, important facts, and logical reasonings. The book was well received by the public, and will long maintain its ground.

The writings of Mr. Fuller having circulated in America, and having been generally approved, Princeton and Yale colleges conferred on him the title of Doctor of Divinity; which, however, supposing it to be incompatible with the simplicity of the Christian character, he declined to use.

In 1792, the Baptist Missionary society was first established at Kettering, by Mr. Fuller and a few of his friends, among whom was Mr. Carey, of Leicester, now the celebrated Dr. Carey, who volunteered his services as a missionary. India was selected as the country which they should visit; and, in the spring of 1793, Mr. Carey and other missionaries set sail for Bengal, where they arrived in the succeeding October. In the establishment of that society, Mr. Fuller had taken the liveliest interest, and he was appointed to the situation of secretary. The society, ever afterwards, was inseparable from his mind, and depended, under God, mainly on his exertions. The consultations which he held, the correspondence he maintained, the personal solicitations which he employed, the contributions he collected, the management of these and other funds, the selection, probation, and improvement of intended missionaries; the works which he composed and compiled on these subjects, the discourses he delivered, and the journeys he accomplished, to extend the knowledge, and to promote the welfare of the mission, required energy almost unequalled. In 1799, he made a tour through Scotland for the benefit of the society; and, on his return home, he found that he had travelled nine hundred miles, and collected full nine hundred pounds. In 1804, he visited the Baptist congregations throughout Ireland, and collected a considerable sum for the mission. In July, 1805, he made another tour through Scotland, to collect for the printing of the Scriptures in the Eastern languages, and travelled one thousand eight hundred miles in one month, preached every day, and collected one thousand eight hundred pounds. In 1807, he drew up a statement of the proceedings of the society; and, in fine, the history of the last twenty-three years of his life was completely identified with that of the mission.

Besides the publications already mentioned, Mr. Fuller was the author of a great number of treatises on various subjects, which, since his decease, have been collected and printed in eight volumes, octavo; recently reprinted in this country in two large volumes; among which we may particularly mention, "The Gospel its own Witness;" "The Calvinistic and Socinian Systems compared;" "Expository Discourses on the Books of Genesis and the Apocalypse;" "Sermons on various subjects;" "Apology for Christian Missions to the Heathen;" with many other smaller works, of peculiar excellence. All his writings bear the powerful stamp of a mind, which, for native vigor, original research, logical acumen, profound knowledge of the human heart, and intimate acquaintance with the Scriptures, has had no rival since the days of president Edwards.

On the 7th of May, 1815, in the sixty-second year of his age, this zealous, intelligent, benevolent, and most useful Christian minister expired; his heart being devoted to God, and his soul resting on Christ alone for salvation and eternal happiness.

It has been well said, that Fuller is "the Franklin of theology." The views entertained of him, by those best acquainted with his writings, are thus eloquently expressed by the Rev. Robert Hall: "I cannot refrain from expressing, in a few words, the sentiments of affectionate veneration with which I always regarded that excellent person while living, and cherish his memory now that he is no more; a man whose sagacity enabled him to penetrate to the depths of every subject he explored, whose conceptions were so powerful and luminous, that what was recondite and original, appeared familiar; what was intricate, easy and perspicuous in his hands; equally successful in enforcing the practical, in stating the theoretical, and discussing the polemical branches of theology. Without the advantages of early education, he rose to high distinction among the religious writers of his day, and, in the midst of a most active and laborious life, left monuments of his piety and genius, which will survive to distant posterity. Were I making his eulogium, I should necessarily dwell on the spotless integrity of his private life, his fidelity in friendship, his neglect of self-interest, his ardent attachment to truth, and especially the series of unceasing labors and exertions, in superintending the mission to India, to which he most probably fell a victim. He had nothing feeble or undecided in his character, but, to every undertaking in which he engaged, he brought all the powers of his understanding, all the energies of his heart; and, if he were less distinguished by the pre-eminence than the acumen and solidity of his thoughts, less eminent for the gentler graces than for stern integrity and native grandeur of mind, we have only to remember the necessary limitation of human excellence. While he endeared himself to his denomination by a long course of most useful labor, by his excellent works on the Socinian and Deistical controversies, as well as his devotion to the cause of missions, he laid the world under lasting obligations."

FULLER'S SOAP. (See SOAP.)

FULKE, (WILLIAM, D. D.) This pious and learned divine, of the church of England, was born in London, and educated at Cambridge, where, in 1564, he was chosen a fellow. He had previously spent six years in the study of law, and his father was so offended at his returning to college, that, though he was rich, he refused him any supplies. Fulke, however, easily made his way by his talents and learning. He became eminent alike in the mathematics, in the oriental languages, and in divinity, and published books in them all. Cartwright, the divinity professor, was his intimate friend. In consequence of this, however, Fulke was suspected of peiticism, and expelled from his college. The earl of Leicester, out of policy, became his patron, gave him the livings of Warley and Didington, and in 1574, sent him as chaplain of an ambassador to France. On his return he was made master of Pembroke-hall, and Margaret professor of divinity in Cambridge, and held these offices till his death, in 1589. His works are very numerous; written in Latin and English; and levelled chiefly at the Papists. The principal one is his Confutation of the Rhenish Testament, printed in 1580, by the Papists, in opposition to the Protestant versions. Mr. Hervey styles this Confutation, a valuable piece of ancient controversy and criticism, full of sound divinity, weighty arguments, and important observations.—Middleton, vol. ii. 261.

FULNESS, means the state of being filled, so as to have no part vacant; it necessarily includes the idea of completeness, such as leaves nothing more to be desired; (compare Col. 1:19, with ch. 2:10.) and, in scriptural style, it sometimes imports satiety. In this last acceptance it occurs, Isa. 1:11, "I am full of the burnt offerings of rams," for, it is afterwards added, "they are a trouble to me, I am weary to bear them," ver. 14. The term frequently occurs in the New Testament, and its signification is commonly very important. Thus the apostle speaks of "the fulness of time," when God sent forth his son, (Gal. 4:4;) it was the time that he himself had, in his eternal counsels, appointed—it was the time promised to the fathers, and foretold by the prophets; expected by the Jews themselves, and earnestly longed for by all that looked for redemption in Israel, Luke 2:25, 26, 38.

2. The church is termed "the fulness of Christ; because it is that which constitutes him a complete and perfect head. For though he has a natural and personal fulness, as God over all and blessed forever, yet, as Mediator, he is not full and complete without his mystical body; even as a king is not complete without his subjects; so Christ receives a relative fulness from his members, Eph. 1:23.

3. But the most important view of this subject, is that which regards the personal fulness of Christ, considered as Mediator; for "it hath pleased the Father," says the apostle, "that in him should all fulness dwell," (Col. 1:19;) and "out of his fulness," says another apostle, "have all we received, even grace for grace," John 1:16. The plenitude here referred to, as dwelling in Christ, is a copious and delightful theme of contemplation, for it comprehends all spiritual and heavenly blessings, answerable to the utmost exigencies of his guilty, helpless, and ruined people, in their state of dependence on him, in this world, John 1:14. Rom. 10:4. 2 Cor. 12:9. Ps. 68:18. Col. 2:9. Cant. 5:16. Ps. 45:2.

4. It is said, that "the fulness of the Godhead dwells in Christ bodily," (Col. 2:2;) that is, the whole nature and attributes of God are in Christ, and that really, essentially, or substantially; and also personally, by nearest union; as the soul dwells in the body; so that the same person who is man is God also.—Jones; Watson.

FUNERAL RITES. (See BURIAL.)

FURLONG; a measure of length containing one hundred and twenty-five paces, which made the eighth part of an Italian mile; but Maimonides says the Jewish furlong contained 266 2-3 cubits, and so seven furlongs and a half went to one mile, Luke 24:13.—Brown.

FURMAN, (RICHARD, D. D.) an eminent minister in Charleston, South Carolina, and president of the Baptist General Convention of the United States, was a native of New York, but brought up in South Carolina, at the High Hills of Santee. His education was conducted by his father, a gentleman of more than ordinary intelligence, judgment, and discretion, by whom the mind of his son was early imbued with an elegant taste, the most ardent thirst for knowledge, and profound reverence for the word of God. He became a subject of divine grace in youth; and such was the soundness of his piety, as well as the extent of his attainments, that he was admitted to the gospel ministry at the age of eighteen. His youthful ministrations left a deep impression upon every mind, and many of his vicious hearers, were by the divine blessing turned to righteousness. He at this time laid the foundation of many of the churches afterwards embodied in the Charleston Association. "There was a greatness in the rudiments of his work, a majesty in the style of his youthful performances, which agreed well with the sedate lustre of his subsequent life."

During the American revolution, he retired with his family into North Carolina and Virginia, where his patriotism, character and talents, attracted the attention of some of the leading men of the revolution, and gained him the friendship of the celebrated Patrick Henry. He afterwards assisted in framing the constitution of South Carolina.

In 1787, he was settled as pastor of the Baptist church in Charleston, where for nearly forty years he continued to exemplify, by rich and affecting illustrations, both the active and passive virtues of the Christian character, equally esteemed in every relation, the social and civil, humane and benevolent, religious and professional. His mind was alive to every incident which could be thought to have a bearing on the happiness of the community in which he lived. If in a mind where every excellence stood in the equipose of truth and dignity, there might be a preponderating principle, that principle was the feeling of a humane kindness which suffering in any form elicited. In the hut of the unhappy slave, and in the chambers of the sick and the dying, there was something in his manner which partook of a divine eloquence, and was carried with a soothing power to the heart.

His religious views coincided in the main with those of Doddridge, Fuller, and Dwight, though he called no man on earth master. As an experimental Christian he stood pre-eminent. The distinguishing feature in his religion was a keen and penetrating conviction of his own depravity. In the deep and practical knowledge of the heart he excelled, yet he was charitable in his judgment of others. In the general character of his preaching he was judicious, affectionate, and instructive, but at intervals he rose to a strain of masculine dignity and eloquence, which held his astonished hearers, even of the highest order, in breathless attention. But a divine unction, the love of Christ crucified, pervaded and sweetened all his character and endowments. He died among his attached people, August 25, 1825.

The dying bed of this eminent man was an edifying scene. Among other things, he said to some friends present, "On a review of life I see much to be thankful for; but O what cause to be humbled before my God. I am overwhelmed with the sense of my ingratitude, of my neglects, of my unfaithfulness as a minister of Christ. I am a dying man, but my trust is in the Redeemer; I preach Christ to you dying, as I have attempted to do while living."—Brantly's Funeral Sermon; Am. Bap. Mag.

FURNACE; a place for melting gold and other metals. "The refining pot is for silver, the furnace for gold," Prov. 17: 3. Metaphorically, it signifies a place of cruel bondage and oppression, such as Egypt was to the Israelites, who there met with much hardship, rigor and severity, to try and purge them, (Deut. 4: 20. Jer. 11: 4.) the sharp and grievous afflictions and judgments, wherewith God tries his people, (Ezek. 22: 18. 20: 22.) also a place of capital punishment, as Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace, Dan. 3: 6, 11.

On the last we may remark, that this mode of punishment is not unusual in the East in modern times. After speaking of the common modes of punishing with death in Persia, Chardin says, "But there is still a particular way of putting to death such as have transgressed in civil affairs, either by causing a death, or by selling above the tax by a false weight, or who have committed themselves in any other manner: they are put upon a spit and roasted over a slow fire, Jer. 29: 22. Bakers, when they offend, are thrown into a hot oven. During the dearth in 1668, I saw such ovens heated in the royal square in Spain, to terrify the bakers, and deter them from deriving advantage from the general distress. To this dreadful mode of punishment our Lord repeatedly alludes in speaking of the end of the wicked, Matt. 13: 42, 50.—Watson.

FURROWS; openings in the ground, made by a plough, or other instrument. The sacred writers sometimes borrow similitudes from the furrows of the field, Job 31: 38. "If my land cry against me, or the furrows thereof complain;" if I have employed the poor to till my ground, without paying them for their labor. And Hosea 11: 12, I will make Judah plough, and Jacob shall break the clods, and form the furrows. The ten tribes and Judah shall one after the other endure the effects of my anger. But, the prophet adds, immediately, "Sow in righteousness, and reap in mercy."—Calmet.

FURY, is attributed to God metaphorically, or speaking after the manner of men; that is, God's method of punishing the wicked is as fearful as the violent exertions of a man in a state of fury. So that when he is said to pour out his fury on a person, or on a people, it is a figurative expression for dispensing afflictive providences; but we must be very careful not to attribute human infirmities, passions, or malevolence to the Deity.—Calmet.

FUTURE STATE; a term made use of in relation to the existence of the soul after death. That there is such a state of existence, we have every reason to believe; "for if we suppose," says a good writer, "the events of this life to have no reference to another, the whole state of man becomes not only inexplicable, but contradictory and inconsistent. The powers of the inferior animals are perfectly suited to their station. They know nothing higher than their present condition. In gratifying their appetites, they fulfil their destiny, and pass away.—Man, alone, comes forth to act a part which carries no meaning, and tends to no end. Endowed with capacities which extend far beyond his present sphere, fitted by his rational nature for running the race of immortality, he is stopped short in the very entrance of his course. He squanders his activity on pursuits which he discerns to be vain. He languishes for knowledge which is placed beyond his reach. He thirsts after a happiness which he is doomed never to enjoy. He sees and laments the disasters of his state, and yet, upon this supposition, can find nothing to remedy them. Has the eternal God any pleasure in sporting himself with such a scene of misery and folly as this life (if it had no connection with another) must exhibit to his eye? Did he call into existence this magnificent universe, adorn it with so much beauty and splendor, and surround it with those glorious luminaries which we behold in the heavens, only that some generations of mortal men might arise to behold these wonders, and then disappear forever? How unsuitable in this case were the habitation to the wretched inhabitant! How inconsistent the commencement of his being, and the mighty preparation of his powers and faculties, with his despicable end! How contradictory, in fine, were every thing which concerns the state of man, to the wisdom and perfection of his Maker!"

But that there is such a state is clear from many passages of the New Testament: John 5: 24. Acts 7: 9. Rom. 8: 10, 11. 2 Cor 5: 1, 2. Phil. 1: 21. 1 Thess. 4: 14; 5: 10. Luke 16: 22, &c. But though these texts prove the point, yet some have doubted whether there be any where in the Old Testament any reference to a future state at all. The case, it is said, appears to be this: the Mosaic covenant contained no promises directly relating to a future state; probably, as Dr. Warburton asserts, and argues at large, because Moses was secure of an equal providence, and therefore needed not subsidiary sanctions taken from a future state, without the belief of which the doctrine of an universal providence cannot ordinarily be vindicated, nor the general sanctions of religion secured. But, in opposition to this sentiment, as Doddridge observes, "it is evident that good men, even before Moses, were animated by views of a future state, (Heb. 11: 13, 16.) as he himself plainly was, (24th to 26th verse;) and that the promises of heavenly felicity were contained even in the covenant made with Abraham, which the Mosaic could not disannul. Succeeding providences also confirmed the natural arguments in its favor, as every remarkable interposition would do; and when general promises were made to the obedient, and an equal providence relating to the nation established on national conformity to the Mosaic institution, and not merely to the general precepts of virtue; as such an equal providence would necessarily involve many of the best men in national ruin, at a time when, by preserving their integrity in the midst of general apostasy, their virtue was most conspicuous; such good men, in such a state, would have vast additional reasons for expecting future rewards, beyond what could arise from principles common to the rest of mankind; so that we cannot wonder that we find in the writings of the prophets many strong expressions of such an expectation, particularly Gen. 49: 18. Ps. 16: 9—11. Ps. 17: last verse; Ps. 73: 17, 27. Eccl. 3: 15, 16, &c. Eccl. 7: 12, 15. Isa. 3: 10, 11. Ezek. 18: 19, 21. Job.

19: 23, 37. Dan. 12: 2. Isa. 35: 8. Isa. 26: 19. The same thing may also be inferred from the particular promises made to Daniel, (Dan. 12: 13.) to Zerubbabel, (Hag. 2: 23.) and to Joshua, the high priest, (Zech. 3: 7.) as well as from those historical facts recorded in the Old Testament, of the murder of Abel, the translation of Enoch and Elijah, the death of Moses, and the story of the witch of Endor, and from what is said of the appearance of angels to, and their converse with, good men. ## G.

GAASH; a mountain of Ephraim, north of which stood Tinnath-Serah, celebrated for Joshua's tomb, (Josh. 24: 30.) which, Eusebius says, was known in his time.—II. A brook, or valley, (2 Sam. 23: 30.) probably at the foot of mount Gaash.—Calmet.

GABA; a city at the foot of mount Carmel, between Ptolemais and Cesarea.—Calmet.

GABAA, (a hill.) Many places in a mountainous country like Judea, might be called Gibeah, Gibeon, Gabbatha, Gibethon, Gabbath, Gabe, or Gabaa; signifying eminences.—Calmet.

GABALA. (See GERAL.)

GABATHA; a town in the south of Judah, twelve miles from Eleutheropolis, where the prophet Habakkuk's sepulchre was shown.—Calmet.

GABATHA, (Heb. high, or elevated.) In Greek, lithostrotion, paved with stones, John 19: 13.) It was probably an eminence, or terrace; a gallery or balcony paved with stone or marble, and of considerable height.—Calmet.

GABINIUS, (AULUS;) one of Pompey's generals, who was sent into Judea against Alexander and Antigonus, B. C. 60. (See ALEXANDER, and III. ANTIQONUS.) He restored Hircanus at Jerusalem, confirmed him in the high-priesthood, and settled governors and judges in the provinces, so that Judea, from a monarchy, became an aristocracy. He established courts of justice at Jerusalem, Gadara, (or at Dora,) Amatha, Jericho, and Sephoris; that the people, finding judges in all parts of the country, might not be obliged to go far from their habitations. Some learned men are of opinion, that the establishment of the Sanhedrim owed its origin to Gabinius.—Calmet.

GABRES, or GUEBRES. (See GAURS.) The Turks apply the term to Christians in the sense of infidels or heathens.—Calmet.

GABRIEL, (the strength of God;) a principal angel. He was sent to the prophet Daniel to explain his visions; also to Zacharias, to announce to him the future birth of John the Baptist, Dan. 8: 16. 9: 21. 10: 16. Luke 1: 11, et seq. Six months afterwards, he was sent to Nazareth, to the virgin Mary, Luke 1: 26, &c. (See ANGEL; and ANNUNCIATION.)—Calmet.

GABRIEL, (SAINT, CONGREGATION OF;) a society of lay gentlemen, founded by Cesar Bianchetti, at Boulogne, about A. D. 1646, for improvement "in Christian knowledge and virtue."—Hist. des Ord. Relig. tom. viii. c. 22.—Williams.

GAD, (fortunate;) son of Jacob and Zilpah, Leah's servant, Gen. 30: 9, 10, 11. Leah called him Gad, saying, "Happy am I!" Gad had seven sons, Ziphon, Haggai, Shuni, Ezbon, Eri, Arodi, and Areli, Gen. 46: 16. Jacob, blessing Gad, said, "A troop shall overcome him, but he shall overcome at the last." Gen. 49: 19. Moses, in his last song, mentions Gad, "as a lion which teareth the arm with the crown of the head," &c. Deut. 33.

The tribe of Gad came out of Egypt, in number, fifty-five thousand six hundred and fifty. After the defeat of the kings Og and Sihon, Gad and Reuben desired to have their allotment east of Jordan, alleging their great number of cattle. Moses granted their request, on condition that they should accompany their brethren, and assist in conquering the land west of Jordan. Gad had his inheritance between Reuben south, and Manasse north, with the mountains of Gilead east, and Jordan west. (See CANAAN.)—Calmet.

GAD, David's friend, who followed him when persecuted by Saul. Scripture styles him a prophet, and David's seer, 1 Sam. 22: 5. 2 Sam. 24: 11. 1 Chron. 21: 9—11. He wrote a history of David's life, which is cited 1 Chron. 29: 29.—Calmet.

GAD, the god or goddess of fortune, a heathen deity, mentioned in several passages of Scripture. We find a place in Canaan, called the tower of Gad, (Josh. 15: 37.) and another in the valley of Lebanon, called Bnal-Gad, Josh. 11: 17. In Isaiah 65: 11, those who prepare the table for Gad are allotted to the sword; and those who furnish a drink-offering to Meni, to the slaughter. We find Meni, in medals of Antioch, to be either male or female, without distinction; and therefore Gad, the associate of Meni, may well be thought similar in this respect. (See MENI.)—Calmet.

GADARA; a celebrated city of Palestine, the capital of Peraea, situated eastward of the lake of Tiberias, eight miles from the shore. It was strongly fortified, had a court of justice, and several hot baths. It gave name also to a canton, which is mentioned as the country of the Gadarenes, (Mark 5: 1. and Luke 8: 26.) though Matthew calls it the country of the Gergasenes, ch. 8: 28. Gergasa was near Gadara, and therefore one evangelist might with as much propriety call it the country of the Gergasenes, as another, that of the Gadarenes.

"Along the borders of this lake Tiberias," says Dr. Clarke, "may still be seen the remains of those ancient tombs, hewn by the earliest inhabitants of Galilee, in the rocks which face the water. They were deserted in the time of our Savior, and had become the resort of wretched men, afflicted by diseases, and made outcasts of society: for in the account of the cure performed by our Sa vior upon a demoniac in the country of the Gadarenes, these tombs are particularly alluded to; and their existence to this day, offers strong internal evidence of the accuracy of the evangelist who has recorded the transaction: "There met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit, who had his dwelling among the tombs." Dr. Clarke's Travels in the Holy Land, part ii. p. 466, &c.—Jones.

GALANTIE; a denomination which derived its name from Gaian, a bishop of Alexandria, in the sixth century, who denied that Jesus Christ, after the hypostatical union, was subject to any of the infirmities of human nature.—Hand. Buck.

GAUUS; a Christian who accompanied Paul on his travels through some of the Gentile countries, Acts 19: 29. 20: 4. Rom. 16: 23. It is highly probable, though not absolutely certain, that this was the same Gaius who is mentioned in such honorable terms by the apostle John in his third epistle.—Jones.

GALATIA; a province in Asia Minor, having the river Halys east, Bithynia and Paphlagonia north, Cappadocia and Phrygia south, and Mysia and Lydia west. The Gauls, having invaded Asia Minor, in several bodies, conquered this country, settled in it, and called it Gallio-Grecia, or Galatia, which, in Greek, signifies Gaul; (perhaps, New Gaul, or Little Gaul.)

The Galatians worshipped the mother of the gods. Callimachus, in his hymns, calls them "a foolish people;" and Hilary, himself a Gaul, as well as Jerome, describes them as Gallios indoctos. Their inland situation cut them off in a great degree from intercourse with more civilized nations, and they still retained their native language in the days of Paul. They also seem to have retained much of the warmth and volatility of character, for which the Gauls (French) in all ages have been remarkable.

The apostle Paul preached several times in Galatia; first, A. D. 51, (Acts 16: 6.) afterwards, A. D. 54, (Acts 18: 23.) and formed considerable churches there. It is probable, he was the first who preached there to the Gentiles; but, possibly, Peter had preached there to the Jews, since his first epistle is directed to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, &c. These Jews, it has been supposed by some, occasioned those differences in the Galatian church, on account of which Paul wrote his epistle in A. D. 52, in which he takes some pains to establish his character of apostle, which had been disputed, with intention to place him below Peter, who preached generally to Jews only, and who observed the law.

But his main object throughout nearly the whole of it is, to counteract the pernicious influence of the doctrine of those false teachers, particularly as it respected the article of justification, or a sinner's acceptance with God. And in no part of the apostle's writings is that important doctrine handled in a more full and explicit manner; nor does he any where display such a firm, determined, and inflexible opposition to all who would corrupt the truth from its simplicity.

"The erroneous doctrines of the judaizing teachers," says Dr. Macknight, "and the calumnies they spread for the purpose of discrediting St. Paul's apostleship, no doubt occasioned great uneasiness of mind to him and to the faithful in that age, and did much hurt, at least for a while, among the Galatians. But in the issue these evils have proved of no small service to the church in general; for by obliging the apostle to produce the evidences of his apostleship, and to relate the history of his life, especially after his conversion, we have obtained the fullest assurance of his being a real apostle, called to the office by Jesus Christ himself; consequently we are assured that our faith in the doctrines of the gospel, as taught by him, (and it is he who hath taught the peculiar doctrines of the gospel most fully,) is not built on the credit of a man, but on the authority of the Spirit of God, by whom St. Paul was inspired in the whole of the doctrine which he has delivered to the world."—Calmet; Watson.

GALATIANS, (EPISTLE TO.) (See GALATIA.)

GALBANUM; a gum, or sweet spice, and an ingredient in the incense burned at the golden altar, in the holy place, Exod. 30: 34. It is a juice, drawn by incision from a plant called metopion, much like the large kind of fennel.—Calmet.

GALE, (THEOPHILUS,) a learned non-conformist divine, was born in 1628, at King's Teignton, in Devonshire, and educated at Oxford, where his education commenced under a private preceptor in his father's vicarage-house, from whence he was removed to a grammar school in the neighborhood, where he made great proficiency in classical learning. In 1652, he commenced master of arts; and soon became an eminent tutor, fellow, and a distinguished preacher in the university.

While engaged in the prosecution of his great undertaking, "The Court of the Gentiles," Mr. Gale, however, did not fail to discharge the duties of his ministerial office in the most conscientious manner. He preached constantly; and his discourses from the pulpit were so many conspicuous proofs of his distinguished piety and learning. He was invited to Winchester, and became a stated preacher there in 1657, in which station he continued for several years, generally admired and esteemed, both for his excellent sentiments, and his exemplary life and conversation. But having now, for some considerable time past, imbibed the principles of the non-conformists, on the re-establishment of episcopacy, at the restoration of Charles the Second, he refused to comply with the act of uniformity, which passed in 1661; and rather than violate his conscience he preferred suffering all the penalties which the law could inflict.

Thus excluded from the public service of his function, and deprived of his fellowship at Oxford, he found friends among those of his own sentiments, and was taken into the family of Philip, lord Wharton, in the capacity of tutor to his two sons.

In 1669, Mr. Gale published, at Oxford, in quarto, the first part of "The Court of the Gentiles; or, a Discourse touching the Original of human Literature, both Philology and Philosophy, from the Scriptures and Jewish church," &c. This was received by the public with great applause, and was reprinted in 1672. The second part was printed at Oxford in 1671, and at London in 1676. Parts iii. and iv. were printed at London in 1677. The whole was speedily translated into Latin, by which means the reputation of the author was spread into all parts of Europe, but especially in Germany, where his performance was much read and admired. In the first part of this learned work, Mr. Gale endeavors to prove, that all languages have their origin and rise from the Hebrew; instancing particularly in the Oriental tongues, such as the Phœnician, Coptic, Chaldaic, Syriac, Arabic, Persian, Samaritan, and Ethiopic; and then in the European, especially the Greek, Latin, the old Gallic, and Britannie. To this he adds a deduction, importing that the pagan theology, phisic, politics, poetry, history, rhetoric, are deduced from sacred names, persons, rites, and records; and showing withal, how the Jewish traditions came to be corrupted and mistaken by pagans. In the second part, he makes it his business to evince, that philosophy also has its original from the Jewish church, commencing with the Barbaric philosophy, under which he comprehends the Egyptian, Phœnician, Chaldean, Persian, Indian, Ethiopic, Scythian, and Britannie; thence proceeding to the Grecian, and chiefly to the Ionic and Italic, or Pythagorean, where he displays extensive reading and great learning, while he deduces this doctrine of Judaic origin from the testimonies of heathen, Jewish, and Christian authors, passing through all the particular sects of philosophers with great care and industry. In the third part, the vanity of pagan philosophy is demonstrated from its causes, parts, properties, and effects; namely, pagan idolatry, Judaic apostasy, Gnostic infusions, errors among the Greek fathers, especially Origenism, Arianism, Pelagianism, and the whole system of Popery, or Antichristianism, distributed into three parts, mystic, scholastic, and canonic theology. In the fourth part, he treats of reformed philosophy, wherein Plato's moral or metaphisic, or prime philosophy, is reduced to a useful form or method. He divides this, which is larger than any of the former parts, into three books, discoursing in the first of moral philosophy; in the second, of metaphysics; and in the third, of divine predetermination.

Mr. Gale continued to be an assistant to Mr. Rowe, of London, till the death of that gentleman, in 1677; and then he was chosen to succeed him as pastor of the church. His stated residence was at Newington, where he died in 1678.

Mr. Gale was a man of very extensive learning, of unquestionable piety, and animated with an ardent love of truth. His great merit, and the irreproachableness of his life, gained him the respect of all parties. He was a decided non-conformist on principle, and evinced his zeal in its support by bequeathing all his estate, real and personal, to the education of young students destined for the dissenting ministry, and appointing trustees for its management. His valuable and well chosen library, with a few exceptions, he bequeathed towards promoting useful learning in New England, where those principles extensively prevailed.

Besides his great work, "The Court of the Gentiles," he published in Latin an abridgment of it for the use of students, under the title of "Philosophia Generalis," &c. London, 1676, 8vo.; "Theophily; or, a Discourse of the Saints' Amity with God in Christ," London, 1671, 8vo.; "The true Idea of Jansenism, both historic and dogmatic," 1669, 8vo.; "The Anatomy of Infidelity," 1672, 8vo.; "A Discourse on the Coming of Christ," 1673, 8vo.; "Idea Theologicæ," &c. 12mo.; and "The Life and Death of Thomas Tregosse," &c. 1671, 8vo.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

GALE, (DR. JOHN,) one of the ablest ministers of his time among the General Baptists, was born in the year 1679, and was the son of a respectable citizen of London, who, perceiving in him superior talents, determined to give him a liberal education, and to devote him to the work of the Christian ministry. With this view he sent young Gale to the university of Leyden, where he continued two years; and by his rapid improvement, the result of indefatigable application, he gained the esteem of the professors, and was honored with the degrees of master of arts and doctor in philosophy, before he was nineteen years of age. He went afterwards to Amsterdam, and spent some years among the Remonstrants, under the tuition of Limborch and Le Clerc. On his return to England he pursued his studies with redoubled ardor, and treasured up in his mind a considerable portion of valuable knowledge.

Dr. Gale did not begin to preach stately till he was thirty-five years of age. The publication which gave celebrity to his name was his "Reflections on Dr. Wall's History of Infant Baptism," in which he is generally acknowledged to have displayed considerable ability, and, what is not so common in that controversy, mildness of temper. He had projected several important undertakings, but the execution of these plans was prevented by the attack of a fever, which put a period to his life in December, 1721, in the forty-second year of his age. His illness was of short duration, but "borne with that calmness and patience which became a mind firmly possessed with a belief in the superintendence of a wise and good God, to whose providence he always resigned himself and his affairs." He was a man who did honor to human nature. Four volumes of sermons, with his life prefixed, were published after his decease. See Memoirs of Dr. John Gale.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

GALENIANS; the followers of Galen Abraham Haan, a physician at Amsterdam, and an eloquent preacher among the Mennonites, (which see.) He was considered a Latitudinarian, admitting to his communion all who believed the Scriptures and led religious lives. He was opposed by Samuel Apostool. (See APOSTOOLIANS.) Alshelm's E. H. vol. v. p. 496.—Williams.

GALILEAN; a name of reproach first given to our Savior and his disciples by the Jews, and afterwards liberally used by the pagans. Julian the Apostate constantly employed it, and wished to have it established as the legal name by which the Christians should be designated. The Redeemer he called "the Galilean God," and with his dying breath thus gave vent to his rage, while forced to acknowledge his power: nenikēkas Galilaie: "O Galilean, thou hast conquered!"—Hend. Buck.

GALILEANS; a sect of the Jews which arose in Judea some years after the birth of our Savior. They sprang from one Judas, a native of Gaulam, in Upper Galilee, upon the occasion of Augustus appointing the people to be mustered, which they looked upon as an instance of servitude which all true Israelites ought to oppose. They pretended that God alone should be owned as master and lord, and in other respects were of the opinion of the Pharisees; but as they judged it unlawful to pray for infidel princes, they separated themselves from the rest of the Jews, and performed their sacrifices apart. As our Savior and his apostles were of Galilee, they were suspected to be of the sect of the Galileans; and it was on this principle, as St. Jerome observes, that the Pharisees laid a snare for him, asking, Whether it were lawful to give tribute to Cæsar? that in case he denied it, they might have an occasion of accusing him.—Hend. Buck.

GALILEE; one of the most extensive provinces into which the Holy Land was divided; but it probably varied in its limits at different periods. It is divided by the rabbins into (1.) The Upper; (2.) The Nether; and, (3.) The Valley. Josephus limits Galilee west by the city of Ptolemais and mount Carmel; on the south by the country of Samaria and Seythopolis; on the east by the cantons of Hippos, Gadara, and Gaulan; on the north by the confines of the Tyrians. Lower Galilee reaches in length from Tiberias to Chabulon, or Zabulon, the frontier of Ptolemais; in width from Chaloth, in the great plain, to Bersabee. The breadth of Upper Galilee begins at Bersabee, and extends to Baca, which separates it from the Tyrians. Its length reaches from Tella, a village on the river Jordan, to Meroth. But the exact situation of these places is not known.

This province contained four tribes; Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Asher; a part also of Dan; and part of Perea, beyond the river. Upper Galilee abounded in mountains, and was termed "Galilee of the Gentiles," as the mountainous nature of the country enabled those who possessed the fastnesses to maintain themselves against invaders. Strabo (lib. 16.) enumerates among its inhabitants Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Lower Galilee, which contained the tribes of Zebulun and Asher, was sometimes called the Great Field, "the champaign," Deut. 11:30. The valley was adjacent to the sea of Tiberias. Josephus describes Galilæa as being very populous, containing two hundred and four cities and towns, the least of which contained fifteen thousand inhabitants. It was also very rich, and paid two hundred talents in tribute. The natives were industrious; high spirited, brave, and made good soldiers; they were also seditious, and prone to insolence and rebellion. Their language and customs differed considerably from those of the Judeans, Mark 14:70. (See the two preceding articles.)—Calmet.

GALILEE, (SEA OF.) This inland sea, or more properly lake, forever dear in the imagination of the Christian, from the memorable scenes acted on its shores and on its bosom, derives its several names, the lake of Tiberias, the sea of Galilee, and the lake of Gennesareth, from the territory which forms its western and south-western border. It is computed to be between seventeen and eighteen miles in length, and from five to six in breadth. It is naturally pure and sweet, secluded in its situation, and surrounded by elevated, and anciently fruitful declivities. The mountains on the east come close to its shore, and the country on that side has not a very agreeable aspect: on the west, it has the plain of Tiberias, the high ground of the plain of Hutin, or Hottein, the plain of Gennesareth, and the foot of those hills by which you ascend to the high mountain of Saphet. To the north and south it has a plain country, or valley. There is a current throughout the whole breadth of the lake, even to the shore; and the passage of the Jordan through it is discernible by the smoothness of the surface in that part.

"The lake of Gennesareth," says Dr. Clarke, "is surrounded by objects well calculated to heighten the solemn impression made by historical recollections, and affords one of the most striking prospects in the Holy Land. In picturesque beauty, it comes nearest to the lake of Locarno in Italy, although it is destitute of any thing similar to the islands by which that majestic piece of water is adorned. It is inferior in magnitude, and in the height of its surrounding mountains, to the lake Asphalites."

The situation of the lake, lying, as it were, in a deep basin, between the hills which inclose it on all sides, excepting only the narrow entrance and outlets of the Jordan at either end, protects its waters from long-continued tempests; its surface is in general as smooth as that of the Dead sea. But the same local features render it occasionally subject to whirlwinds, squalls, and sudden gusts from the mountains, of short duration; especially when the strong current formed by the Jordan is opposed by a wind of this description from the south-east, sweeping from the mountains with the force of a hurricane, it may easily be conceived that a boisterous sea must be instantly raised, which the small vessels of the country would be unable to resist.—Watson.

GALL, (rash;) something excessively bitter, and supposed to be poisonous, Deut. 29: 18. 32: 32. Psalm 69: 21. Jer. 8: 14. 9: 15. 23: 15. Lam. 3: 19. Hosea 10: 4. Amos 6: 12. It is evident, from the first-mentioned place, that some herb or plant is meant of a malignant and nauseous kind. It is joined with wormwood, and, in the margin of our Bibles, explained to be "a very poisonous herb." In Psalm 69: 21, which is justly considered as a prophecy of our Savior's sufferings, it is said, "They gave me gall (rash) to eat." And, accordingly, it is recorded in the history, "They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall," Matt. 27: 34. But, in the parallel passage, it is said to be "wine mingled with myrrh," (Mark 15: 23.) a very bitter ingredient. From whence it is probable that the word may be used as a general name for whatever is exceedingly bitter; and, consequently, where the sense requires it, may be put specially for any bitter herb or plant.—Watson.

GALLEY; a ship rowed with oars. The enemies of the Jews, and the Assyrian army in particular, are likened to *galley*s, or gallants, that is, according to ancient ideas, large and magnificent ships, Isa. 33: 21.—Brown.

GALLICAN. (See CHURCH, GALLICAN.)

GALLIO; the brother of Seneca, the philosopher. He was at first named Marcus Annaeus Novatus; but, being adopted by Lucius Junius Gallio, he took the name of his adoptive father. The emperor Claudius made him proconsul of Achaia. He was of a mild and agreeable temper. To him his brother Seneca dedicated his books, "Of Anger." He shared in the fortunes of his brothers, as well when out of favor as in their prosperity at court. At length, Nero put him, as well as them, to death.

The Jews, enraged at St. Paul for converting many Gentiles, in A. D. 53, dragged him to the tribunal of Gallio, who, as proconsul, generally resided at Corinth, Acts 18: 12, 13. They accused him of teaching "men to worship God contrary to the law." Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, was beaten by the Greeks before Gallio's seat of justice; but this governor did not concern himself about it. His abstaining from interfering in a religious controversy, perhaps did credit to his prudence; nevertheless, his name has passed into a reproachful proverb; and a man regardless of all piety is called "a Gallio," and is said, "Gallio-like, to care for none of these things." Little did this Roman anticipate that his name would be so immortalized.—Watson.

GAMALIEL; an illustrious doctor of the Jewish law, a Pharisee, and Paul's master. It is said he was the grandson of the famous Hillel, (see HILLEL) uncle to Nicodemus, and for thirty-two years president of the Jewish Sanhedrim. It is certain that the family of Gamaliel was so distinguished as to enjoy privileges of a peculiar kind, especially in relation to the study of Greek literature, which was generally prohibited among the Jews. See Robinson's Bib. Repos. 1632.

The Jews having brought Peter before the assembly of rulers, Gamaliel moved that the apostles should retire; and then advised the assembly to take heed what they intended to do touching these men, and to treat them with lenity. Gamaliel's advice was followed; and the apostles were liberated, Acts 5: 34.

When Paul, in Rom. 10: 1, affirms, "My heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved," we should not forget how much of an interesting and affecting character was connected with the personal character of many of whom he spoke. Could he cease to feel for his former venerated teacher, so richly cultivated, intelligent and amiable as he was, yet, in neglecting to embrace Christianity, so fatally mistaken! Heb. 2: 3.—Calnet; Brown.

GAMBA, (FRANCIS;) a Lombard of the Protestant persuasion, and a martyr of the sixteenth century. He was apprehended and condemned to death by the senate of Milan. At the place of execution, a monk presented a cross to him; to whom he said, "My mind is so full of the real merits and goodness of Christ, that I want not a piece of senseless stick to put me in mind of him." For this expression his tongue was bored through, after which he was burnt to death.—Fox, p. 185.

GAMES, (PUBLIC, or GYMNASTIC.) Games and combats were instituted by the ancients in honor of their gods; and were celebrated with that view by the most polished and enlightened nations of antiquity. The most renowned heroes, legislators, and statesmen, did not think it unbecoming their character and dignity, to mingle with the combatants, or contend in the race; they even reckoned it glorious to share in the exercises, and meritorious to carry away the prize. The victors were crowned with a wreath of laurel in presence of their country; they were celebrated in the rapturous effusions of their poets; they were admired, and almost adored, by the innumerable multitudes which flocked to the games, from every part of Greece, and many of the adjacent countries: They returned to their own homes in a triumphal chariot, and made their entrance into their native city, not through the gates which admitted the vulgar throng, but through a breach in the walls, which were broken down to give them admission; and at the same time to express the persuasion of their fellow-citizens, that walls are of small use to a city defended by men of such tried courage and ability. Hence the surprising ardor which animated all the states of Greece to imitate the ancient heroes, and encircle their brows with wreaths, which rendered them still more the objects of admiration or envy to succeeding times, than the victories they had gained, or the laws they had enacted.

But the institutors of those games and combats had higher and nobler objects in view than veneration for the mighty dead, or the gratification of ambition or vanity; it was their design to prepare the youth for the profession of arms; to confirm their health; to improve their strength, their vigor, and activity; to ensure them to fatigue; and to render them intrepid in close fight, where, in the infancy of the art of war, muscular force commonly decided the victory. This statement accounts for the striking allusions which the apostle Paul makes in his epistles to these celebrated exercises. Such references were calculated to touch the heart of a Greek, and of every one familiarly acquainted with them, in the liveliest manner, as well as to place before the eye of his mind the most glowing and correct images of spiritual and divine things.

1. Certain persons were appointed to take care that all things were done according to custom, to decide controversies that happened amongst the antagonists, and to adjudge the prize to the victor. Some eminent writers are of opinion that Christ is called the "Author and Finisher of faith," in allusion to these judges.

2. Those who were designed for the profession of athleta, or combatants, frequented from their earliest years the academies maintained for that purpose at the public expense. In these places, they were exercised under the direction of different masters, who employed the most effectual methods to inure their bodies for the fatigues of the public games, and to form them for the combats. The regimen to which they submitted was very hard and severe. At first, they had no other nourishment than dried figs, nuts, soft cheese, and a gross, heavy sort of bread, called maza; they were absolutely forbidden the use of wine, and enjoined continence.

3. When they proposed to contend in the Olympian games, they were obliged to repair to the public gymnasium at Elis, ten months before the solemnity, where they prepared themselves by continual exercises. No man that had omitted to present himself at the appointed time, was allowed to be a candidate for the prizes; nor were the accustomed rewards of victory given to such persons, if by any means they insinuated themselves, and overcame their antagonists; nor would any apology, though seemingly ever so reasonable, serve to excuse their absence. No person that was himself a notorious criminal, or nearly related to one, was permitted to contend. Further, to prevent underhand dealings, if any person was convicted of bribing his adversary, a severe fine was laid upon him; nor was this alone thought a sufficient guard against unfair contracts, and unjust practices, but the contenders were obliged to swear they had spent ten whole months in preparatory exercises; and, besides all this, they, their fathers, and their brethren, took a solemn oath, that they would not, by any sinister or unlawful means, endeavor to stop the fair and just proceedings of the games.

The spiritual contest, in which all true Christians aim at obtaining a heavenly crown, has its rules also, devised and enacted by infinite wisdom and goodness, which require implicit and exact submission, which yield neither to times nor circumstances, but maintain their supreme authority, from age to age, uninterrupted and unimpaired. The combatant who violates these rules forfeits the prize, and is driven from the field with indelible disgrace, and consigned to everlasting woe. Hence the great apostle of the Gentiles exhorts his son Timothy strictly to observe the precepts of the gospel, without which he can no more hope to obtain the approbation of God, and the possession of the heavenly crown, than a combatant in the public games of Greece, who disregarded the established rules, could hope to receive from the hands of his judge the promised reward: "And if a man also strive for mastery, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully," (2 Tim. 2: 5.) or according to the established laws of the games. But the apostle intimates, that there was this peculiar circumstance attending the Christian contest, that the person who proclaimed its laws and rewards to others, was also to engage in it himself; and that there would be a peculiar infamy and misery in his miscarrying, 1 Cor. 9: 27.

4. The athleta took care to disencumber their bodies of every article of clothing which could in any manner hinder or incommode them. In the race, they were anxious to carry as little weight as possible, and uniformly stripped themselves of all such clothes as, by their weight, length, or otherwise, might entangle or retard them in the course. The Christian also must "lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset" him, Heb. 12: 1. In the exercise of faith and self-denial, he must "cast off the works of darkness," lay aside all malice and guile, hypocrisies, and envyings, and evil-speakings, inordinate affections, and worldly cares, and whatever else might obstruct his holy profession, damp his spirits, or hinder his progress in the paths of righteousness.

5. The foot race seems to have been placed in the first rank of public games, and cultivated with a care and industry proportioned to the estimation in which it was held. The Olympic games generally opened with races, and were celebrated at first with no other exercise. The lists or course where the athleta exercised themselves in running, was at first but one stadium in length, or about six hundred feet; and from this measure it took its name, and was called the stadium, whatever might be its extent. This, in the language of St. Paul, speaking of the Christian's course, was "the race which was set before them," determined by public authority, and carefully measured. On each side of the stadium and its extremity, ran an ascent, or kind of terrace, covered with seats and benches, upon which the spectators were seated,—an innumerable multitude, collected from all parts of Greece, to which the apostle thus alludes in his figurative description of the Christian life: "Seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight," Heb. 12: 1.

The most remarkable parts of the stadium were its entrance, middle, and extremity. The entrance was marked at first only by a line drawn on the sand, from side to side of the stadium. To prevent any unfair advantage being taken by the more vigilant or alert candidates, a cord was at length stretched in front of the horses or men that were to run; and sometimes the space was railed in with wood. The opening of this barrier was the signal for the racers to start. The middle of the stadium was remarkable only by the circumstance of having the prizes allotted to the victors set up there. According to some writers, however, it was at the goal, or extremity, and not in the middle of the course, that the prizes were exhibited; and they were placed in a very conspicuous situation, that the competitors might be animated by having them always in their sight. This accords with the view which the apostle gives of the Christian life: "Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended; but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus," Phil. 3: 13, 14.

6. The honors and rewards granted to the victors were of several kinds. They were animated in their course by the rapturous applauses of the countless multitudes that lined the stadium, and waited the issue of the contest with eager anxiety; and their success was instantly followed by reiterated and long-continued plaudits; but these were only a prelude to the appointed rewards, which, though of little value in themselves, were accounted the highest honor to which a mortal could aspire. These consisted of different wreaths of wild olive, pine, parsley, or laurel, according to the different places where the games were celebrated. After the judges had passed sentence, a public herald proclaimed the name of the victor; one of the judges put the crown upon his head, and a branch of palm into his right hand, which he carried as a token of victorious courage and perseverance. As he might be victor more than once in the same games, and sometimes on the same day, he might also receive several crowns and palms. When the victor had received his reward, a herald, preceded by a trumpet, conducted him through the stadium, and proclaimed aloud his name and country; while the delighted multitudes, at the sight of him, redoubled their acclamations and applauses.

The crown in the Olympic games was of wild olive; in the Pythian, of laurel; in the Isthmian or Corinthian, of pine tree; and in the Nemean, of smallage or parsley. Most of these were evergreens; yet they would soon grow dry, and crumble into dust. "Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible." The Christian is called to fight the good fight of faith, and to lay hold of eternal life; and to this he is more powerfully stimulated by considering, that the ancient athleta took all their care and pains only for the sake of obtaining a garland of flowers, or a wreath of laurel, which quickly fades and perishes, possessed little intrinsic value, and only served to nourish their pride and vanity, without imparting any solid advantage to themselves or others; but that which is placed in the view of the spiritual combatants, to animate their exertions, and reward their labors, is no less than a crown of glory, which never decays; "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for them," 1 Peter 1: 4: 5: 4.

7. But the victory sometimes remained doubtful; in consequence of which a number of competitors appeared before the judges, and claimed the prize. The candidates who were rejected on such occasions by the judge of the games, as not having fairly merited the prize, were called by the Greeks adokimoi, or disapproved, which we render eastaway, in a passage already alluded to from St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians: "But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be cast away," rejected by the Judge of all the earth, and disappointed of my expected crown. The affecting passage of the same apostle, in the second epistle of Timothy, written a little before his martyrdom, is beautifully allusive to the above-mentioned race, to the crown that awaited the victory, and to the Hellenodics, or judges, who bestowed it: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but to all them also that love his appearing;" 2 Tim. 4: 8.

GAMMADIM; (contracted ones; cubit-high men.) It is very uncertain what people are meant by this term, in Ezekel. 27: 11. The Vulgate renders the word pygmies. Mr. Taylor takes them to be Nubians, whom the ancient writers describe as being of diminutive stature, contracted proportions, but warlike, and even terrible to the neighboring nations; all which answers very well to the Gammadim.—Calmet.

GAMMELL, (WILLIAM,) an eminent minister of Newport, R. I. was born in Boston, in 1786. In early life he made a profession of religion, and united with the church, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Stillman. At the age of nineteen, he commenced the study of theology, with the Rev. Mr. Williams, of Wrentham, and began soon to supply the vacant churches in the vicinity. He was settled in Bellingham four years. In 1812, or 14, he removed to Medfield, where his field of labor was extensive, and where he remained until the year 1823, when he removed to Newport, R. I. and became pastor of the second Baptist church in that town. Here his commanding talents soon replenished their capacious house, and filled it often to overflowing. His influence was also felt with a salutary power through the whole state; when it pleased God, in his mysterious providence, suddenly to remove him from the world, and to draw a dense cloud over the large circle that was rejoicing in his light. He died May 1, 1827, in the forty-second year of his age, leaving a widow and seven children.

Mr. Gammell published several interesting discourses, but they give a very inadequate conception of the charm of his preaching. There was a rich and spontaneous eloquence, naturally adapting itself to every variety of occasion, an unction and a pathos, accompanied with an interesting personal appearance, which could not be transferred into his written communications, but which found their way effectually to the heart. These appendages of public speaking, as Campbell remarks of certain peculiarities of language, are like essences which cannot be turned from one vessel to another without suffering a loss. His piety was of an order that kept his eye continually fixed on that better world, into which, we trust, he has found an abundant admission.—R. I. Rel. Messenger; Chris. Watchman.

GANO, (JOHN,) a distinguished minister in New York, collected the first Baptist society in that city, and was ordained its pastor, in 1762. He was born at Hopewell, New Jersey, July 22, 1727. In this place he was converted to God, and ordained to the ministry, in 1754. The famous Tennant was one of his earliest friends. His first labors were in the southern states, where, as an itinerant, he was inferior to none but Whitfield. Early espousing the cause of his country in the contest with Great Britain, at the commencement of the war he joined the standard of freedom in the capacity of chaplain. His preaching contributed to impart a determined spirit to the soldiers, and he continued in the army till the conclusion of the war. When a lieutenant, after uttering some profane expressions, accosted him, saying, "Good morning, Dr. Good Man;" he replied—"You pray early this morning." The reproved man said, "I beg your pardon." "O," retorted Mr. G., "I cannot pardon you; carry your case to God."

He left his society in New York, in 1788, and removed to Kentucky. He died at Frankfort, August 10, 1804, aged seventy-seven, resigned to the divine will, and in the hope of everlasting blessedness in the presence of his Redeemer.

Mr. Gano, as a minister of Christ, shone as a star of the first magnitude in the American churches. For this office, God had endowed him with a large portion of grace and with excellent gifts. His pulpit talents have been rarely equalled. To the refinements of learning he did not aspire. "He believed, and therefore spoke." The careless and irreverent stood arrested and awed before him, and the most insensible were made to feel. The seals of his ministry were ample. Memoirs of his life, written principally by himself, were published in 12mo. 1806. Gano's Memoirs; Benedict's His. Bap. vol. ii. 306.—Allen.

GANO, (DR. STEPHEN,) son of the preceding, was born in the city of New York, December 25, 1762. He was originally destined for the medical profession, and accordingly, after completing his studies, served some time in the revolutionary army in the capacity of surgeon. About this time, being enlightened and changed by divine grace, he entered the gospel ministry, and spent a few years in Hudson, Hillsdale, and the adjacent region, in the state of New York. In 1792, he was called to the pastoral care of the First Baptist church in Providence, R. I., and occupied this important station till his death, August 18, 1828, a period of thirty-six years. Endowed by nature with a noble person, a masculine understanding, a heart full of the most generous sympathies, and a voice of singular power, compass, and melody, all improved by education, and sanctified by the spirit of Christ, it is not surprising that he filled successfully a pulpit that, originally venerable with the memory of ROGER WILLIAMS, had been dignified with the piety of a MANNING, and graced with the eloquence of a MAXCY. Several powerful revivals were experienced in the course of his ministry, and he baptized not far from seven hundred souls on a profession of vital faith in the crucified Savior. He was the intimate friend of BACKUS, and SMITH, and STILLMAN, and BALDWIN. He filled a large space in the eye of the Christian public, and his praise is in the churches as a man of God, whose whole life and death bore witness to the glory of the cross.—Chris. Watchman; Am. Bap. Mag.

GAP; a breach made in a dam, wall, or hedge. The Jewish false prophets did not stand in the gap, or make up the hedge; they did nothing tending to stop the course of wickedness, which opened a door for the vengeance of God to break in upon their nation; nor did they with effectual, fervent prayer, intercede with God to turn away his wrath, Ezekel. 13: 5, and 22: 30.—Brown.

GARDENS, in the eastern countries, were objects of particular attention; and hence came to be frequently spoken of by the inspired writers, in the way of illustrating subjects of a spiritual and heavenly nature.

In the hotter parts of the eastern countries, a constant supply of water is so absolutely necessary for the cultivation, and even for the preservation and existence of a garden, that should it want water but for a few days, every thing in it would be burnt up with the heat, and totally destroyed. There is therefore no garden whatever in those countries, but what has such a certain supply, either from some neighboring river, or from a reservoir of water collected from springs, or filled with rain water in the proper season, in sufficient quantity to afford ample provision for the rest of the year.

Mr. Maundrell, speaking of the Emir of Berytus, says, "The best sight that the palace affords, and that which is most deserving of recollection, is the orange garden. It contains a large quadrangular plot of ground, divided into sixteen lesser squares, four in a row, with walks between them. The walks are shaded with orange trees of a large spreading size. Every one of these sixteen lesser squares in the garden was bordered with stone, and in the stone-work were troughs, very artificially contrived, for conveying the water all over the garden, there being little outlets cut at every tree, for the stream, as it passed by, to flow out and water it." Travels, p. 39. Kempter describes the royal gardens at Ispahan as being watered exactly in the same manner. Amen. Exot. p. 193.

These extracts may enable us to form a clear idea of what the Psalmist means by "the rivers or divisions of water," mentioned Ps. 1: 3, and other places of Scripture ; that is, waters distributed in artificial canals, for such is the import of the phrase. The prophet Jeremiah has imitated, and elegantly amplified the passage of the Psalmist above referred to :—

"He shall be like a tree planted by the water side,
And which sendeth forth her roots to the aqueduct;
She shall not fail when the heat cometh;
But her leaf shall be green;
In the year of drought she shall not be anxious,
Neither shall she cease from bearing fruit."

Jeremiah 17: 8.

We may also learn from this the true meaning of the following elegant proverb :

"The heart of the king is, in the hand of JEHOVAH,
Like the canals of waters.
Whithersoever it pleaseth him, he inclineth it." Prov. 21: 1.

In other words, the direction of it is in the hand of the Lord, as the distribution of the water of the reservoir, through the garden, by different canals, is at the will of the gardener. See Eccles. 2: 5—9—Jones.

GARDINER, (WILLIAM,) an English merchant, residing in Lisbon, in the seventeenth century, who was so shocked with the superstitions of popery, that he deliberately formed the design of making a reform in Portugal, or perishing in the attempt. To this end, he settled all his worldly affairs, paid his debts, closed his books, and consigned over his merchandise. This done, he entered the cathedral, the following Sunday, and placed himself near the altar, with a New Testament in his hand. The king and court soon appeared, and a cardinal began to say mass. At that part of the ceremony at which the people adore the wafer, the spirit of Gardiner could endure no longer. Springing towards the cardinal, he snatched the host from him, and trampled it under his feet, to the amazement of the whole congregation. Being arrested, and brought before the king, he was asked, who was his abettor ; to which he replied, "My own conscience alone. I would not hazard what I have done for any man living, but I owe that, and all other services, to God." He endured the tortures of the stake with firmness and joy.—Fox, 165.

GARDINER, (COLONEL JAMES,) so justly celebrated for his piety and valor, was born at Carriden, in Louthgowsire, January 10, 1687. It was the peculiar advantage of Gardiner, that he possessed a mother, able and willing to implant in his young and tender mind principles of truth and vital Christianity, which, in after life, yielded solid and lasting pleasure and advantage. He was, however, taken from her maternal guidance and protection, to enter an academy at Louthgowsire, where he made very considerable progress in literature.

At a very early age he made up his mind to follow a military life. The tears of his mother, whose judgment and affection he much valued, opposed his wishes ; but though such opposition was added to the entreaties of his nearest friends, they did not operate on his mind, for it was fixed ; and he accordingly entered the army as a cadet ; and, at the age of fourteen, bore an ensign's commission in a Scottish regiment in the Dutch service, in which he continued till the year 1702, when he received an ensign's commission from queen Anne, which he bore in the battle of Ramillies, being at that time sixteen years of age. In that memorable action he received a wound in his mouth by a musket ball. On the 31st of January, 1715, he was made captain-lieutenant in colonel Ker's regiment of dragoons. For some time he was stationed at Paris ; and though he there entered into every scene of dissipation and licentiousness he could, conscience, that faithful monitor, frequently checked him ; and, in his apparently happiest hours, he was often wretched. He could not always forget the prayers, the tears, the cautions of his mother. In the year 1719, the impressions that had been made on the mind of colonel Gardiner were revived, and his mind was awakened from the lethargy into which, for so many years, it had fallen. The circumstances were the following : on one Sunday, he had spent the evening in some very gay and trifling company ; about eleven, the company broke up, and he retired to his room to loiter away an hour, when accidentally he discovered a book lying near him, entitled "The Christian Soldier ; or, Heaven taken by Storm." This book he took up with an intention of ridiculing the plain and simple truths it contained ; but, while perusing, he fell into a sound slumber, and dreamed that he saw a universal blaze of light fall on the book while he was reading it, and, lifting up his eyes, saw, suspended in the air, a visible representation of the Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross, and distinctly heard a voice to this effect : "Oh ! sinner, did I suffer all this for thee, and are these the returns ?" Struck with this awful circumstance, he sank down, and awoke in a state bordering on distraction, appearing to himself the vilest monster in the creation. At that time he had such a view, both of the majesty and goodness of God, as caused deep repentance. From that time his mind was continually taken up with reflections on the divine purity and goodness, and of his own sinfulness : he began to lead a new life, and he now found that he had fresh battles to fight, and joyfully took up the sword of the Spirit, and, like a brave soldier, continued resolute and firm. He pursued his religious duties with the utmost strictness, constantly rising at four o'clock in the morning, and devoted two hours to the secret exercises of devotion, reading, meditation and prayer ; in which last, he expressed himself with so much of fervor and spiritual devotion, that it has seldom been equalled, and never excelled. If at any time he was obliged to leave his room earlier than usual, he rose an hour sooner ; so that when a journey, or a march called him out at four, he rose at two ; he also retired for an hour in the evening, that his mind might not be too wandering.

His valued and beloved mother he maintained till her death, which event was one of the greatest domestic trials he was ever called upon to experience, but which he bore with the piety and resignation of a sincere Christian. In the year 1726, he was united to lady Frances Erskine, daughter of the late earl of Buchan, who was pious, sensible, and amiable, and of whom he made the observation, that the greatest imperfection in her character was, that "she valued and loved him more than he deserved." By this lady he had thirteen children, five only of whom survived their father.

Towards the latter end of the year 1742, he embarked for Flanders, and spent some time at Ghent ; and, amidst all the hurry and bustle, and fatigue of marches, and the care of the regiment, he was tranquil and serene. In 1745, the memorable battle of Preston Pans was fought, which proved fatal to him. Colonel Gardiner took leave of his beloved wife and his eldest daughter at Stirling castle. The former being more than usually affected at their separation, he asked her the reason ; and, on her assigning the natural cause, instead of offering her consolation, as he had generally done on such occasions, he only replied, "We have an eternity to spend together !"

Eminent for his piety, gentleness, wisdom, and excellence, he was beloved and respected while living, and most deeply regretted when dead. As a husband he was exemplary, affectionate, attentive and kind ; and as a friend, condescending and sincere. His temper was both mild and amiable ; before he governed others, he had learned the very difficult lesson of governing himself. See Life of Colonel Gardiner, by Dr. Doddridge.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

GARLANDS ; a kind of crowns made with flowers, ribands, &c. Those brought by the priest of Jupiter, were probably designed to crown the ox destined for sacrifice, in like manner as the Jews crowned their victims of first-fruits with olive branches, Acts 14: 13.—Brown.

GARLICK. This word occurs only in Num. 11: 5, but the Talmudists frequently mention the use of this plant among the Jews, and their fondness for it. That garlicks grew plenteously in Egypt, is asserted by Dioscorides ; there they were much esteemed, and were both eaten and worshipped.

"Then gods were recommended by their taste.
Such savory deities must needs be good,
Which served at once for worship and for food."

GARMENTS. (See HABITS.)

GASTRELL, (FRANCIS, D. D.) bishop of Chester, was born at Slapton, in Northamptonshire, in 1662. He was educated at Oxford, where he took the degrees in arts; and then, devoting himself to the church, entered into holy orders. In the year 1694, he took the degree of bachelor of divinity; and about the same time he was appointed preacher to the Honorable society of Lincoln's Inn; in which station he acquitted himself so well, that, in the year 1697, he was appointed to preach Mr. Boyle's lecture.

In the following year, Mr. Gastrell took the degree of doctor in divinity; being at this time chaplain to the house of commons; and, in the year 1702, queen Anne collated him to a canonry of Christ church, in Oxford.

The ferment which had been raised by the dispute between the doctors South and Sherlock, concerning the Trinity, being still kept up with an ill-governed zeal, Dr. Gastrell published, this same year, "Some Considerations concerning the Trinity," and "the Ways of managing that Controversy;" which soon passed through two editions; and coming to a third, in the year 1707, the author subjoined to that edition a vindication of it, in answer to some animadversion of Mr. Collins', in his "Essay concerning the Use of Reason." In this year, likewise, it was that Dr. Gastrell published his excellent book, entitled "The Christian Institutes; or, the sincere Word of God: being a plain and impartial Account of the whole Faith and Duty of a Christian. Collected out of the Writings of the Old and New Testament: digested under proper Heads, and delivered in the Words of Scripture." This treatise has been frequently reprinted; and is esteemed a very useful performance.

In 1711, he was chosen proctor in convocation for the chapter of Oxford; and was appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary to queen Anne. In 1714, he published "Remarks on Dr. Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity." Dr. Clarke observes, that the objections in those "Remarks" were set forth to particular advantage, by the skill of a very able and learned writer, and proposed with a reasonable and good spirit. Dr. Gastrell held the preacher's place at Lincoln's Inn till this year; when he resigned it upon his promotion to the see of Chester, in 1714. He died November 24, 1725, "leaving," says Dr. Willis, "a sufficient monument of himself in his excellent writings."—Jones's Chris. Biog.

GATAKER, (THOMAS,) was born 1574, in London, where his father was then minister. When he was sixteen years of age, he was placed at St. John's college, at Cambridge; and there proceeded to master of arts with uncommon applause.

After various testimonies to his talents and worth, about the year 1601, he became preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and he held this employment, with great reputation, for ten years. But, having entered into the matrimonial state, in 1611, he quitted the office of preacher to that society for the rectory of Rotherhithe, in Surrey.

He published, in 1619, his "Discourse of the Nature and Use of Lots; a Treatise Historical and Theological." This treatise made a great noise in the world, and was opposed by several writers. In 1620, he set out on a tour to the Low Countries. In his travels he confuted some of the English papists in Flanders; and, soon after, returned to England.

In 1642, Mr. Gataker was appointed one of the assembly of divines who met at Westminster. He was employed, together with some other members of the assembly, in writing "Annotations upon the Bible;" wherein, those upon Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the Lamentations, were executed by him, and have great merit. In the mean time, on the removal of Dr. Comber, he was offered the mastership of Trinity college, in Cambridge, but he declined it on account of his ill state of health. He continued, however, to publish several learned works, most of which were printed among his "Opera Critica," at Utrecht, in 1668, folio. He also published, in 1652, an edition of the "Meditations of Marcus Antoninus;" with a Latin translation, and a commentary, and a preliminary discourse on the philosophy of the Stoics, which is much esteemed. He died in 1654.

Echard says, "Mr. Gataker was the most celebrated among the assembly of divines, being highly esteemed by Salmasius and other foreigners; and it is hard to say which is most remarkable, his exemplary piety and civility, his polite literature, or his humility and modesty, in refusing preferments."—Jones's Chris. Biog.

GATE. The gates or doors to the houses of the Hebrews, with their posts, were generally of wood; such were the gates of Gaza which Samson carried away on his shoulders; (Judg. 16: 3.) that is, the gate, bars, posts, and locks, if there were any.

"Gate," is often used in Scripture to denote a place of public assembly, where justice was administered, (Deut. 17: 5, 8. 21: 19. 22: 15. 25: 6, 7, &c.) because, as the Jews mostly labored in the fields, assemblies were held at their city gates, and justice administered there, that laborers might lose no time; and that country people, who had affairs of justice, might not be obliged to enter the town. See Ruth 4: 1. Gen. 23: 10, 18.

Hence, also, "gate" sometimes signifies power, dominion; almost in the same sense as the Turkish sultan's palace is called the Porte. God promises Abraham, that his posterity shall possess the gates of their enemies, their towns, their fortresses; (Gen. 22: 17.) and Christ says to Peter, "Thou art Peter; and on this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it," Matt. 16: 18. (See HADES, and HELL, ad fin.)

Solomon says, "He that exalteth his gate seeketh destruction." The Arabs are accustomed to ride into the houses of those they design to harass. To prevent this, Thevenot tells us that the door of the house in which the French merchants lived at Rama was not three feet high, and that all the doors of that town are equally low.—Calmet; Watson.

GATH, (Heb. vine-press;) the fifth of the Philistine cities. It was a place of strength in the time of the prophets Amos and Micah, and is placed by Jerome on the road between Eleutheropolis and Gaza, eighteen miles south of Joppa, and thirty-two west of Jerusalem. It appears to have been the extreme boundary of the Philistine territory in one direction, as Ekron was on the other. Hence the expression, "from Ekron even unto Gath," 1 Sam. 7: 14.—Watson.

GATHER. God gathers sinners to himself, when, by his preached gospel and Holy Spirit, he powerfully draws and unites them to his person, and instates and preserves them in fellowship with him, Matt. 23: 37. Those gather with Christ that promote the true interests of religion and welfare of men's souls, Matt. 12: 30. Luke 11: 23. The gathering of the people, was to Judah, as, at the three solemn feasts, the Hebrew tribes went up to Jerusalem; and their gathering was, and is, to Shiloh, when multitudes attended his instructions; multitudes, chiefly of Gentiles, believe on, and walk in him, Gen. 49: 10. To have one's soul gathered with sinners, and his life with bloody men, is to be shut up in their company, to share in their plagues, and be carried into bell with them, Ps. 26: 9.—Brown.

GATH-HEPHER, the birthplace of the prophet Jonah, was situated in Galilee, and in the canton of Opher, 2 Kings, 14: 25. Joshua makes this city to be part of the tribe of Zebulun, (Josh. 19: 15.) and Jerome, in his preface to the prophecy of Jonah, says, that it was two miles from Sephoris, or Diocæsarea.—Jones.

GAULAN; a celebrated city beyond Jordan, from which the small province of Gaulanites derived its name. It was seated in Upper Galilee beyond Jordan, and was given to the half tribe of Manasseh, Deut. 4: 43. It was one of the cities of refuge, Josh. 21: 27.—Jones.

GAURS, the supposed descendants of the ancient Parsees, (See MAGI, and PARSEES,) who still subsist in different parts of the East.

The Mahometans denounce this people as monsters of cruelty and iniquity; but modern travellers describe them as harmless and inoffensive, though very superstitious in their devotions. For their ancient principles, said to be derived from Zoroaster, see the articles above referred to; but it is difficult to say how far they retain the same principles. From some circumstances, it has been supposed that they (or a part of them) have imbibed some points of Christianity, but little certain is known respecting them.—Eney. Brit. in Gabres; Itinerary's Travels, vol. i. p. 263; Pinkerton's Geogr. Persia, ch. ii.—Williams.

GAZA; a city of the Philistines, made by Joshua part of the tribe of Judah. It was one of the five principalities of the Philistines, situated towards the southern extremity of the promised land, (1 Sam. 6: 17.) between Gaza and Askelon. The advantageous situation of Gaza was the cause of the numerous revolutions which it underwent. It first of all belonged to the Philistines, and then to the Hebrews. It recovered its liberty in the reigns of Jotham and Ahaz, and was reconquered by Hezekiah, 2 Kings 18: 8. It was subject to the Chaldeans, who conquered Syria and Phœnicia. Afterwards, it fell into the hands of the Persians, then of the Greeks and Romans, and since of the Turks. Luke speaks of the old city, (Acts 8: 26.) and Strabo also notices "Gaza, the desert." The new city was built seventeen miles nearer the sea.

"Modern Gaza," says Dr. Wittman, "is situated on an eminence, and is rendered picturesque by the number of fine minarets which rise majestically above the buildings, and by the beautiful date-trees which are interspersed. The suburbs are composed of wretched mud huts; but within side the town the buildings make a much better appearance than those we had generally met with in Syria. The streets are of a moderate breadth. Many fragments of statues, columns, &c. of marble, are seen in the walls and buildings in different parts of the town. The suburbs and environs of Gaza are rendered extremely agreeable by a number of large gardens, cultivated with the nicest care, which lie in a direction north and south of the town; while others of the same description run to a considerable distance westward. These gardens are filled with a great variety of choice fruit-trees, such as the fig, the mulberry, the pomegranate, the apricot, the peach, and the almond; together with a few lemon and orange trees. The numerous plantations of olive and date-trees which are interspersed, contribute greatly to the picturesque effect of the scene exhibited by the surrounding plains, and the view of the sea, distant about a league, tends to diversify still more the animated features of this luxurious scene." This and similar descriptions of modern travellers, which are occasionally introduced into this work, are given both as interesting in themselves, and to show that relics of the ancient beauty and fertility of the Holy Land are still to be found in many parts of it.—Watson.

GAZARES; a small party, probably, of Albigenes, in the twelfth century, who, to enjoy their religious liberties, had strayed as far as Gazare, in Dalmatia; but they were found out and condemned by pope Innocent III. Broughton's Dict.—Williams.

GEBA. Geba seems to have been the northern limit of the kingdom of Judah, 2 Kings 23: 8. "From Geba to Beersheba," seems to be, with respect to Judah, of the same import as "from Dan to Beersheba" had been, with respect to all Israel, when under one dominion.—Calmet.

GEBAL; a district, or perhaps a sovereignty, south of Judah, and in south Idumea. Also a city of Phœnicia, between Sidon and Orthosia, on the shore of the Mediterranean, (Ezek. 27: 9.) written by Stephens, Ptolemy, and Strabo, Gabala; by Pliny, Gabale; and by the LXX, Byblus. The city of Gebal has the important office of "calkers" to the ships of Tyre assigned to it by the prophet Ezekiel; its chiefs are also characterized as wise. Its ruins are splendid. The modern city is called by Mr. Maundrell, Jebilee.

This city was famous for its worship of Adonis, who was believed to have been wounded by a boar in mount Libanus. The river Adonis, whose waters are at some seasons as red as blood, passes by it; and when this phenomenon appeared, the inhabitants lamented Adonis, pretending their river to be colored with his blood. (See ADONIS.)—Calmet.

GEDDES, (ALEXANDER,) a learned but injudicious Roman Catholic divine, was born, in 1737, at Ruthven, in Banffshire; was educated at the Scotch college at Paris; and officiated at various chapels till 1782, when he desisted entirely from the exercise of his clerical functions. For many years he was engaged on a new translation of the Old and New Testament, of which he published only two volumes. This work raised a tempest of indignation against him, from both Protestants and Catholics. He died in 1802. Besides the version of the Bible, he published a translation of Horace's Satires; Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures; and other works of less importance. See Magee on Atonement.—Daventry.

GEDER. This name occurs several times in the Scriptures, and we are under the necessity of distinguishing the towns so called with considerable attention; because they have hitherto been subject to much confusion.

They are all in the tribe of Judah; and apparently in the south of that tribe. They were, probably, rather forts, or military posts, than extensive and populous towns. Some of them were single, others, apparently, were double; and, perhaps, one was almost, or altogether, a chain of fencible posts, in a military sense.—Calmet.

GEHENNA, or GEHENNOM, or valley of Hinnom; or valley of the son of Hinnom; (see Josh. 15: 8. 2 Kings 23: 10. Heb.) a valley adjacent to Jerusalem, through which the southern limits of the tribe of Benjamin passed. Eusebius says it lay east of Jerusalem, at the foot of its walls; but we are certain it also extended south, along the brook Kedron. It is thought to have been the common sewer belonging to Jerusalem, and that a fire was always burning there to consume the filth of the city. In allusion to this circumstance, or to the fire kept up in the valley in honor of Moloch, the false god, to whom the Hebrews frequently offered human sacrifices, and even their own children, (Jer. 7: 31.) hell is called Gehenna, in some parts of the New Testament. Josiah, to pollute this place, and to render it odious, commanded all manner of ordure, and dead men's bones, to be thrown into it, 2 Kings 23: 10.

After having been the scene of much cruelty, then, Gehenna became the receptacle of much pollution; so far it coincided in character with hell; and the perpetual fires that were kept burning there to consume the filth of the city, added another similarity to those evils attributed to the place of torment. The combined ideas of wickedness, pollution, and punishment, compose that character which might well justify the Syriac language in deriving its name of hell from this valley of the sons of Hinnom. Comp. Matt. 5: 22, and 10: 28. (See HELL.)—Calmet.

GELDENHAUR, (GERARD,) better known by the name of Gerardus Noviomagus, a very learned German, was born at Nimeguen, in 1482. From his earliest youth he was distinguished by his love of learning, especially of history and poetry. He studied at Davenport and Louvain, with great success. At the latter university he contracted a close friendship with Erasmus. He served as reader and historian successively to Charles of Austria, Philip, and Maximilian, of Burgundy. In 1526, being sent to Wittenberg to inquire into the state of the schools and churches there, he became convinced that the doctrine of Luther was the doctrine of Scripture, renounced popery, and retired toward the Upper Rhine. He became an instructor of youth at Worms, at Augsburg, and Marburg, at which last place he taught divinity, as well as history. He died of the plague, January 10, 1542. His change of religion, and some writings which he published against the church of Rome, occasioned a quarrel between him and Erasmus, who, to preserve appearances with Rome, found it necessary to abuse him. Geldenhaur was the author of many learned works.—Middleton, vol. i. 81.

GENARA. (See TALMUD.)

GENEALOGY, signifies the line of descent, or a list of a person's ancestors. The common Hebrew expression for it is Sepher-Toledoth, "the Book of Generations." No nation was ever more careful to preserve their genealogies than the Jews. The sacred writings contain genealogies extended three thousand five hundred years backward. The genealogy of our Savior is deduced by the evangelists from Adam to Joseph and Mary, through a space of four thousand years and upwards. Matthew gives the line of descent through Joseph, his reputed or legal father, and Luke through Mary, his mother. In reading these genealogies we should remember that the Messiah was restricted by divine appointment, 1. To the posterity of Abraham. 2. To the family of David. 3. To the existence of the second temple. It appears that our Lord was of the direct line, the elder branch of the royal family, in short the very person who, had the dominion continued in the family of David, would have legally sat on the throne, Gen. 49: 10. Acts. 2: 25—36.

The Jewish priests were obliged to produce an exact genealogy of their families, before they were admitted to exercise their function. Wherever placed, the Jews were particularly careful not to marry below themselves; and to prevent this, they kept tables of genealogy in their several families, the originals of which were lodged at Jerusalem, to be occasionally consulted. These authentic monuments, during all their wars and persecutions, were taken great care of, and from time to time renewed. But, since the last destruction of their city, and the dispersion of the people, their ancient genealogies are lost. But to this the Jews reply, that either Elias, or some other inspired priest or prophet, shall come and restore their genealogical tables before the Messiah's appearance; a tradition, which they ground on a passage in Nehemiah 7: 64, 65.—Calmet; Watson.

GENERAL CALL. (See CALLING.)

GENERATION. Besides the common acceptation of this word, as signifying descent, it is used for the history and genealogy of any individual. The ancients sometimes computed by generations; "In the fourth generation thy descendants shall come hither again," Gen. 15: 16. Among the ancients, when the duration of generations was not exactly described by the age of four men succeeding one another from father to son, it was fixed by some at a hundred years, by others at a hundred and ten, by others at thirty-three, thirty, twenty-five, and even at twenty years; being neither uniform nor settled: only, it is remarked, that a generation is longer as it is more ancient.—Calmet; Watson.

GENERATION, ETERNAL is a term used as descriptive of the Father's communicating the divine nature to the Son. To this mode of representing the relation of these two persons of the Trinity, as it respects their essence, it has been objected, that it goes to subvert the supreme and eternal Deity of the Son, and to represent him as essentially derived and inferior; a doctrine nowhere taught in the Scriptures. Some prefer saying that it was not the divine nature that was communicated to the Son, but only distinct personality. In regard to this, and all similar subjects which lie beyond the limits of the human faculties, the wisest, and most truly philosophical, as well as the safest way, is, to abstain from all metaphysical subtleties, and rest satisfied with the biblical mode of representation. That Christ is the Son of God in a sense perfectly unique, and that he was from eternity God, are truths which the Scriptures clearly teach; but wherein, in that sense, his filiation consisted, is a subject on which they are entirely silent. Every past attempt to explain it has only furnished a fresh instance of "darkening counsel, by words without knowledge." (See article SON OF GOD.) Owen on the Spirit, and on the Person of Christ; Pearson on the Creed; Ridgley's Body of Divinity, p. 73, 76, 3d edition; Gill's ditto, p. 205, vol. i. 8vo edition; Lambert's Sermons, ser. 13, text John 11: 35; Hodson's Essay on the Eternal Filiation of the Son of God; Watts's Works, vol. v. p. 77; Kidd on the Trinity; Stuart and Miller's Letters; Fuller's Works, vol. i. 26, ii. 815. (See CALVINISM.)—Hend. Buck.

GENEROUSITY; the disposition which prompts us to bestow favors which are not the purchase of any particular merit. It is different from humanity. Humanity is that exquisite feeling we possess in relation to others, so as to grieve for their sufferings, resent their injuries, or rejoice at their prosperity; and as it arises from sympathy, it requires no great self-denial, or self-command; but generosity is that by which we are led to prefer some other person to ourselves, and to sacrifice any interest of our own to the interest of another. Generosity is peculiarly amiable when it is spontaneous and unsolicited, when it is disinterested, and when, in the distribution of its benefits, it consults the best season and manner in conferring them.—Hend. Buck.

GENESIS; a canonical book of the Old Testament, so called from the Greek genesis, or generation, because it contains an account of the origin of all visible things, and of the genealogy of the first patriarchs. In the Hebrew it is called bereshit, which signifies, in the beginning, because it begins with that word. (See PENTATEUCH.)—Watson.

GENIUS, in the ancient mythology, signified a good or evil spirit, set over each person to direct his birth, accompany him in his life, to guard his person, and guide his thoughts.

Genius, among the moderns, signifies that peculiar aptitude which some men naturally possess, to perform well and easily that which others can do but indifferently, and with a great deal of pain. It is defined by Sir Joshua Reynolds, "the power of expressing a subject as a whole;" by others, "greater acuteness of perception and memory;" by others, "the predominance of the ideal faculty, or imagination;" by some it is resolved into "intuitive judgment," and others still into "patient thought," study, and application. Probably it comprehends something of all these.—Hend. Buck.

GENNESARETH, (LAND OF), of GENESAR; so named from Cinnereth, the ancient name of a city and adjoining tract, extending four miles along the north-western shore of the sea of Galilee. This part of Galilee is described by Josephus as possessing a singular fertility, with delightful temperature of the air, and abounding in the fruits of different climates. (See GALILEE, SEA (F).)—Watson.

GENTILE; in matters of religion, a pagan, or worshipper of false gods. The origin of this word is deduced from the Jews, who called all those who were not of their race and religion gojim, i. e. gentes, which, in the Greek translation of the Old Testament, is rendered ta ethnē, in which sense it frequently occurs in the New Testament; as in Matt. 6: 32. "All these things the nations or Gentiles seek." The prophets of the Old Testament dwell frequently and with benevolent delight on the future calling of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ. (See NATIONS; HEATHEN; PAGANISM.) In the writings of St. Paul, the Gentiles are generally denoted as Greeks, Rom. 1: 14, 16. 2: 9, 10. 3: 10, 12. 1 Cor. 1: 22—24. Gal. 3: 28. St. Luke, in the Acts, expresses himself in the same manner, Acts 6: 1. 11: 20. 18: &c.—Hend. Buck; Watson.

GENTILES, (COURT OF THE.) Josephus says there was in the court of the temple a wall, or balustrade, breast-high, with pillars at particular distances, and inscriptions on them in Greek and Latin, importing that strangers were forbidden from entering farther; here their offerings were received, and sacrifices were offered for them, they standing at the barrier; but they were not allowed to approach to the altar.

From the above particulars, we learn the meaning of what the apostle Paul calls "the middle wall of partition," between Jews and Gentiles, broken down by the gospel.—Watson.

GENTILES, (ISLES OF THE,) (Gen. 10: 5.) evidently denote Asia Minor and the whole of Europe, which were peopled by the descendants of Japheth.—Calmet.

GENTLENESS; softness or mildness of disposition and behavior. Little as this disposition is thought of by many, we find it considered in Scripture as a characteristic of the true Christian. "The wisdom that is from above," saith St. James, "is gentle," ch. 3: 17. "This gentleness indeed, is to be distinguished from passive tameness of spirit, and from unlimited compliance with the manners of others. That passive tameness, which submits without a struggle to every encroachment of the violent and assuming, forms no part of Christian duty; but, on the contrary, is destructive of general happiness and order. That unlimited complaisance, which on every occasion falls in with the opinions and manners of others, is so far from being a virtue, that it is itself a vice, and the parent of many vices. It overthrows all steadiness of principle, and produces that sinful conformity with the world which taints the whole character. In the present corrupted state of human manners, always to assent and to comply, is the very worst maxim we can adopt. True gentleness, therefore, is to be carefully distinguished from the mean spirit of cowards and the fawning assent of sycophants. It renounces no just right from fear; it gives up no important truth from flattery: it is, indeed, not only consistent with a firm mind, but it necessarily requires a manly spirit and fixed principle, in order to give it any real value. It stands opposed to harshness and severity, to pride and arrogance, to violence and oppression: it is properly that part of charity which makes us unwilling to give pain to any of our brethren. Compassion prompts us to relieve their wants; forbearance prevents us from retaliating their injuries; meekness restrains our angry passions; candor our severe judgments; but gentleness corrects whatever is offensive in our manner, and, by a constant train of humane attentions, studies to alleviate the burden of common misery."—Head. Buck.

GENTOOS; a term signifying mankind, assumed by the inhabitants of Hindostan, now called Hindoos, which see.—Williams.

GENUFLEXION; the act of bowing or bending the knee, or rather of kneeling down. The Jews usually prayed standing, but not always. Baronius is of opinion that genuflexion was not established in public worship in the year of Christ 58, from that passage in Acts 20: 36, where St. Paul is expressly mentioned to kneel down at prayer; but Saurin shows that nothing can be thence concluded. The same author remarks, also, that the primitive Christians carried the practice of genuflexion in private so far, that some of them had worn cavities in the floor where they prayed; and St. Jerome relates of St. James, that he had contracted a hardness on his knees equal to that of camels.—Head. Buck.

GEORGE, prince of Anhalt, and bishop of Mersburg, was born of religious parents, August 14, 1507, and educated at Leipsic, under George Forcheme. When twenty-two years of age, his attainments were such, that he was chosen by Albert, elector of Mentz, to be one of his council, and gained his highest confidence.

About this time the Reformation attracted the attention of all men; and Luther's writings concerning the difference between the law and gospel, &c., were dispersed and read everywhere. Prince George was no idle spectator. He sought truth like a philosopher, and loved it as a Christian. He began all his investigations with prayer. He sought truth in its fountain, the Holy Scriptures. The result was, that he openly embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and renounced all connection with popery. He put down superstition and set up seminaries of learning—the surest way under God of exterminating the errors which superstition had engendered. All however was done with Christian mildness, and multitudes were soon brought by divine grace to rejoice experimentally in the light of the gospel.

In 1545, by the persuasion of Luther, he consented to give himself to the work of the ministry, and was made bishop of Mersburg—an office full of danger and difficulty, which no worldly man would covet. His whole time was thenceforth devoted to this holy work. Above all low ambition and revenge himself, he endeavored to remove it from others. He was a peacemaker among princes. In all he bore with Christian magnanimity. He lived with God in his heart, and for God in his intercourse with men. Luther, Justus, Jonas, and others, were his most intimate friends. As in life, so in death he was full of resignation, faith, and love; dwelling most sweetly on the promises, especially John 3: 16. 10: 27, 28, and Matt. 11: 28. He died October 17, 1553, aged forty-six. Melancthon wrote two elegies on his death. He wrote and published many tracts and sermons.—Middleton, vol. i. 292.

GERAH; the smallest piece of money among the Hebrews, twenty of which made a shekel, Exod. 30: 13.—Calmet.

GERAR. We find a city of this name so early as Gen. 20: 1. 26: 1, 17, expressly stated to be a city of the Philistines. The probability is, that some wandering tribe of Palti had settled here, before the great influx of their nation into these parts, during the captivity of the Israelites in Egypt. As Abraham himself was a pilgrim from a region not very distant from the original country of these Palti, they might, perhaps, feel some kind of sympathy with him and for him. Gerar was not far from Gaza, in the south of Judah.—Calmet.

GERARD, (ALEXANDER, D. D.) a Scotch divine and writer, born in 1728, at Garioch, in Aberdeenshire, was educated at Marischal college, at which, in 1752, he succeeded Fordyce, as professor of moral philosophy, and, in 1760, was appointed divinity professor. In 1771, he obtained the theological professorship at King's college, Aberdeen. He died in 1795. He wrote an Essay on Taste; an Essay on Genius; Sermons; and Dissertations on the Genius and Evidences of Christianity.—Davenport.

GERGESENES, or GIRGASITES; a people of the land of Canaan, who settled east of the sea of Tiberias; and gave name to a region and city. (See GADARA).—Calmet.

GERIZIM; a mount near Shechem, in Ephraim, a province of Samaria. Shechem lay at the foot of two mountains, Ebal and Gerizim. (See EBAL.)

As to the original of the temple upon Gerizim, we must take Josephus's relation of it. Mausebe, the grandson of Eliashub, the high-priest, and brother to Jaddus, high-priest of the Jews, having been driven from Jerusalem in the year of the world 3671, and not enduring patiently to see himself deprived of the honor and advantages of the priesthood, Sanballat, his father-in-law, addressing himself to Alexander the Great, who was then carrying on the siege of Tyre, and having paid him homage for the province of Samaria, whereof he was governor, he farther offered him eight thousand of his best troops, which disposed Alexander to grant what he desired for his son-in-law, and for many other priests, who, being married, as well as he, contrary to the law, chose rather to forsake their country than their wives, and had joined Manasseh in Samaria.

When Antiochus Epiphanes began to persecute the Jews, A. M. 3836; B. C. 186, the Samaritans entreated him that their temple upon Gerizim, which hitherto had been dedicated to an unknown and nameless god, might be consecrated to Jupiter the Grecian, which was easily consented to by Antiochus. The temple of Gerizim subsisted some time after the worship of Jupiter was introduced into it; but it was destroyed by John Hircanus Maccabæus, and was not rebuilt till Gabinius was governor of Syria; who repaired Samaria, and called it by his own name. It is certain, that in our Savior's time, this temple was in being, John 4: 20. We are assured, that Herod the Great, having rebuilt Samaria, and called it Sebaste, in honor of Augustus, would have obliged the Samaritans to worship in the temple which he had erected there, but they constantly refused.—Watson.

GERMANICUS; a young man, and a Christian martyr of the second century, who, being delivered to the wild beasts, on account of his faith, behaved with such astonishing courage, that several pagans became converts to Christianity.—Foz, p. 17.

GESENIUS, (WILLIAM,) a celebrated orientalist and biblical critic, was born 1786, at Nordhausen, where his father, who was known as a respectable medical writer, was engaged in the practice of his profession. He was educated at the gymnasium of his native town, and at the universities of Helmstädt and Göttingen. His attention, however, was almost exclusively devoted to the study of the Oriental languages; and the necessity which he soon perceived of a better grammar and lexicon of the Hebrew language, led him to devote himself entirely to this, and to the study of the Old Testament. This he did during a three years' residence at Göttingen, as Magister legens and lecturer on theology, from 1806 to 1809, when he made preparations for his Hebrew lexicon. In 1809, he was appointed by the government of Westphalia professor of ancient literature in the Catholic and Protestant gymnasium, at Heiligenstadt; afterwards, in 1810, extraordinary, and in 1811, ordinary professor of theology at Halle. Here he attracted particular attention to the study of the Old Testament; and remaining after the restoration of the university in 1814, as doctor of theology, he wrote his Commentary on the origin, character, and authority of the Samaritan Pentateuch, which will always be regarded as a model in investigations of such a nature. In the summer of 1820, he made a scientific tour to Paris and Oxford, where he prepared collections in the Semitic languages, for lexicographical purposes, and also took a copy of the Ethiopian book of Enoch, with a view to future publication. In 1810 and 1812, appeared his Hebrew and German Lexicon, in two volumes, and in 1815, an abridgment of the same, a translation of which, by Mr. Gibbs, of Andover, has been published, both in America and England.

The chief peculiarities of these valuable works are a just estimation of, and thorough examination of, all the sources of lexicography, a correct apprehension of the relation between the Hebrew and its cognate languages, a complete statement and explanation of the constructions and phrases which are derived from each word; a clear distinction between what belongs to the province of the lexicon, the grammar, and the exegetical commentary respectively, and attention to the various kinds of diction. Some excellent remarks, which have had no small effect in the dissemination of right views upon these subjects, are to be found in the prefaces to the lexicon. His version of Isaiah, with a commentary, is one of the ablest critical works that have ever appeared; but unfortunately the neological views of the author have deeply tinged many parts of his exposition, especially such as relate to the prophecies respecting the Messiah. The last twenty-six chapters of the book he considers to have been written, not by Isaiah, but by some later author—an hypothesis which has been refuted by several writers, but by none more ably than by Henegstenberg, in his Old Testament Christology. Making deductions for these serious faults, it may nevertheless be asserted, that more philological, historical, and antiquarian research is to be found in this work, than in any other commentary on the Scriptures. The celebrity which Gesenius acquired by these labors has attracted a vast number of students to Halle, where he and Wegscheider take the lead of the naturalist party, and have for a time given eclat and currency to their principles; but of late their popularity as theologians has begun to decline, and the students are taught to discriminate between the speculating, unbelieving philologist, and the profound, consistent, and pious divine.—Hand. Buck.

GESHURITES; a people who dwelt east of the Jordan, north of Bashan, and within mount Hermon, Deut. 3: 14. Josh. 12: 5. They were not driven out by the Israelites; (Josh. 13: 13.) and after the death of Saul, Ishboeth was acknowledged king by them, [Eng. Tr. Ashurites,] and by the Israelites of Gilead, 2 Sam. 2: 9. The Geshur of 2 Sam. 3: 3. 15: 8, is a different country probably.—Calmet.

GETHIN, (Lady GRACE), daughter of Sir George Norton, and wife of Sir Richard Gethin, of Gethin Grot, Ireland, was born 1676, and died 1697, at the early age of twenty-one. Her mother, a lady of piety, had given her all the advantages of a liberal education, and the rapid advances she made were an ample recompense for the pains bestowed. Her reading and observations were extraordinary; for she had considered the human passions with unusual penetration and judgment; and laid such a foundation for her conduct as would have elevated her to a high rank in Christian excellence; but she was cut off in the bloom of life, early, but not unprepared. Her monument in Westminster Abbey is of beautiful black and white marble; but a more interesting monument remains in a posthumous volume of her writings, entitled Reliquiæ Gethinianæ, celebrated by Congreve. For perpetuating her memory, provision was made for a sermon to be preached in Westminster Abbey on Ash Wednesday forever.—Betham.

GETHSEMANE, (the oil press, or valley of oil;) a village at the foot of the mount of Olives, to which our Savior sometimes retired; and in a garden belonging to which, often visited by him for the purpose of private devotion, he endured his agony, and was taken by Judas, Matt. 26: 36. et. seq. I would desire grace, says Dr. Hawker, that by faith I might often visit Gethsemane; and while traversing the hallowed ground, call to mind that here it was Jesus entered upon that spiritual conflict with the powers of darkness, which, when finished, completed the salvation of his people. Sacred Gethsemane! (See AGONY).—Hawker; Calmet.

GIAH; a valley, probably not far from Gibeon, which might be an outlet, as its name imports, from a narrow and contracted road or country, to one more open; or it might be an eruption of water, as it were, from the mountain, 2 Sam. 2: 24.—Calmet.

GIANT, (nophel; Greek, gigas;) a monster, a terrible man, a chief who beats and bears down other men. Scripture speaks of giants before the flood: "Nephilim, mighty men who were of old, men of renown," Gen. 6: 4. Scripture sometimes calls giants Rephaim: Chedorlaomer beat the Rephaim at Ashteroth-Karnaim. The Enim, ancient inhabitants of Moab, were of a gigantic stature, that is, Rephaim. The Rephaim and the Perizzites are connected as old inhabitants of Canaan.

2. The Rephaim, in some parts of Scripture, signify spirits in the invisible world, in a state of misery. Jot says that the ancient Rephaim groan under the waters; and Solomon, that the ways of a loose woman lead to the Rephaim; that he who deviates from the ways of wisdom, shall dwell in the assembly of Rephaim, that is, in hell, Prov. 2: 18. 4: 18. 21: 16, &c. Gen. 14: 5. Deut. 2: 11, 20. 3: 11, 13. Josh. 12: 4. 13: 12. Job 26: 5.

3. As to the existence of giants, several writers, both ancient and modern, have thought that the giants of Scripture were men famous for violence and crime, rather than for strength or stature. But it cannot be denied, that there have been races of men of a stature much above that common at present; although their size has often been absurdly magnified. The ancients considered persons whose stature exceeded seven feet as gigantic. Living giants have certainly been seen who were somewhat taller; but the existence of those who greatly surpassed it, or were double the height, has been inferred only from remains discovered in the earth, but not from the ocular testimony of credible witnesses. Were we to admit what has been reported on the subject, there would be no bounds to the dimensions of giants; the earth would seem unsuitable for them to tread upon. History, however, acquaints us that, in the reign of Claudius, a giant named Galbara, ten feet high, was brought to Rome from the coast of Africa. An instance is cited by Goropius, an author with whom we are otherwise unacquainted, of a female of equal stature. A certain Greek sophist, Procerus, is said to have been nine feet in height. Julius Capitolinus affirms that Maximilian, the Roman emperor, was eight feet and a half; there was a Swede, one of the liegwards of Frederick the Great, of that size. M. Le Cat speaks of a giant exhibited at Rouen, measuring eight feet and some inches; and we believe some have been seen in England, within the last thirty years, whose stature was not inferior. In Plott's "History of Staffordshire," there is an instance of a man of seven feet and a half high, and another, in Thoresby's account of Leeds, of seven feet five inches high. Examples may be found elsewhere of several individuals seven feet in height, below which, after the opinion of the ancients, we may cease to consider men gigantic. Entire families sometimes, though rarely, occur of six feet four, or six feet six inches high. From all this we may conclude, that there may have possibly been seen some solitary instances of men who were ten feet in height; that those of eight feet are extremely uncommon, and that even six feet and a half far exceeds the height of men in Europe. We may reasonably understand that the gigantic nations of Canaan were above the average size of other people, with instances among them of several families of gigantic stature. This is all that is necessary to suppose, in order to explain the account of Moses; but the notion that men have gradually degenerated in size has no foundation.—Watson.

GIBBON, (EDWARD), one of the three greatest of English historians, was born in 1737, at Putney; was imperfectly educated at Westminster school, and Magdalen college, Oxford; and finished his studies at Lausanne, under M. Pavillard, a Calvinistic minister. It was his having embraced popery that occasioned his being sent to Lausanne. Pavillard reclaimed him from popery; but, after having vibrated between Catholicism and Protestantism, Gibbon settled into a confirmed sceptic. In 1758, he returned to England, and entered upon the duties of active life. More than two years he subsequently spent in visiting France, Switzerland, and Italy; and it was while he sat musing among the ruins of the Capitol, and the barefooted friars were singing vespers in the temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing a history of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, first arose in his mind. Several other historical schemes had previously occupied his attention. Of this great work the first volume appeared in 1776, the second and third in 1781, and the concluding three volumes in 1788. It raised him at once to the summit of literary fame; but its artful attacks on Christianity excited great disgust and indignation, and called forth several antagonists. One of them impeached his fidelity as a historian, and thus provoked a reply, which gave the assailant ample cause to repent his rashness. The facts Gibbon has recorded are not hostile to Christianity, when stripped, as they should be, of the sneers and insinuations by which he pandered to the sceptical spirit of his age.

In 1774, he became a member of parliament, and throughout the American war, he gave a silent support to the measures of lord North. In 1783, he retired to Lausanne, whence he twice returned to his native country. He died, January 16, 1794, during his last visit to England. His posthumous works were published, in two quarto volumes, by his friend lord Sheffield.

It is lamentable to reflect, that history has fallen under the dominion of infidelity; that of the three eminent historians, Robertson is barely neutral, and Hume and Gibbon are decidedly hostile to Christianity. Thus the book of God's providence, and of the manifestations of his wisdom, and long suffering, and justice, can scarcely be read by the general eye, till it is blurred and partly effaced by the comments of scepticism and profaneness; and the belief of the unguarded reader is assailed, not by arguments and open objections, but by continual insinuations, and by a slight but perpetual misrepresentation of facts. Notwithstanding his great powers, Gibbon has already sunk, and must sink still lower, in the scale of popularity, and begins to receive, even in this world, a measure of retribution for having chosen the worst side, in the great contest for evil and for good, and for having staked his all on Christianity being untrue—his reputation here, and his happiness hereafter. Yet even Gibbon is an important witness to the fulfilment of prophecy.—Davenport; Douglas on Errors; Keith's Evidence of Prophecy, &c.

GIBBONS, (THOMAS, D. D.) was born at Reek, eight miles from Cambridge, in 1720. His father was pastor of a Congregational church at Olney, in Bucks, who gave him the best education his circumstances would permit. His indefatigable application and industry enabled him to surmount every obstacle, and he made considerable acquisitions in useful and ornamental literature.

About the year 1742, he had the felicity to become acquainted with Dr. Isaac Watts; and by showing him a volume of poems in manuscript, a peculiar and intimate friendship was formed between them, which continued unabated to the close of Dr. Watts's life, which took place in 1748, and eventually led to the writing of his "Memoirs," which appeared in 1780, in an octavo volume.

Dr. Gibbons entered upon the work of the ministry in 1742, and in the following year he was called to the pastoral charge of the Independent church, meeting in Haberdashers' hall, Staining lane, Cheapside, where he continued his official labors to the period of his death, which took place on the 22d of February, 1785, in the sixty-fifth year of his age.

Dr. Gibbons was a man of great piety, of irreproachable manners, upright and benevolent, and of great cheerfulness of temper. He possessed a considerable portion of classical literature, and distinguished himself as an author by a variety of publications both in prose and verse. Among these, besides his Life of Dr. Watts, we may specify "Poems, on several Occasions," 1743; "Juvenilia; or, Poems on various Subjects of Devotion and Virtue," octavo, 1750; "Rhetoric; or, a View of its principal Tropes and Figures, in their Origin and Powers; with a variety of Rules to escape Errors and Blemishes, and attain Propriety and Elegance in Composition," octavo, 1767. In 1777, he published "Lives and Memoirs of eminently pious Women, who were Ornaments of their Sex, Blessings to their Families, and edifying Examples to the Church and the World," two volumes, octavo. After Dr. Gibbons's death, three volumes of sermons by him were published in octavo, by subscription.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

GIBEAH; a city of Benjamin, about seven miles north of Jerusalem, and the birth-place of Saul, king of Israel; whence it is frequently called "Gibeah of Saul," 1 Sam. 11: 4. 15: 34. 2 Sam. 21: 6. Isa. 10: 29. Gibeah was also famous for its sins; particularly for that committed by forcing the young Levite's wife, who went to lodge there; and for the war which succeeded it, to the almost entire extermination of the tribe of Benjamin, Judges 19. Scripture remarks, that this happened at a time when there was no king in Israel, and when every one did what was right in his own eyes.—Calmet.

GIBEON; a city situated on a hill about five miles north of Jerusalem, and belonging to the tribe of Judah. It is spoken of as "a great city;" (Josh. 10.) and the capture of it by Joshua seems to have spread much consternation, at that time, throughout the neighborhood. The Gibeonites continued ever afterwards faithful in their attachment to the Israelites, though they appear to have suffered dreadfully under the sanguinary reign of Saul, 2 Sam. 21.

Previous to the building of the temple at Jerusalem, it appears that the tabernacle and altar of sacrifice were for some time stationed at Gibeon, 1 Chron. 21: 29, 30. 1 Kings 3: 4.—Jones.

GICHTEL, (JOHN GEORGE,) a mystic and fanatic, born at Ratisbon, in 1638. In his sixteenth year he pretended to have divine visions and revelations; he afterwards went to Holland, where he attended to certain religious exercises, with a view to fit himself for the duties of a missionary in America. After enduring several persecutions in Germany, the result of the disturbances created by his doctrines, and suffering considerable opposition from a number of his followers, who withdrew from him that support for which he was entirely dependent on them, he died at Amsterdam, in 1710. He wrote several works, which were published by himself or his disciples, who called themselves the Angelic Brethren. These works have recently been drawn forth from oblivion, and are held in great esteem by the present mystics of Germany.—Hend. Euck.

GIDEON; the son of Joash, of the tribe of Manasseh; the same with Jerubbaal, the seventh judge of Israel. He dwelt in the city of Ophra, and was chosen by God in a very extraordinary manner to deliver the Israelites from the oppression of the Midianites, under which they had labored for the space of seven years. See Judges 6: 14—27. 8: 1—24, &c.—Watson.

GIDGAD; a mountain in the wilderness of Paran, between Bene-jaakan and Jobathah, where the Hebrews encamped, Num. 33: 32.—Calmet.

GIER-EAGLE; (rachma, Lev. 11: 18. Deut. 14: 17.) Bruce says, "We know from Horus Apollo, that the rachma, or she-vulture, was sacred to Isis, and adorned the statue of the goddess; that it was the emblem of parental affection; and that it was the hieroglyphic for an affectionate mother."

Hasselquist says, "The appearance of the bird is as horrid as can well be imagined. The face is naked and wrinkled, the eyes are large and black, the beak black and crooked, the talons large, and extended ready for prey, and the whole body polluted with filth. These are qualities enough to make the beholder shudder with horror. Notwithstanding this, the inhabitants of Egypt cannot be enough thankful to Providence for this bird. All the places round Cairo are filled with the dead bodies of asses and camels; and thousands of these birds fly about and devour the carcasses, before they putrefy and fill the air with noxious exhalations." No wonder that such an animal should be deemed unclean.—Watson.

GIFFORD, (ANDREW, D. D.) a distinguished minister of London, and assistant librarian of the British museum, was born at Bristol, August 17, 1700. Becoming the subject of divine grace at an early age, he was baptized on profession of his faith in Christ, in 1715, and united with the Pithay church in that city, of which his father was pastor. He finished his classical studies under the celebrated Dr. Ward, of Gresham college, in 1723, and commenced preaching at Nottingham and Bristol, where his ministry attracted much attention. He removed to London, in 1729, and became pastor of the Baptist church in Little Wild street. He was also chaplain to the family of Sir Richard Elllys, the learned author of the "Fortuita Sacra." In 1743, he visited Edinburgh, and was honored with the freedom of the city. In 1754, he was made D. D. by the Marischal college, Aberdeen. In 1757, having been some time a member of the Antiquarian society, he was appointed assistant librarian of the British museum, a station which he held till his death, i. e. twenty-seven years. In a perfect acquaintance with ancient coins and manuscripts he is said to have eminently excelled. Many of the nobility courted his acquaintance, and occasionally attended his meeting, which was then in Eagle street.

The ministrv of Dr. Gifford was eminently useful. He was a pathetic and powerful preacher, uniting in his character the Barnabas and the Boanerges. His biographer, Dr. Rippon, says of him, "His heart was in the work, and it might have been said of him, Vividus vultus, vividi oculi, vivida manus, denique omnia vivida. When above eighty years of age, he was more zealous and active in his Master's work than many young men of twenty-five; and it was truly said of him that "the doctor will die popular." But popularity merely, would have been regarded as a light thing by Dr. Gifford. He supremely valued and sought "the honor that cometh from God only," and the happiness springing from communion with the Savior. In his last moments he said with characteristic feeling, "I want no friend but Christ; I wish to see no friend but Christ. What should I do now, were it not for an interest in Jesus Christ." Thus affectionately recommending the Savior to all around him, he fell asleep, June 19, 1784, aged eighty-four.

Besides other charitable legacies, Dr. Gifford bequeathed his valuable books, pictures, and manuscripts, with a vast variety of curiosities, to the Baptist academy at Bristol, and caused an elegant room to be erected, which is called "Gifford's Museum."—Memoir of Dr. Rippon; Am. Bap. Mag. for 1825.

GIFT OF TONGUES; an ability given by the Holy Spirit to the apostles and others, of readily and intelligibly speaking a variety of languages which they had never learned. This was a glorious and decisive attestation to the gospel, as well as a suitable, and, indeed, in their circumstances, a necessary qualification for the mission for which the apostles and their coadjutors were designed. Nor is there any reason, with Dr. Middleton, to understand it as merely an occasional gift, so that a person might speak a language most finely one hour, and be entirely ignorant of it the next; which neither agrees with what is said of the abuse of it, nor would it have been sufficient to answer the end proposed, Acts 2. Some appear to have been gifted with one tongue, others with more. To St. Paul this endowment was vouchsafed in a more liberal degree, than to many others; for, as to the Corinthians, who had received the gift of tongues, he says, "that he spake with tongues more than they all."—Watson.

GIFTS. The practice of making presents is very common in Oriental countries. The custom probably had its origin among those men who first sustained the office of kings or rulers, and who, from the novelty and perhaps the weakness attached to their situation, chose, rather than make the hazardous attempt of exacting taxes, to content themselves with receiving those presents which might be freely offered, 1 Sam 10: 27. Hence it passed into a custom, that whoever approached the king or his officers, should come with a gift. This was the practice and the expectation. Gifts of this kind, that have now been described, are not to be confounded with those which were presented to judges, not as a mark of esteem and honor, but for purposes of bribery and corruption. The former were considered an honor to the giver, but a gift of the latter kind has been justly reprobated in every age, Exod. 23: 8. Deut. 10: 17. 16: 19. 27: 25. Ps. 15: 5. 26: 10. Isa. 1: 23. 5: 23. 33: 15. The giver was not restricted as to the kind of present which he should make. He might present not only silver and gold, but clothes and arms, also different kinds of food, in a word, any thing which could be of benefit to the recipient, Gen. 43: 11. 1 Sam. 9: 7. 16: 20. Job 42: 11. It was sometimes the case, that the king, when he made a feast, presented vestments to all the guests who were invited, with which they clothed themselves before they sat down to it, 2 Kings 10: 22. Gen. 45: 22. Rev. 3: 5. Matt. 22: 11, 12.—Watson.

GIHON; a fountain west of Jerusalem, where Solomon was anointed king by Zadok and Nathan. Hezekiah ordered the waters of the upper channel of Gihon to be conveyed into Jerusalem, 1 Kings 1: 33. 2 Chron. 32: 30. 2. The name of one of the four rivers of Paradise, Gen. 2: 13. (See EBEN.)—Calmet.

GILBERTINES; a religious order; thus called from St. Gilbert, of Sempringham, in the county of Lincoln, who founded the same about the year 1148; the monks of which observed the rule of St. Augustine, and were accounted canons, and the nuns that of St. Benedict.—Hend. Buch.

GILBOA; a ridge of mountains, memorable for the defeat and death of Saul and Jonathan, (1 Sam. 31.) running north of Bethshan or Scythopolis, and forming the western boundary of that part of the plain of the Jordan. They are said to be extremely dry and barren, and are still called, by the Arabs, Djebel Gilbo.—Calmet.

GILEAD; a mountainous district east of the Jordan, and which separated the lands of Ammon, Moab, Reuben, Gad, and Manassah, from Arabia Deserta, Gen. 31: 21.

The scenery of the mountains of Gilead is described by Mr. Buckingham as being extremely beautiful. The plains are covered with a fertile soil, the hills are clothed with forests, and at every new turn the most beautiful landscapes that can be imagined are presented. The Scripture references to the stately oaks and herds of cattle in this region are well known.—Calmet.

GILGAL; a celebrated place situated on the west of Jordan, one league from the river, and at an equal distance from Jericho, Josh. 5: 2—4. The word Gilgal signifies rolling. Here the ark was long stationed, and consequently the place was much resorted to by the Israelites. It seems to have been the place in which Jeroboam or some of the kings of Israel instituted idolatrous worship; and hence the allusions to it by the prophets, Hosea 4: 15. Amos 4: 4. It is probable that there were idols at Gilgal as early as the days of Ehud, who was one of the judges; for it is said that, having delivered his presents to the king, "Ehud went away, but returned again from the quarries that were by Gilgal," Judges 3: 19. The margin of our Bibles reads, "the graven images," or idols set up by the Moabites, the viewing of which, it is thought, stirred up Ehud to revenge the affront thereby offered to the God of Israel.—Watson.

GILL, (JOHN, D. D.) was born the 23d of November, 1697, at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, where his father was deacon of the Baptist church. He made rapid advances in classical learning, at a neighboring grammar-school, in which he was placed while very young; and even then he resorted so frequently to a bookseller's, for the purpose of reading, that it became proverbial to say, that a thing was as certain as that John Gill was in the bookseller's shop. Being driven from the grammar-school, by the bigotry of the clergyman who presided over it, his friends endeavored to procure him admission into a seminary for the ministry, by sending specimens of his advancement in different branches of literature. These, however, defeated their object, for they produced the following answer: "He is too young; and should he continue, as it might be expected he would, to make such rapid advances, he would go through the common circle before he would be capable of taking care of himself, or of being employed in any public service." It is to be hoped that this reply was accompanied with some explanation, which made it appear more justifiable than in its present detached state; or it would seem that the guardians of this seminary felt but little solicitude to see the finest talents consecrated to the noblest of causes. Not discouraged by this repulse, young Gill pursued his studies with so much ardor, that before he was nineteen, he had read the principal Greek and Latin classics; had gone through a course of logic, rhetoric, natural and moral philosophy; and acquired a considerable knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. But it is supremely gratifying to find that religion was still dearer to him than learning; for, instead of resembling those schoolists who suppose it a proof of genius to disdain the study of their Maker's will, he imitated Him who, in early youth, resorted to the temple as his Father's house, and there employed in sacred researches that understanding at which all were astonished. The Baptist church in his native town first received this extraordinary youth as a member, and then called him forth into the ministry. For this work he went to study under Mr. Davies, at Higham Ferrers; but was soon invited to preach to the Baptist congregation in Horslydown, near London, over which he was ordained in 1719, when he was in his twenty-second year.

He was now applied with intense ardor to oriental literature; and having contracted an acquaintance with one of the most learned of the Jewish rabbies, he read the Targums, the Talmud, and every book of rabbinical lore which he could procure. In this line it is said that he had but few equals, and that he was not excelled by any whose name is recorded in the annals of literature. Having published, in 1748, "A Commentary on the New-Testament," in three folio volumes, the immense reading and learning which it displayed induced the university of Aberdeen to send him the diploma of doctor of divinity, with the following compliment: "On account of his knowledge of the Scriptures, of the oriental languages, and of Jewish antiquities; of his learned defence of the Scriptures against deists and infidels, and the reputation gained by his other works, the university had, without his privity, unanimously agreed to confer on him the degree of doctor in divinity." He published also "A Commentary on the Old Testament," which, together with that of the New, forms an immense mass of nine folio volumes. At the close of this Herculean labor, he was so far from resting satisfied, that he said, "I considered with myself what would be next best to engage in, for the further instruction of the people under my care, and my thoughts led me to enter upon a scheme of doctrinal and practical divinity;" this he executed in three quarto volumes. Amidst these labors of the study, and the pulpit, he lived to a good old age, and died 1771, aged 73.

Besides the works already mentioned, he maintained the five points of Calvinism in his "Cause of God and Truth," with much temper and learning. He published also "A Dissertation on the Hebrew Language;" "Discourses on the Canticles," to which considerable objections have been made; and many sermons, as well as smaller controversial pieces. His private character was so excellent, that it has been said, "his learning and labors were exceeded only by the invariable sanctity of his life and conversation." As a divine, he was a supralapsarian Calvinist; but in his Body of Divinity, he is so far from condemning sublapsarian sentiments as heretical, or Arminianised, that he attempts to show how the two systems coalesce. While his works impress the judicious reader with esteem for the purity of his intentions, and admiration for the magnitude of his labors, they excite regret that they had not been prepared with greater delicacy of taste, and revised with more accurate judgment. It is, above all, to be lamented, that they have diffused a taste for Ultra Calvinism, which has induced many, who were devoid of his sanctity, to profane his name, in order to sanction their errors, or their lusts. Dr. Gill was, nevertheless, a great and good man; and his character is highly esteemed by every well-informed Christian. His "Body of Divinity," abridged by the late Dr. Staughton, was published in Philadelphia, in 1816, in one volume, octavo. See Memoirs of Dr. Gill; Jones's Chris. Biog.—Hend. Buck.

GILPIN, (BERNARD,) a Protestant reformer, was born, in 1517, at Kentmire, in Westmoreland; and was educated at Queen's college, Oxford. His Catholic principles were first shaken by Peter Martyr, against whom he had been brought forward as the champion of the Romish church.

After having embraced the Protestant faith, he became rector of Houghton Spring, in the diocese of Durham. In the reign of Mary, the sanguinary Bonner marked him out for one of his victims, but the queen's death took place before Gilpin could be brought to London. In the next reign he refused the highest offers of preferment, and he died, deeply lamented by his parishioners, in 1583. His piety, benevolence to the poor, and unwearied endeavors to spread religion, gained him the honorable appellation of "the Northern Apostle."—Middleton; Jones's Chris. Biog.

GILPIN, (WILLIAM,) a divine and elegant writer, was born, in 1724, at Carlisle; received his education at Queen's college, Oxford; for many years kept a celebrated academy at Cheam; and died, in 1807, vicar of Boldre, and prebendary of Salisbury. He wrote Lives of Bernard Gilpin and Wicliff; Sermons; and various theological works; Remarks on Forest Scenery; a Tour to the Lakes; and several volumes of Observations on the Picturesque Beauties of many parts of England.—Davenport.

GIRDLE. The girdle is an indispensable article in the dress of an Oriental. It has various uses; but the principal one is to tuck up their long flowing vestments, that they may not incommode them in their work, or on a journey. The Jews, according to some writers, wore a double girdle, one of greater breadth, with which they girded their tunic when they prepared for active exertions; the other they wore under their shirt, around their loins.

The upper girdle was sometimes made of leather, the material of which the girdle of John the Baptist was made; but it was more commonly fabricated of worsted, often very artfully woven into a variety of figures, and made to fold several times about the body; one end of which being doubled back, and sewn along the edges, serves them for a purse, agreeably to the acceptance of zōnē in the Scriptures, which is translated purse in several places of the New Testament, Matt. 10: 9. Mark 6: 8. The Turks make a further use of these girdles, by fixing their knives and poinards in them; while the writers and secretaries suspend in them their ink-horns; a custom as old as the prophet Ezekiel, who mentions "a person clothed in white linen, with an ink-horn upon his loins," Ezek. 9: 2. That part of the ink-holder which passes between the girdle and the tunic, and receives their pens, is long and flat; but the vessel for the ink, which rests upon the girdle, is square, with a lid to clasp over it.

2. To loose the girdle and give it to another, was, among the Orientals, a token of great confidence and affection. A girdle curiously and richly wrought, was, among the ancient Hebrews, a mark of honor, and sometimes bestowed as a reward of merit, 2 Sam. 18: 11. People of rank and fashion in the East wear very broad girdles, all of silk, and superbly ornamented with gold and silver, and precious stones, of which they are extremely proud, regarding them as the tokens of their superior station and the proof of their riches. "To gird up the loins," is to bring the flowing robe within the girdle, and so to prepare for a journey, or for some vigorous exercise.—Watson.

GIRGASHITES. (See GERGESHITES.)

GITH; a grain, by the Greeks called Melanthon, by the Latins, Nigella, because it is black; in our translation, fitches or vetches, which see.—Calmet.

GITTITES; the inhabitants of Gath, Josh. 13: 3. Obed-Edom and Ittai are called Gittites, (2 Sam. 6: 10. 15: 19.) probably, because they visited David at Gath, or because they were natives of Gittaim, a city of Benjamin, 2 Sam. 4: 3.—Calmet.

GITTITH; a Hebrew word, which occurs frequently in the titles of the Psalms. It is generally translated wine-presses. Calmet is of opinion, that such psalms were given to the class of young women, or songstresses of Gath, to be sung by them, (see Ps. 8.) remarking that Gittith does not signify wine-presses, but a woman of Gath. If wine-presses were meant, it should be gitteth.—Calmet.

GIVE, properly signifies to bestow a thing freely, as in alms, John 3: 16. But it is used to signify the imparting or permitting of any thing good or bad, Ps. 16: 7. John 18: 11. Ps. 28: 4. To give ourselves to Christ, and his ministers and people, is solemnly to devote ourselves to the faith, profession, worship, and obedience of Jesus Christ, as our husband, teacher, Savior, portion, and sovereign Lord; and to a submissive subjection to the instruction, government, and discipline of his ministers; and to a walking with his people in all the ordinances of his grace, 2 Cor. 8: 5. To be given to a thing, is to be much set upon, earnest for, and delighted in it, 1 Tim. 3: 3.—Brown.

GLAS, (JOHN,) the father of Scotch independency, and founder of a denomination which is called after him—though, in England, better known by the term Sandemanians—was born, 1695, in the parish of Auchtermuchty, in the county of Fife, North Britain. At St. Andrews and Edinburgh, he perfected his studies in philosophy and theology. In 1719, he was ordained minister of the parish of Tealing, near Dundee.

Mr. Glas had studied, with great diligence and care, the doctrinal systems of Calvin and Arminius; and being decidedly fixed in the former, he held forth the doctrine of rich, free, and sovereign grace, with extraordinary ability, from the pulpit; and his fame as a preacher soon spread abroad, and drew numbers to hear him. An extraordinary stir being made in Scotland, about the duty of covenanting, Mr. Glas was put upon the task of investigating this subject, and of bringing it to the touchstone of the New Testament. The result of his inquiries was the publication of a small volume, which made its first appearance in 1729, under the title of "The Testimony of the King of Martyrs concerning his Kingdom;" being an explanation and illustration of Christ's good confession before Pontius Pilate, John 18: 36, 37. He could no longer officiate, with a good conscience, as a clergyman of the national establishment.

Mr. Glas now took up his residence in Dundee, where he was the means of collecting a church, which was formed on Congregational principles, and of which he was chosen a presbyter, in conjunction with Mr. Francis Archibald, who had left the church of Scotland at the same time as himself. From this period Mr. Glas was busily engaged for several years in maintaining his principles against a host of opponents, who rose up in rapid succession to defend those of the national establishment. By the spirit of inquiry thus set on foot, the profession spread rapidly throughout Scotland, and the formation of churches in the various towns of Dunkeld, Perth, Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c. found abundant employment for Mr. Glas for a number of years. He removed his residence from Dundee to Edinburgh, where he officiated several years as the pastor of a church which had been collected there; and when his labors were no longer required there, he removed to Perth, where he labored with assiduity till the year 1737; when, having established the profession in that city, he again returned to Dundee, where he continued his labors in his Master's vineyard to the termination of his useful life, November 2d, 1773, at the advanced age of seventy-eight. Besides his "Testimony of the King of Martyrs," he published a great number of different treatises, of which a uniform edition was printed in five volumes, octavo, Perth, 1782.—Hend. Buck.

GLASITES. See GLAS, (JOHN;) and SANDEMANIANS.

GLASS, (hualos.) This word occurs Rev. 21: 18, 21. 4: 6. 15: 2. There seems to be no reference to glass in the Old Testament. The art of making it was not known. Our translators have rendered the Hebrew in Exodus 38: 8, and Job 27: 18, "looking-glass." But the making mirrors of glass, coated with quicksilver, is an invention quite modern. Mirrors were then made of polished metal. The word esoptron, or mirror, occurs in 1 Cor. 13: 12, and James 1: 23. Dr. Pearce thinks that in the former place it signifies any of those transparent substances which the ancients used in their windows, and through which they saw external objects obscurely. It is certain that the specimens of Roman glass, dug up from Pompeii, are all dull and cloudy. But others are of opinion that the word denotes a mirror of polished metal; as this, however, was liable to many imperfections, so that the object before it was not seen clearly or fully, the meaning of the apostle is, that we see things as it were by images reflected from a mirror, which shows them very obscurely and indistinctly. In the latter place, a mirror undoubtedly is meant.—Watson.

GLEANNING. The Hebrews were not permitted to go over their trees or fields a second time, to gather the fruit or the grain, but were to leave the gleanings for the poor, the fatherless, and the widow, Lev. 19: 10. 23: 22. Deut. 24: 21. Ruth 2: 3. (See HARVEST.)—Calmet.

GLEDE; a fowl of the ravenous kind. It is called dash, from its swift flight; and raah, from its quick sight. It is impatient of cold, and so is seldom seen in the winter; through fear and cowardice, it seldom attacks any but tame fowls, hens, &c. Deut. 16: 13. It is called a vulture, Lev. 11: 14. Was this unclean bird an emblem of persecutors, destitute of courage except to harass and destroy the saints?—Brown.

GLENORCHY, (LADY WILHELMINA MAXWELL,) distinguished for her benevolence and piety, was born at Preston, in North Britain, in the year 1742. She was the daughter of Dr. William Maxwell, a gentleman of great fortune and respectability. The instructions she received were such as to improve her heart, as well as enlighten her understanding. Her mind was strong and vigorous, yet polished and delicate. Her memory was retentive, her person interesting, her behavior affable, her imagination lively, and her temper excellent. Her juvenile years, though sedulously watched over by her kind and intelligent mother, were nevertheless too much devoted to the follies and gayety of fashionable life. When, however, she had attained the age of twenty-three years, her mind was aroused by a serious illness, to reflections on her present character and future prospects; and musing on the first question in the Assembly's Catechism, "What is the chief end of man?"—"It is to glorify God, and enjoy him forever," she asked herself, Have I answered the design of my being? Have I glorified God? Shall I enjoy him forever? Thus reflecting, she gradually felt the sinfulness of her nature; perceived the total alienation of her heart from God; and applied to her heavenly Father through Christ for pardon and grace.

Like many young professors of religion, she endeavored at first to conceal from observation the change which had been wrought on her heart, and, as far as possible, to compromise with the world; but such conduct she soon discovered to be incompatible with spirituality of mind, and she therefore determined on making an open and decided profession of Christianity. The remainder of her life was distinguished by the consistency of her deportment. She employed much of her time in acts of benevolence; in wise and pious conversation; in an extensive, judicious, and profitable correspondence; and in every other means for promoting the conversion of sinners and the edification of saints. For such benevolent actions, the worldly and irreligious branded her with the name of Methodist, and endeavored to represent her as a wild enthusiast; but such opposition her principles enabled her patiently to endure, and, through evil and good report, to pursue her work of faith and labor of love. Though her health declined, her activity and usefulness were unabated; till, on the 17th of July, 1786, she was summoned to her reward. She bequeathed, by her will, five thousand pounds for the education of young men for the ministry in England; five thousand pounds to the society in Scotland for the propagation of Christian knowledge; and the greatest part of the residue of her property to charitable and pious purposes.

GLORIFY; to render glorious. God is glorified by Christ, or by creatures, when his perfections are acknowledged, or manifested by their praising, trusting in, or serving him; or are displayed in his favors, and judgments executed on them, John 17: 4. Ps. 1: 23. Rom. 4: 20. Lev. 10: 3. Isa. 44: 23. Christ is glorified in God's receiving him into heaven, bestowing on him the highest honor, power, and authority, as our Mediator, (John 17: 1, 5,) and in the Holy Ghost's declaring, and revealing his excellencies, and communicating his fulness to men, (John 16: 14.) and in his people's believing on him, walking in nim, praising, obeying and imitating him; and his exerting, and manifesting his power and wisdom, by doing good to them, 2 Thess. 1: 10, 12, and John 11: 4. Men are glorified when endowed with great and shining holiness, happiness, and honor, in the heavenly and eternal state, Rom. 8: 17, 30. To glorify one's self, is to claim, or boast of honor not due to one, Heb. 5: 5, and Rev. 18: 7.—Brown.

GLORY, splendor, magnificence; also admiration, praise, or honor, attributed to God, in adoration or worship.

The glory of God, is the splendid manifestation of the divine perfections in creation, providence, and grace, Exod. 33: 18. It is also used for the state of future happiness, Rom. 3: 23. 5: 2.

We may be said to give glory to God when we confess our sins, when we love him supremely, when we commit ourselves to him, are zealous in his service, improve our talents, walk humbly, thankfully, and cheerfully, before him, and recommend, proclaim, or set forth his excellencies to others, Jos. 7: 19. Gal. 2: 20. John 15: 8. Ps. 1: 23. Matt. 5: 16. (See GLORIFY.)—Hend. Buck.

GLOSSARIUM, in biblical literature, is a book or writing, comprehending glosses or short explanations of dark and difficult words or phrases in the inspired writings or the Greek authors. Among the Greeks, glossa meant either an idiomatic word, peculiar to a certain dialect only, and unknown in others, an obsolete word, or an obscure one. A glossary, of course, extends only to a few of the words and phrases of an author. It is not to be used as a lexicon, but as a comment on particular passages. Its value depends on its antiquity, or on the learning of its author. The principal ancient glossaries published are these: Hesychius, Suidas, Phavorinus, Cyrill, Photius, Etymologicum Magnum.—Hend. Buck.

GNAT, (κόμης; Matt. 23: 24.) a small winged insect, comprehending a genus of the order of diptera. In those hot countries, as Servius remarks, speaking of the East, gnats and flies are very apt to fall into wine, if it be not carefully covered; and passing the liquor through a strainer, that no gnat or part of one might remain, became a proverb for exactness about little matters. This may help us to understand that passage, (Matt. 23: 24.) where the proverbial expression of carefully straining out a little fly from the liquor to be drunk, and yet swallowing a camel, intimates, that the scribes and Pharisees affected to scruple little things, and yet disregarded those of the greatest moment.—Watson.

GNOSIMACHI; a name which distinguished those in the seventh century who were professed enemies to the Gnosis; i. e. the studied knowledge or science of Christianity. (See GNOSTICS.)—Hend. Buck.

GNOSTICS, from gnōsis, "knowledge;" men of science and wisdom, illuminati; men who, from blending the philosophy of the East, or of Greece, with the doctrines of the gospel, boasted of deeper knowledge in the Scriptures and theology than others. It was, therefore, not so properly a distinct sect as a generic term, comprehending all who, forsaking the simplicity of the gospel, pretended to be "wise above what is written," to explain the New Testament by the dogmas of the philosophers, and to derive from the sacred writings mysteries which never were contained in them.

The origin of the Gnostic heresy, as it is called, has been variously stated. The principles of this heresy were, however, much older than Christianity; and many of the errors alluded to in the apostolic epistles are doubtless of a character very similar to some branches of the Gnostic system. (See CEBALA.) Cerinthus, against whom St. John wrote his gospel; the Nicolaitans, mentioned in the Revelation, and the Ebionites, (described under that article,) were all early Gnostics, although the system was not then so completely formed as afterwards. Dr. Burton, in his Bampton Lectures, says, "It was not by any means a new and distinct philosophy, but made up of selections from almost every system. Thus we find in it the Platonic doctrine of ideas, and the notion that every thing in this lower world has a celestial and immaterial archetype. We find in it evident traces of that mystical and cabalistic jargon, which, after their return from captivity, deformed the religion of the Jews: and many Gnostics adopted the Oriental notion of two independent co-eternal principles, the one the author of good, the other of evil. Lastly, we find the Gnostic theology full of ideas and terms, which must have been taken from the gospel; and Jesus Christ, under some form or other of æon, emanation, or incorporeal phantom, enters into all their systems, and is the means of communicating to them that knowledge which raised them above all other mortals, and entitled them to their peculiar name. The genius and very soul of Gnosticism was mystery: its end and object was to purify its followers from the corruptions of matter, and to raise them to a higher scale of being, suited only to those who were become perfect by knowledge."

Such as would be thoroughly acquainted with all their doctrines, reveries, and visions, may consult Irenæus, Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Epiphanius; particularly the first of these writers, who relates their sentiments at large, and confutes them. Indeed he dwells more on the Valentinians than any other sect of Gnostics; but he shows the general principles whereon all their mistaken opinions were founded, and the method they followed in explaining Scripture. He accuses them of introducing into religion certain vain and ridiculous genealogies, i. e. a kind of divine processions or emanations, which had no other foundation but in their own wild imagination. The Gnostics confessed that these æons or emanations were nowhere expressly delivered in the sacred writings; but insisted that Jesus Christ had intimated them in parables to such as could understand them. They built their theology not only on the gospels and the epistles of St. Paul, but also on the law of Moses and the prophets. These last were peculiarly serviceable to them, on account of the allegories and allusions with which they abound, which are capable of different interpretations; though their doctrine concerning the creation of the world by one or more inferior beings of an evil or imperfect nature, led them to deny the divine authority of the books of the Old Testament, which contradicted this idle fiction, and filled them with an abhorrence of Moses and the religion he taught; alleging, that he was actuated by the malignant author of this world, who consulted his own glory and authority, and not the real advantage of men. Their persuasion that evil resided in matter, as its centre and source, made them treat the body with contempt, discourage marriage, and reject the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, and its reunion with the immortal spirit. Their notion, that malevolent genii presided in nature, and occasioned diseases and calamities, wars and desolations, induced them to apply themselves to the study of magic, in order to weaken the powers or suspend the influence of these malignant agents. The Gnostics considered Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and inferior to the Father, who came into the world for the rescue and happiness of miserable mortals, oppressed by matter and evil beings; but they rejected our Lord's humanity, on the principle that every thing corporeal is essentially and intrinsically evil; and therefore the greatest part of them denied the reality of his sufferings. They set a great value on the beginning of the gospel of St. John, where they fancied they saw a great deal of their æons, or emanations, under the terms the word, the life, the light, &c. They divided all nature into three kinds of beings, viz. hylic, or material; psychic, or animal; and pneumatic, or spiritual. On the like principle they also distinguished three sorts of men; material, animal, and spiritual. The first, who were material, and incapable of knowledge, inevitably perished, both soul and body; the third, such as the Gnostics themselves pretended to be, were all certainly saved; the psychic, or animal, who were the middle between the other two, were capable either of being saved or damned, according to their good or evil actions. With regard to their moral doctrines and conduct, they were much divided. The greatest part of this sect adopted very austere rules of life, recommended rigorous abstinence, and prescribed severe bodily mortifications, with a view of purifying and exalting the mind. However, some maintained that there was no moral difference in human actions; and thus confounding right with wrong, they gave a loose rein to all the passions, and asserted the innocence of following blindly all their motions, and of living by their tumultuous dictates. They supported their opinions and practice by various authorities: some referred to fictitious and apocryphal writings of Adam, Abraham, Zoroaster, Christ, and his apostles; others boasted that they had deduced their sentiments from secret doctrines of Christ, concealed from the vulgar; and others affirmed that they arrived at superior degrees of wisdom by an innate vigor of mind; and others asserted that they were instructed in these mysterious parts of theological science by Theudas, a disciple of Paul, and by Matthias, one of the friends of our Lord. The tenets of the ancient Gnostics were revived in Spain, in the fourth century, by a sect called the Priscillianists. At length the name Gnostic, which originally was glorious, became infamous, by the idle opinions and dissolute lives of the persons who bore it.—Watson; Hend. Buck.

GO. When God is said to go down, or up, it does not mean, that he changes his place in respect of his essence, but that his knowledge, or powerful operation, or the symbol of his presence, bears such relation to a particular place, Gen. 11: 5, 7, and 25: 13. His comings are the display of his perfections, and the acts of his providence towards the world, towards Jesus, or his church; and in respect of this he may be said to come or go from one, Ps. 68: 24. Christ's goings forth from everlasting, prove his divine nature, prior to his incarnation, Mic. 5: 2. The saints' going out and in, denotes their whole conversation, which is by Christ as the door; they have great liberty in him, and live by faith on him, Ps. 17: 5, and 121: 8. John 10: 9. The prince in the midst of them when they go in shall go in; and when they go forth shall go forth. Jesus, who is among his people in their heart, always present to assist them, shall go with them when they go in to the throne of grace, that he may present their petitions, and render them accepted; when they go in to the house of God, he shall go in to feed them on good pasture; when they go in to their heart to search it, he shall go in to discover it to them, and comfort against all grief on every side. When they go out from public ordinances he shall go with them, to impress what they have been about on their mind; he shall go out with them to the world, to keep them from the evil; he shall go out of the world with them at death, to introduce them to eternal glory, Ezek. 46: 10.—Brown.

GOAD; a long staff or wand for driving cattle, Judg. 3: 26. It had a piece of sharply pointed iron in the small end, and perhaps a paddle on the other, to cut up weeds. The words of the wise are as goads; they penetrate into men's minds, and stir them up to the practice of duty. Eccl. 12: 11.—Brown.

GOAT, (gnav.) The goat was one of the clean beasts which the Israelites might both eat and offer in sacrifice.

The kid is often mentioned as a food, in a way that implies that it was considered as a delicacy. The akav, or wild goat, mentioned Deut. 14: 5, and nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible, is supposed to be the tragelaphus, or "goat-deer." Schultens conjectures that this animal might have its name, ob fugacitatem, from its shyness, or running away. The word jol, or jaal, occurs 1 Sam. 24: 3. Job 39: 1. Psalm 104: 18. Prov. 5: 19, and various have been the sentiments of interpreters on the animal intended by it. Bochart insists that it is the ibex, or "rock-goat." The root whence the name is derived, signifies to ascend, to mount; and the ibex is famous for clambering, climbing, and leaping, on the most craggy precipices. The Arab writers attribute to the jaal very long horns, bending backwards; consequently it cannot be the chamois. The horns of the jaal are reckoned among the valuable articles of traffic, Ezek. 27: 15. The ibex is finely shaped, graceful in its motions, and gentle in its manners. The female is particularly celebrated by natural historians for tender affection to her young, and the incessant vigilance with which she watches over their safety; and also for ardent attachment and fidelity to her mate.—Watson; Abbott.

GOATS' HAIR, was used by Moses in making the curtains of the tabernacle, Exod. 25: 4, &c. The hair of the goats of Asia, Phrygia, and Cilicia, which is cut off, in order to manufacture stuffs, is very bright and fine, and hangs to the ground; in beauty it almost equals silk, and is never sheared, but combed off. The shepherds carefully and frequently wash these goats in rivers. The women of the country spin the hair, which is carried to Angora, where it is worked and dyed, and a considerable trade in the article carried on. The natives attribute the quality of the hair to the soil of the country.—Calmet.

GOB; a plain where two battles were fought between the Hebrews and Philistines, 2 Sam. 21: 18, 19. In 1 Chron. 20: 4, we read Gezer instead of Gob. The LXX, in some copies, read Nob instead of Gob; and in others Gath.—Calmet.

GOD; that infinitely great, intelligent, and free Being; of perfect goodness, wisdom, and power; transcendently glorious in holiness; who made the universe, and continues to support it, as well as to govern and direct it, by his providence and laws. The name is derived from the Icelandic Godi, which signifies the supreme Magistrate, and is thus perfectly characteristic of JEHOVAH as the moral Governor of the universe. It also corresponds to the Jewish and Christian sense of the Greek words Theos and Kyrios, in the New Testament, the names usually applied to the ETERNAL. For an account of the various attributes which enter into our conception of the divine character, as revealed in the Scriptures, the reader is referred to those articles. (Also, see ATTRIBUTES.)

2. By his personality, intelligence, and freedom, God is distinguished from Fate, Nature, Destiny, Necessity, Chance, Anima Mundi, and from all the other fictitious beings acknowledged by the Stoics, Pantheists, Spinozists, and other sorts of Atheists. (See ATHEISM.)

3. The knowledge of God, his nature, attributes, word, and works, above all, his moral character, with the relations between him and his creatures, makes the subject of the extensive science called theology, that master science, of which all the other sciences are but subordinate and illustrative parts. If there have been men of science, who have failed to trace the relation of all science to the knowledge of God, it has been owing to a bias of mind, altogether foreign to sound philosophy.

4. "The plain argument, (says Maclaurin, in his Account of Sir I. Newton's Philosophical Discoveries) for the existence of the Deity, obvious to all, and carrying irresistible conviction with it, is from the evident contrivance and fitness of things for one another, which we meet with throughout all parts of the universe. There is no need of nice or subtle reasonings in this matter; a manifest contrivance immediately suggests a contriver. It strikes us like a sensation; and artful reasonings against it may puzzle us, but it is without shaking our belief." (See EXISTENCE of God.)

5. Not only the works of creation, but the course of divine operation in the government of the world, has from age to age been a manifestation of the divine character; continually receiving new and stronger illustrations, until the completion of the Christian revelation by the ministry of Christ, and his inspired followers; and still placing itself in brighter light, and more impressive aspects, as the scheme of human redemption runs on to its consummation

From all the acts of God as recorded in the Scriptures, we are taught that he alone is God; that he is present everywhere, to sustain and govern all things; that his wisdom is infinite, his counsel settled, his truth sure, and his power irresistible; that his character, as well as his law, is immutably holy, just, and good; above all, that he is rich in mercy; that he has freely provided, whether as Father, or Son, or Holy Ghost, the means of our salvation; that he is alike and at once the Father and Lord, the Redeemer and Judge, the Sanctifier and Friend of man.

6. Under these deeply awful, but consolatory views, do the Scriptures present to us the supreme object of our worship, love, and trust; and they dwell upon each of the above particulars with inimitable sublimity and beauty of language, and with an inexhaustible variety of illustration. Nor can we compare these views of the divine nature with the conceptions of the most enlightened of pagans, without feeling how much reason we have for everlasting gratitude, that a revelation so explicit, so comprehensive, and so joyful, should have been made to us, in our guilty and perplexed condition. It is thus that Christian philosophers, even when they do not use the language of the Scriptures, are able to speak of this great and mysterious Being, in language so clear, and with conceptions so noble; in a manner, too, so equable, so different from the sages of antiquity, who, if any time they approach the truth, never fail to mingle with it some essentially erroneous or grovelling conception.

7. "THE IDEA OF THE SUPREME BEING," says Robert Hall, "has this peculiar property: that as it admits of no substitute, so, from the first moments it is formed, it is capable of continual growth and enlargement. God himself is immutable; but our conception of his character is continually receiving fresh accessions, is continually growing more extended and refulgent, by having transferred to it new elements of beauty and goodness; by attracting to itself as a centre, whatever bears the impress of dignity, order, or happiness. It borrows splendor from all that is fair, subordinates to itself all that is great, and sits enthroned on the riches of the universe."

8. "As the object of worship will always be in a degree the object of imitation, hence arises a fixed standard of moral excellence; by the contemplation of which, the tendencies to corruption are counteracted, the contagion of bad example is checked, and human nature rises above its natural level."

Who then, as he contemplates this glorious Being in the transcendent beauty of his revealed character, can forbear to pray, "THY NAME BE HALLOWED; THY KINGDOM COME; THY WILL BE DONE; AS IN HEAVEN, SO IN EARTH!" (See EXISTENCE OF GOD.)—Head. Buck; Works of Robert Hall, vol. i. p. 30; Watson.

GODS, FALSE GODS. The Hebrew name of God, (Elohim,) like the English, "Lord," is used in various applications. The true God is often called Elohim; as are the angels, judges, princes, and sometimes idols and false gods. (See Gen. 1: 1. Exod. 22: 20. Psal. 86: 8.; and also the following passages in the Hebrew: Exod. 21: 6. 22: 8. 1 Sam. 2: 25. Exod. 22: 28.) The Israelites had so great an aversion and contempt for strange gods, that they would not name them; but substituted some term of contempt: so, instead of Elohim, they called them elilim; nothings, vanities, gods of no value. Instead of Mephi-baal, and Meri-baal, and Jern-baal, they said, Mephi-bosheth, and Meri-bosheth, and Jern-bosheth. Baal signifies master, husband; bosheth, a shame.

The beings, whether real or imaginary, adopted as objects of worship among men, in preference to the thrice holy JERUHAN, but too clearly display the fallen condition of the human mind. Fear, lust, malignity or pride, evidently predominate in the conception and choice of such objects of adoration. Nothing like pure and elevating devotional sentiment could, or did attach to them. The principal of the ancient gods, whom the Romans called dei majorum gentium, and Cicero celestial gods, Varro select gods, Ovid nobiles deos, others conscientes deos, were Jupiter, Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Neptune, Vulcan, and Apollo. Jupiter is considered as the god of heaven; Neptune, as god of the sea; Mars, as the god of war; Apollo, of eloquence, poetry, and physic; Mercury, of thieves; Bacchus, of wine; Cupid, of love, &c. A second sort of gods, called demi-gods, semi-dei, dei minorum gentium, indigetes, or gods adopted, were men canonized and deified. As the greater gods had possession of heaven by their own right, these secondary deities had it by merit and donation, being translated into heaven because they had lived as gods upon earth.

2. The heathen gods may be all reduced to the following classes: (1.) Created spirits, angels, or demons, whence good and evil gods; Genii, Lares, Lemures, Typhons, guardian gods, infernal gods, &c. (2.) Heavenly bodies; as the sun, moon, and other planets; also, the fixed stars, constellations, &c. (3.) Elements; as air, earth, ocean, Ops, Vesta; the rivers, fountains, &c. (4.) Meteors. Thus the Persians adored the wind; thunder and lightning were honored under the name of Ger-yon; and several nations of India and America have made themselves gods of the same. Castor, Pollux, Helena, and Iris, have also been preferred from meteors to be gods; and the like has been practised in regard to comets: witness that which appeared at the murder of Cæsar. (5.) They erected minerals or fossils into deities. Such was the Bætylus. The Finlanders adored stones; the Scythians, iron; and many nations, silver and gold. (6.) Plants have been made gods. Thus leeks and onions were deities in Egypt; the Sclavi, Lithuanians, Celtæ, Vandals, and Peruvians, adored trees and forests; the ancient Gauls, Britons, and Druids, paid a particular devotion to the oak; and it was no other than wheat, corn, seed, &c., that the ancients adored under the names of Ceres and Proserpina. (7.) They took themselves gods from among the waters. The Syrians and Egyptians adored fishes; and what were the Tritons, the Nereids, Syrens, &c., but fishes? Several nations have adored serpents; particularly the Egyptians, Prussians, Lithuanians, Samogitians, &c. (8.) Insects, as flies and ants, had their priests and votaries. (9.) Among birds, the stork, raven, sparrowhawk, ibis, eagle, grisson, and lap-wing, have had divine honors; the last in Mexico, the rest in Egypt and at Thebes. (10.) Fourfooted beasts have had their altars; as the bull-dog, cat, wolf, baboon, lion, and crocodile, in Egypt and elsewhere; the hog in the island of Crete; rats and mice in the Troas, and at Tenedos; weasels at Thebes; and the porcupine throughout all Zoroaster's school. (11.) Nothing was more common than to place men among the number of deities; and from Belus or Baal, to the Roman emperors before Constantine, the instances of this kind are innumerable; frequently they did not wait so long as their deaths for the apotheosis. Nebuchadnezzar procured his statue to be worshipped while living; and Virgil shows that Augustus had altars and sacrifices offered to him; as we learn from other hands that he had priests, called Augustales, and temples at Lyons, Narbona, and several other places; and he must be allowed the first of the Romans in whose behalf idolatry was carried to such a pitch. The Ethiopians deemed all their kings gods; the Velleda of the Germans, the Janus of the Hungarians, and the Thaut, Woden, and Assa, of the northern nations, were indisputably men. (12.) Not men only, but every thing that relates to man, has also been deified; as labor, rest, sleep, youth, age, death, virtues, vices, occasion, time, place, numbers, among the Pythagoreans; the generative power, under the name of Priapus. Infancy alone had a cloud of deities; as Vegetanus, Levana, Rumina, Edufa, Potina, Cuba, Cumina, Carna, Ossilago, Statulinus, Fabulinus, &c. They also adored the gods Health, Fever, Fear, Love, Pain, Indignation, Shame, Impudence, Opinion, Renown, Prudence, Science, Art, Fidelity, Felicity, Calumny, Liberty, Money, War, Peace, Victory, Triumph, &c. Lastly, Nature, the universe, or to Fan, was reputed a great god.

3. Hesiod has a poem under the title of Theogonia, that is, "The Generation of the Gods," in which he explains their genealogy and descent, sets forth who was the first and principal, who next descended from him, and what issue each had; the whole making a sort of system of heathen theology. Beside this popular theology, each philosopher had his system, as may be seen from the "Timæus" of Plato, and Cicero "De Natura Deorum," Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Arnobius, Minutius Felix, Lactantius, Eusebius, Augustine, and Theodoret, show the vanity of the heathen gods. It is very difficult to discover the real sentiments of the heathens with respect to their gods; they are exceedingly intricate and confused, and even frequently contradictory. They admitted so many superior and inferior gods, who shared the empire, that every place was full of gods. Varro reckons up no less than thirty thousand adored within a small extent of ground, and yet their number was every day increasing. In modern Oriental paganism they amount to many millions, and are, in fact, innumerable.

Who that loves the true God, can realize the actual condition of mankind at this moment, without horror and grief! Who but must labor and pray for the success of the missionary enterprise! Who but must rejoice in the divine assurance, that "The gods that have not made the heavens and the earth, even they shall perish from the earth, and from under these heavens!" Jer. 10: 11.—Calmet; Watson.

GODFATHERS, and GODMOTHERS; in established churches, persons who, at the baptism of infants, answer for their future conduct, and solemnly promise that they will renounce the devil and all his works, and follow a life of piety and virtue; and by these means lay themselves under an indispensable obligation to instruct them, and watch over their conduct. In the Catholic church, the number of Godfathers and Godmothers is reduced to two; in the church of England, to three; formerly the number was not limited.—Hend. Buck.

GODLINESS, strictly taken, is right worship or devotion; but in general it imports the whole of practical religion, 1 Tim. 4: 8. 2 Pet. 1: 6. It is difficult, as Saurin observes, to include an adequate idea of it in what is called a definition. "It supposes knowledge, veneration, affection, dependence, submission, gratitude, and obedience; or it may be reduced to these four ideas: knowledge in the mind, by which it is distinguished from the visions of the superstitious; rectitude in the conscience, that distinguishes it from hypocrisy; sacrifice in the life, or renunciation of the world, by which it is distinguished from the unmeaning obedience of him who goes as a happy constitution leads him; and, lastly, zeal in the heart, which differs from the languishing emotions of the lukewarm." The advantages of this disposition are honor, peace, safety, usefulness, support in death, and prospect of glory; or, as the apostle sums up all in a few words, "It is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come," 1 Tim. 4: 8. Saurin's Ser. vol. v. ser. 3, Eng. trans.; Barron's Works, vol. i. p. 9; Scott's Christian Life; Seougal's Life of God in the Soul of Man.—Hend. Buck.

GODLY; godlike; that which proceeds from God and is pleasing to him. It also signifies conformity to his will, and an assimilation to his character, Psal. 12: 1. Mal. 2: 15. 2 Cor. 1: 12. Tit. 2: 12, &c.—Calmet.

GODMAN, (JOHN D., M. D.,) a man of genius, and one of the most distinguished naturalists and physicians America has produced, was born at Annapolis, in Maryland, and having lost his parents at an early age, was bound apprentice to a printer. He afterwards entered the navy, and at the age of fifteen commenced the study of medicine. On completing his studies, he settled in Philadelphia as a physician and private teacher of anatomy, and for some time was an assistant editor of the Medical Journal. It was at this period that he published his Natural History of American Quadrupeds, in three volumes, 8vo. Having been elected to the professorship of anatomy in Rutgers' Medical college, he removed to New York, where he soon acquired extensive practice as a surgeon. Ill health, however, obliged him to relinquish his pursuits, and he returned, in 1829, to Philadelphia, where he died in 1830, in the thirty-second year of his age. He possessed much and varied information in his profession, in natural history, and in general literature. Besides the work above referred to, he is the author of Rambles of a Naturalist, and the articles on natural history in the Encyclopædia Americana, as far as the letter C.

Dr. Godman had at one time adopted the infidelity and atheism of the French naturalists of the last century, but the happy death of a Christian friend, in 1827, led him to the Scriptures. In them he found the words of eternal life; and not only did he find peace to his own soul in the Savior, but he was the means of leading Dr. E. Judson, (brother of the distinguished missionary,) who had previously been an infidel, to the same blessed hope. Both died near the same time, bearing like testimony to the divine supports of the gospel.—Davenport; Allica; Americana Ency.; Amer. Quar. Review; Dr. Sewall's Eulogy.

GOEL, (Heb.;) among the Hebrews, one whose right and duty it was to avenge the blood of his relation, but who was not allowed to break in upon the security of an asylum or city of refuge. (See AVENGER OF BLOOD.) Hend. Buck.

GOERING, (JACOB,) minister of the German Lutheran church in York, Pennsylvania, commenced the labors of the sacred office when only twenty years of age; and it pleased God to give such success to his faithful exertions at this early period of life, that a revival of religion always attended his preaching. He died in 1807, aged fifty-two. He was a president of the synod of the German Lutheran church in the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. He was a man of profound erudition; and among the languages, with which he was acquainted, the Hebrew and Arabic were his favorites. Though warmly interested in his country's welfare, he yet declined a civil station, in which his fellow-citizens would gladly have placed him, dedicating himself wholly to the ministry. He died in the full assurance of obtaining and enjoying a perpetual happiness through the merits of his Redeemer. Brown's Amer. Reg. ii. 84, 85.—Allen.

GOG AND MAGOG; symbolical names of the heathen nations of northern Asia, more particularly the Tartars and Mongolians, which the Arabic and other Oriental writers term Yajuj and Majuj. They occur in Ezek. 38: and 39: and Rev. 20.—Hend. Buck.

GOLD; the most valuable of the precious metals. It is the heaviest of all known bodies, and the most ductile of all the metals. It is wholly incapable of rust, and is not sonorous when struck upon. It requires a strong fire to melt it, remaining unaltered in the degree of heat that fuses tin or lead, but running with a less vehement one than is necessary to the fusing of iron or copper. It does not retain its color till the time of melting, but becomes ignited and white before it runs; and when in fusion, it appears of a pale, bluish, green color on the surface. Common fire carried to its utmost vehemence has no farther effect on gold than the fusing of it. It will remain ever so long in its fiercest heat, and come out at last unaltered, and with its weight entire.

Arabia had formerly its golden mines. "The gold of Sheba," (Psal. 72: 15.) is, in the Septuagint and Arabic versions, "the gold of Arabia." Sheba was the ancient name of Arabia Felix. Mr. Bruce, however, places it in Africa, at Azab. The gold of Ophir, so often mentioned, must be that which was procured in Arabia, on the coast of the Red sea. We are assured by Sanchoniathon, as quoted by Eusebius, and by Herodotus, that the Phœnicians carried on a considerable traffic with this gold even before the days of Job, who speaks of it, 22: 24.—Watson.

GOLGOTHA. (See CALVARY.)

GOLIATH; a famous giant of Gath, (1 Sam. 17: 4, &c. A. M. 2941. ante A. D. 1063.) who defied the Hebrews, and was encountered and slain by David. He was descended from Arapha; that is, the old Rephaim. (See GIANTS; and ARMS, MILITARY.)—Calmet.

GOMAR, (FRANCIS,) an eminent Calvinistic divine, was a native of Bruges, and born 1563. He came over to England to obtain his education, and studied awhile in both the universities, but graduated at Cambridge, as bachelor of divinity. On returning to the continent, he obtained a professorship at Heidelberg, which, in 1593, he relinquished for the theological chair at Leyden, the celebrated Arminius being his colleague. The different views taken by these two professors on some of the leading polemical questions, both as to doctrine and discipline, terminated in a controversy, which was carried on with much acuteness and no little acrimony. It has been remarked by an acute observer, that while many pens were engaged in opposing Arminius, there were but few who opposed him on the same footing with Gomar, who was chiefly concerned about the ground of a sinner's acceptance with God, as he understood it to be affected by that controversy. The greater part of the disputants chose to make the controversy turn upon another hinge, contending about grace and free will, and what influence these had in the conversion of a sinner; but with Gomar the grand inquiry was, what is necessary to the justification of a sinner before God; is any thing besides the work finished upon the cross? Any addition to this, he contended, was subversive of the true grace of God. For this doctrine he evinced great zeal, and wrote with extraordinary ability. He subsequently filled literary situations, both at Middleburgh and Saumur, but died at Groningen, in 1641, having for some short time prior to his decease filled the chair of Hebrew professor there. His controversial tracts were collected four years after his death, and printed in one folio volume, at Amsterdam. Aikin's Gen. Biog. and Glas's Works, vol. v. p. 359.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

GOMARISTS; Calvinists; so called from Francis Gomar, the chief antagonist of Arminius. (See GOMAR.)

GOMER, the eldest son of Japheth, (Gen. 10: 2.) peopled a considerable part of Asia Minor, particularly the region of Phrygia; the appellation of which Bochart conceives, with great probability, to be a translation into Greek of the Hebrew word Gomer, "a coal." Phrygia is literally "the burnt country." (See DISPERSION.)—Calmet.

GOMORRAH; one of the five cities of the Pentapolis, consumed by fire, Gen. 19: 24, &c. (See DEAD SEA.)—Watson.

GOOD, in general, is whatever increases pleasure, or diminishes pain in us. Great confusion has been introduced into philosophical writings, from not distinguishing between the three distinct senses in which this term good is used. 1. The agreeable, or that which gives immediate pleasure, without regard to consequences. 2. The useful, or that which, on the whole, is best for us in the present life. And, 3. The virtuous, or that which God approves as right, and which is productive of everlasting happiness. If men always choose the greatest apparent good, as metaphysicians have contended, we must never forget to examine which kind of good it is which they prefer, since this determines their character. Those who consult only their senses, prefer the agreeable. Those who consult their reason only, prefer the useful; and those who consult their conscience also, prefer the virtuous. This last is the only true wisdom. For this kind of good in the natural order, as well as in the final event of things, comprehends every other.—Hend. Buck.

GOOD, (JOHN MASON,) a distinguished physician, poet, and philologist, the son of a dissenting minister, was born, in 1764, at Epping, in Essex; practised for some years as a surgeon and apothecary at Coggeshal, and in London; took his degree, and began to practise as a physician, in 1820; and died January 2, 1827. Dr. Good was a man of vast and diversified knowledge; was intimately acquainted with many of the Oriental languages; and was no contemptible poet and theologian. He published translations of Solomon's Song, Job, and Lucretius; Memoirs of Alexander Geddes; Medical Technology; a Physiological System of Nosology; the Book of Nature, three vols.; and the Study of Medicine, five volumes, 8vo. His life has been written by Dr. O. Gregory. Dr. Good was at one period of his life a Socinian of the school of Priestley; but a number of years before his death he became a decided and experimental believer in the orthodox faith, an active promoter of Bible and missionary associations, and all means of advancing the eternal happiness of man. His last moments were bright with the faith and hope of the gospel.—Memoir; Davenport.

GOODELL, (SOLOMON,) a liberal-hearted Christian, who died at Jamaica, Vermont, in September, 1815, aged seventy. He was a farmer, living in a rude spot in the neighborhood of the Green mountains; all his property was gained by severe personal labor, and saved by strict frugality; yet his liberality was such as might shame Mr. Girard, the possessor of fifteen millions of dollars. At no time was his property worth five thousand dollars; yet, besides providing for his family, the amount of his donations for missions to the heathen, besides other charities, was three thousand six hundred and eighty-six dollars. He was a Baptist, yet most of his donations were intrusted to the hands of his fellow-Christians, not Baptists. In this way he proved that he was no sectarian; not, like Mr. Girard, by contemning all religions alike. The power that moved him to his self-denying distributions in his life, not, like Mr. Girard, when he could hold and accumulate no longer, was a settled religious principle; a conviction, that all his property was the gift of God, and that it should be used by him as the steward of God to promote his Master's glory, and the salvation of mankind.—Allen.

GOOD FRIDAY; a fast kept in national churches, in memory of the sufferings and death of Jesus Christ. It is observed on the Friday in Passion Week, and it is called, by way of eminence, good; because of the good effects of our Savior's sufferings. Among the Saxons it was called Long Friday; but for what reason does not appear, except on account of the long offices then used. The Protestants on the continent consider this day as the most solemn in the whole year; by the Catholics, however, it is only celebrated as a half holiday.—Hend. Buck.

GOODNESS; philosophically, the fitness of a thing to produce any particular end. In morals, perfection, kindness, benevolence.—Hend. Buck.

GOODNESS OF GOD relates both to the absolute perfection of his own nature, and his kindness manifested to his creatures. Goodness, says Dr. Gill, is essential to God, without which he would not be God, Exod. 33: 19. 34: 6, 7. Goodness belongs only to God, he is solely good, (Matt. 19: 17.) and all the goodness found in creatures is only an emanation of the divine goodness. He is the chief good; the sum and substance of all felicity, Ps. 144: 12, 15. 73: 25. 4: 6, 7. There is nothing but goodness in God, and nothing but goodness comes from him, 1 John 1: 5. James 1: 13, 14. He is infinitely good; finite minds cannot comprehend his goodness, Rom. 11: 35, 36. He is immutably and unchangeably good, Zeph. 3: 17. The goodness of God is communicative and diffusive, Ps. 119: 68. 33: 5. With respect to the objects of it, it may be considered as general and special. His general goodness is seen in all his creatures; yea, in the inanimate creation, the sun, the earth, and all his works; and in the government, support, and protection of the world at large, Ps. 36: 6. 145: His special goodness relates to angels and saints. To angels, in creating, confirming, and making them what they are. To saints, in election, calling, justification, adoption, sanctification, perseverance, and eternal glorification. Gill's Body of Div. v. i. p. 133, 8vo ed.; Charnock's Works, v. i. p. 574; *Paley's Nat. GOODWIN, (THOMAS, D. D.) a celebrated non-conformist divine of the seventeenth century, was born at Rolesby, in Norfolk, in the year 1600. He was educated at Christ-church college, and Catharine hall, Cambridge, of which he afterwards became fellow. Having taken orders, he was elected lecturer of Trinity church, in Cambridge, in 1628; and four years afterwards was presented by the king to the vicarage of the same church. Becoming dissatisfied, however, with the terms of conformity, he relinquished his preferments, and, in 1634, quitted the university.

When the Puritans were persecuted by the episcopal consistories, he fled to Holland, where he became minister of a congregation at Arnhem. At the beginning of the long parliament he returned to London, and was one of the assembly of divines, with whom, however, he did not always agree. His attachment to the Independents rendered him a favorite with Cromwell, through whose influence, in 1649, he was made one of the commissioners for licensing preachers, and appointed president of Magdalen college, Oxford, where he collected a church upon the Congregational model.

Anthony Wood styles him and Dr. Owen "the two atlases and patriarchs of Independency." In the common register of Oxford he is said to be "in scriptis in re Theologica quam plurimis orbi notus." The writer of his life, prefixed to his works, tells us, that "he was much addicted to retirement and deep contemplation, had been much exercised in the controversies agitated in the age in which he lived, and had a deep insight into the economy of divine grace." He died on the 23d of February, 1679, aged eighty years. His works have been published in four volumes, folio. Brit. Biog.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

GOPHER-WOOD. (See ARK.)

GORDIUS; a Roman centurion and Christian martyr, under the emperor Diocletian. He was a native of Cesarea. For avowing his faith in Christ, he was first put to the torture, and afterwards burnt to death, A. D. 311.—Foz. 59.

GORTONIANS; the followers of Samuel Gorton, of New England, about 1613. He was charged with being a Familist and Antinomian, and was banished as a common disturber from Plymouth, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. Hutchinson's Hist. of Massachusetts, vol. i. p. 117; Holmes's American Annals, in 1637.—Williams.

GOSHEN. This was the most fertile pasture ground in the whole of Lower Egypt; thence called Goshen, from gush, in Arabic, signifying "a heart," or whatsoever is choice or precious. There was also a Goshen in the territory of the tribe of Judah, so called for the same reason, Josh. 10: 41. Gen. 47: 11. 45: 18. The land of Goshen lay along the most easterly branch of the Nile, and on the east side of it; for it is evident that, at the time of the exode, the Israelites did not cross the Nile. In ancient times, the fertile land was considerably more extensive, both in length and breadth, than at present, in consequence of the general failure of the eastern branches of the Nile; the main body of the river verging more and more to the west continually, and deepening the channels on that side.—Watson.

GOSPEL; the revelation of the grace of God to fallen man through a mediator. It is taken also for the history of the life, actions, death, resurrection, ascension, and doctrine of Jesus Christ. The word is compounded of two Saxon words—god, "good," and spell, a "message," or "tidings," and thus corresponds to the Greek euangelion, which signifies a joyful message, or good news. It is called the gospel of his grace, because it flows from his free love, Acts 20: 24. The gospel of the kingdom, as it treats of the kingdom of grace and glory. The gospel of Christ, because he is the author and subject of it, Rom. 1: 16. The gospel of peace and salvation, as it promotes our present comfort, and leads to eternal glory, Eph. 1: 13. 6: 15. The glorious gospel, as in it the glorious perfections of Jehovah are displayed, 2 Cor. 4: 4. The everlasting gospel, as it was designed from eternity, is permanent in time, and the effects of it are eternal, Rev. 14: 6.

There are about thirty or forty apocryphal gospels—as the gospel of St. Peter, of St. Andrew, of St. Barnabas, the eternal gospel, &c. &c. &c.; but they were never received by the Christian church, being evidently fabulous and trifling. (See CHRISTIANITY.)—Hend. Buck.

GOSPEL, A LAW. It has been disputed whether the gospel consists merely of promises, or whether it can in any sense be called a law. The answer plainly depends upon adjusting the meaning of the words gospel and law. If the gospel be taken for the declaration God has made to men by Christ, concerning the manner in which he will treat them, and the conduct he expects from them, it is plain that this includes commands, and even threatenings, as well as promises; but to define the gospel so, as only to express the favorable part of that declaration, is indeed taking the question for granted, and confining the word to a sense much less extensive than it often has in Scripture: (compare Rom. 2: 16. 2 Thess. 1: 8. 1 Tim. 1: 10, 11.) and it is certain, that, if the gospel be put for all the parts of the dispensation taken in connexion one with another, it may well be called, on the whole, a good message. In like manner the question, whether the gospel be a law or not, is to be determined by the definition of the law and of the gospel, as above. If law signifies, as it generally does, the discovery of the will of a superior, teaching what he requires of those under his government, with the intimation of his intention of dispensing rewards and punishments, as this rule of their conduct is observed or neglected; in this latitude of expression it is plain, from the proposition, that the gospel, taken for the declaration made to men by Christ, is a law, as in Scripture it is sometimes called, James 1: 25. Rom. 4: 15. 8: 2. But if law be taken, in the greatest rigor of the expression, for such a discovery of the will of God, and our duty, as to contain in it no intimation of our obtaining the divine favor otherwise than by a perfect and universal conformity to it, in that sense the gospel is not a law. GOSPEL CALL. (See CALLING.)

GOSPELLERS; according to Mr. Grant, a sect of Antinomians, which rose about the time of the Reformation; but we think, with Dr. Johnson, it was rather a term of reproach applied by the papists to all who advocated the circulation of the Scriptures, and the doctrines of the gospel, particularly to the followers of Wickliffe in England. So Rowe uses it:—

"These Gossellers have had their golden days, Have trodden down our holy Roman faith."

GOUGE, (WILLIAM, D. D.) This excellent divine was born in Stratford, Bow, in 1575. He was early distinguished for piety and the love of study. His public education was received at Cambridge, where he lived nine years. He was accustomed to rise so early that he had time for his private devotion, and to read five chapters in the Bible regularly, before called to the chapel prayers at half past five o'clock, A. M. He read a few chapters more after dinner, and five before rest at night, constantly; and often lay awake in the night in sweet meditations on what he had read. He entered the ministry at the age of thirty-one, richly furnished for that holy work, and with a heart entirely devoted to its duties. He was minister of Blackfriars, London, forty-five years. He was often offered places of greater profit, but always refused, saying, "that the height of his ambition was to go from Blackfriars to heaven." God wonderfully honored his ministry, for thousands have owned that they were converted and built up under it. His doctrine was sound, his method clear, and his expressions plain and familiar. His life was coincident with his doctrine, and his family of thirteen children was trained as carefully, wisely, and religiously as his church. He was esteemed as the father of the London ministers, and the spiritual oracle of his time. In 1643, he was called to be a member of the assembly of divines, and though infirm in health, was constant in attendance. In the moderator's absence he frequently filled the chair. The vacancies in business he always occupied with his Bible or other books which he carried with him. He was appointed one of the annotators on the Scriptures, and performed as his part, from the beginning of 1 Kings to the book of Job, in a manner that gained high approbation. He also published several works, the principal of which were his "Commentary on Hebrews," "Domestical Duties," and "The Whole Armor of God."

He was a man of great meekness, yet firm against wrong doing. He utterly refused to read the "Book of Sports," though required by royal authority, choosing rather to suffer than to sin. He was distinguished for his charity, keeping what he called a sacred stock for the poor, and seemed covetous of nothing but his time. If he heard any at work before he got to his study at four in the morning, he used to say, with Demosthenes, "that he was much troubled that any should be at their calling before he was at his." He has been heard to say, "that he took not any journey merely for pleasure in all his lifetime." Yea, it was his meat and his drink to be doing the will of his heavenly Father. Yet no grace was more eminent in his character than humility. Even in old age, when suffering under the asthma and stone, he spoke of himself not as a great sufferer, but only as a great sinner, and of Christ as a great Savior. His last days were full of calm triumph. He died December 12, 1653, aged seventy-nine, "worn out," as was said of him, "not with rest, but with whetting."—Middleton, vol. iii. 267—281.

GOUGE. (THOMAS.) The following extraordinary character of this extraordinary man is given by archbishop Tillotson. After mentioning that he was born at Bow, in 1605, educated at Cambridge, and after a few years settled at St. Sepulchre's, London, with various other particulars of his life and character, he adds, "But that virtue, which, of all others, shone brightest in him, and was his peculiar character, was his cheerful and unwearied diligence in acts of pious charity. In this he left behind him all that ever I knew, and, as I said before, had a singular sagacity and prudence in devising the most effectual ways of doing good. For about nine or ten years last past, he did almost wholly apply his charity to Wales, because there he judged was most occasion for it, and because this was a very great work; he did not only lay out upon it whatever he could spare out of his own estate, but employed his whole time and pains to excite and engage the charity of others for his assistance in it. By the large and bountiful contributions thus obtained, to all which he constantly added two thirds of his own estate, (two hundred pounds a-year,) there were every year eight hundred, sometimes one thousand poor children educated; and by this example, several of the most considerable towns of Wales were excited to bring up, at their own charge, the like number of poor children, in the like manner, and under his instruction and care. But, which was the greatest work of all, and amounted indeed to a mighty charge, he procured a new and very fair impression of the Bible, and the liturgy of the church of England, in the Welsh tongue, to the number of eight thousand; the former impression being spent, and not twenty of them to be had in all London. This was a work of that charge, that it was not likely to have been done in any other way; and for which this age, and perhaps the next, will have great cause to thank God on his behalf. Once always, but usually twice a-year, at his own charge, he travelled over a great part of Wales, none of the best countries to travel in. But for the love of God and man he endured all that, &c. So that, all things considered, there have not, since the primitive times of Christianity, been many among the sons of men, to whom that glorious character of the Son of God might be better applied, that he went about doing good." He died Oct. 29, 1681. Mr. Gouge wrote several practical works, which have been held in much esteem. "While I read his practical writings," says Mr. Rogers, "I am, as it were, in a house well furnished, where there is every thing for convenience, and delight in life; there wants nothing here to compose an entire body of religion in its beauty, power, and extent."—Middleton, vol. iii. p. 150.

GOURD, (kikivon; Jonah 4: 6, 7, 9, 10.) Michaëlis, in his remarks on this subject, says, "Celsius appears to me to have proved that it is the kiki of the Egyptians." Niebuhr says, "I saw, for the first time at Basra, the plant el-kerua, mentioned in Michaëlis's 'Questions.' It has the form of a tree. The trunk appeared to me rather to resemble leaves than wood; nevertheless, it is harder than that which bears the Adam's fig. Each branch of the kerua has but one large leaf, with six or seven foldings in it. This plant was near to a rivulet, which watered it amply. At the end of October, 1765, it had risen in five months' time about eight feet, and bore at once flowers and fruit, ripe and unripe. Another tree of this species, which had not had so much water, had not grown more in a whole year. The flowers and leaves of it which I gathered withered in a few minutes; as do all plants of a rapid growth. This tree is called at Aleppo, palma Christi. An oil is made from it called oleum de kerua; oleum cicum; or oleum ficus infernalis. The Christians and Jews of Mosul (Nineveh) say, it was not the kerua whose shadow refreshed Jonah, but a sort of gourd, el-kerua, which has very large leaves, very large fruit, and lasts but about four months."

The epithet which the prophet uses in speaking of the plant, "son of the night it was, and, as a son of the night, it died," does not compel us to believe that it grew in a single night, but, either by a strong Oriental figure that it was of rapid growth, or akin to night in the shade it spread for his repose. The figure is not uncommon in the East, and one of our own poets has called the rose "child of the summer." Nor are we bound to take the expression "on the morrow," as strictly importing the very next day, since the word has reference to much more distant time, Exod. 13: 14. Deut. 6: 20. Joshua 4: 6. It might be simply taken as afterwards. But the author of "Scripture Illustrated" justly remarks, "As the history in Jonah expressly says, the Lord prepared this plant, no doubt we may conceive of it as an extraordinary one of its kind, remarkably rapid in its growth, remarkably hard in its stem, remarkably vigorous in its branches, and remarkable for the extensive spread of its leaves, and the deep gloom of their shadow; and, after a certain duration, remarkable for a sudden withering, and a total uselessness to the impatient prophet."

2. We read of the wild gourd in 2 Kings 4: 39. This plant or fruit is called in Hebrew pakovat and pakoim. There have been various opinions about it. Celsius supposes it the colocynthis. The leaves of the plant are large, placed alternate; the flowers white, and the fruit of the gourd kind, of the size of a large apple, which, when ripe, is yellow, and of a pleasant and inviting appearance, but to the taste intolerably bitter, and proves a drastic purgative. It seems that the fruit, whatever it might have been, was early thought proper for an ornament in architecture. It furnished a model for some of the carved work of cedar in Solomon's temple, 1 Kings 6: 18. 7: 24.—Watson.

GOVERNMENT OF GOD, is either providential, moral, or spiritual. His providential government is the disposal of his creatures, and all events relative to them, according to his infinite justice, power, and wisdom. His moral government is his rendering to every man according to his character, considered as good or evil. His spiritual government is that which he maintains by his spirit and word, over the hearts and lives of his saints, both individually, and as collected into the visible church; hence called, in the current language of the New Testament, the "kingdom of God," Rom. 14: 17. 1 Cor. 4: 20. Col. 1: 12, 13. John 3: 3—7. (See DOMINION; and SOVEREIGNTY.)—Head. Buck.

GOVERNMENT OF THE HEBREWS. The posterity of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were set apart and destined to the great object of preserving and transmitting the true religion, Gen. 18: 16—20. 17: 9—14. 12: 3. 22: 18. 28: 14. Having greatly increased in numbers in Egypt, it appeared very evident that they could not live among nations given to idolatry without running the hazard of becoming infected with the same evil. They were, therefore, in the providence of God, assigned to a particular country, the extent of which was so small, that they were obliged, if they would live independently of other nations, to give up in a great measure the life of shepherds, and devote themselves to agriculture. Further: very many of the Hebrews, during their residence in Egypt, had fallen into idolatrous habits. These were to be brought back again to the knowledge of the true God, and all were to be excited to engage in those undertakings which should be found necessary for the support of the true religion. All the Mosaic institutions aim at the accomplishment of these objects. The fundamental principle, therefore, of those institutions, was this,—that the true God, the Creator and Governor of the universe, and none other, ought to be worshipped. To secure this end the more certainly, God became king to the Hebrews. Accordingly, the land of Canaan, which was destined to be occupied by them, was declared to be the land of Jehovah, of which he was to be the king, and the Hebrews merely the hereditary occupants. God promulgated, from the clouds of mount Sinai, the prominent laws for the government of his people, considered as a religious community, Exod. 20. These laws were afterwards more fully developed and illustrated by Moses. The rewards which should accompany the obedient, and the punishments which should be the lot of the transgressor, were at the same time announced, and the Hebrews promised by a solemn oath to obey, Exodus 21:—24. Deut. 27:—30.

2. When we remember that God was expressly chosen the King of the people, and that he enacted laws and decided litigated points of importance; (Num. 17: 1—11. 27: 1—11. 36: 1—10.) when we remember also that he answered and solved questions proposed, (Num. 15: 32—41. Joshua 7: 16—22. Judges 1: 1, 2. 20: 18, 27, 28. 1 Sam. 14: 37. 23: 9—12. 30: 8. 2 Sam. 2: 1.) that he threatened punishment, and that, in some instances, he actually indicted it upon the hardened and impenitent; (Num. 11: 33—35. 12: 1—15. 16: 1—50. Lev. 26: 3—46. Deut. 26:—30.) when, finally, we take into account, that he promised prophets, who were to be, as it were, his ambassadors, (Deut. 18.) and afterwards seat them according to his promise; and that, in order to preserve the true religion, he governed the whole people by a striking and peculiar providence, we are at liberty to say, that God was, in fact, the Monarch of the people, and that the government was a theocracy. But, although the government of the Jews was a theocracy, it was not destitute of the usual forms which exist in civil governments among men. God, it is true, was the King, and the high-priest, if we may be allowed so to speak, was his minister of state; but still the political affairs were in a great measure under the disposal of the elders, princes, &c. It was to them that Moses gave the divine commands, determined expressly their powers, and submitted their requests to the decision of God, Num. 14: 5. 16: 4, &c. 27: 5. 37: 5, 6. It was in reference to the great power possessed by these men, who formed the legislative assembly of the nation, that Josephus pronounced the government to be aristocratical. But from the circumstance that the people possessed so much influence, as to render it necessary to submit laws to them for their ratification, and that they even took upon themselves sometimes to propose laws or to resist those which were enacted; from the circumstance also that the legislature of the nation had not the power of laying taxes, and that the civil code was regulated and enforced by God himself, independently of the legislature, Lowman and Michaëlis are in favor of considering the Hebrew government a democracy. In support of their opinion such passages are exhibited as the following: Exodus 19: 7, 8. 24: 3—8. Deut. 29: 9—14. Joshua 9: 18, 19. 23: 1, &c. 24: 2, &c. 1 Samuel 10: 24. 11: 14, 15. Num. 27: 1—8. 36: 1—9. The truth seems to lie between these two opinions. The Hebrew government, putting out of view its theocratical feature, was of a mixed form, in some respects approaching to a democracy, in others assuming more of an aristocratical character.

3. In the time of Samuel, the government, in point of form, was changed into a monarchy. The election of a king, however, was committed to God, who chose one by lot; so that God was still the ruler, and the king the vicergerent. The terms of the government, as respected God, were the same as before, and the same duties and principles were inculcated on the Israelites as had been originally, 1 Sam. 8: 7. 10: 17—23. 12: 11, 15, 20—22, 24, 25. In consequence of the fact, that Saul did not obey at all times to obey the commands of God, the kingdom was taken from him and given to another, 1 Sam. 13: 5—14. 15: 1—31. David, through the agency of Samuel, was selected by Jehovah for king, who thus gave a proof that he still retained, and was disposed to exercise, the right of appointing the ruler under him, 1 Samuel 16: 1—3. David was first made king over Judah; but as he received his appointment from God, and acted under his authority, the other eleven tribes submitted to him, 2 Sam. 5: 1—3. 1 Chron. 28: 4—6. The paramount authority of God, as the King of the nation, and his right to appoint one who should act in the capacity of his vicergerent, are expressly recognized in the books of Kings and Chronicles.

4. The rebuilding of Jerusalem was accomplished, and the reformation of their ecclesiastical and civil polity was effected, by the two divinely inspired and pious governors, Ezra and Nehemiah; but the theocratic government does not appear to have been restored. The new temple was not, as formerly, God's palace; and the cloud of his presence did not take possession of it. After their death the Jews were governed by their high-priests, in subjection however to the Persian kings, to whom they paid tribute, (Ezra 4: 13. 7: 24.) but with the full enjoyment of their other magistracies, as well as their liberties, civil and religious. Nearly three centuries of uninterrupted prosperity ensued, until the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, when they were most cruelly oppressed, and compelled to take up arms in their own defence. Under the able conduct of Judas surnamed Maccabeus, and his valiant brothers, the Jews maintained a religious war for twenty-six years with five successive kings of Syria; and after destroying upwards of two hundred thousand of their best troops, the Maccabees finally established the independence of their own country and the aggrandizement of their family. This illustrious house, whose princes united the regal and pontifical dignity in their own persons, administered the affairs of the Jews during a period of one hundred and twenty-six years; until, disputes arising between Hyrcanus II. and his brother Aristobulus, the latter was defeated by the Romans under Pompey, who captured Jerusalem, and reduced Judea to dependence, B. C. 59. (See Jews.)—Watson.

GRACE; a term of very frequent occurrence in the Scriptures, especially those of the New Testament, in which the place it occupies is so important, that, without a proper understanding of its import, we can never make any considerable progress in the knowledge of the Scriptures, or indeed comprehend the general design of divine revelation; and yet unhappily no subject is more misunderstood.

The primary and principal sense of the word is, free favor; unmerited kindness. In this acceptation it is most frequently used in the inspired volume. Grace, in the writings of Paul, stands in direct opposition to works and worthiness—all works and worthiness of every kind, and of every degree. This appears from the following passages: "Now to him that worketh, the reward is not reckoned of grace, but of debt;—therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace. For by grace are ye saved—not of works, lest any man should boast. Who hath saved us—not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace," Rom. 4: 4, 16. Eph. 2: 8. 2 Tim. 1: 9.

As the word mercy, in its primary signification, has relation to some creature, either actually in a suffering state, or obnoxious to it; so grace, in its proper and strict sense, always presupposes unworthiness in its object. Hence, whenever any thing valuable is communicated by the blessed God, it cannot be of grace, any further than the person on whom it is conferred is considered as unworthy. For, so far as any degree of worth appears, the province of grace ceases, and that of equity takes place. Grace and worthiness, therefore, cannot be connected in the same act, and for the same end. The one must necessarily give place to the other, according to that remarkable text: "If by grace, then it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then it is no more grace; otherwise work is no more work," Rom. 11: 6.—Besides, when the word of God represents the capital blessings of salvation as flowing from divine grace, it describes the persons on whom they are bestowed, not only as having no claim to those benefits, but as deserving quite the reverse; as having incurred a tremendous curse, and as justly exposed to eternal ruin, Rom. 3: 19, 23. Gal. 3: 10.

Grace, therefore, may be thus defined: it is the favor of God, manifested in the vouchsafement of spiritual and eternal blessings to the guilty and the unworthy, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Such is the eternal origin, such the glorious basis, of our salvation! Hence it proceeds and is carried on to perfection. Grace shines through the whole. For, as an elegant writer observes, it is "not like a fringe of gold bordering the garment; not like an embroidery of gold, decorating the robe; but like the mercypseat of the ancient tabernacle, which was gold—pure gold—all gold throughout."

This is the inexhaustible source of all those inestimable blessings which the Lord bestows on his unworthy creatures, in this, or in a future world. It is this which, in all that he does, or ever will do for sinners, he intends to render everlastingly glorious in their eyes, and in the eyes of all holy intelligences. The indelible motto, inscribed by the hand of Jehovah on all blessings of the evangelical covenant, is, "TO THE PRAISE AND GLORY OF HIS GRACE." Divine grace is in Scripture compared to a sovereign. Now a sovereign, considered as such, is invested with regal power, and the highest authority. Grace, therefore, in her beneficent government, must exert and manifest sovereign power—must supersede the reign, and counteract the mighty and destructive operations of sin; or she cannot bring the sinner to eternal life. For the Holy Spirit has compared sin to a sovereign, whose reign terminates in death.

Divine grace, therefore, as reigning in our salvation, not only appears, but appears with majesty; not only shines, but triumphs; providing all things, bestowing all things, working in us all things, necessary to our eternal happiness.

If we carefully examine the Scriptures concerning this important subject, we shall find the revealed properties of divine grace to be the following: it is free, foregoing, distinguishing, sovereign, effectual, rich, eternal, and regulated by infinite wisdom in such a way as to satisfy justice, secure holiness, maintain truth, and multiply happiness.

Divines have distinguished grace into common or general, and special or particular. Common grace is what all men have who hear the gospel; the illumination and strivings of God's Spirit, convictions of sin, &c., Gen. 6: John 16. Special grace is that which is peculiar to the saved; such as electing, redeeming, justifying, pardoning, adopting, establishing, and sanctifying grace, Rom. 8: 30. This special grace is by some distinguished into imputed and inherent. Imputed grace consists in the holiness, obedience, and righteousness of Christ, imputed to us for our justification; inherent grace is what is wrought in the heart by the Spirit of God in regeneration. Grace is also said to be efficacious, irresistible, and victorious; not but that there are in human nature, in the first moments of conviction, even in the saved, some struggles, opposition, or conflict; but by these terms we are to understand, that, in the end, victory declares for the grace of the gospel. There have been many other distinctions of grace; but as they are of too frivolous a nature, and are now obsolete, they need not a place here.

Growth in grace is the progress we make in the divine life. It discovers itself by an increase of spiritual light and knowledge; by our renouncing self, and depending more upon Christ; by growing more spiritual in duties; by being more humble, submissive, and thankful; by rising superior to the corruptions of our nature, and finding the power of sin more weakened in us; by being less attached to the world, and possessing more of a heavenly disposition. M' Laurin's Essays, essay 3; Gill's Body of Div., vol. i. p. 118; Doddridge's Lect., part viii. prop. 139; Pike and Huppari's Cases of Conscience; Saunders on 1 Rom. 9: 26, 27, vol. iv.; Booth's Reign of Grace; Scott on Growth in Grace; Fuller's Works; Dwight's Theol.—Jones; *Hend. GRACE AT MEALS; a short prayer, imploring the divine blessing on our food, and expressive of gratitude to God for supplying our necessities. The propriety of this act is evident from the divine command, (1 Thes. 5: 18. 1 Cor. 10: 31. 1 Tim. 4: 5.) from the conduct of Christ, (Mark 8: 6, 7.) from reason itself; not to mention that it is a custom practised by most nations, and even not neglected by heathens themselves.

As to the manner in which it ought to be performed, as Dr. Watts observes, we ought to have a due regard to the occasion, and the persons present; the neglect of which hath been attended with indecencies and indiscretions. Some have used themselves to mutter a few words with so low a voice, as though by some secret charm they were to consecrate the food alone, and there was no need of the rest to join with them in the petitions. Others have broke out into so violent a sound, as though they were bound to make a thousand people hear them. Some perform this part of worship with so slight and familiar an air, as though they had no sense of the great God to whom they speak; others have put on an unnatural solemnity, and changed their natural voice into so different and awkward a tone, not without some distortions of countenance, that have tempted strangers to ridicule.

It is the custom of some to hurry over a single sentence or two, and they have done, before half the company are prepared to lift up a thought to heaven. Others, again, make a long prayer, and, among a multitude of other petitions, do not utter one that relates to the table before them.

The general rules of prudence, together with a due observation of the custom of the place where we live, would correct all these disorders, and teach us that a few sentences suited to the occasion, spoken with an audible and proper voice, are sufficient for this purpose, especially if any strangers are present. Watts' Works, oct. edition, vol. iv. p. 160; Law's Serious Call, p. 69; Scot's Post. Ser., p. 174; Aids to Devotion.—Hend. Buck.

GRACIOUS; full of free favor, and disposed to give free gifts, Exod. 22: 27, and 34: 6. Gen. 43: 29. Christ's words were gracious: they showed the grace that was in him; related to the precious and honorable truths of God; and tended to the edification of others, Luke 4: 22. The word is often used for truly pious.—Brown.

GRADMOUNTAINS; a severe order of monks, instituted by Stephen de Muret, in the eleventh century, at Muret, in the neighborhood of Grammont, whence its name. His laws enjoined poverty, obedience, and silence. They were interdicted all the comforts of life, and became, in consequence, burdens to themselves and useless to society. Moshier's E. H., vol. ii. pp. 532—534; Broughton's Dict.—Williams.

GRAFTING; the act of inserting a shoot or scion taken from one tree, into the stem or some other part of another, in such a manner that they unite, and produce fruit of the kind belonging to the tree from which the scion was taken. By this practice, particular sorts of fruit may be kept from degenerating, which they are very apt to do when raised from the seed; for the grafts, though they receive their nourishment from the stocks, always produce fruit of the same sort as the tree from which they were taken. This process, probably from the abundant supply of nourishment afforded to the graft, has the advantage of hastening the period of its bearing. God grafted in the Gentiles when he brought them into his church, and united them to Jesus Christ as their spiritual and fructifying root, Rom. 11: 17—21. God's word is ingrafted, as it is put into and planted in our hearts, that it may bring forth the fruit of good works in our life, Jan. 1: 21.—Brown; Ency. Amer.

GRAHAM, (MRS. ISABELLA.) This pious, charitable, and intelligent woman was born in Scotland, in the county of Lanark, on the 29th of July, 1742. Her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. John Marshall, were both religious people, and instilled into her young and tender mind the value of that religion, the truths of which she exemplified in her matron years. Isabella, also, for some time enjoyed the pastoral exertions of the excellent Dr. Witherspoon, afterwards president of Princeton college; and when she had arrived at the age of seventeen, she was admitted by him to the sacrament of the Lord's supper. In 1765, she was married to Dr. Graham, and accompanied him to Canada, where his regiment was stationed. At Niagara they spent four happy years; but being obliged to go to Antigua, she there lost her beloved husband, in 1774. She then returned to Scotland, and supported her father and her four children by opening a school for young ladies.

In 1789, she left Scotland for America, and arrived at New York on the 8th of September, where she was received with the greatest kindness by Dr. Rodgers and Dr. Mason. She then again opened her seminary with as much success as before, and in this place became a member of Dr. Mason's church. But though greatly distinguished for her personal endowments, Mrs. Graham was peculiarly eminent as a public benefactor. In the year 1799, a society was instituted at New York, for the relief of poor widows with small children; a society which arose into great respectability, and has been productive of very beneficial effects. The original plan of the society was formed at the house of Mrs. Graham; and she made, at the first anniversary, a very pleasing report of the proceedings of the managers, and of the amount of relief afforded to the poor. During the winter of 1799, she was indefatigable in her attentions to the poor; she exerted herself to procure work for her widows, and occupied much of her time in cutting it out and preparing it for them. The society for the relief of poor widows opened a school for the instruction of their orphans, and many of Mrs. Graham's former pupils volunteered their services, taking upon themselves, by rotation, the part of instructors. Besides establishing this school, Mrs. Graham selected some of the widows best qualified for the task, and engaged them for a small compensation, to open day schools for the instruction of the children in distant parts of the city. She also established two Sunday schools, one of which she superintended herself, and the other she placed under the care of her daughter. On the 15th of March, 1815, the female subscribers, in order to make proposals for providing an asylum for orphan children, met at the City hotel. Mrs. Graham was called to the chair, a society organized, and a board of direction chosen. Mrs. Hoffman was elected the first directress of the Orphan Asylum society. Mrs. Graham continued in the office of first directress of the Widows' society, but felt also much interest in the success of the Orphan Asylum society; and herself, or one of her family, taught the orphans daily, until the friends of the institution were sufficient to provide a teacher and superintendent. In the year 1811, some gentlemen of New York established a Magdalen society; they elected a board of ladies, requesting their aid to superintend the internal management of the Magdalen house: this board chose Mrs. Graham their presiding lady, which office she held until her decease; and its attending duties she discharged with fidelity and zeal. In 1812, the trustees of the Lancasterian school solicited the attendance of several pious ladies, to give catechetical instruction to their scholars one afternoon in every week. Mrs. Graham attended regularly to that duty. In the spring of 1814, she was requested to unite with some ladies in forming a society for the promotion of industry among the poor; and to that object she afforded her best support. But the termination of such varied and important labors now appeared to approach. For some weeks previous to her last illness she was favored with unusual health, and much enjoyment of religion. She died on the 24th of July, 1814. See Life of Mrs. Graham, and Funeral Sermon, by Rev. Dr. Mason.—Jones' Chr. Biog.

GRAHAM, (MARY JANE,) author of the "Test of Truth," was born in London, in April, 1803, and died at Stoke Fleming, Devon, in December, 1830, at the age of twenty-seven. She was a young lady of superior talents, highly cultivated mind, and uncommon scientific attainments. No one can doubt this who reads her writings, especially her Essay on the Study of the Mathematics. She was mistress of the Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Italian languages, and her English style shows that she was in an uncommon degree mistress of her own. She was well acquainted with Music, and her published "Letter on Music," while it clearly develops its principles, is buoyant with spirit and life and beauty.

But all these attainments were consecrated by the power of Christianity to the glory of God, and the good of mankind. She delighted in doing good. Her views of religious truth were decidedly evangelical, lucid, consistent, and practical. Her piety commenced when she was seven years old. At seventeen she was led astray by literary temptations, and her Christian hope was eclipsed for a time in the gloom of infidelity. Restored by divine grace after a severe conflict to an established faith in God's word, she published a full account of her exercises in her "Test of Truth," with the hope of recovering others from unbelief. It should be remarked, that it was originally written in the form of a letter to her Spanish teacher, who was an infidel.

Miss Graham's health was very delicate from her childhood, and for the last few years of her life she was a great sufferer. But hers was a religion that triumphed over suffering, and reaped from it "the peaceable fruits of righteousness." "Strengthened with all might, unto all long-suffering with joyfulfulness," she remarked on one occasion that her "pains were sweeter than honey or the honey-comb." Death to her had no sting. "It is not death to me," she would say, "for Jesus hath tasted death for me, and hath drunk up all its bitterness." After a violent attack of coughing and spasm, a friend said to her, "I fear you suffer much." "Oh, no!" she replied, "I delight to feel the pins of the tabernacle taking out." Yet she observed, "It is not the cessation from pain that can make Christians view the approach of death with satisfaction. For, believe me, they have not one pain too many. But, oh, to behold the King in his beauty! and beholding, to be transformed into his glorious likeness! and then to cease from sin! this, this is the blessed cessation after which real Christians pant." She maintained the use of her pen to the last, and prepared for the press her valuable work on "The Freeness of Divine Grace," and part of a series of "Letters to a Governess," full of the most admirable instructions. See Memoir of her Life, by Rev. Charles Bridges.

GRANTHAM, (THOMAS,) a distinguished minister among the General Baptists of England in the seventeenth century, was born 1633, and died in 1692, aged fifty-eight years. He is represented as "a man endowed with every Christian grace and virtue," a learned scholar, a faithful confessor, and laborious servant of Christ; who with Christian fortitude endured ten persecutions for conscience' sake. He was selected to deliver to Charles II. the confession of faith, drawn up by the body of Christians to which he belonged, and also at a later period to present a remonstrance against persecution, both of which were kindly received by the king, and redress of grievances promised. In that disputing age he was often engaged in public disputations, in which he successfully displayed his skill as an accomplished logician. He also conducted an epistolary dispute, in sixty letters, with the Rev. John Connould, the learned vicar of Norwich, who afterwards felt a great esteem and friendship for him through life. Mr. Grantham was the founder of the Baptist church in Norwich. He was also the author of numerous publications, which display singular merit and greatness of mind.

One of the most beautiful facts in history, of the power of Christian love over party spirit, occurred at the death of Mr. Grantham. Mr. Connould, his former antagonist, on hearing that indecencies were threatened by the bigoted populace to the corpse of his friend, had it conveyed to his own church, and there performed the burial service, before a crowded audience, with many tears, adding, as he closed the book, This day is a very great day fallen in our Israel. The remains of Mr. Grantham were then solemnly interred in the middle aisle of the church. A memorial of Mr. Grantham, in golden capitals, is hung up in the General Baptist chapel, in the parish of St. James, in Norwich.—Benedict's His. Bap., vol. i. p. 227.

GRAPE; the fruit of the vine. There were fine vineyards and excellent grapes in the promised land. The bunch of grapes which was cut in the valley of Eschol, and was brought upon a staff between two men to the camp of Israel at Kadeshbarnea, (Num. 13: 23.) may give us some idea of the largeness of the fruit in that country. It would be easy to produce a great number of witnesses to prove that the grapes in those regions grow to a prodigious size. By Calmet, Schencher, and Harmer, this subject has been exhausted. "At Beiddjijn," says Schultz, "a village near Ptolemais, we took our supper under a large vine, the stem of which was nearly a foot and a half in diameter, the height about thirty feet, and covered with its branches and shoots (for the shoots must be supported) a hut of more than fifty feet long and broad. The bunches of these grapes are so large that they weigh from ten to twelve pounds, and the grapes may be compared to our plums. Such a bunch is cut off and laid on a board, and which they seat themselves, and each helps himself, to as many as he pleases." Forster, in his Hebrew Dictionary, (under the word Eschol,) says, that he knew at Nuremberg a monk of the name of Acacius, who had resided eight years in Palestine, and had also preached at Hebron, where he had seen bunches of grapes which were as much as two men could conveniently carry.

The wild grapes, (Isa. 5: 2-4.) are the fruit of the wild or bastard vine; sour and unpalatable, and good for nothing but to make verjuice. Hasselquist is inclined to believe that the prophet here means the solanum incanum, "hoary nightshade," because it is common in Egypt and Palestine, and the Arabian name agrees well with it. The Arabs call it anab el dib, "wolf's grapes." The prophet could not have found a plant more opposite to the vine than this; for it grows much in the vineyards, and is very pernicious to them. It is likewise a vine. See Jer. 2: 21, and Deut. 32: 32, 33.—Watson.

GRASS, (dasha), or HERBAGE; (Gen. 1: 11.) the well known vegetable upon which flocks and herds feed, and which decks our fields, and refreshes our sight with its grateful verdure. Its feeble frame and transitory duration are mentioned in Scripture as emblematic of the frail condition and fleeting existence of man. The inspired poets draw this picture with such inimitable beauty as the laborer-egies on mortality of ancient and modern times have never surpassed. See Ps. 90: 6. 103; and particularly Isa. 40: 6—8. As, in their decay, the herbs of the fields strikingly illustrate the shortness of human life, so, in the order of their growth, from seeds dead and buried, they give a natural testimony to the doctrine of a resurrection. The prophet Isaiah, and the apostle Peter, both speak of bodies rising from the dead, as of so many seeds springing from the ground to renovated existence and beauty, although they do not, as some have absurdly supposed, consider the resurrection as in any sense analogous to the process of vegetation, Isa. 26: 19. 1 Pet. 1: 24, 25. (See HAY; HERB; and FUEL.)

In several places, Scripture refers to grass growing on the house-tops, but which comes to nothing. The following quotation will show the nature of this: "In the morning the master of the house laid in a stock of earth, which was carried up, and spread evenly on the top of the house, which is flat. The whole roof is thus formed of mere earth, laid on, and rolled hard and flat. On the top of every house is a large stone roller, for the purpose of hardening and flattening this layer of made soil, so that the rain may not penetrate; but upon this surface, as may be supposed, grass and weeds grow freely. It is to such grass that the Psalmist alludes as useless and bad." Jonett's Christian Researches in Syria, p. 89.—Watson; Calmet.

GRASSHOPPER; (hened;) Lev. 11: 22. Num. 13: 33. 2 Chron. 7: 13. Eccl. 12: 5. Isa. 40: 22. 2 Esdras 4: 24. Wisdom 16: 9. Eccl. 43: 17. Our translators render the Hebrew word locust in the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the temple, (2 Chron. 7: 13,) and with propriety. But it is rendered grasshopper, in Eccl. 12: 5. where Solomon, describing the infelicities of old age, says, "The grasshopper shall be a burden."

The prophet Isaiah contrasts the grandeur and power of God, and every thing reputed great in this world, by a very expressive reference to this insect: Jehovah sitteth on the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants are to him as grasshoppers, Isa. 40: 22. What atoms and inanities are they all before him, who sitteth on the circle of the immense heavens, and views the potentates of the earth in the light of grasshoppers, those poor insects that wander over the barren heath for sustenance, spend the day in insignificant chirpings, and take up their contemptible lodging at night on a blade of grass! (See LOCUST.)—Watson.

GRATITUDE, is that pleasant affection of the mind which arises from a sense of favors received, and by which the possessor is excited to make all the returns of love and service in his power. "Gratitude," says Mr. Cogan, in his Treatise on the Passions, "is the powerful reaction of a well-disposed mind, upon whom benevolence has conferred some important good. It is mostly conjoined with an impressive sense of the amiable disposition of the person by whom the benefit is conferred, and it immediately produces a personal affection towards him. We shall not wonder at the peculiar strength and energy of this affection, when we consider that it is compounded of love placed upon the good communicated, affection for the donor, and joy at the reception. Thus it has goodness for its object, and the most pleasing, perhaps unexpected, exertions of goodness for its immediate cause. Thankfulness refers to verbal expressions of gratitude." (See THANKFULNESS.) Chalmers' Works.—Hend. Buck.

GRAVE. (See BURIAL.)

GRAVITY, is that seriousness of mind, united with dignity of behavior, that commands veneration and respect. It is often enjoined in the New Testament as a branch of Christian morals. See Dr. Watts' admirable Sermon on Gravity, ser. 23. vol. i.—Hend. Buck.

GREATNESS OF GOD, is the infinite glory and excellency of all his perfections. His greatness appears by the attributes he possesses, (Deut. 32: 3, 4.) the works he hath made, (Ps. 19: 1.) by the awful and benign providences he displays, (Ps. 97: 1, 2.) the great effects he produces by his word, (Gen. 1:) the constant energy he manifests in the existence and support of all his creatures, (Ps. 145:) and the everlasting provision of glory made for his people, 1 Thes. 4: 17. This greatness is of himself, and not derived; (Ps. 21: 13.) it is infinite, (Ps. 145: 3.) not diminished by exertion, but will always remain the same, Mal. 3: 6. The considerations of his greatness should excite veneration, (Ps. 89: 7.) admiration, (Jer. 9: 6, 7.) humility, (Job 42: 5, 6.) dependence, (Isa. 26: 4.) submission, (Job 1: 22.) obedience, Deut. 4: 39, 40. (See ATTRIBUTES, and books under that article.)—Hend. Buck.

GREAVES; defensive armor for the legs. (See ARMS, MILITARY.)

GRECIA, or GREECE, both names occurring in the English Scriptures. In the Old Testament it is often called Javan. The boundaries of the country which received this name differed under the different governments which ruled over it. Thus the Greece of the Old Testament is not exactly the same as that of the New: the former including Macedonia, Thessaly, Epirus, Hellas or Greece Proper, and the Peloponnusus or Morea; while the latter excludes Macedonia, Thessaly, and Epirus. But the Romans, in the time of the apostles, had, in fact, made two divisions of these countries. The first, which was that of Macedonia, included also Thessaly and Epirus; and the other, that of Achaia, all the rest of Greece, which is, properly speaking, the Greece of the New Testament. But the term Greek admits of a larger interpretation, and applies not only to the inhabitants of Greece Proper, but to those of Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, over nearly the whole of the former of which countries, and great part of the two latter, Grecian colonies and the Grecian language had extended themselves. In fact, in the two books of the Maccabees, and in those of the New Testament, the word Greek commonly implies a Gentile.

2. The Scripture has but little reference to Greece till the time of Alexander, whose conquests extended into Asia, where Greece had hitherto been of no importance. Yet that some intercourse was maintained with these countries from Jerusalem, may be inferred from the desire of Baasha to shut up all passage between Jerusalem and Joppa, which was its port, by the building of Ramah; and the anxiety of Asa to counteract his scheme, 1 Kings 15: 2, 17. Greece was certainly intended by the prophet Daniel under the symbol of the single-horned goat; (Dan. 8: 5—21.) and it is probable that when he calls Greece Chittim, he spoke the language of the Hebrew nation, rather than that of the Persian court. After the establishment of the Grecian dynasties in Asia, Judea could not but be considerably affected by them; and the books of the Maccabees afford proofs of this. The Roman power, superseding the Grecian establishments, yet left traces of Greek language, customs, &c., to the days of the Herods, when the gospel history commences. By the activity of the apostles, and especially by that of St. Paul, the gospel was propagated into those countries which used the Grecian dialects: hence, we are interested in the study of this language. Moreover, as Greece, like all other countries, had its peculiar manners, and national spirit, we are not able to estimate properly an epistle written to those who dwell where they prevailed, without a competent acquaintance with the manners themselves, with the sentiments and reasonings of those who practised them, and with the arguments employed in their defence by those who adhered to them. (See ATHENS, CORINTH, &c.)—Watson.

GREEK OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. The character of the New Testament diction, although pretty definitely marked, was for a long time mistaken, or was only imperfectly and partially understood, by biblical philologists, and has been the subject of much dispute. From the time of Henry Stephens (1576) down to the middle of last century, two parties existed among the interpreters of the New Testament; the one of which labored to show that the diction of the New Testament is in all respects conformed to the style of the Attic Greek writers; while the other maintained, on the contrary, and supposed themselves able to prove, from every verse, that the style was altogether mixed with Hebraisms, and came very far short of the ancient classic Greek in respect to purity. Though latterly the former of these positions has been shown to be inadmissible, yet it was not till quite lately that the imperfect notions of those who maintained the latter began to be felt, and the spirit of the New Testament diction came to be more deeply investigated.

In the age which succeeded that of Alexander the Great, the Greek language underwent an internal change of a double nature. In part a prosaic language of books was formed, (ἡ κοινὴ διαλεκτός), which was built on the Attic dialect, but was intermixed with not a few provincialisms; and partly a language of popular intercourse was formed, in which the various dialects of the different Grecian tribes, heretofore separate, were more or less mingled together; while the Macedonian dialect was peculiarly prominent. The latter language constitutes the basis of the diction employed by the LXX., the writers of the Apocrypha, and the New Testament. This popular Greek dialect was not spoken and written by the Jews, without some foreign intermixtures. They particularly introduced many idioms, and the general complexion of their vernacular language. Hence arose a judaizing Greek dialect. The basis of this dialect consists of the peculiarities of the later Greek; but in the use of all the parts of speech, the Hebrew idioms and modes of construction are combined with them.

It should further be noticed, that there occur in the New Testament, words that express both doctrines and practices which were utterly unknown to the Greeks; and also words bearing widely different interpretations from those which are ordinarily found in Greek writers. It contains examples of all the dialects occurring in the Greek language, as the Æolic, Bœotic, Doric, Ionic, and especially of the Attic; which, being most generally in use on account of its elegance, pervades every book of the New Testament.

2. A variety of solutions has been given to the question, why the New Testament was written in Greek. The true reason is, that it was the language most generally understood both by writers and readers; being spoken and written, read and understood, throughout the Roman empire, and particularly in the eastern provinces. Now what should that one language be, in which it was proper to write the Christian revelation, but the Greek, which was then generally understood, and in which there were many books extant; that treated of all kinds of literature, and on that account were likely to be preserved, and by the reading of which Christians, in after ages, would be enabled to understand the Greek of the New Testament? This advantage none of the provincial dialects used in the apostles' days could pretend to. Being limited to particular countries, they were soon to be disused; and few (if any) books being written in them which merited to be preserved, the meaning of such of the apostles' letters as were composed in the provincial languages could not easily have been ascertained. (See ARAMEAN LANGUAGE.)

Many Jews had two names, one Greek and the other Hebrew; others greesised their Hebrew name: of Jesus they made Jason; of Saulos, Paulos; of Simon or Simeon, Petros, &c.—Hend. Buck; Watson.

GREEKS, were properly the inhabitants of Greece; but this is not the only acceptation of the name in the New Testament. It seems to import, (1.) Those persons of Hebrew descent who, being settled in cities where Greek was the natural language, spoke this language rather than their parental Hebrew. They are called Greeks to distinguish them from those Jews who spoke Hebrew, Acts 6. (2.) Such persons as were Greek settlers in the land of Israel, or in any of its towns. After the time of Alexander, these aliens were numerous in some places, Mark 7: 26. Matt. 15: 21.—Calmet.

GREEK CHURCH. (See CHURCH, GREEK.)

GREEKS, (UNITED); certain Greek congregations in Italy, Hungary, Gallicia, Poland, and Lithuania, which have acknowledged the supremacy of the pope, and are in communion with the church of Rome. They are also to be found in some other parts of the East, but in comparatively small numbers.—Hend. Buck.

GREGORY NAZIANZEN, the son of the bishop of Nazianzum, in Cappadocia, was born A. D. 328, and studied at Cæsarea, Alexandria, and Athens. After having displayed great theological and other talents, he was raised by Theodosius, in 380, to the archiepiscopal throne of Constantinople. He, however, soon resigned his high office, and retired to Naziazoum, where he died, in 389. His works, which form two folio volumes, consist of sermons, poems, and letters, and are pure in their style, and highly eloquent.—Davenport; Murdock's Mosheim.

GREGORY, (OF NYSSA,) the younger brother of St. Basil, was born at Sebaste, about 331, and was ordained bishop of Nyssa, in Cappadocia, in 372. The zeal of Gregory against the Arians induced Valens to expel him from his see, but he was restored by Gratian. The drawing up of the Nicene creed was intrusted to him by the council of Constantinople. He died about 396. His sermons, funeral orations, scriptural commentaries, lives, and other works, form two folio volumes.—Davenport; Mosheim.

GREGORY I., (POPE,) who bears the surname of Great, and obtained the honors of sainthood, was born, about 544, at Rome; was raised to the papal throne in 590; and died in 604. It was by him that Augustin was commissioned to convert the Anglo-Saxons. Gregory was pious, charitable, and a reformer of the clerical discipline; but he had lofty notions of papal authority; could, for political purposes, flatter the vicious great; and was an inveterate enemy of classical literature. His works occupy four folio volumes.—Davenport; Jones' Church History.

GREGORY VII., (POPE,) whose real name was Hildebrand, is said to have been the son of a carpenter, at Soano, in Tuscany. After having held various clerical preferments, he was invested with the tiara, in 1073. His persecution of Henry IV. of Germany, is one of the most prominent events of his pontificate. No pope ever exceeded, and very few equalled him, in ambition, daringness, perseverance, and want of principle. The power of deposing sovereigns, releasing subjects from their allegiance and acting as lord paramount of kingdoms, he was the first pope who claimed. He died in 1085. He is the author of Letters, in eleven books; a Commentary upon the Seven Penitential Psalms, which work has been often ascribed to Gregory I.; and a Commentary upon the Gospel of St. Matthew.—Davenport; Campbell's Lec. Eccles. His.

GREGORY XIII., (POPE,) whose name was Hugh Buoncompagno, was born, in 1502, at Bologna; acquired a consummate knowledge of the civil and canon law; succeeded Pius V. as pope, in 1572; and died in 1587. The reformation of the calendar, which took place under his auspices, in 1582, is the most remarkable event of his pontificate.—Davenport.

GREGORY, (GEORGE, D. D.,) a divine and miscellaneous writer, the son of the prebendary of Ferns, in Ireland, was born in 1754, and completed his education at Edinburgh. In 1778, he took orders, and became a curate at Liverpool; whence, in 1782, he removed to London, where he obtained the curacy of Cripplegate, and was chosen evening preacher of the Foundling. As a reward for having written in defence of the Addington administration lord Sidmouth, in 1804, procured for him the living of Westham, in Essex, which Dr. Gregory held till his decease, in 1808. Among his works are, Essays, historical and moral; a Life of Chatterton; a Church History; Sermons; Letters to a Daughter; Letters on Literature; on the Composition of a Sermon; and a translation of Louth's Lectures on Hebrew Poetry.—Davenport.

GREY, (LADY JANE,) whose accomplishments and whose fate have rendered her an object of universal admiration and pity, was the daughter of the marquis of Dorset, and was born, about 1537, at Bradgate hall, in Leicestershire. Her talents, which were of a superior order, were early developed, and by the time that she was fourteen she had mastered Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, and French and Italian. Aylmer, who was afterwards bishop of London, was her tutor. Bishop Burnet says, "She was the wonder and delight of all who knew her." In 1553, she was united to lord Guilford Dudley; and, shortly afterwards, reluctantly accepted the diadem which the intrigues of her father and her father-in-law had induced Edward VI. to settle upon her. Her brief reign of nine days ended by her being committed to the Tower with her husband, and, in February, 1554, they were brought to the scaffold by the relentless Mary. She refused to apostatize from the Protestant faith, and died with the utmost firmness, in the flower of youth and beauty.

Lady Jane was early instructed in the principles of the reformed religion, for which she was so zealous. Her great piety and concern for the reformation from popery, and the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, are evidently displayed in her conversations and letters. The good ness and benevolence of her heart are also strongly depicted in the affectionate and tender letter which she wrote her father, assuring him of her entire forgiveness, and joyful resignation to her fate; telling him, that there "could be nothing more welcome than from this vale of misery to aspire to that heavenly throne of all joy and pleasure with Christ her Savior." She read much of the Holy Scriptures, and attained great knowledge in divinity. She had a mind superior to the empty troubles of the world; and delighted, not only to know, but to do her Savior's will. The day appointed for the execution of lady Jane, and her husband, lord Dudley, was the 12th of February, 1551. The fatal morning having arrived, her husband was desirous to take a long farewell of his beloved wife; but she declined, saying "such a meeting would rather add to his afflictions than increase that quiet wherewith they had possessed their souls for the stroke of death; that he demanded a lenity which would put fire into the wound, and that it was to be feared her presence would rather weaken than strengthen him; that he would do well to remit this interview to the other world; that there, indeed, friendships were happy and unions indissoluble; and that theirs would be eternal, if they carried nothing with them of terrestrial, which might hinder them from rejoicing." Her Remains were published after her death, and some of her letters and devotional pieces are preserved in Fox's Martyrology.—Davenport; Jones's Chris. Biog.

GRIESBACH, (JOHN JAMES), an eminent German theologian, was born, in 1745, at Butzbach, in the duchy of Hesse Darmstadt; was educated at Frankfurt, Tubingen, Halle, and Leipsic; and was successively professor of theology at Halle and at Jena, rector of the university of Jena, and ecclesiastical privy councillor to the duke of Saxe Weimar. He died in 1812. Of his numerous and erudite publications, one of the most celebrated is his edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings. From Griesbach's preface to vol. 2, of this work, we quote the following words as expressive of the theological views of this distinguished critic: "There are so many arguments for the true Deity of Christ that I see not how it can be called in question; the divine authority of the Scriptures being granted, and just rules of interpretation acknowledged. The exordium of John's gospel is so perspicuous, and above all exception, that it never can be overturned by the daring attacks of critics and interpreters."—Davenport.

GRIEVE. God is grieved when he is highly offended with men's sinning, and provoked to execute his judgments on them, Gen. 6: 6. Heb. 3: 10. Men grieve the Holy Ghost when they resist his persuasions, abuse his gifts or grace, and so displease and offend him, and provoke him to withdraw his influences, and give them up to their corrupt lusts, Eph. 4: 30.—Brown.

GRIEVOUS; that which furnishes great cause of grief. (1.) What is very offensive; so sin is grievous when it is very great and aggravated, (Lam. 1: 8—20. Ezek. 14: 13.) and men are grievous revolvers when they sin exceedingly, Jer. 6: 28. (2.) What is very ill-natured, outrageous, and provoking; so grievous words stir up anger, Prov. 15: 1. (3.) What is very afflicting and hard to be borne; and so war, visions, &c. are said to be grievous, Isa. 21: 15. Matt. 23: 1. (4.) What is very hurtful and destructive; so wolves and false teachers are called grievous, Acts. 20: 29. Men write grievousness, which they have prescribed, when they establish and ratify wicked and oppressive laws, Isa. 10: 1.—Brown.

GRIFFIN, (EDMUND D.) a young clergyman of distinguished talents, was born at Wyoming, Pennsylvania, September 10, 1804. His parents removing to New York, he was at the age of twelve placed under the instruction of David Graham of that city. With unequalled ardor he here pursued the various branches of study, gaining the highest rank in the school. In this school it was an excellent arrangement, which required frequent exercises in composition. Young Griffin wrote nine little volumes of essays, and thus acquired a rich flow of language, and remarkable copiousness and energy of thought. In 1823, at the age of eighteen, he was graduated at Columbia college with the highest honors of his class. After prosecuting the study of law about two months in the office of his father, he determined to prepare for the ministry; and feeling a repugnance to Calvinistic views, entered on his studies in the seminary of the Episcopal church. In August, 1826, he was admitted to deacon's orders, and soon became an assistant preacher in the church in Hamilton square, and also associate with Dr. Lyell. In the hope of promoting his ultimate usefulness, he visited Europe in 1828, from which he returned in April, 1830; and after delivering an admirable course of lectures in Columbia college, on the history of literature, died suddenly of an inflammation of the bowels, September 1, at the age of twenty-six. "In the midst of life, we are in death!"

He died in meek submission and joyful trust in the Redeemer, admonishing others to pursue the course to a blessed immortality. On reviving, after a spasm, which seemed to be fatal, he said with a smile of inexpressible sweetness, "I did not get off that time;" but, checking himself, he added, "that was a rebellious thought; I must wait God's time to die."

Probably America cannot boast of any young man, unless it be the lamented Buckminster, who at so early a period reached such a height of learning and eloquence. He had taste, and feeling, and enthusiasm; and his powers of description are unrivalled. His poetical talents also were of a high order. Two volumes of his works have been published, with the title, Remains of Rev. Edmund D. Griffin. See Memoir, prefixed to the Remains.—Allen.

GRINSHAW, (WILLIAM.) This humble, laborious, and ardent minister of Christ, was born, in 1708, at Brindle, Lancashire, and educated at Cambridge. He entered the ministry in 1731, without any true piety; but in 1734, he was brought under deep conviction of sin, and embraced Christ only as his all in all. In 1742, after his preaching had become evangelically clear and powerful, he came to Haworth, near Bradford, in Yorkshire, where his labors soon drew crowds of awakened hearers. So fully did he lay himself out to do good, that for fifteen or sixteen years together, he was accustomed, besides visiting the sick, and performing other pastoral duties, to preach fifteen, twenty, and often thirty times a week. During all this time he was only once suspended from his labors by sickness; though he ventured upon the bleak mountains in all weathers.

His soul enjoyed large manifestations of God's love, that he might not faint, and he drank deep into his Spirit. His cup ran over, and at some seasons, his faith was so strong, and his hope so abundant, that higher degrees of spiritual delight would have overpowered his mortal frame. At the very mention of his Savior's name he would often pause, and then break out into some express admiration of his love. His sublime soul was lifted above the world. He aimed to live as a king and priest unto his God. The employment of his life was in sermons, prayers, and praises. His usual hour of rising was five, and the melody of his heart rose with him. His first gratulation was constantly that excellent doxology of Watts, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow;" &c. After prayer with his family he would take an affectionate leave of them for the day, as one who might see them no more, giving them his fervent benediction. "May God bless you in your souls, and in your bodies, and in all you put your hands to do this day! Whether you live or die, may the Lord grant that you may live to him, and for him, and with him!" In like manner he parted with them at night.

God gave him very numerous seals of his ministry. His communicants rose to twelve hundred, most of whom he had good evidence were in communion with Christ. He has often preached five times in a day, rarely less than three or four, and to do this would often travel forty or fifty miles. When pressed by his friends to spare himself, he would say, "Let me labor now; I shall rest enough by and by. I cannot do enough for Christ, who has done so much for me." He died April 7, 1763, aged fifty-five. His last words in relation to his own labors were, "AN UNPROFITABLE SERVANT!"—Middleton, vol. iv. p. 394.

GRIND. (See MILL.)

GRINDAL, (Archbishop EDMUND.) was born in the year 1519, in Cumberland. In his early days he studied much; books were his delight and recreation, and he carried them habitually about with him. He was educated at Cambridge. He was on all occasions distinguished as a learned man at the university. He passed through various preferments, but in 1553, on the death of king Edward the Sixth, apprehending the persecution of the Protestants, he fled to Strasburgh, in Germany, where he was well received. During his residence abroad he devoted much time to the duties of religion; to his studies; to the matter of the controversies at Frankfort; to assisting Mr. John Fox in his celebrated martyrological histories. In 1558, Grindal, on the accession of queen Elisabeth to the crown, returned to England; was diligently employed in the reformation of religion; assisted in public disputations; preached at the court and at St. Paul's, with great zeal and piety; and, in 1559, on the removal of Bonner, bishop of London, the queen thought none so fit to succeed him as Grindal. He reluctantly accepted the office, but nobly discharged its duties. In 1575, he was nominated and appointed for the see of Canterbury, which he retained until 1582, when, being afflicted with the loss of sight, he resigned. In 1583, having made his will, bequeathed most of his property to charitable objects, and devised means for the advancement of learning and piety, he expired on the 6th of July, at Croydon.

Grindal was a man of sincere personal piety, and of great firmness and resolution, though of a mild and affable temper, and friendly disposition. In the time in which he lived, he was celebrated for his episcopal abilities, and admirable endowments for spiritual government, as well as his singular learning.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

GRIZZLED; having many white spots like hail stones, Zech. 6: 3.—Brown.

GROANING, is expressive of great trouble; and of a vehement desire of relief, Exod. 2: 24. The saints groan earnestly, and with groanings that cannot be uttered; they have a deep and heart-burdening sense of their sins and afflictions; and with ardent desire, long, and cry for deliverance, 2 Cor. 5: 2, 4. Rom. 8: 26.—Brown.

GROSSETESTE, or GREATHEAD, (ROBERT), bishop of Lincoln, was born at Stradbroke, in the county of Suffolk, in the year 1175. He was a prelate of great learning and integrity; and, considering the age in which he lived, must be regarded as a phoenix. Though of obscure parentage, his studies were prosecuted at the university of Oxford, where he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the Greek and Hebrew languages; after which he went to Paris, then the first seminary in Europe, where he became a perfect master of the French language. Returning to his native country, he took up his residence at Oxford, where his reputation as a theologian procured him many scholars; till, having been appointed successively archdeacon of Chester and of Wilts, he was in 1235 raised to the mitre, and made bishop of the diocese of Lincoln. He no sooner entered upon this high station than he began to reform the abuses which he found to exist in the church. He convened the clergy of his diocese at stated times; to whom he preached, and inculcated upon them the duties of their office. But as the latter had no ear to give to these things, the bishop soon began to be involved in litigations with the monks and other popish agents.

In the year 1253, when the pope commanded him to prefer an Italian youth to a rich benefice in the cathedral of Lincoln, whom Grosseteste knew to be wholly unworthy and incompetent for the duties of the office, the noble bishop refused, saying, "No man can obey such mandates with a good conscience, even though they were seconded by the high order of angels themselves; on the contrary, every faithful Christian ought to oppose them with all his might."

This venerable and courageous reformer died Oct. 9, 1253. The pope's dread of him is strikingly displayed in the fact that when he heard of his death, he exultingly exclaimed, "I rejoice; and let every true son of the church rejoice with me, that my great enemy is removed." The following character of Grosseteste, drawn by Matthew Paris, the monk of St. Albans, is so honorable, that it deserves to be recorded.

"The holy bishop, Robert," says he, "departed this world, which he never loved; and which was always to him a place of banishment. He was the open reprover of my lord the pope, and of the king, as well as the prelates. He was the corrector of monks, the director of priests, the instructor of the clergy, the patron of scholars, a preacher to the laity, the punisher of incontinence, the diligent investigator of various writings, and the scourge of lazy and selfish Romanists, whom he heartily despised. In regard to temporal concerns, he was liberal, copious, polite, cheerful, and affable; in spiritual things he was devout, humble, and contrite; in the execution of his episcopal office, he was diligent, venerable, and indefatigable." See Jones' History of the Christian Church, vol. ii. chap. v. sect. 7.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

GROTIUS, or DE GROOT, (HUGO), an eminent scholar, was born, in 1583, at Delft, in Holland, of which place his father was burgomaster. From his childhood he manifested talents, and a love of learning, which were carefully fostered. At Leyden, Francis Junius was his tutor, and Scaliger also assisted to direct his studies. In his fifteenth year he accompanied Barneveldt, the Dutch ambassador, to Paris; was presented by Henry IV. with his picture and a gold chain; and received the most flattering attentions from men of rank and learning. On his return home, he began to practise as an advocate. His legal avocations, however, did not prevent him from making an indefatigable and effective use of his pen. The honors conferred on him kept pace with the reputation which he acquired. He was successively appointed historiographer, advocate general of Holland and Zealand, pensionary of Rotterdam, a member of the states general, and envoy to England, to adjust some disputes between the two countries. But, in 1618, his fortune changed, and, along with Barneveldt, he was involved in the proscription of the Arminian party by prince Maurice. He narrowly escaped the fate of Barneveldt, but was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Lovestein. At the expiration of eighteen months, however, which he had employed in writing his Treatise on the Truth of the Christian Religion, he was delivered by the contrivance of his wife, who sent him out of the castle concealed in a large chest. Grotius sought an asylum in France, and it was during his residence there that he composed his great work, De Jure Belli et Pacis. After an absence of twelve years he returned to Holland, but persecution still awaited him, and he quitted his native land forever. In 1635, Christina of Sweden appointed him her ambassador at Paris, and this office he held nearly eleven years. He died at Rostock, on his way to Sweden, in August, 1645. Two of his dying expressions are recorded:—"Alas! I have spent my life in laboriously doing nothing." "I place all my hopes in Jesus Christ."

On his death two medals were struck, one containing this just inscription, that he was "The Phoenix of his country, the oracle of Delft, the great genius, the light which enlighteneth the earth."

Grotius was master of all that is worth knowing in sacred and profane literature. There was no art or science with which he was not acquainted. He possessed a clear head, an excellent judgment, universal learning, immense reading, and a sincere and unwavering love of truth and Christianity. In his annotations on the Old and New Testament he discovers his amazing store of classical erudition, and the acuteness of his critical tact. He adheres rigidly to the literal sense throughout, objects to the double sense of prophecy, is rather hostile to the application of the Old Testament revelation to the Messiah, and attaches too little importance to the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, many of which, indeed, he appears grossly to have misapprehended. It has been remarked by professor Gausson, that while no commentators deserve to be preferred to Erasmus and Grotius, whoever makes use of their writings should be aware that "he is treading on fire overspread with faithless ashes." His Socinian perversions were ably exposed by Dr. Owen, in his "Vindiciæ Evangelicæ," and by Calovius, in his "Biblia Illustrata." See M. de Burigny's Life of Grotius; Jones' Chris. Biog.—Davenport; Clissold; Heid. Buck.

GROSVENOR, (BENJAMIN, D. D.) was born in London, Jan. 1, 1675. From a very early period he was the subject of deep and abiding impressions of religion, and resolved upon dedicating himself to the service of God and his church. For this purpose he pursued a liberal course of study.

Mr. Grosvenor entered upon his public ministry in the year 1699. Soon after this he was chosen to succeed Mr. Slater, as pastor of the Presbyterian congregation in Crosby square. To this charge he was ordained July 11, 1704; and the success of his ministry was apparent in raising the church to a flourishing state, in which it continued for many years.

The popularity of Mr. Grosvenor as a preacher, his solid judgment, added to a lively imagination, his graceful elocution, and fervent devotion, occasioned his being appointed to take a part in several important lectures which were then carrying on in the metropolis. In 1730, the university of Edinburgh presented him, unsolicited, with the honorary degree of doctor in divinity. He continued to discharge the ministerial functions till the year 1749, when the infirmities of age compelled him to relinquish his pastoral office, having been a preacher half a century. He died on the 27th of October, 1758, at the age of eighty-three.

A catalogue of his published pieces, amounting to about thirty in number, may be found in Wilson's History of Dissenting Churches. As an author, he is peculiarly acceptable, for the devotional spirit which pervades his works, as well as for his ingenious remarks, and his extensive acquaintance with the history of the church. *Prot. GROVE. The use of groves for religious worship is generally supposed to have been as ancient as the patriarchal ages; for we are informed, that "Abraham planted a grove in Beersheba, and called there on the name of the Lord," Gen. 21: 33. The reason and origin of planting sacred groves is variously conjectured; some imagining it was only hereby intended to render the service more agreeable to the worshippers, by the pleasantness of the shade; whereas others suppose it was to invite the presence of the gods. The one or the other of these reasons, in the case of idolaters, seem to be intimated in Hosea: "They burn incense under oaks, and poplars, and elms, because the shade thereof is good," Hosea 4: 13. Others conceive their worship was performed in the midst of groves, because the gloom of such a place is apt to strike a religious awe upon the mind; or else, because such dark concealments suited the lewd mysteries of their idolatrous worship. Another conjecture, which seems as probable as any, is, that this practice began with the worship of demons, or departed souls. It was an ancient custom to bury the dead under trees, or in woods. "Deborah was buried under an oak, near Bethel," (Genesis 35: 8.) and the bones of Saul and Jonathan under a tree at Jabesh, 1 Samuel 31: 13. Now an imagination prevailing among the heathen, that the souls of the deceased hover about their graves, or at least delight to visit their dead bodies, the idolaters, who paid divine honors to the souls of their departed heroes, erected images and altars for their worship in the same groves where they were buried; and from thence it grew into a custom afterward to plant groves, and build temples, near the tombs of departed heroes, (2 Kings 23: 15, 16.) and to surround their temples and altars with groves and trees; and these sacred groves being constantly furnished with the images of the heroes or gods that were worshipped in them, a grove and an idol came to be used as convertible terms, 2 Kings 23: 6. The use of them was therefore forbidden of God, Deut. 16: 21. 12: 2, 3, 13, 14.—Watson.

GROVE, (HENRY,) a learned divine among the English Presbyterians, was born at Taunton, in Somersetshire, January 4, 1683; and, at fourteen years of age, being possessed of a sufficient stock of classical literature, he went through a course of academical learning under the reverend Mr. Warren, of Taunton, who was for many years at the head of a flourishing academy. Soon after his beginning to preach he married; and at the age of twenty-three, on the death of his tutor, Mr. Warren, was chosen to succeed him in the academy at Taunton. The province first assigned him was ethics and pneumatology; and he composed a system in each. His concern in the academy obliging him to a residence in Taunton, he preached for eighteen years to two small congregations in the neighborhood. In 1708, he commenced author, by a piece entitled "The Regulation of Diversions;" drawn up for the use of his pupils. In 1718 he published "An Essay towards a Demonstration of the Soul's Immortality." About 1719, when those angry disputes relating to the Trinity unhappily divided the Presbyterians, and when the animosities were carried so high as to produce excommunications, &c., Mr. Grove's moderate conduct was such as drew on him the censures and displeasure of some of his own persuasion; the reasons for this moderate conduct are mentioned in his "Essay on the Terms of Christian Communion."

In 1725, he lost his partner in the academy, the Rev. Mr. James; and was now obliged to take the students in divinity under his direction. He confined himself to no system in divinity, but directed his pupils to the best writers on natural and revealed religion, and an impartial consideration of the chief controversies therein. He likewise succeeded Mr. James in his pastoral charge at Fullwood, near Taunton, in which he continued till his death. In 1730, he published "The evidence of our Savior's Resurrection considered," and, the same year, "Some Thoughts concerning the Proof of a future State, from Reason." In 1732, he printed "A Discourse concerning the Nature and Design of the Lord's Supper," where he set that institution in the same light as bishop Hoadly. In 1734, he published without his name, "Wisdom the first Spring of Action in the Deity," which was aimed at, as to some particulars, by Mr. Balguy, who, however, allowed the discourse in general to abound with solid remarks and sound reasonings. In 1736, he published "A Discourse on saving Faith." The same year he met with an affliction, which gave him an opportunity of showing the strength of his Christian patience and resignation; this was the death of his wife; and a little more than a year after this he died himself, February 27, 1737-8. After his death, came out by subscription, his "Posthumous Works," 1740, in four volumes, octavo. The character of Mr. Grove may, in a great measure, be collected from the account we have given of his life. It was, in every respect, excellent and amiable. As a preacher, also, he was admired and esteemed.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

GRYNÆUS, (SIMON,) an eminent Protestant theologian, was born, in 1493, at Veringen, in Swabia; was professor of Greek at Heidelberg, and theology at Basil; was the friend of Luther, Melancthon, and Erasmus; and died in 1541. The last five books which we possess of Livy were discovered by Grynæus, in a monastery at Lorach. Bibliander called him "an incomparable man, in whom every Christian grace and virtue, with all learning and politeness, seemed to have taken up their habitation." Middleton, vol. i. 149.—Davenport.

GRYNÆUS, (JOHN JAMES, D. D.) an eminent Swiss divine, was born at Bern, in 1540, of pious parents, and was educated at the university. In 1559, he began to preach. In 1564, he was made doctor in divinity, and in 1565, succeeded his father in the pastoral charge at Rontela. He coincided with Zuinglius in his views of the Lord's supper, which lost him many of his Lutheran friends. In 1575, however, he was called to Basil as theological professor, where he was happily instrumental in uniting the Lutheran and Zuinglian churches, and was exceedingly useful. Two years he lectured at Heidelberg for prince Cassimire, but on the death of Senler, he succeeded him in the pastoral office at Basil, where he remained the rest of his life. His great learning and worth drew travellers from all parts to visit him. His great wit was tempered with an amiable gravity. He was remarkably patient under wrongs, which he revenged only by Christian silence, and regarded not the reproaches of men, if his Master could by any means be glorified in his sermons and writings. The number of his published works is fourteen, among which is an Ecclesiastical History. In his old age, having lost his wife, children, and friends, and being a great sufferer in body, he sustained all with admirable patience. He would often say, "To die in Christ is sweet, but to rise in him is sweeter. At the last day we shall have lasting joys."—Middleton, vol. ii. 383.

GUEBRES. (See GAUR.)

GUELPHS, and Guibellines; two religio-political factions of the thirteenth century, which filled Italy with civil wars and blood. The former took part with the pope, the latter with the emperor. Mosheim's E. H. vol. iii. p. 180; Ency. Perth.—Williams.

GUEST. Gospel hearers are likened to guests; at Christ's invitation by his ministers, or others, they come to his ordinances, professing to feed with him on his fullness, Matt. 22: 10, 11. The Chaldeans were guests bidden to the Lord's sacrifice; he raised them up and enabled them to execute his vengeance; and they satiated their own pride and covetousness in murdering and spoiling the Jews, and nations around, Zeph. 1: 7.—Brown.

GUIDE. God is a guide; he directs the motions of all his creatures, (Job 38: 22.) and, by his word, spirit, and providence, he directs his people in their proper course, and comforts them under their troubles, Isa. 49: 10. A first husband is called a guide of youth; (Prov. 2: 17.) so God was to the Hebrews, Jer. 3: 4.—Brown.

GUILT; the state of a person justly charged with a crime; a consciousness of having done amiss; liability to punishment.—Hend. Buck.

GUILTY; chargeable with crimes that expose to punishment, Gen. 42: 21. He that offends in one point is guilty of all; of breaking all the commandments of God; he tramples on the authority which establishes, and fails of that love which fulfils the whole law, James 2: 10. An unworthy partaker of the Lord's supper is guilty of the body and blood of the Lord; he is chargeable with the horrid crime of crucifying Christ afresh, and offering the highest indignity to his person and righteousness, represented by the symbols of that ordinance, 1 Cor. 11: 27.—Brown.

GULF. The great gulf fixed between Abraham and the rich man, may denote the great distance between heaven and hell, and the irremovable hindrances of coming from one to the other, Luke 16: 26.—Brown.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, king of Sweden, the grandson of Gustavus Vasa, was born in 1594, and succeeded to the crown at the age of seventeen. The first eighteen years of his reign were employed in ameliorating the situation of his subjects, and in bringing to a glorious conclusion a war in which his country was involved with Denmark, Russia, and Poland. In 1630, he entered upon a still more heroic career. For the noble purpose of rescuing the Protestants of Germany from the tyranny of the house of Austria, he led into the empire an army of sixty thousand men. In 1631, and 1632, he defeated Tilly, near Leipsic, and on the banks of the Lech; but, in 1633, and on the 16th of November, he fell, in the moment of victory, at the battle of Lutzen. To the virtues of a man Gustavus joined the talents of a consummate general. He was a lover of learning, humane, equitable, generous, and pious; and even the most splendid successes never prompted him to deviate from his wondrous simplicity of manners, and moderation of conduct.—Davenport.

GUYON, (JANE BOUVIER DE LA MOTTE,) a French lady who became celebrated through her religious enthusiasm, was born, in 1648, at Angers, and was left a widow at the age of twenty-eight. Her mind had naturally a strong devotional tendency. It has now heated by meditation; and, misled by the bishop of Geneva and two monks, she was taught to believe that heaven destined her for an extraordinary mission. For five years she wandered about, preaching her doctrines. During that period she published her Short and easy Method of Praying; and The Song of Songs interpreted according to its mystical Sense. The system of quietism which she taught, and which was first imagined in Spain by Michael Molinos, excited the attention of the French clergy, and drew upon her a long persecution, in which Bossuet was a principal actor. Fenelon in vain espoused her cause. After having been confined in the Bastille and various prisons, she was liberated in 1702, and she died at Blois, in 1719. Her works occupy thirty-nine volumes, and are now almost forgotten. Some of her poems have been translated by Cowper.—Davenport; Douglas; Jones' Chris. Biog.

GUYSE, (JOHN D. D.,) was born at Hertford, in 1680, of pious parents. Being religiously educated, God was pleased to call him early by his grace, and he became a member of the dissenting church, in Hertford, at the age of fourteen. His views being directed to the ministry, he diligently studied to prepare himself for usefulness. He entered into the holy work at the age of twenty, as assistant to Mr. Haworth, who soon after dying, Mr. Guyse was chosen to succeed him as pastor of the church at Hertford. Here he labored with much acceptance and usefulness, refusing many pressing invitations to remove, and guarding his flock especially against Arian sentiments, at that time prevalent in the west of England; until his health failing, his physicians recommended a change of air and situation. He accordingly accepted an invitation to remove to London, as successor to Rev. Matthew Clarke. Here his sphere of usefulness was enlarged, and his worth became widely known as a scholar, Christian, and divine. In 1732, the university of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of D. D. He published many sermons, but his great work is his Paraphrase on the New Testament, which has been generally approved as a very judicious work. He was much beloved by those who knew him for the benevolence of his disposition. He made conscience of devoting a tenth part of his income to charitable uses. He died November 22, 1761, at the age of eighty. His last words were, "Oh my God, thou who hast always been with me, thou wilt not leave me." Blessed are they whose confidence is equally evangelical.—Middleton, vol. iv. p. 374.

GYMNOSOPHISTS, i. e. naked philosophers; so called, because they wore no more clothing than they found needful for decency and convenience. They were of two parties, Indian and Ethiopian. The former were a sort of wild philosophers; some of whom were, probably, Brahmans; others, hermits and devotees. The Ethiopians are said to have discharged the sacred functions in the manner of the Egyptian priests. They had colleges and disciples of different classes.

The Gymnosophists were remarkable for contempt of death, and are said to have practised suicide in the most deliberate manner, by casting themselves into the flames; it is probable this, however, was an act of devotion to their idols, and with a view to merit immortality. Enfield's Philos. vol. i. pp. 66, 96.—Williams.

H.

HABADIM; a subdivision of the Jewish sect of Chasidim, founded by rabbi Solomon, in the government of Mobilie. They may not improperly be termed the "Jewish Quietists," as their distinguishing peculiarity consists in the rejection of external forms, and the complete abandonment of the mind to abstraction and contemplation. Instead of the baptisms customary among the Jews, they go through the signs without the use of the element, and consider it their duty to disengage themselves as much as possible from matter, because of its tendency to clog the mind in its ascent to the Supreme Source of Intelligence. In prayer they make no use of words, but simply place themselves in the attitude of supplication, and exercise themselves in mental ejaculations.—Hend. Buck.

HABAKKUK, a prophet of the tribe of Simeon. He is said to have prophesied about B. C. 605, and to have been alive at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. It is generally believed that he remained and died in Judea. The principal predictions contained in this book, are, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of the Jews by the Chaldeans or Babylonians; their deliverance from the oppressor "at the appointed time" and the total ruin of the Babylonian empire. The promise of the Messiah is confirmed; and the overruling providence of God is asserted; and the concluding prayer, or rather hymn, recounts the wonders which God had wrought for his people, when he led them from Egypt into Canaan, and expresses the most perfect confidence in the fulfilment of his promises. The style of Habakkuk is highly poetical, and the hymn in the third chapter is perhaps unrivalled for sublimity, simplicity, and power.—Watson.

HABERGEON. (See ARMS, MILITARY.)

HABIT; a peculiar power and facility of doing any thing, acquired by frequent repetition of the same action. It is distinguished from custom. Custom respects the action; habit the actor. By custom we mean a frequent reiteration of the same act; and by habit the effect that custom has on the mind or body. "Man," as one observes, "is a bundle of habits. There are habits of industry, attention, vigilance, advertency; of a prompt obedience to the judgment occurring, or of yielding to the first impulse of passion; of apprehending, methodizing, reasoning; of vanity, melancholy, fretfulness, suspicion, covetousness, &c. In a word, there is not a quality or function, either of body or mind, which does not feel the influence of this great law of animated nature." To cure evil habits, we should be as early as we can in our application, principiis obsta; to cross and mortify the inclination by a frequent and obstinate practice of the contrary virtue. To form good habits, we should get our minds well stored with knowledge; associate with the wisest and best men; reflect much on the pleasure good habits are productive of; and, above all, supplicate the Divine Being for direction and assistance. Kaimes's El. of Crit. ch. xiv. vol. i.; Grove's Mor. Phil. vol. i. p. 143; Paley's Mor. Phil. vol. i. p. 46; Jortin on Bad Habits, ser. 1, vol. iii.; Reid on the Active Powers, p. 117; Cogan on the Passions, p. 235; Buckminster's Sermons; Taylor on Character; Chalmers on the Intellectual and Moral Constitution of Man.—Hend. Buck.

HABITATION. God is the habitation of his people; in him they find the most delightful rest, safety, and comfort, Ps. 91: 9. Justice and judgment are the habitation or establishment of God's throne; all his royal acts are founded on justice and judgment; he takes pleasure to execute them; and being executed on our Redeemer, they became the foundation of his exercise of mercy, and performance of his promises to us; by his righteous distribution of rewards and punishments, he supports the honor of his character, Ps. 89: 14. The land of Canaan, the city of Jerusalem, the tabernacle and temple, heaven and the heart of the saints, are represented as the habitation of God; there he did or does signally show himself present, work by his power, or bestow his favor and influence, Jer. 25: 30. Ezra 7: 15. Exod. 15: 2. Ps. 132: 5, 13. Eph. 2: 22. Eternity is represented as his habitation; he is eternal in a manner no other is, nor does his duration increase as that of angels and men, Isa. 57: 15. He inhabited the praises of Israel; he dwelt in the temple when they praised; he owns, deserves, is the object of, and kindly accepts the praises of his people. Ps. 22: 3.—Brown.

HABITS, (DRESS.) The dress of Oriental nations, to which the inspired writers often allude, has undergone almost no change from the earliest times. Their stuffs were fabricated of various materials; but wool was generally used in their finer fabrics; and the hair of goats, camels, and even of horses, was manufactured for coarser purposes, especially for sackcloth, which they wore in time of mourning and distress. Sackcloth of black goat's hair was manufactured for mournings; the color and the coarseness of which being reckoned more suitable to the circumstances of the wearer, than the finer and more valuable texture which the hair of white goats supplied. This is the reason why a clouded sky is represented, in the bold figurative language of Scripture, as covered with sackcloth and blackness, the color and dress of persons in affliction. In Egypt and Syria, they wore also fine linen, cotton and byssus, probably fine muslin from India, (in Hebrew bavats;) the finest cloth known to the ancients. In Canaan, persons of distinction were dressed in fine linen of Egypt; and, according to some authors, in silk, and rich cloth, shaded with the choicest colors, or, as the Vulgate calls it, with feathered work, embroidered with gold. The beauty of their clothes consisted in the fineness and color of the stuffs; and it seems, the color most in use among the Israelites, as well as among the Greeks and Romans, was white, not imparted and improved by the dyer's art, but the native color of the wool. The general use of this color seems to be recognised by Solomon in his direction: "Let thy garments be always white," Eccles. 9: 8. But garments in the native color of the wool were not confined to the lower orders; they were also in great esteem among persons of superior station, and are particularly valued in Scripture, as the emblem of knowledge and purity, gladness and victory, grace and glory. The priests of Baal were habited in black; a color which appears to have been peculiar to themselves, and which few others in those countries, except mourners, would choose to wear. Blue was a color in great esteem among the Jews, and other Oriental nations. The robe of the ephod, in the gorgeous dress of the high-priest, was made all of blue; it was a prominent color in the sumptuous hangings of the tabernacle; and the whole people of Israel were required to put a fringe of blue upon the border of their garments, and on the fringe a riband of the same color. The palace of Ahasuerus, the king of Persia, was furnished with curtains of this color, on a pavement of red, and blue, and white marble; a proof that it was not less esteemed in Persia than on the Jordan. And from Ezekiel we learn, that the Assyrian nobles were habited in robes of this color: "She doated on the Assyrians her neighbors, which were clothed with blue, captains and rulers, all of them desirable young men."

2. The Jewish nobles and courtiers, upon great and solemn occasions, appeared in scarlet robes, dyed, not as at present with madder, with cochineal, or with any modern tincture, but with a shrub, whose red berries give an orient tinge to the cloth. Crimson or vermilion, a color, as the name imports, from the blood of the worm, was used in the temple of Solomon, and by many persons of the first quality; sometimes they wore purple, the most sublime of all earthly colors, says Mr. Harmer, having the gaudiness of red, of which it retains a shade, softened with the gravity of blue. This was chiefly dyed at Tyre, and was supposed to take the tincture from the liquor of a shell-fish, anciently found in the adjacent sea; though Mr. Bruce, in his Travels, inclines to the opinion, that the murex, or purple fish at Tyre, was only a concealment of their knowledge of cochineal, as, if the whole city of Tyre had applied to nothing else but fishing, they would not have colored twenty yards of cloth in a year. The children of wealthy and noble families were dressed in vestments of different colors. This mark of distinction may be traced to the patriarchal age; for Joseph was arrayed, by his indulgent and imprudent father, in a coat of many colors. A robe of divers colors was anciently reserved for the kings' daughters who were virgins; and in one of these was Tamar, the virgin daughter of David, arrayed, when she was met by her brother.

3. In our region of the world, the fashion is in a state of almost daily fluctuation, and different fashions are not unfrequently seen contending for the superiority; but in the East, where the people are by no means given to change, the form of their garments continues nearly the same from one age to another. The greater part of their clothes are long and flowing, loosely cast about the body, consisting only of a large piece of cloth, in the cutting and sewing of which very little art or industry is employed. They have more dignity and gracefulness than ours, and are better adapted to the burning climates of Asia. From the simplicity of their form, and their loose adaptation to the body, the same clothes might be worn, with equal ease and convenience, by many different persons. The clothes of those Philistines whom Samson slew at Askelon, required no altering to fit his companions; nor the robe of Jonathan, to answer his friend. The arts of weaving and fulling seem to have been distinct occupations in Israel, from a very remote period, in consequence of the various and skilful operations which were necessary to bring their stuffs to a suitable degree of perfection; but when the weaver and the fuller had finished their part, the labor was nearly at an end; no distinct artizan was necessary to make them into clothes; every family seems to have made their own. Sometimes, however, this part of the work was performed in the loom; for they had the art of weaving robes with sleeves all of one piece: of this kind was the coat which our Savior wore during his abode with men. The loose dresses of these countries, when the arm is lifted up, expose its whole length; to this circumstance the prophet Isaiah refers: "To whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" that is, uncovered; who observes that he is exerting the arm of his power?

4. The chosen people were not allowed to wear clothes of any materials or form they chose; they were forbidden by their law to wear a garment of woollen and linen. This law did not prevent them from wearing many different substances together, but only these two; nor did the prohibition extend to the wool of camels and goats, (for the hair of these animals they called by the same name,) but only to that of sheep. It was lawful for any man who saw an Israelite dressed in such a garment to fall upon him and put him to death. In the opinion of Maimonides, this was principally intended as a preservative from idolatry; for the heathen priests of those times wore such mixed garments of woollen and linen, in the superstitious hope, it was imagined, of having the beneficial influence of some lucky conjunction of the planets or stars, to bring down a blessing upon their sheep and their flax. The second restraint referred to the sexes, of which one was not to wear the dress appropriated to the other. This practice is said to be an abomination to the Lord; which critics suppose refers to some idolatrous custom, of which Moses and the prophets always spoke in terms of the utmost abhorrence. Nothing, indeed, was more common among the heathen, in the worship of some of their false deities, than for the males to assist in women's clothes, and the females in the dress appropriated to men; in the worship of Venus, in particular, the women appeared before her in armor, and the men in women's apparel; and thus the words literally run in the original Scriptures, "Women shall not put on the armor of a man, nor a man the stole of a woman." But whatever there may be in these observations, it is certain that, if there were no distinction of sexes made by their habits, there would be danger of involving mankind in all manner of licentiousness and impurity.

5. The ancient Jews very seldom wore any covering upon the head, except when they were in mourning, or worshipping in the temple, or in the synagogue. To pray with the head covered, was, in their estimation, a higher mark of respect for the majesty of heaven, as it indicated the conscious unworthiness of the suppliant to lift up his eyes in the divine presence. To guard themselves from the wind or the storm, or from the still more fatal stroke of the sunbeam, to which the general custom of walking bareheaded particularly exposed them, they wrapped their heads in their mantles, or upper garments. But during their long captivity in Babylon, the Jews began to wear turbans, in compliance with the customs of their conquerors; for Daniel informs us, that his three friends were cast into the fiery furnace with their hats, or, as the term should be rendered, their turbans. It is not, however, improbable, that the bulk of the nation continued to follow their ancient custom; and that the compliance prevailed only among those Jews who were connected with the Babylonish court; for many ages after that, we find Antiochus Epiphanes introducing the habits and fashions of the Grecians among the Jews; and as the history of the Maccabees relates, he brought the chief young men under his subjection, and made them wear a hat, or turban. Their legs, from the knee down, were generally bare, though persons of great dignity wore long and flowing robes; (Rev. 1: 13.) and they never wore any thing upon the feet, but soles fastened in different ways, according to the taste or fancy of the wearer. (See GIRBLE; SHOE.)—Watson; Calmet; Jones.

HACHILAH; a mountain about ten miles south of Jericho, where David concealed himself from Saul, 1 Sam. 23: 19. Jonathan Maccabeus built here the castle of Massada.—Calmet.

HADAD, son to the king of East Edom, was carried into Egypt by his father's servants, when Joab, general of David's troops, extirpated the males of Edom. Hadad was then a child. The king of Egypt gave him a house, lands, and every necessary subsistence, and married him to the sister of Tahpenes, his queen. By her he had a son, named Genubath, whom queen Tahpenes educated in Pharaoh's house with the king's children. Hadad being informed that David was dead, and that Joab was killed, desired leave to return into his own country. Pharaoh wished to detain him, but at last permitted his return to Edom. Here he began to raise disturbances against Solomon; but the Scripture does not mention particulars. Josephus says, that Hadad did not return to Edom till long after the death of David, when Solomon's affairs began to decline, by reason of his impieties. He also observes, that, not being able to engage the Edomites to revolt, because of the strong garrisons which Solomon had placed there, Hadad got together such people as were willing, and carried them to Razon, then in rebellion against Hadadezer, king of Syria. Razon received Hadad with joy, and assisted him in conquering part of Syria, where he reigned, and from whence he insulted Solomon's territories.—Watson.

HADADEZER; king of Zobah, a country which extended from Libanus to the Orontes, whom David defeated, 2 Sam. 8: 3. B. C. 1044.—Calmet.

HADES, (Gr. from a, privative, and idein, to see;) the invisible world, or the place of the departed, in the intermediate state, prior to the resurrection. The corresponding term in Hebrew is Sheol, which is derived from the root shae, to demand, inquire; and either signifies the place with respect to which it may be asked, "Man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" (Job 14: 10.) or the insatiable receptacle which crieth Give, give, and never saith, It is enough, Prov. 30: 15, 16. Both words Sheol and Hades are employed to express the state of the dead, in its most comprehensive point of view; including the grave as the invisible residence of the body, and the world of spirits as the invisible abode of the soul. At other times they are used, either of the one or the other, taken separately. They are often very improperly rendered hell in our common version; the instances being comparatively few in which the words have the accessory signification of the place of punishment. In other passages the term grave is too limited a rendering. The reader must judge from the context, and all the circumstances of the case, in which acceptation the words are to be taken.

That the Hebrews ordinarily understood something beyond the grave by the term Sheol, is evident from the circumstance, that the common name for that receptacle of the human body is Keber; so that when in any given instance they did apply it in this sense, it was only designating a part for the whole. It was the state in which the aged patriarch expected to meet his deceased son, (Gen. 37: 35.) into which the fathers had entered, and whither their posterity were removed at death to join their society, Gen. 25: 8. 35: 29. 49: 29. Deut. 32: 50. In all these passages, the being "gathered to one's people," is spoken of as something distinct from mere burial; and, indeed, in the cases of Abraham and Moses, it is obvious, that, in such a sense, no phrase can be more incongruous, since the former had no people in the cave of Machpelah, Sarah being the only individual who as yet had been buried in it; and of the grave of the latter, the children of Israel were profoundly ignorant. To his people he certainly was not gathered, if by the phrase be meant that his body was deposited in his family grave. It has justly been observed that Hades, and the corresponding Hebrew word Sheol, are always singular, in meaning as well as in form. The word for grave is often plural. The former never admit the possessive pronouns, being the receptacle of all the dead, and therefore incapable of appropriation to individuals; the latter frequently does. Where the disposal of the body or corpse is spoken of, taphos, or some equivalent term, is the name of its repository. When mention is made of the spirit after death, its abode is called Hades. Campbell's Dissert. No. vi.; Dwight's Theology; Prof. Stuart's Exegetical Essays; Whitman's Letters to a Universalist; and the Controversy of Messrs. Balfour, Hudson, and Cooke.—Head. Buck. (See HELL.)

HADGEE; the title of a Mohammedan who performs a pilgrimage to Mecca; a religious act which every orthodox Mussulman is directed to do once in his life. It is also the name of the celebration which takes place on the arrival of the caravan of pilgrims at Mecca.—Head. Buck.

HADID, or CHADID; a city of Benjamin, (Ezra. 2: 33. Nehem. 7: 37.) probably the Adita or Adiada of Josephus, and of 1 Mac. 12: 38. 13: 3, in Sephela, or in the plain of Judah.—Calmet.

HADRACH, or ADRA; a city mentioned by Zechariah, (9: 1.) who denounced dreadful threatenings against it. Ptolemy notices a city called Adra. It could not be far from Damascus; for Zechariah calls Damascus the bulwark, defence, and confidence of Hadrach.—Calmet.

HÆRETICO COMBURENDO; a writ which, in England, anciently lay against a heretic, who, having once been convicted of heresy by his bishop, and having abjured it, afterwards falling into it again, or into some other, is thereupon committed to the secular power. By 2 Henry IV. cap. 15, the diocesan alone, without the intervention of a synod, might convict of heretical tenets; and unless the convict abjured his opinions, or if after abjuration he relapsed, the sheriff was bound ex officio, if required by the bishop, to commit the unhappy victim to the flames, without waiting for the consent of the crown. This writ remained in force, and was actually executed on two Baptists, in the seventh year of Elisabeth, and on two Arians in the ninth of James I.—Head. Buck.

HALF-WAY COVENANT; a scheme adopted by the Congregational churches of New England, in 1657—1662, in order to extend the privileges of church membership and infant baptism beyond the pale of actual communicants at the Lord's table.

An opinion at this time began to prevail, that all persons baptized in infancy, not scandalous in life nor formally excommunicated, ought to be considered members of the church, in all respects except the right of partaking the Lord's supper, for which evidence of regeneration was still generally held to be a requisite qualification. The proposal of so great an innovation on the principles and practices of the first settlers, as would be expected, met with a decided opposition; and a contest arose which occasioned great agitation in all the New England colonies, especially in Connecticut and Massachusetts. At length, in 1657, the court of Massachusetts advised to a general council; and sent letters to the other courts, signifying their opinion. The general court of Connecticut acceded to the proposal, and appointed four delegates to the proposed council. These with the delegates from Massachusetts convened at Boston, in June, 1657. The questions submitted to this council were seventeen in number, most of them relating to baptism and church membership. Their determination was in substance, that all baptized persons ought to be considered members of the church, under its discipline, and to be admitted to all its privileges except a participation of the communion.

The churches were inflamed instead of being reconciled by this decision. The general court of Massachusetts therefore, in 1662, appointed a synod of all the ministers of that colony, to deliberate and decide on two questions; of which the most deeply interesting was, "WHO ARE THE SUBJECTS OF BAPTISM?" Their answer to the question concerning baptism, which, as they viewed it, involved that of church membership, was substantially the same as that given by the council in 1657. They were not unanimous however: several learned and pious men protesting against the decision, which was drawn up in the following propositions:—

"1. They that according to Scripture are members of the visible church, are the subjects of baptism.

"2. The members of the visible church, according to Scripture, are confederate, visible believers in particular churches, and their infant seed, i. e. children in minority, whose next parents one or both are in covenant.

"3. The infant seed of confederate visible believers are members of the same church with their parents, and when grown up are personally under the watch, discipline, and government of that church.

"4. Those adult persons are not therefore to be admitted to full communion, merely because they are and continue members, without suitable qualifications, as the word of God requireth thereunto.

"5. Church members who were admitted in minority, understanding the doctrine of faith, and publicly professing their assent thereto, not scandalous of life, and solemnly owning the covenant before the church wherein they give up themselves and their children to the Lord, and subject themselves to the government of Christ in the church, their children are to be baptized," &c. See Mather's Magnalia, book 5, p. 64.

Most of the New England churches after a time acquiesced in this decision. It has been called very commonly since, the half-way covenant; "a name which itself indicates," says Dr. Wisner, "that religion and the observance of its sacred rites were extensively becoming, in the estimation of the people, a sort of half-way business, and of course its energy and vitality dying away. According to the provisions of this arrangement, persons, who confessedly had not given their hearts to God, for the purpose of obtaining access to the (in such case) mere ceremony of baptism for their children, were permitted and encouraged to come and 'profess before God, angels, and men, to give themselves up to God the Father as their chief good; to the Son of God as their Mediator, Head, and Lord, relying upon him as the Prophet, Priest, and King of their salvation; to the Holy Spirit of God, as their Sanctifier, Guide, and Comforter, to be temples for him to dwell in;' were permitted and encouraged to come and make, in the most solemn circumstances, the most solemn of all professions, when they did not regard themselves, and those around did not regard them, as having at all in heart given themselves away to God, and trusted in Christ, and yielded themselves up to be temples of the Holy Ghost. And as to the promises which were annexed, of educating children in the fear of the Lord, and submitting to the discipline of the church, on the one hand, and of watchful care on the other, they soon came to be alike disregarded, both by those who exacted and by those who made them; parents did not, and soon were not expected to, fulfil their engagements, in form so significant and solemn; and churches did not, and were soon not expected to fulfil theirs. Thus the most solemn and impressive acts of religion came to be regarded as unmeaning ceremonies; the form only to be thought important, while the substance was overlooked and rapidly passing away.

"And now another and still more fatal step was taken in this downward course. Why should such a difference be made between the two Christian sacraments, which reason infers from the nature of the case, and the Scriptures clearly determine, require precisely the same qualifications? And why, if persons were qualified to make, in order to come to one ordinance, the very same profession, both in meaning and in terms, required to come to the other, why should they be excluded from that other? The practical result every one sees would be, that if the innovation already made were not abandoned, another would speedily be introduced. And such was the fact. Correct moral deportment, with a profession of correct doctrinal opinions, and a desire for regeneration, came to be regarded as the only qualification for admission to the communion. This innovation, though not as yet publicly advocated by any, there is conclusive proof had become quite extensive in practice previously to 1679. The churches soon came to consist very considerably, in many places, of unregenerate persons—of those who regarded themselves, and were regarded by others, as unregenerate.—Of all these things the consequence was, that within thirty years after the commencement of the eighteenth century, a large proportion of the clergy—through the country—were either only speculatively correct, or to some extent actually erroneous, in their religious opinions, maintaining regularly the forms of religion, but in some instances having well nigh lost, and in others, it is to be feared, having never felt, its power.

"Thus was abandoned by the New England churches extensively, that principle, viz. that particular churches ought to consist of regenerate persons—the letting go of which soon after the apostolic age, a distinguished writer (Dr. Owen) has affirmed and proved, "was the occasion and means of introducing all that corruption in doctrine, worship, order, and rule, which ensued and ended in the great apostasy."

It should be added, that the half-way covenant is now universally abandoned by the evangelical Congregational churches in New England, and that if retained at all, it is at present found only among the Unitarians.—Wisner's History of the Old South Church; Spirit of the Pilgrims; Mather's Magnalia; Hutchinson's; Trumbull.

HAGAR; an Egyptian servant belonging to Sarah, who being barren, gave her to Abraham for a wife, that by her, as a substitute, she might have children, Gen. 16, and 21. The Mussulmen and Arabians, who are descended from Ishmael, speak highly in her commendation. They call her "Mother Hagar," and maintain that she was Abraham's lawful wife; the mother of Ishmael, his eldest son, who as such possessed Arabia, which very much exceeds, in their estimation, both in extent and riches, the land of Canaan, which was given to his younger son Isaac.

Hagar, according to Paul, may symbolize the synagogue, which produces only slaves—the offspring always following the condition of the mother, Gal. 4: 24.—Calmet.

HAGARENES; the descendants of Ishmael: called also Ishmaelites and Saracens, or Arabians, from their country.—Calmet.

HAGGAI, the tenth of the minor prophets, was probably born at Babylon, whence he accompanied Zerubbabel. The captives, immediately after their return to Judea, began with ardor to rebuild the temple; but the work was suspended fourteen years, till after the death of Cambyses. Darius Hystaspes succeeding to the empire, Haggai was excited by God to exhort Zerubbabel, prince of Judah, and the high-priest Joshua, to resume the work of the temple, which had been so long interrupted, (B. C. 521.) The remonstrances of the prophet had their effect, and in the second year of Darius, and the sixteenth year after the return from Babylon, they resumed this work, Hag. 1: 14. 2: 1. The Lord commanded Haggai to tell the people, that if any one recollected the temple of Solomon, and did not think this to be so beautiful and magnificent as that structure was, he ought not to be discouraged; because God would render the new temple much more august and venerable than the former had ever been; not in embellishments of gold or silver, but by the presence of the Messiah, the desire of all nations, and by the glory which his coming would add to it.

We know nothing of Haggai's death. Epiphanius asserts, that he was buried at Jerusalem among the priests; which might induce us to believe, that he was of Aaron's family: but Haggai says nothing of himself to favor this opinion.—Calmet.

HAGIOGRAPHIA, (Gr. for holy writings;) the name given to the third division of the Jewish Scriptures, which comprises the book of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, Esther, and the Chronicles. These books appear to have received the name of "Sacred Writings," to intimate that, though they were not written by Moses, nor by any of the prophets, strictly so called, they were nevertheless to be received as of the same divine authority, having been written or added to the canon, under the influence of that Holy Spirit by whose inspiration the other books were composed. (See BRLE.)—Hend. Buck.

HAHIROTH, whence Pi-hahiroth, as it is called in Exod. 14: 2, 9, but simply Hahiroth, in Numb. 33: 8; the gullet, or opening; but whether of a cave, or a passage between rocks into a wider place, or of a narrow sea into a broader, is not determined. We take it for the opening of a gullet of water, at the present Suez, in the northern extremity of the Red sea. (See EXODS.)—Calmet.

HAICHTITES; a Musselman sect, who attempt to unite their faith with the religion of Christ, whose second coming they expect, as the Judge of all; quoting these words from the Koran—"O Mohammed, thou shalt see thy Lord, who will come in the clouds." Rycaut's Ottoman Empire, cited by Broughton.—Williams.

HAIL! a salutation, importing a wish for the welfare of the person addressed. It is now seldom used among us; but was customary among our Saxon ancestors, and imported as much as "joy to you;" or "health to you;" including in the term health all kinds of prosperity.—Calmet.

HAIL-STONES, are congealed drops of rain, formed into ice by the power of cold in the upper regions of the atmosphere. Hail was among the plagues of Egypt; (Exod. 9: 24.) and that hail, though uncommon, is not absolutely unknown in Egypt, we have the testimony of Volney, who mentions a hail-storm, which he saw crossing over mount Sinai into that country, some of whose frozen stones he gathered; "and so," he says, "I drank iced water in Egypt." Hail was also the means made use of by God, for defeating an army of the kings of Canaan, Josh. 10: 11. God's judgments are likened to a hail-storm, in Isa. 28: 2; but the most tremendous hail mentioned in Scripture, or in any writer, is that alluded to in Rev. 16: 21:—"Every stone was about the weight of a talent." How prodigious is this description! in comparison with it all accounts of hail-stones, and hail-storms, are diminutive. We have, in the Philosophical Transactions, mention of hail as large as pullets' eggs: but what is this to the weight of a talent!—Calmet.

HAIR. The Eastern females wear their hair, which the prophet emphatically calls the "instrument of their pride," very long, and divided into a great number of tresses. Black hair was regarded by the Hebrews as most beautiful, Cant. 5: 11. Horace represents this also as the taste of the Romans. In Barbary, the ladies all affect to have their hair hang down to the ground, which, after they have collected into one lock, they bind and plait with ribbons. Where nature has been less liberal in its ornaments, the defect is supplied by art, and foreign is procured to be interwoven with the natural hair. The apostle's remark on this subject corresponds entirely with the custom of the East, as well as with the original design of the Creator:—"Does not even nature itself teach you, that if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him? But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her; for her hair is given her for a covering," 1 Cor. 11: 14. The men in the East, Chardin observes, are shaved; the women nourish their hair with great fondness, which they lengthen by tresses, and tufts of silk down to the heels. But among the Hebrews the men did not shave their heads; they wore their natural hair, though not long; and it is certain that they were, at a very remote period, initiated in the art of cherishing and beautifying the hair with fragrant ointments, Exod. 30: 32, 33. Ps. 23: 5. Eccl. 9: 8. Matt. 6: 17. After the hair is plaited and perfumed, the Eastern ladies proceed to dress their heads, by tying above the lock into which they collect it, a triangular piece of linen, adorned with various figures in needle-work. This, among persons of better fashion, is covered with a sarmah, as they call it, which is made in the same triangular shape, of thin, flexible plates of gold or silver, carefully cut through, and engraven in imitation of lace. This excessive attention to ornament is noticed and forbidden by the apostles, 1 Tim. 2: 9. 1 Pet. 3: 3. Cutting off the hair was a sign of mourning, Jer. 7: 29; but sometimes in mourning they suffered it to grow long. In ordinary sorrows they neglected their hair; and in violent paroxysms they plucked it off with their hands.—Calmet; Watson.

HAIRETTITES; a sort of Mohammedan sceptics, who affect to doubt of every thing, while they inconsistently consider themselves as Musselmen. They drink freely of opiates, and cannot be supposed very strict in conforming to a religion which they do not believe: yet there are said to have been muftis (priests) of this sect. Rycaut's Ottoman Empire, cited by Broughton.—Williams.

HALAH; a river of Media, or of Colchis.—Also, a city or country of Media, to which the kings of Assyria transplanted the ten tribes. It is mentioned with Habor; (2 Kings 17: 6,) which shows it to have been on the river Gozan. Hyde supposes it to be Holwan; Bochart thinks it to be the metropolis of the Calachene, admitting a permutation of the first letter.—Calmet.

HALCYONS; a name assumed, in 1802, by a small body of Christians in the United States, whose tenets resembled those now known by the name of CHRISTIANS.

HALDANITES; the followers of Robert and James Alexander Haldane, two gentlemen of fortune, brothers, and seceders from the church of Scotland; who, between twenty and thirty years since, formed the design of devoting themselves to the propagation of the gospel in India; but, being prevented by the East India company, directed their attention to its dissemination at home, and spent considerable sums in the erection of large places of worship in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen; and in other means of circulating evangelical religion. In the prosecution of their inquiries after truth, they adopted many of the tenets of Sandeman, with some rigid forms of discipline. Afterwards they became Baptists, and the party divided and subdivided, till they became, as a sect, extinct; and most of their followers have either joined the Scotch Baptists, or Independents.

It should be observed, that though these gentlemen have vacillated on minor points, they have always adhered to the great and fundamental truths of revelation; and, as they have latterly relaxed in their zeal on inferior points, they have become more zealous for the great essentials of religion. Mr. Robert Haldane has recently published a work on the Evidence of Divine Revelation, which is recommended by the London Christian Observer as in some respects preferable to Paley. (See BAPTISTS, the SCOTCH.)—J. A. Haldane's Social Worship; Morison's Theol. Dict.; Evans' Sketch, (1817,) p. 317, &c.—Williams.

HALL, (Sir MATTHEW,) an eminent and incorruptible judge, born, in 1609, at Alderley, in Gloucestershire, was the son of a retired barrister. With the exception of one period, when his mind was corrupted by attending the theatre, from which, however, he was happily recovered by divine grace, he studied diligently at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and Lincoln's Inn; and was called to the bar not long before the breaking out of the civil war. Though he acted as counsel for Strafford, Laud, Hamilton, and many others of the king's party, and even for Charles himself, he conformed to the republican government, and became a lay member of the Westminster assembly of divines. By dint of importunity, Cromwell prevailed upon him, in 1654, to become one of the justices of the Common bench, but he soon offended the Protector by refusing to warp the laws, and the result was, that he thenceforth refused to try criminal causes. Having promoted the Restoration, he was, in 1660, appointed chief baron of the exchequer, and, in 1671, chief justice of the king's bench. He died in 1676.

The seat of judgment was never more purely filled than by Sir Matthew Hale. No influence, no power, could turn him aside from the path of rectitude. His private character was equally estimable. He was a Protestant, and a most devout Christian. He delighted to encourage youthful genius, diligence, and piety. His "Letters to his Children," and "Grandchildren," are among his most useful works.—The knowledge of judge Hale was not confined to the law, but extended to divinity, mathematics, and history, upon all of which subjects works of his are extant. His principal religious production is, Contemplations, Moral and Divine. Among his legal labors are, A History of the Pleas of the Crown; and A History of the Common Law of England.—Davenport.

HALL, (JOSEPH, D. D.) bishop of Norwich, a divine and poet, was born, in 1574, at Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire, and was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. His mother was a woman of uncommon piety. After having held the livings of Halsted and Waltham, and the deanery of Worcester, and been chosen as one of the English divines deputed to the synod of Dort, he was raised, in 1627, to the see of Exeter, whence, in 1641, he was translated to Norwich. Though he had refused to persecute the Puritans, yet, having joined the other bishops in the celebrated protest against laws made during their absence from the upper house, he was committed to the Tower, and his estate was subsequently sequestered. To insults and affronts the most paltry, yet galling and oppressive, he was compelled to submit; though he deserved the respect and esteem of all men, and of all parties. Soon after his expulsion from his bishopric, he retired to a small place called Higham, in Norfolk, where, notwithstanding the diminution of his income, he was charitable to the destitute, and distributed considerable sums to poor widows. In that retirement he finished his valuable life; and on the 8th of September, 1656, in the eighty-second year of his age, he expired, and was buried in the churchyard of that parish, without any memorial.

Bishop Hall was a man of great wit and learning, meekness, modesty, and piety. His writings, which are numerous, and which are generally known by the appellation of "Hall's Contemplations," are replete with fine thoughts, excellent morality, and sincere piety: they are a complete body of divinity. In some single pages and sentences, more of knowledge and information is communicated, than in volumes of modern treatises and sermons. Few men knew so well the human heart; and though sometimes his expressions are coarse, his style too colloquial, and his manner offensive; yet whoever can value a diamond, though its encrustation may be coarse and unpleasing, for its intrinsic excellence and value, will, on the same principle, prize the works of this very excellent man. They consist of five volumes quarto, or twelve volumes octavo, and have gained their author the name of the English Seneca.—Davenport; Jones' Chr. Biog.

HALL, (GORDON,) first American missionary at Bombay, was a native of Berkshire county, Massachusetts, and was graduated at Williams college in 1808. Having studied theology, he refused an invitation to settle in Connecticut, saying, "Wo is me if I preach not the gospel to the heathen." Offering himself as a missionary to the American Board of Commissioners for foreign missions, he was ordained at Salem, with Judson, Newell, Nutt, and Rice, February 6, 1812, and in the same month sailed for Calcutta. Mr. Hall arrived at Bombay in February, 1813; and there spent thirteen years in his benevolent toils, with a purpose unaltered and zeal unquenched. He had just revised the New Testament in Maharratta, when, as he was on a journey in the interior, he was seized with the cholera, which proved fatal in eight or nine hours. He died March 20, 1826, aged about thirty-six.

He was a man of great force of mind and decision of character, of ardent piety, and of entire devotedness to the work of a missionary. His vigorous frame and habits of life fitted him to endure the hardships of a missionary. His qualifications of every kind for the work to which he devoted his life, were very uncommon. He published An Appeal to American Christians, in behalf of the Twelve Millions speaking the Maharratta Language, 1826. He wrote also, with Mr. Newell, The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions, &c. 2d ed. 1818. The New Testament, in Maharratta, was printed at the mission press in Bombay, in 1826. Memoir. Miss. Her., Oct. 1826.—Allen.

HALL, (REV. ROBERT, A. M. ;) a name rich in sacred as well as splendid associations. This extraordinary man, who, in the recorded judgment of Dr. Parr, combined "the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the acuteness of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher, and the piety of a saint," was the son of the Rev. Robert Hall, of Arnsby, (Eng.) He was born May 2, 1764. His mother is represented as a woman of sterling sense, and distinguished piety. Robert was the youngest of fourteen children, and while an infant was so delicate and feeble, that he was not expected to reach maturity, and he could neither walk nor talk till two years old. His nurse taught him his alphabet from the grave stones in a burial ground near his father's dwelling. That burial ground became afterwards, out of school hours, his favorite study, where, reclining on the grass, he would remain with his books, till the shades of evening deepened around him. It is not improbable that he here contracted the injury and pain in his back from which he suffered so much through his whole life, and which led Dr. Prichard to remark, that "no man probably ever went through more physical suffering than Mr. Hall," and that "he was a fine example of the triumph of the higher powers of mind, exalted by religion, over the infirmities of the body."

His intellect early developed its extraordinary vigor. Edwards on the Will, and Butler's Analogy, were the chosen companions of his childhood, being perused and re-perused with intense interest before he was nine years old. At eleven, his master, Mr. Simmons, declared himself unable any longer to keep pace with his pupil. At the same time he manifested such unequivocal proofs of piety, that his delighted father began to think seriously of devoting him to the sacred office. Some friends, indeed, most injudiciously drew him forward repeatedly to preach, at the age of eleven, to select companies; a circumstance, which from the vanity it inspired, he afterwards strongly reprobated. He was put under the instructions of the Rev. John Ryland, of Northampton, where he made great progress in the languages, acquired the general principles of abstract science, a thirst for knowledge of every kind, and the habit, as well as taste, for beautiful composition. In 1778, he entered the Bristol Institution as a student of theology. So precocious was the development of his pulpit talents, that he was solemnly ordained to the work of the ministry, in 1780, at the age of sixteen. The next year, he entered King's college, Aberdeen, on Dr. Ward's foundation. Here he enjoyed the instruction of Drs. Gerard, Ogilvie, Beattie, and Campbell, and here also formed that intimate friendship with Sir James Mackintosh, which continued through life, and which there is reason to believe is now made perfect in heaven. Mr. Hall was the first scholar in his class through his collegiate course, and was considered by all the students a model of social, moral, and religious excellence. Sir James said he became attached to Mr. Hall, "because he could not help it." Neither their tastes nor sentiments were alike at first, yet their cast of mind was similar, and it was not long before Sir James became, to use his own language, "fascinated with his brilliancy and acumen, in love with his cordiality and ardor, and awe-struck by the transparency of his conduct and the purity of his principles."

In 1785, Mr. Hall became assistant pastor at Broadmead, Bristol, with Dr. Evans, and also classical tutor in the Baptist Academy, which offices he filled with great popularity for five years. In 1790, he removed to Cambridge, and became successor to Mr. R. Robinson, as pastor of the Baptist church. Here, in 1791, he published his "Christianity consistent with the Love of Freedom," and, in 1793, his "Apology for the Freedom of the Press." The death of his excellent father, in 1791, led Mr. Hall to a deeper prayerfulness, and issued in the renunciation of some erroneous views which he had imbibed from the speculations of Dr. Priestley, whom as a philosopher he early admired and defended. Here also he revised and extended his knowledge in every department, re-arranged the whole furniture of his mind, and the economy of his habits, while at the same time his piety grew in seriousness, affection, and ardor. His labors were not only greatly admired, but blessed to the revival of evangelical piety, and a large increase of the church and congregation. Here also, in 1799, he preached and published his celebrated sermon on Modern Infidelity, which not only procured him the esteem of many illustrious men of all orders, but is supposed to have done more to check the growing scepticism of the times than any one work, Paley's and Burke's not excepted. It is indeed a masterly expose of the unsound principles and pernicious tendency of the atheistical French philosophy. In 1802, appeared his "Reflections on War." The threatened invasion of Bonaparte, in 1803, brought him again before the public, in the discourse entitled "Sentiments suitable to the Present Crisis," which raised Mr. Hall's reputation for large views and powerful eloquence to the highest pitch.

In November, 1804, owing chiefly to the increasing pain in his back, attended by the want of sufficient exercise and rest, the exquisitely toned mind of Mr. Hall lost its balance, and he who had so long been the theme of universal admiration, became the subject of as extensive a sympathy. He was placed under the care of Dr. Arnold of Leicester, where, by the divine blessing, his health was restored in about two months. But similar causes produced a relapse, about twelve months afterwards, from which he was soon restored; though it was deemed essential to the permanent establishment of his health, that he should resign his pastoral charge, and remove from Cambridge. This he did, though the attachment on both sides remained undiminished until death. Two shocks of so humiliating a calamity within the compass of a year, deeply impressed Mr. Hall's mind. His own decided persuasion was, that he never before experienced a thorough transformation of character; and there can be no question that from this period his spirit was habitually more humble, dependent, and truly devotional. It became his custom to renew, every birthday, by a solemn act, the dedication of himself to God, on evangelical principles, and in the most earnest sincerity of heart.

In 1807, he became pastor of the Baptist church in Leicester, where he soon after married, and where he labored most successfully for nearly twenty years. At no period was he more happy, active, and useful. The church, when he left it, was larger than the whole congregation when he took the charge of it. But his influence was not confined to the limits of his parish. He took an active part in all the noble charities of the age, and by his sermons, speeches, and writings, exerted a wide influence on society, not only in England, but on the continent of Europe, America, and in India. His Review of Zeal without Innovation, &c. his tracts on the Terms of Communion, and his sermons on the Advantages of Knowledge to the Lower Classes, on the Discouragements and Supports of the Christian Ministry, on the Character of a Christian Missionary, on the Death of the Princess Charlotte, and of Rev. Dr. Ryland, with several others, were given to the public while residing here. Here also, in 1823, he delivered his admirable course of lectures on the Socinian Controversy, partially preserved in his Works.

Wherever he went, he was called to address overflowing congregations. Churchmen and dissenters; men of rank and influence, individuals in lower stations; men of simple piety, and others of deep theological knowledge; men who admired Christianity as a beautiful system, and those who received it into the heart by faith; men in doubt, others involved in unbelief; all resorted to the place where he was announced as the preacher.

In 1826, a sense of duty to the denomination of which he was so distinguished an ornament, induced him to accept of the unanimous invitation of the church in Broadmead, Bristol, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the excellent Dr. Ryland. The separation from his flock at Leicester was mutually distressing, though soothed and sustained by Christian principles. At Bristol he was welcomed with enthusiastic joy, and the same church which enjoyed his earliest ministry, was favored with his last. Large accessions were received during the five years which preceded his death, and this, together with the society of many valued friends, among whom was the Rev. John Foster, notwithstanding his disease in the back, and increasing infirmities, made the closing years of his life eminently happy.

In February, 1831, the church of Christ, and the world at large, were deprived of the services of this great man, now in his sixty-seventh year, after an illness of ten days, a full and affecting account of which has been given to the public by Dr. Chandler. When he first announced his apprehension that he should never again minister among his people, he added, "But I am in God's hands, and I rejoice that I am. I have not one anxious thought, either for life or death. I think I would rather go than stay; for I have seen enough of the world, and I have a humble hope." After one of his severe paroxysms, being asked if he felt much pain, he replied, that his sufferings were great; "but what," he added, "are my sufferings, to the sufferings of Christ? His sufferings were infinitely greater; his sufferings were complicated. God has been very merciful to me; very merciful." During the last day, when the final paroxysm came on, Mrs. Hall in much agitation exclaimed, "This can't be dying!" to which he replied, "It is death—it is death—death! Oh the sufferings of this body!" Being asked, "But are you comfortable in your mind?" he immediately answered, "Very comfortable—very comfortable!" and exclaimed, "Come, Lord Jesus—Come." He hesitated, as if incapable of bringing out the last word; and one of his daughters involuntarily anticipated him by saying, "quickly!" on which her departing father gave her a look of the most complacent delight. There was a solemn and awful grandeur in this last scene. He died from a failure of the vital powers of the heart, amidst the most vigorous exercises of consciousness and volition. Peacefully he closed those brilliant eyes which had so often beamed rays of benignity and intellectual fire. Calmly, yet firmly, he sealed those lips which had so often charmed the ears of thousands with messages of divine mercy and grace. "I have never before seen," says Dr. Chandler, "and scarcely shall I again witness, a death in all its circumstances so grand and impressive; so harmonious with his natural character, so consistent with his spiritual life. And when after death, we gazed upon his countenance, combining such peace, benevolence, and grandeur in its silent expressions, we felt the reaction of faith on sensible objects, exhilarating us with the consolatory conviction, that the gain of the departed was in a sense proportioned to the loss felt by the Christian church."

"The loss of Mr. Hall," says John Foster, "is reflected on with a sentiment peculiar to the event, never experienced before, nor to be expected in any future instance."

In the social circle, and in the solemn assembly, Mr. Hall appeared as a distinguished representative, a most expressive organ of our nature, in all its more familiar sentiments, or in all its more sublime conceptions and aspirations. Hence he was regarded by the multitudes who sought his public or his private presence as a kind of universal property, whom all parties had a right to enjoy, and none to monopolize: before him all forgot their denominations, as he appeared to forget his own, in the comprehensive idea of the church of Christ.

There was nothing very remarkable in Mr. Hall's manner of delivering his sermons. His simplicity, yet solemnity of deportment, engaged the attention, but did not promise any of his most rapturous effusions. His voice was feeble, but distinct, and as he proceeded trembled beneath his images, and conveyed the idea that the spring of sublimity and beauty in his mind was exhaustless, and would pour forth a more copious stream, if it had a wider channel than could be supplied by the bodily organs. The plainest and least inspired of his discourses were not without delicate gleams of imagery, and felicitous turns of expression. But he was ever best when he was intensest—when he unveiled the mighty foundations of the rock of ages—or made the hearts of his hearers vibrate with a strange joy, which they will recognise in more exalted stages of their being.

His excellence did not so much consist in the predominance of one of his powers, as in the exquisite proportion and harmony of them all. The richness, variety, and extent of his knowledge, were not so remarkable as his absolute mastery over it. There is not the least appearance of straining after greatness in his most magnificent excursions, but he rises to the loftiest heights with a childlike ease. His style as a writer is one of the clearest and simplest—the least encumbered with its own beauty—of any which ever has been written. His noblest passages do but make truth visible in the form of beauty, and "clothe upon" abstract ideas, till they become palpable in exquisite shapes. The dullest writer would not convey the same meaning in so few words, as he has done in the most sublime of his illustrations. "Whoever wishes to see the English language in its perfection," says Dugald Stewart, "must read the writings of Rev. Robert Hall. He combines the beauties of Johnson, Addison, and Burke, without their imperfections."

His "Works" have been collected and published, with a Memoir of his Life, by Dr. Gregory, and Observations on his Character as a Preacher by the profound Foster. They have been reprinted in this country, in three vols. octavo, and widely circulated. See Memoir, &c.

HALLELUJAH. (See ALLELUIA.)

HALLER, (Baron ALBERT VON,) a native of Switzerland, who has many claims to fame, was born in 1708, at Berne, and displayed, even in childhood, the most extraordinary talents. Having chosen the medical profession, he studied at Tübingen and Leyden, after which he visited England and France, and then proceeded to Basil, to make himself master of mathematics under James Bernoulli. Botany also became one of his favorite pursuits, and he began to display those poetical powers which eventually ranked him among the standard German poets. For nineteen years he was professor of anatomy, surgery, and botany, at Göttingen, at the expiration of which period he returned to his native country. There he resided, honored by his fellow citizens, for nearly a quarter of a century; continued to benefit science by his literary labors; filled several important offices in the state, and adorned the gospel by his life. He died in 1777. Among his numerous productions are the collection of Bibliotheca, in ten quarto volumes; Prelections; Elements of Physiology; Outlines of Physiology; various works on Botany; and his invaluable Letters to his Daughter on the Excellence of the Christian Religion.—Davenport.

HALLET, (JOSEPH,) a learned and celebrated minister amongst the Protestant dissenters, was born at Exeter, Eng. in the year 1692. His father (the venerable Joseph Hallet) kept an academy in the same city; where his son went through the usual course of a learned education amongst the dissenters. After this he became an assistant to his father in the academy; and, in the year 1713, he was admitted to the ministerial office. In 1715 he was ordained at Exeter; and, soon after his ordination, he was chosen pastor of a small congregation at Shobrook, in the neighborhood of that city, where he continued to preach till the year 1722, when he was called to succeed his father as co-pastor with Mr. Peirce, in his native city. His first appearance, as a writer, was in the year 1720, when he published a tract, entitled, "The Unity of God not inconsistent with the Divinity of Christ." In 1726 he published "The Reconciler; or, an Essay to show that Christians are much more agreed in their notions concerning the Holy Trinity, than has been commonly represented;" and in 1729, "A collection of Notes on some Texts of Scripture;" &c.

About this time the famous treatise of Tindal, entitled, "Christianity as Old as the Creation," made its appearance; the author of which had, amongst other things, advanced, that miracles are no proof of any religion, because they may be performed by evil beings; and, as what he had said upon this subject had puzzled many, Mr. Hallet took occasion to lay before the public "An Essay on the nature and use of Miracles; designed against the assertion, that they are no proper proof of a Divine Mission. To which is prefixed an Answer to some other objections against Revealed Religion contained in a late book, entitled, 'Christianity as old as the Creation.'" This was followed, in 1731, by "A Defence of a Discourse on the Impossibility of proving a Future State by the Light of Nature: with an Answer to the Rev. Mr. Grove's Thoughts on the same Subject." In the following year, Mr. Hallet published, "A Second Volume of Notes and Discourses."

Mr. Peirce's excellent Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistle to the Hebrews, being left unfinished, and printed in that imperfect state, our author, after having waited about five years to see whether the work would be completed by any other person, was prevailed upon, by the impertinence of some of his friends, to publish "A Paraphrase and Notes on the last Three Chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews; being a Supplement to the learned Mr. Peirce's Paraphrase and Notes on this Epistle; with an Essay to discover the Author of the Epistle, and the Language in which it was originally written." In 1736 our author published "A Third Volume of Notes and Discourses." In the same year, likewise, he published a tract, entitled, "The Truth and Importance of the Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity and Incarnation demonstrated." In the following year, the publication of Dr. Morgan's "Moral Philosopher," making a great noise in the literary world, our author was one of the first that entered the lists against him. The piece which he wrote upon this occasion was printed the same year, under the title of "The Immorality of 'The Moral Philosopher,' being an Answer to a Book lately published, entitled, 'The Moral Philosopher.'" Dr. Morgan replying to this piece, our divine immediately published "A Letter to the Moral Philosopher; being a Vindication of a Pamphlet, entitled, 'The Immorality of the Moral Philosopher.'" This was followed, some time after, by "A Rebuke to the Moral Philosopher for the Errors and Immoralities contained in his Third Volume," which closed the controversy on the part of our author. In 1738 Mr. Hallet published "The consistent Christian; being a Confutation of the Errors advanced in Mr. Chubb's late book, entitled, 'The True Gospel of Jesus Christ asserted,' relating to the Necessity of Faith, the Nature of the Gospel, the Inspiration of the Apostles, &c.; with Remarks on his Dissertation on Providence." He continued to prosecute his studies with his usual diligence; and faithfully discharged the duties of his profession till his death, which happened in the year 1744.

Mr. Hallet's truly Christian behavior, and mild and gentle temper, endeared him to all his acquaintance; and he enjoyed the general esteem of his contemporaries. His various publications, and particularly his "Notes and Discourses on several passages of the Old and New Testament," are, and will remain, a sufficient proof of his having possessed the greatest critical sagacity, combined with extensive learning. *Brit Biog.—Jones's Chris. HALLOW; to render sacred, set apart, consecrate. The English word is from the Saxon, and is properly to hallow, to make holy; hence hallowed persons, things, places, rites, &c.; hence also, the name, character, power, dignity of God, is to be hallowed; that is, profoundly revered as holy in every human heart, Matt. 6. Luke 11. (See SACRIFICIATION; HOLY.)—Calmet.

HALT; to go lame on the feet or legs. Many persons who were halt, were cured by our Lord. To halt between two opinions, (1 Kings 18: 21.) should perhaps be understood to hesitate, from indecision which to embrace; or to stagger from one to the other, repeatedly. Some say, it is an allusion to birds, who hop from spray to spray, forwards and backwards:—as the contrary influence of supposed convictions vibrated in the mind in alternate affirmation and doubtfulness.—Calmet.

HALYBURTON, (THOMAS), professor of divinity in the university of St. Andrews, was born at Duplin, Scotland, in the parish of Aberdalgy, near Perth, Dec. 25, 1674. Both his parents were eminently pious. In 1682 his father died, in the fifty-fifth year of his age; and the care of the son's morals and education devolved on his excellent mother. Never was the importance of the union of piety and literature in the maternal character more fully developed than in this instance. But for this the world might never have heard, nor the church have felt, the benefit of the talents and Christian virtues of Halyburton. He was in early youth the subject of frequent, but ineffectual religious convictions. In 1689 he began to be perplexed respecting the evidences of revealed religion, till, after having experienced some mental relief from Robert Bruce's "Fulfilling of the Scriptures," he received further aid from Mr. Donaldson, an excellent old minister, who came to preach at Perth, and paid a visit to his mother. He inquired of his young friend, if he sought a blessing from God on his learning; remarking, at the same time, with an austere look—"Sirrah, unsanctified learning has done much mischief to the kirk of God." This led him to seek divine direction in extraordinary difficulties; but this exercise, he acknowledges, left him still afar off from God." At the university of St. Andrews his regard for religion increased; and, under the ministry of Mr. Thomas Forrester, he began to discover the more secret evils of his heart. He formed many good resolutions, and thought he had found peace; but it was a structure, which had for its foundation vows made, and sometimes fulfilled with apparent success, rather than the atonement of Christ. Having applied himself closely three years to the study of philosophy, he had thought of going abroad, in search of further improvement; but fear of the sea on the one hand, and the pressing solicitations of friends on the other, prevailed with him to engage as domestic chaplain in a nobleman's family. Accordingly, in August, 1696, he went to the Wemyss. Here he met with considerable difficulties, arising out of his prominent situation, and more especially, from the debates into which he was drawn on the truth of religion.

In resorting to the works of deists, with a view to meet their arguments, his own mind was much perplexed; but the valuable fruit of his study, in reference to others, may be seen in his admirable "Inquiry into the Principles of Modern Deists," published some years after, which has been often republished, and is still a standard work on that subject. Nor in the issue, could he regret a research which taught him an humble submission to the dictates of divine revelation, notwithstanding at first he was the subject of the most distressing doubts. He represents his state of depression, during this conflict, as of a nature too grave to have been long sustained. But about the close of January, or beginning of February, 1698, he obtained from the Scriptures that salutary relief, which was no less necessary to his earthly existence, than to his spiritual peace. New light broke in upon his mind. From the doctrine of the cross he derived that consolation which he had in vain sought elsewhere, and that purity, which is connected, as a principle, with the religion of Christ His heart was expanded towards others, and for many days together, he says, he seemed admitted into the very "secret of the divine pavilion." The most overwhelming sense of his own worthlessness pervaded his mind, and his feelings of reverence for God were exceedingly exalted;—his joy, he states to have been "truly unspeakable, and full of glory." So much was he raised above earth, that he could scarcely bend his mind to the perusal of any works but those of a devotional cast. His views of the enormity of sin, he says, grew clearer as he advanced in holiness; his contrition under it became more pungent, and his desire after freedom from its influence more ardent. "All his former doubts, respecting the being of a God, vanished in the clear light of an evangelical faith; and he had a witness to the existence of a Being, of infinite love and purity, in the internal satisfaction and holiness of his heart." The divine authority of the Scriptures, which he had previously disputed, and on which his mind could be satisfied neither by personal investigation, nor by reading the works of others, now received sufficient proof in the discoveries which they had enabled him to make of his own guilt—of the being, attributes, and purposes of God—and the transforming, quickening, supporting, and reviving influences which they had conveyed to his own mind. In short, reason now became entirely the disciple of revelation, and the thoughts of entering the ministry, which he had previously laid aside, on account of the wavering state of his mind, now returned. He was licensed to preach, June 22, 1699, and appointed minister of Ceres parish, in 1700. Within a few years after his settlement at Ceres, his health began to fail; and at length, his indisposition so much increased, that with great difficulty he went through the labors incident to so large a parish. In April, 1710, he was appointed, by patent from queen Anne, professor of divinity in the new college of St. Andrews, through the mediation of the synod of Fife, and delivered his inaugural oration in confutation of an atheistical pamphlet, entitled, "Epistola Archimedis ad Regem Gelonem." In April, 1711, he was seized with a dangerous pleurisy. This disease was removed, but he never fully recovered his former strength; and, on the 23d of September, 1712, he departed triumphantly to his eternal rest.

His last words are among the richest treasures which piety ever bequeathed to the church; and the letters which he dictated on his dying bed, are specimens of his unparalleled devotion and concern for the welfare of others. He was singularly fitted for the schools: he spoke elegant Latin with fluency: he was well skilled in the Greek, but his sickness prevented the execution of his design to learn the Oriental languages. Few lives have been more useful and distinguished by genuine piety; his death was a loss to Scotland, and the world at large. His works, in addition to those already mentioned, consist of— "The Great Concern of Salvation; in three parts, viz.—A Discovery of Man's Natural State; or, the Guilty Sinner Convicted: Man's Recovery by Faith in Christ; or, the Convinced Sinner's Case and Cure: The Christian's Duty, with respect to both Personal and Family Religion." "The Nature of Faith," in answer to Mr. Locke; Glasgow, octavo, 1770. Ten Sermons, preached before and after the celebration of the Sacrament of the Lord's supper: to which are added, Two Sermons, preached upon occasion of the Death of a Friend. To these discourses is prefixed an excellent preface by Dr. Watts, highly expressive both of their own worth, and of their author's. See the invaluable Memoir of Haliburton.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

HAM, or CHAM, son of Noah, and brother to Shem and Japheth, is believed to have been Noah's youngest son. Ham, says Dr. Hales, signifies burnt or black, and this name was peculiarly significant of the regions allotted to his family. To the Cushites, or children of his eldest son, Cush, were allotted the hot southern regions of Asia, along the coasts of the Persian Gulf, Susiana, or Chusistan, Arabia, &c.; to the sons of Canaan, Palestine and Syria; to the sons of Misraim, Egypt, and Libya, in Africa. The Hamites in general, like the Canaanites of old, were a sea-faring race, and sooner arrived at civilization and the luxuries of life, than their simpler pastoral and agricultural brethren of the other two families. The first great empires of Assyria and Egypt were founded by them; and the republics of Tyre, Sidon, and Carthage, were early distinguished for their commerce: but they sooner also fell to decay; and Egypt, which was one of the first, became the last and "basest of the kingdoms." (Ezek. 29: 15.) and has been successively in subjection to the Shemites, and Japhethites; as have also the settlements of the other branches of the Hamites. (See CANAAN, and DIVISION OF MANKIND.)—Watson.

HAMAN, son of Hammedatha the Amalekite, of the race of Agag; or, according to other copies, of Hamadath the Bugean; or Gogean; that is, of the race of Gog, or it may be read, Haman the son of Hamadath, which Haman was Bagua or Bagoas, eunuch, or officer, to the king of Persia. We have no proof of Haman's being an Amalekite; but Esther 3: 1, reads, of the race of Agag. In the apocryphal Greek, (ch. 9: 24.) and the Latin, (ch. 16: 6.) he is called a Macedonian. See the particulars of his monitory history in the book of Esther.

There is something so entirely different from the customs of European civilization, in Haman's proposed destruction of the Jewish people, (Esther ch. 3.) that the mind of the reader, when perusing it, is alarmed. And, indeed, it seems barely credible that a king should endure a massacre of so great a proportion of his subjects—a whole nation cut off at a stroke! However, that such a proposal might be made, is attested by a similar proposal made in later times, which narrowly escaped witnessing a catastrophe of the same nature. M. De Peyssonnel, in delineating the character of the celebrated Hassan Pacha, (who, in the war of 1770, between Russia and Turkey, became eminent as a seaman,) says of him, "He preserved the Greeks, when it was deliberated in the council [of the Grand Seignior] to EXTERMINATE THEM ENTIRELY, as a punishment for their defection, (i. e. of some of them,) and to prevent their future rebellion: he obtained for them a general amnesty, which he took care should be faithfully observed." This account has subsequently been confirmed by Mr. Elton, of Smyrna.—Calmet.

HAMATH; a celebrated city of Syria, which Calmet supposes to be Emesa on the Orontes. "The entering in of Hamath," is a narrow pass leading from Canaan to Syria, through the valley between Libanus and Antilibanus; and is placed as the northern boundary of Canaan, Judg. 3: 3. 1 Kings 8: 65. 2 Kings 14: 25. 2 Chron. 7: 8.—Calmet.

HAMET, (SECT OF;) the followers of one Hamet, supposed to be the same with Mahady, the head of a modern sect of Musselmans, (A. D. 1792.) who reject the ancient doctrine of the caliphs. See Mahady. Morse's Geog. vol. ii. Boston ed. 1796; Grégoire's Hist. tom. ii. p. 424.—Williams.

HAMILTON, (PATRICK,) the first Scotch reformer. He was of royal descent, a circumstance valuable as it drew more attention to his doctrine, life, and sufferings. He was naturally of an amiable disposition, and being well educated, was very early made abbot of Ferme. At the age of twenty-three, he visited the continent, and at Wittenberg met Luther and Melancthon, from whom he received instruction in the doctrine of the gospel. Returning to Scotland, he began to impart the knowledge of true religion to his countrymen. His fervor and boldness in opposing the corruptions of popery alarming the clergy, he was summoned before the archbishop of St. Andrews, in Feb. 1527, condemned, and delivered over to the secular power to be burnt. It was hoped he would be induced to recant, but all endeavors proved unavailing to shake the faith and firmness of the youthful martyr.

At the place of execution he gave his servant his garments, saying, "These are the last things you can receive of me, nor have I any thing now to leave you but the example of my death, which I pray you to bear in mind: for though it be bitter to the flesh, and fearful before men, yet it is the entrance into eternal life, which none shall inherit who deny Jesus Christ, before this wicked generation." The fire burning slowly, his sufferings were long and dreadful, but his patience and piety were only more fully displayed thereby; inasmuch that many were led to inquire into his principles, and to abjure the errors of popery. "The smoke of Mr. Patrick Hamilton," said a papist, "infected as many as it blew upon." His writings called "Patrick's Places," have been esteemed by many, an admirable and invaluable performance.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 59.

HAMILTON, (GEN. ALEXANDER,) first Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, born in the island of Nevis in 1757. At the age of sixteen, he accompanied his mother to New York, and entered a student of Columbia college, in which he continued about three years. While a member of this institution the first buddings of his intellect gave presages of his future eminence.

His brilliant military and civil career, with its melancholy close, is well known. He died in 1804, from a mortal wound received in a duel with colonel Burr.

With all his pre-eminence of talents, he is yet a melancholy proof of the influence which intercourse with a depraved world has in perverting the judgment. In principle he was opposed to duelling, his conscience was not hardened, and he was not indifferent to the happiness of his wife and children; but in an evil hour he yielded to public prejudice. His own views of usefulness were followed, in contrariety to the injunctions of his Maker and Judge. When afterwards, in conversation with the Rev. Dr. Mason, his sin was intimated to him, he assented with strong emotion. And when the Redeemer was exhibited as the only propitiation for sin, he said with emphasis, "I have a tender reliance on the mercy of the Almighty, through the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ." He had been for some time convinced of the truth of Christianity, and it was his intention, if his life had been spared, to have written a work upon its evidences.

His writings were collected and published in three vols. 1810. Mason's Orat. on his Death; Not's Discourse; Morris' Fun. Orator; Otis' Eulogy; Ames' Sketch; Marshall, p. 131, 350—360, 607—611.—Allen.

HAMILTON, (ELISABETH,) a female of great talents and acquisitions, was born, in 1758, at Belfast, was brought up by an uncle who resided near Stirling, in Scotland; acquired reputation by her productions, and affection and respect by her disposition and character; and died unmarried, at Harrowgate, July 23, 1846. Among her works are, Letters of a Hindoo Rajah; Memoirs of Modern Philosophers (a satire on modern philosophy;) The Life of Agrippina; The Cottagers of Glenburnie; Popular Essays; Letters on the Elementary Principles of Education; and Letters on the Formation of the Religious and Moral Principle.—Davenport.

HAMLIN, (PHILIP;) a French martyr of the sixteenth century. He had been a Romish priest, but on renouncing the errors of popery, was apprehended, and condemned to the stake. He began there earnestly to exhort the people, when the officer commanded the fagots to be immediately lighted, and a trumpet blown while he was burning, that none might be converted by his dying voice.—Fox, p. 117.

HAMMER. God's word is like a hammer; with it he breaks our hearts, Jer. 23: 29. Babylon was the hammer of the whole earth; the Chaldean armies broke in pieces and subdued a multitude of nations, Jer. 1: 23. Neh. 1: 1.—Brown.

HAMMOND, (HENRY, D. D.,) a learned and eloquent divine of the seventeenth century, was born the 18th of August, 1605, at Chertsey, in Surrey. His parents intending him for the church, he was sent at an early age to Eton, whence he removed to Magdalen college, Oxford, and became a fellow of that society in 1625. In 1633, the then earl of Leicester presented him to the rectory of Penshurst, Kent, where he resided till 1643, having graduated as doctor of divinity in the interval. During the revolution he suffered much for his attachment to the royalist cause. In 1660, he was called in to assist in restoring the church establishment, and was nominated by Charles II. to the bishopric of Worcester, but died before his consecration, the same year. Besides his "Practical Catechism," he was the author of a paraphrase of the New Testament, with notes, and had finished the book of Psalms, with a view to the publication of a similar illustration of the Old Testament, when death hindered the completion of his design. His works were collected after his decease, and printed in four folio volumes, in 1684.

Dr. Hammond was in personal appearance very handsome, well made, and of a strong and vigorous constitution; of a clear and florid complexion, his eye remarkably quick and sprightly, and in his countenance there was a mixture of sweetness and dignity. He possessed uncommon abilities, and his learning was great and extensive. His eloquence was free, graceful, and commanding. His piety was great and fervent, and much of his time was spent in secret devotion. Bishop Burnet says that his death was an unspeakable loss to the church. See Fell's Life of Dr. Hammond.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

HAMONAH; a city where Ezekiel (39: 16.) foretold the burial of Gog and his people would be. We know not any town of this name in Palestine. Hamonah signifies multitude; and the prophet intended to show, that the slaughter of Gog's people would be so great, that the place of their burial might be called Multitude.—Calmet.

HANANI; the father of the prophet Jehu, 1 Kings 16: 7. Also a prophet who came to Asa, king of Judah, and said, "Because thou hast put thy trust in the king of Syria, and not in the Lord, the army of the king of Syria is escaped out of thine hands," 2 Chron. 16: 7. We know not on what occasion the prophet spake thus; but Asa ordered him to be seized and imprisoned. Some suppose him to have been father to the prophet Jehu; but this does not appear from Scripture. Jehu prophesied in Israel: Hanani in Judah. Jehu was put to death by Baasha, king of Israel, who died A. M. 3075; but Hanani reproved Asa, king of Judah, who reigned from A. M. 3049 to 3090.—Calmet.

HANANIAH; one of the three young men of the tribe of Judah and of the royal family, who, being carried captive to Babylon, were selected for instruction in the sciences of the Chaldeans, and to wait in Nebuchadnezzar's palace. His name was changed to Shadrach; and he became celebrated for his refusal to worship the golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 1: 11. 3: 4. (See ΑΒΔΑΝΕΟ.) Also a false prophet of Gibeon, who coming to Jerusalem in the fourth year of Zedekiah, king of Judah, (A. M. 3409,) foretold to Jeremiah and all the people, that within two years all the vessels of the Lord's house that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, had carried to Babylon, would be restored, Jer. 28.—Calmet.

HANBALLITES; a sect of Mussulmen, so called from their leader, Abu Hanbal, (about 323,) who pretended Mahomet was seated on the throne of God, which was generally considered as impious. He, however, contrived to raise a party, which occasioned an insurrection; in which several thousand lives were sacrificed. D'Herbelot's Bib. Orient. cited by Broughton.—Williams.

HANCOCK, (THOMAS,) a benefactor of Harvard college, was the son of Mr. Hancock, of Lexington, and died in Boston, August 1, 1764. Although his nephew, governor Hancock, inherited most of his property, yet he bequeathed one thousand pounds sterling for founding a professorship of the Hebrew and other Oriental languages in Harvard college; one thousand pounds to the society for propagating the gospel among the Indians in North America; and six hundred pounds to the town of Boston, towards erecting a hospital for the reception of such persons as are deprived of their reason. Ann. Reg. for 1764, 116; Holmes.—Allen.

'HAND. To kiss one's hand, is an act of adoration, 1 Kings 19: 18. "If I beheld the sun when it shined, and my mouth hath kissed my hand," Job 31: 27. To lift up one's hand, is a way of taking an oath which has been in use among all nations. To give one's hand, signifies to grant peace, to swear friendship, to promise entire security, to make alliance, 2 Kings 10: 15. The Jews say they were obliged to give the hand to the Egyptians and Assyrians, that they might procure bread; (2 Macc. 13: 22.) that is, to surrender to them, to submit.

To stretch out one's hand, signifies to chastise, to exercise severity or justice, Ezek. 25: 7. God delivered his people with a high hand, and arm stretched out; by performing many wonders, and inflicting many chastisements, on the Egyptians. To stretch out one's hand, sometimes denotes beseeching mercy:—"I have spread out my hands," entreated, "all the day unto a rebellious people," Isa. 65: 2.

To seat one on the right hand, is a token of high favor, Ps. 16: 11. 77: 10. The Son of God is often represented as sitting at the right hand of his heavenly Father:—"The Lord said to my Lord, sit thou at my right hand;" (Ps. 110: 1.) thou hast done thy work upon earth, now take possession of that sovereign kingdom and glory which by right belongeth unto thee; do thou rule with authority and honor, as thou art Mediator.

The accuser was commonly at the right hand of the accused:—"Let Satan stand at his right hand," Ps. 109: 6. And in Zech. 3: 1, Satan was at the right hand of the high-priest Joshua, to accuse him. Often, in a contrary sense, to be at one's right hand signifies to defend, to protect, to support him:—"I have set the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved," Ps. 16: 8.

Our Savior, in Matt. 6: 3, to show with what privacy we should do good works, says that our left hand should not know what our right hand does. Above all things, we should avoid vanity and ostentation in all the good we undertake to do, and should not think that thereby we merit any thing.

Laying on hands, or imposition of hands, is understood in different ways both in the Old and New Testament. It is often taken for ordination and consecration of priests and ministers, as well among the Jews as Christians, Num. 8: 10. Acts 6: 6. 13: 3. 1 Tim. 4: 14. Thus, when Moses constituted Joshua his successor, God appointed him to lay his hands upon him, Num. 27: 18. Jacob laid his hands on Ephraim and Manasseh, when he gave them his last blessing, Gen. 48: 14. The high-priest stretched out his hands to the people, as often as he recited the solemn form of blessing, Lev. 9: 22. The Israelites who presented sin-offerings at the tabernacle, confessed their sins while they laid their hands upon them, Lev. 1: 4. This testified that the person acknowledged himself worthy of death, that he laid his sins upon the sacrifice, that he trusted in Christ for the expiation of his sins, and that he devoted himself to God. Witnesses laid their hands upon the head of the accused person, as it were to signify that they charged upon him the guilt of his blood, and freed themselves from it, Deut. 13: 9. 17: 7. Our Savior laid his hands upon the children that were presented to him, and blessed them, Mark 10: 16. And the Holy Ghost was conferred on those who were baptized by the laying on of the hands of the apostles, Acts 8: 17. 19: 6.—Watson.

HANDBREADTH; a measure of about four inches. Our days are as a handbreadth; they are very short, and their shortness ought to be ever before us, Ps. 39: 5.—Brown.

HANDWRITING. The ceremonial law is called a handwriting against us; its rites witnessed our guilt and desert of death, and it was a means of shutting out the Gentiles from the church of God, Col. 2: 14.—Brown.

HANNAH, wife of Elkanah, of Levi, and the excellent mother of Samuel. She dwelt at Ramath, or Ramathaim, in Ephraim, 1 Sam. 1: 2.—Calmet.

HANUN, son of Nabash, king of the Ammonites, is known for his ruinous insult to David's ambassadors, sent to compliment him after his father's death, 2 Sam. 10. 1 Chron. 19.—Calmet.

HANWAY, (JONAS,) a Christian philanthropist, was born 1712, at Portsmouth Eng.; was engaged in mercantile pursuits as a Russian merchant, in the course of which he visited Persia; and died in 1786. Hanway was a man of great, active humanity. He was the chief founder of the Marine society and the Magdalen hospital; and contributed to the establishment of Sunday schools, and to the improvement of the condition of climbing boys. Besides his Travels in Persia, he published many other works, faulty in style, but benevolent in purpose.—Davenport.

HAPPINESS, absolutely taken, denotes the durable possession of perfect good, without any mixture of evil; or the enjoyment of pure pleasure unalloyed with pain, or a state in which all our wishes are satisfied; in which senses, happiness is only known by name on this earth. The word happy, when applied to any state or condition of human life, will admit of no positive definition, but is merely a relative term; that is, when we call a man happy, we mean that he is happier than some others with whom we compare him; than the generality of others; or than he himself was in some other situation.

Moralists justly observe, that happiness does not consist in the pleasures of sense or imagination; as eating, drinking, music, painting, theatrical exhibitions, &c. &c.; for these pleasures continue but a little while, by repetition lose their relish, and by high expectation often bring disappointment. Nor does happiness consist in an exemption from labor, care, business, &c.; such a state being usually attended with depression of spirits, imaginary anxieties, and the whole train of hypochondriacal affections. Nor is it to be found in greatness, rank, or elevated stations, as matter of fact abundantly testifies; but happiness consists in the exercise of the dispositions, and the enjoyment of the blessings, pointed out by our Lord in his sermon on the mount, Matt. ch. 5-7. Rom. 5: 1-10. In subordination to these, human happiness may be greatly promoted by the exercise of the social affections; and the pursuit of some engaging end, the prudent constitution of the habits, and the enjoyment of our health. Fuller's Works, vol. i. 263; Maclaurin's Sermons and Essays; Foster's Essays; Tillotson's Sermons; Bolton and Lucas on Happiness; Henry's Pleasurateness of a Religious Life; *Grove and Paley's Mor. IIARA; a city or district of Media, to which the Israelites of the ten tribes were transplanted by Tiglath-Pileser, 1 Chron. 5: 26.—Calmet.

HARADAH; a camp station of Israel, Numb. 33: 24. (See EXODUS.) From its vicinity to Egypt, the place of bustle, or hasty removal.—Calmet.

HARAN; the eldest son of Terah, and brother to Abraham and Nahor. He was the father of Lot, Milcah, and Ischah, Gen. 11: 26, &c. Haran died before his father Terah.

2. HARAN, otherwise called Charan, in Mesopotamia; a city celebrated for having been the place to which Abraham removed first, after he left Ur, (Gen. 11: 31, 32.) and where Terah was buried. Thither it was likewise that Jacob repaired to Laban, when he fled from Esau, Gen. 27: 43. 28: 10, &c. Haran was situated in the north-western part of Mesopotamia, on a river of the same name, running into the Euphrates. Mr. Kinneir says, that Haran, which is still so called, or rather Harran, is now peopled by a few families of wandering Arabs, who have been led thither by a plentiful supply of good water from several small streams. It is situated in thirty-six degrees fifty-two minutes north latitude, and thirty-nine degrees five minutes east longitude; in a flat and sandy plain. Some think that it was built by Terah, or by Haran, his eldest son.—Watson.

HARD. "A hard heart," denotes a mind void of holy affections; "a hard forehead," determined, insolent. "I have made thy forehead hard against their foreheads;" (Ezek. 3: 8), the Israelites are hardened to insensibility, have lost all shame; but I will make you still harder, still bolder in reproving evil, than they are in committing it, Isa. 50: 7.—Calmet.

HARDNESS OF HEART. (See BLINDNESS.)

HARE, (Heb. arnabath, Arab. arneb, Lev. 11: 6. Deut. 14: 7.) This name is derived, as Bochart and others suppose, from areh, to crop, and nib, the produce of the ground; these animals being remarkable for devouring young plants and herbage. This animal resembles the rabbit, but is larger, and somewhat longer in proportion to its thickness. The hare in Syria, says Dr. Russell, is distinguished into two species, differing considerably in point of size. The largest is the Turkman hare, and chiefly haunts the plains; the other is the common hare of the desert: both are abundant. The difficulty as to this animal is, that Moses says the arnabath chews the cud; but Aristotle takes notice of the same circumstance, and affirms that the structure of its stomach is similar to that of ruminating animals. Cowper the poet also tells us that his three hares "chewed the cud all day till evening." The animal here mentioned may then be a variety of the species.—Watson.

HARLOT; literally a common prostitute; (Prov. 29: 3.) but the term most commonly occurs in Scripture metaphorically, to denote the unchaste conduct of the Israelites in mingling the worship of the true God with the impure and idolatrous rites of the heathen nations, in violation of the covenant which had been ratified between God and them, Isa. 1: 21.—Jones.

HARMER, (THOMAS,) author of the "Observations on various Passages of Scripture," was the minister of a Dissenting congregation at Watesfield, near Bury St. Edmunds, in the county of Suffolk; a station which he filled with no inconsiderable degree of reputation and honor, for more than half a century. He was much and deservedly esteemed in the literary world, not only for his eminent attainments in Oriental literature, but also for his skill in the study of antiquities. Availing himself of some manuscripts of the celebrated Sir John Chardin, who had travelled into Persia and other Eastern countries, and in which he described the customs and manners of the inhabitants of those nations, Mr. Harmer seized the idea of applying the information thus obtained to the illustration of many portions of the prophetic writings, and of the evangelists also; and with so much success, that he was considered to have poured a flood of light on several texts which, till then, had been involved in obscurity. The first volume of the "Observations" appeared in 1764; in 1776, the work again made its appearance, in two volumes, octavo; and in 1787, were published two additional volumes; a fourth edition, in four volumes, was called for in a short time afterwards; and, since the decease of the author, a fifth edition has been brought forward by the learned Adam Clarke, LL. D., in four volumes, octavo, 1816, with considerable additions and corrections, to which is prefixed a life of the author. Mr. Harmer also published "Outlines of a New Commentary on Solomon's Song," London, 1768, one volume, octavo; reprinted in 1775: and a posthumous volume has recently made its appearance, entitled, "The Miscellaneous Works of the Rev. Thomas Harmer," with an introductory memoir, by William Youngman, London, 1823, octavo. Mr. Harmer was born at Norwich, in 1715, and died in 1788, at the advanced age of seventy-three. Watts' Bib. Brit.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

HARMONISTS; certain emigrants from Wurtemberg to America, between 1803 and 1805, under Mr. George Rapp, their pastor, being compelled to leave their native country, on account of the then government insisting upon their attendance at the parish church, after some alteration had been made in the public service, which they did not approve. They formed an economy on the primitive plan of having "all things in common," Acts 4: 32. They laid out a town about a hundred and twenty miles north of Philadelphia, where they so well succeeded, that, in about 1814, they sold the whole concern, and removed to form a new establishment, on an improved plan, in Indiana, farther up the country. They profess the Protestant religion, but admit of universal toleration. They cultivate the learned languages and professions, and maintain strict morals, with a due observation of the Sabbath. One custom is peculiar. They keep watch by turns at night; and, after crying the hour, add, "A day is past, and a step made nearer our end. Our time runs away, and the joys of heaven are our reward." (See SHAKERS.) Philanthropist, No. xx.; Philanthropic Gazette, 1817, p. 340; 1818, p. 322; 1819, p. 61; Birkbeck's Travels.—Williams.

HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS; a term made use of to denote the concurrence or agreement of the writings of the four evangelists; or the history of the four evangelists, digested into one continued series. By this means each story or discourse is exhibited with all its concurrent circumstances; frequent repetitions are prevented, and a rupture of seeming oppositions reconciled. Among some of the most valuable harmonies, are those of Cradock, Le Clerc, Doddridge, Macknight, Newcome, Carpenter; Towson's able Harmony on the concluding part of the Gospels; and Thompson's Diatessaron. To the theological student Griesbach's Synopsis of the first three gospels, in Greek, with the various readings, is invaluable. An admirable harmony of both the Old and New Testament has recently been published in England, by the Rev. J. Townsend; in which every book, passage, and verse, is inserted as nearly as possible in the order of time.

The term harmony is also used in reference to the agreement which the gospel bears to natural religion, to the Old Testament, to the history of other nations, and to the works of God at large.—Hend. Buck.

HARNESSE; the furniture of a horse, to render him fit for work or war; (Jer. 46: 4.) but it is more frequently taken for a set of defensive armor, 1 Kings 22: 34. (See ARMOR.)—Brown.

HAROD; a well or fountain not far from Jezreel and mount Gilboa, so called from the apprehensions and fears of those who were here tried by Gideon, Judg. 7: 1, 3. "Palpitation" of the heart, as a symptom of alarm and terror.—Calmet.

HAROSHETH OF THE GENTILES; a city supposed to be situated near Hazor, in the northern parts of Canaan, called afterwards Upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles, for the same reason that this place probably obtained that title; namely, from being less inhabited by Jews, and being near the great resorts of the Gentiles, Tyre and Sidon. This is said to have been the residence of Sisera, the general of the armies of Jabin, king of Canaan, who reigned at Hazor.—Watson.

HARP; a stringed musical instrument. The Hebrew word kinnor, which is translated "harp" in our English version, very probably denoted all stringed instruments. By the Hebrews, the harp was called the pleasant harp; and it was employed by them, not only in their devotions, but also at their entertainments and pleasures. It is probable, that the harp was nearly the earliest, if not the earliest, instrument of music. David danced when he played on the harp; the Levites did the same. Hence it appears, that it was light and portable, and that its size was restricted within limits which admitted of that service, and of that manner of using it.—Watson.

HARRIS, (ROBERT, D. D.) president of Trinity college, Oxford, was born at Broad Campden, Gloucestershire, 1578, and educated at Oxford. There he became a subject of divine grace, and relinquishing the law, for which his father had designed him, devoted himself to theology. Receiving ordination from archbishop Bancroft, he became minister of Hanwell, where he continued forty years a laborious and successful pastor. God gave him so rich a harvest, that of Hanwell it was said there was not a family in it where God's name was not called upon, nor a person that refused to be examined and instructed for the table of the Lord. Here he remained, blessed in himself and a blessing to his people, till the civil war in 1642, when he was driven by the king's soldiers to London. Here he was appointed minister of St. Botolph, and one of the assembly of divines. In 1647, he was made president of Trinity college, Oxford, and rector of Garlington, near Oxford, which is always annexed to it. He governed his college with great prudence, and was beloved by the students as a father. Here he continued till his death, in 1658, at the age of eighty. His last days were days of great suffering and great consolation. Being asked where his comfort lay, he answered, "In Christ and in the free grace of God." One having observed that he might take much comfort in the labors of his useful life, he answered, "All is nothing without a Savior. Without him my best works would condemn me. Oh, I am ashamed of them, as they were mixed with so much sin! Oh, I am an unprofitable servant! I have not done any thing for God, as I ought. Loss of time sits heavily on my spirit. Work, work, space, assuring yourselves that nothing will more trouble you when you come to die, than that you have done no more for God, who hath done so much for you. I never in all my life saw the worth of Christ, nor tasted the sweetness of God's love in that measure that I do now." So deeply were these sentiments impressed upon his heart, that he wrote in his will, "I bequeath to all my children, and to their children's children, to each of them, a Bible with this inscription: NONE BUT CHRIST!"—Middleton, vol. iii. 379.

HARRIS, (SAMUEL,) a Baptist minister, called the Apostle of Virginia, was born of respectable parentage, in Hanover county, January 12, 1724. Removing to Pittsylvania county, he there sustained various offices, as colonel of the militia, captain of Mayo fort, and commissioner for the fort and army. He was baptized about 1758. He soon began to preach diligently, but was not ordained until 1769. In his power over the affections of his hearers he was thought to be equal to Whitfield. The Virginians say, he seemed to pour forth streams of lightning from his eyes. His worldly offices he resigned, as he ascribed to them the diminution of his religious enjoyments. In 1774, the general association of Separate Baptists, thinking to re-establish the primitive order, as mentioned Eph. 4: 11, chose Mr. Harris apostle, and ordained him by the hands of every minister in that body. No other instance of such an extraordinary appointment is recollected. His pious zeal met the usual return of persecution. He was once pulled down from his stand, as he was preaching, and dragged by the hair, and once knocked down. Having much property, he devoted the greater part to charitable purposes.

The following anecdotes may illustrate his character. Meeting a pardoned criminal, who showed him his pardon received at the gallows, he asked, "Have you shown it to Jesus Christ?" "No, Mr. Harris, I want you to do it for me." Accordingly the good man dismounted and kneeled, and, with the pardon in one hand and the other on the offender's head, rendered thanks and prayed for God's pardon.—He once requested a debtor to pay him in wheat, as he had a good crop; but the man replied, that he did not intend to pay until he was sued. Unwilling to leave preaching to attend a vexatious suit, he wrote a receipt in full and presented it to the man, saying, he had sued him in the court of heaven; he should leave the affair with the Head of the church, with whom he might settle another day. The man soon loaded his wagon and sent him the wheat. Benedict, ii. 40—58, 330—339.—Allen.

HARRISON, (JOHN, A. M. ;) pastor of a congregation at Weathersfield, Essex, (Eng.) who died in 1749. He was educated at the university of Glasgow, and his fine talents, sanctified by divine grace, well rewarded cultivation. As a minister he shone with peculiar lustre, preaching his sermons to himself in private before he delivered them in public to others. The week before he was seized with his last sickness he had spent in visiting his people, and found, to his unspeakable joy, that upwards of twenty had of late been savingly wrought upon by his ministry. This powerfully affected him with humble, admiring gratitude and joy. He was favored in his last days with great spiritual happiness. Among other things he said, "Oh, I never saw so much as I do now! Oh the astonishing, the inconceivable glory of the other world! What discoveries have I had of it this day. I long, I long to be there! I must have an eternity of praise! Oh the unspeakable, the substantial joys I feel! I know that my Redeemer liveth! This is glory begun! I am filled with God! My life is hid with Christ in God." He particularly mentioned how much Dr. Owen's work on the Person of Christ had been blessed to him, especially the last chapter concerning the exercise of the mediatory office of Christ in heaven, and the state of the worship there.—Middleton, vol. iv. 277.

HART, (ail, Dent. 12: 15. 14: 5. Ps. 42: 1. Isa. 35: 6;) the stag, or male deer. Dr. Shaw considers its name in Hebrew as a generic word, including all the species of the deer kind; whether they are distinguished by round horns, as the stag; or by flat ones, as the fallow deer; or by the smallness of the branches, as the roe. Mr. Good observes that the hind and roe, the hart and the antelope, were held, and still continue to be, in the highest estimation in all the Eastern countries, for the voluptuous beauty of their eyes, the delicate elegance of their form, or their graceful agility of action. The names of these animals were perpetually applied, therefore, to persons, whether male or female, who were supposed to be possessed of any of their respective qualities. In 2 Sam. 1: 19, Saul is denominated "the roe of Israel;" and in the eighteenth verse of the ensuing chapter, we are told that "Asahel was as light of foot as a wild roe;" a phraseology perfectly synonymous with the epithet swift-footed, which Homer has so frequently bestowed upon his hero Achilles. Thus again: "Her princes are like harts which find no pasture; they are fled without strength before their pursuers," Lam. 1: 6. "The Lord Jehovah is my strength; he will make my feet like hinds' feet; he will cause me to tread again on my own hills," Hab. 3: 19. (See HIND.)—Watson.

HART, (OLIVER, M. A. ;) an eminent minister of Charleston, South Carolina. He was born in 1723, at Warrminster, Pennsylvania; baptized in 1740, on profession of his faith; and ordained to the gospel ministry in 1749. The same year, he succeeded Mr. Chanler at Charleston, as pastor of the Baptist church, where he labored honorably and successfully for thirty years. Many owned him as a spiritual father, among whom was the late Rev. Dr. Stillman, of Boston. Mr. Hart was a self-educated man. His countenance was open and manly; his voice clear, harmonious, and commanding; the powers of his mind were strong and capacious, enriched by a fund of useful knowledge, classical, scientific, and theological; and his taste was elegant and refined. He wrote much devotional poetry. But as a Christian and a pastor he was most conspicuous. He walked with God. The doctrines of free and efficacious grace were precious to him. His desire of usefulness was ardent and incessant. He was a prime mover in forming an Association of the churches. He also originated a society for educating young ministers of the gospel to enlarged usefulness.

In 1775, he was chosen by the council of safety to travel, in conjunction with Rev. William Tennent and Hon. William H. Drayton, in the interior, to conciliate the inhabitants of South Carolina to the measures of congress. In consequence of his successful efforts in this way, he was obliged to leave Charleston, in 1780, to avoid falling into the hands of the British.

He settled at Hopewell, New Jersey, the same year, where he remained till his death, in 1795, at the age of seventy-two. He died in the triumph of faith, exclaiming, "Enough, enough!"—Benedict, vol. ii. 323.

HART, (LEVI, D. D. ;) minister of Preston, Connecticut, was graduated at Yale college, in 1760, and died, October 27, 1808, aged sixty-nine. Receiving from the gift of God a sound and vigorous mind, it was much improved by his scientific and literary acquisitions. Many young men were trained up by him for the ministry. He engaged zealously in the support of missionary institutions, and the progress of the gospel was the theme of his correspondence with a number of respectable friends of religion in Europe. He published several sermons. Panop. and Miss. Mag. i. 287, 288.—Allen.

HARVARD, (JOHN ;) the founder of Harvard college. He had been a minister in England; and after his arrival in this country, he preached a short time in Charlestown, where he died, in 1638. He left a legacy of seven hundred and seventy-nine pounds to the school at Newton, or Cambridge, afterwards the college called by his name. Precisely one hundred and ninety years after his death, a granite monument was erected to his memory, September 26, 1828, on the top of the burying-hill in Charlestown. Magnalia, iv. 126; Everett's Address; Hist. Coll. i. 242; Neal, i. 199; Holmes, i. 247; Hutchinson, i. 90.—Allen.

HARVEST. Three months intervened between the seed-time and the first reaping, and a month between this and the full harvest. Barley is in full ear all over the Holy Land, in the beginning of April; and about the middle of the same month, it begins to turn yellow, particularly in the southern district; being as forward near Jericho in the latter end of March, as it is in the plains of Acre a fortnight afterwards. The reaping continues till the middle of Sivan, or till about the end of May or beginning of June, which, as the time of wheat-harvest, finishes this part of the husbandman's labors.

2. The reapers in Palestine and Syria make use of the sickle in cutting down their crops, and, according to the present custom in this country, "fill their hand" with the corn, and those who bind up the sheaves, their "bosom," Ps. 129: 7. Ruth 2: 5. When the crop is thin and short, which is generally the case in light soils, and with their imperfect cultivation, it is not reaped with the sickle, but plucked up by the root with the hand. By this mode of reaping, they leave the most fruitful fields as naked as if nothing had ever grown on them; and as no hay is made in the East, this is done, that they may not lose any of the straw, which is necessary for the sustenance of their cattle. The practice of plucking up with the hand is perhaps referred to in Ps. 129: 7. The tops of the houses in Judea are flat, and being covered with plaster of terrace, are frequently grown over with grass. As it is but small and weak, and from its elevation exposed to the scorching sun, it is soon withered. A more beautiful and striking figure, to display the weak and evanescent condition of wicked men, cannot easily be conceived.

3. The reapers go to the field very early in the morning, and return home betimes in the afternoon. They carry provisions along with them, and leathern bottles, or dried bottle gourds, filled with water. They are followed by their own children, or by others, who glean with much success; for a great quantity of corn is scattered in the reaping, and in their manner of carrying it. The greater part of these circumstances are discernible in the manners of the ancient Israelites. Ruth had not proposed to Naomi, her mother-in-law, to go to the field, and glean after the reapers; nor had the servant of Boaz, to whom she applied for leave, so readily granted her request, if gleaning had not been a common practice in that country. When Boaz inquired who she was, his overseer, after informing him, observes, that she came out to the field in the morning; and that the reapers left the field early in the afternoon, as Dr. Russell states, is evident from this circumstance, that Ruth had time to beat out her gleanings before evening. They carried water and provisions with them; for Boaz invited her to come and drink of the water which the young men had drawn; and at meal-time, to eat of the bread, and dip her morsel in the vinegar. And so great was the simplicity of manners in that part of the world, and in those times, that Boaz himself, although a prince of high rank in Judah, sat down to dinner in the field with his reapers, and helped Ruth with his own hand. Nor ought we to pass over in silence the mutual salutation of Boaz and his reapers, when he came to the field, as it strongly marks the state of religious feeling in Israel at the time, and furnishes another proof of the artless, the happy, and unsuspecting simplicity, which characterized the manners of that highly favored people. "And, behold, Boaz came from Bethlehem, and said unto the reapers, The Lord be with you. And they answered him, The Lord bless thee," Ruth 2: 4.

It appears from the beautiful history of Ruth, that, in Palestine, the women lent their assistance in cutting down and gathering the harvest; for Boaz commands her to keep fast by his maidens. The women in Syria shared also in the labors of the harvest; for Dr. Russell informs us, they sang the zirabeet, or song of thanks, when the passing stranger accepted their present of a handful of corn, and made a suitable return. It was another custom among the Jews to set a confidential servant over the reapers, to see that they executed their work properly, that they had suitable provisions, and to pay them their wages: the Chaldees call him rab, the master, ruler, or governor of the reapers. Such was the person who directed the labors of the reapers in the field of Boaz. The right of the poor in Israel to glean after the reapers was secured by a positive law, couched in these words: "And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy land; neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy harvest. And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard: thou shalt leave them to the poor and the stranger: I am the Lord your God," Lev. 19: 9. It is the opinion of some writers, that, although the poor were allowed the liberty of gleaning, the Israelitish proprietors were not obliged to admit them immediately into the field, as soon as the reapers had cut down the corn, and bound it up in sheaves, but when it was carried off: they might choose, also, among the poor, whom they thought most deserving, or most necessitous. These opinions receive some countenance from the request which Ruth presented to the servant of Boaz, to permit her to glean "among the sheaves;" and from the charge of Boaz to his young men, "Let her glean even among the sheaves;" a mode of speaking which seems to insinuate, that though they could not legally hinder Ruth from gleaning in the field, they had a right, if they chose to exercise it, to prohibit her from gleaning among the sheaves, or immediately after the reapers.—Watson.

HASSIDEANS, or ASSIDEANS; those Jews who resorted to Mattathias, to fight for the laws of God and the liberties of their country. They were men of great valor and zeal, having voluntarily devoted themselves to a more strict observation of the law than other men. For, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, there were two sorts of men in their church—those who contented themselves with that obedience only which was prescribed by the law of Moses, and who were called Zadikim, i. e. the righteous; and those who, over and above the laws, superadded the constitutions and traditions of the elders, and other rigorous observances: these latter were called the Sadducees, i. e. the pious. From the former sprang the Sadducees and Caraites: from the latter, the Pharisees and Essenes, which see.—Hend. Buck.

HASTE; HASTEN. To hasten righteousness is to execute judgment and justice with all proper speed, Isa. 16: 5. To hasten to the coming of the day of God, is earnestly to long after and prepare for the last judgment, 2 Pet. 3: 12.—Brown.

HASTINGS, (Lady ELISABETH), was born on the 19th of April, in the year 1682. She was the daughter of Theophilus, earl of Huntingdon. In her early years she evinced much prudence, united to a sound judgment, good temper, and an excellent understanding. But in lady Hastings these were not the only gems: she shone with a more resplendent lustre; and her heart was as excellent and as dignified, as her person was lovely. It had early been impressed with the great importance of religion; and through life she discovered, that true religion imparted solid pleasures, and, at death, yielded the most lasting and sweetest comforts.

To piety she united a great mind, and considered that learning, when blended with piety, was profitable and desirable. At the age of twenty-seven, she was noticed by Congreve, in the Tatler, under the name of the divine Aspasia, who remarked, that "her countenance was the lively picture of her mind, which was the seat of honor, truth, compassion, knowledge, and innocence." Lady Hastings chose for her companions the wise and the good; she sought not the adulation of the giddy and frivolous, but despised that praise which to her appeared censure in disguise.

She wrote much and well; but such was her modesty, that she would not consent to publish many of her valuable productions, though some were suffered to be communicated to the world. She began every day with supplications and praises to God the most ardent and sincere; and by such exercises she was rendered more fit for the occupations and trials of her life. She much delighted in public worship, which she very constantly attended; to the poor she was compassionate and kind, visiting them herself, and relieving every object that came within her search. Her ladyship's never-failing rule was, "to give the first place to justice, the second to charity, and the third to generosity." The last was exemplified in her ladyship in no ordinary degree. Five hundred pounds a year she gave to one relative, three thousand pounds she presented to another relative; and to a young friend, who had very much impaired her fortune by engaging in the South sea scheme, she gave three hundred guineas. But her life, though useful, at length drew to a close: disease commenced, "and she indeed learned that through much tribulation the people of God are to enter his kingdom." She annexed a codicil to her will, containing the devise of her manor of Wheldale to the provost and scholars of Queen's college, Oxford, for the education of students for the ministry; and, indeed, her whole fortune was dedicated to the cause of truth and religion. She died December 22, 1739, aged fifty-seven years.—Jows' Chris. Biog.

HATE. To hate is not always to be understood rigorously, but frequently signifies merely a less degree of love. "If a man have two wives, one beloved and another hated;" (Deut. 24: 15.) that is, less beloved. Our Savior says that he who would follow him must hate father and mother; that is, he must love them less than Christ, less than his own salvation, and not prefer them to God. "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated;" that is, have deprived of the privileges of his primogeniture, through his own profaneness; and visited him with severe judgment on account of his sins.—Watson.

HATRED, is the aversion of the will to any object considered by us as evil, or to any person or thing we suppose can do us harm. (See ANTI-PATHY.) Hatred is ascribed to God, but it is not to be considered as a passion in him as in man; nor can he hate any of the creatures he has made, as his creatures. Yet he is said to hate the wicked, (Ps. 5.) and indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, will be upon every soul of man that does evil, Rom. 2: 9. (See WRATH OF GOD).—Hend. Buck.

HATTEMISTS; in ecclesiastical history, the name of a modern Dutch sect; so called from Pontian Van Hattem, a minister in the province of Zeeland, towards the close of the last century, who, being addicted to the sentiments of Spinoza, was on that account degraded from his pastoral office. The Verschorists and Hattemists resemble each other in their religious systems, though they never so entirely agreed as to form one communion. The founders of these sects deduced from the doctrine of absolute decrees a system of fatal and uncontrollable necessity; they denied the difference between moral good and evil, and the corruption of human nature; from whence they further concluded, that mankind were under no sort of obligation to correct their manners, to improve their minds, or to obey the divine laws; that the whole of religion consisted not in acting, but in suffering; and that all the precepts of Jesus Christ are reducible to this one,—that we bear with cheerfulness and patience the events that happen to us through the divine will, and make it our constant and only study to maintain a perfect tranquillity of mind. Thus far they agreed: but the Hattemists further affirmed, that Christ made no expiation for the sins of men by his death; but had only suggested to us, by his mediation, that there was nothing in us that could offend the Deity: this, they say, was Christ's manner of justifying his servants, and presenting them blameless before the tribunal of God. It was one of their distinguishing tenets, that God does not punish men for their sins, but by their sins. These two sects, says Mosheim, still subsist, though they no longer bear the names of their founders.—Hend. Buck.

HAURAN. The tract of country of this name is mentioned only twice in Scripture, Ezek. 47: 16, 18. It was probably of small extent in the time of the Jews; but was enlarged under the Romans, by whom it was called Auranitis. At present it extends from about twenty miles south of Damascus to a little below Bozra, including the rocky district of El Ledja, the ancient Trachonitis, and the mountainous one of the Djebel Haouran. Within its limits are also included, besides Trachonitis, Iturea or Itur, now called Dejedour, and part of Batanea or Bashan. It is represented by Burckhardt as a volcanic region, consisting of a porous tufa, pumice, and basalt, with the remains of a crater on the Tel Shoba, on its eastern side. It produces, however, crops of corn, and has many patches of luxuriant herbage, which are frequented in the summer by the Arab tribes for pasturage. It abounds, also, with many interesting remains of cities, scattered over its surface, with Grecian inscriptions. The chief of these are Bozra, Ezra, Medjel, Shoba, Shakka, Souerla, Kanouat, Hebran, Zarle, Oerman, and Aatyl; with Messema, Berak, and Om Ezzitoun, in the Ledja.—Watson.

HAVEN, (NATHANIEL APPLETON,) was born January 14, 1790; graduated at Harvard college in 1807; and settled as a lawyer at Portsmouth, where he died of the scarlet fever, June 3, 1826, aged thirty-six. He wrote some fine poetry, and many valuable articles for the Portsmouth Journal, which he edited from 1821 to 1825. He wrote also for the North American Review: He was a member of the Rev. Dr. Parker's church, in Portsmouth, and for six years superintended a large and flourishing Sabbath school. His Remains, with a memoir by George Ticknor, were published in 1827. N. H. Hist. Col. ii. p. 229—235.—Allen.

HAVILAH; the son of Cush, Gen. 10: 7. There must have been other, and perhaps many, Havilahs besides the original one, a part of the numerous and wide-spread posterity of Cush. By one and the first of these, it is probable that the western shores of the Persian gulf were peopled; by another, the country of Colchis; and by another, the parts about the southern border of the Dead sea and the confines of Judea, the country afterwards inhabited by the Amalekites.—Watson.

HAVOTH-JAIR. The Hebrew and Arabic Havoth or Avoth signifies cabins, or huts, such as belong to the Arabians, and are placed in a circle; such a collection of them forming a hamlet or village. The district mentioned in Num. 32: 41. Dent. 3: 14, were in the Batanea, beyond Jordan, in the land of Gilead, and belonged to the half-tribe of Manasseh.—Calm.

HAWK, (nets;) from the root netsa, to fly, because of the rapidity and length of flight for which this bird is remarkable, Lev. 11: 16. Dent. 11: 15. Job 39: 26. Naz is used generically by the Arabian writers to signify both falcon and hawk; and the term is given in both these senses by Meninski. There can be little doubt that such is the real meaning of the Hebrew word, and that it imports various species of the falcon family, as jer-falcon, gos-hawk, and sparrow-hawk. As this is a bird of prey, cruel in its temper, and gross in its manners, it was forbidden as food, and all others of its kind, in the Mosaic ritual. The Greeks consecrated the hawk to Apollo; and among the Egyptians no animal was held in so high veneration as the ibis and the hawk. Most of the species of hawk, we are told, are birds of passage. The hawk, therefore, is produced, in Job 39: 26, as a specimen of that astonishing instinct which teaches birds of passage to know their times and seasons, when to migrate out of one country into another for the benefit of food, or a warmer climate, or both. The common translation does not give the full force of the passage.—Watson.

HAWLEY, (GIDEON,) missionary to the Indians, was a native of Connecticut, and was graduated at Yale college in 1749. He commenced his missionary labors in February, 1752, at Stockbridge. In July, 1754, Mr. Hawley was ordained at Boston, that his usefulness might be increased by being authorized to administer the ordinances of the gospel. In 1757, the commissioners of the society for propagating the gospel persuaded him to visit the tribe of Indians at Marshpee, whose pastor, Mr. Briant, had been dismissed, and who were dissatisfied with the labors of Mr. Smith. Here he was installed, April 10, 1758, and passed the remainder of his life, being occupied in this place more than half a century in benevolent exertions to enlighten the darkened mind, and to promote the salvation of his Indian brethren. He died October 3, 1807, aged eighty years.

In his last sickness he observed, "I have hope of acceptance with God, but it is founded wholly on free and sovereign grace, and not at all on my own works. It is true, my labors have been many; but they have been so very imperfect, attended with so great a want of charity and humility, that I have no hope in them as the ground of my acceptance." Panoplist, iii. 431; Hist. Col. iii. 188—193; iv. 50—67.—Allen.

HAY. (See GRASS.)

HAZAEI; a striking example of self-deception, 2 Kings 8: 7—13. He was an officer of Benhadad, king of Syria, who sent him to the prophet Elisha to inquire the issue of his sickness. Looking him steadfastly in the face, Elisha burst into tears. Surprised at this conduct, Hazael inquired the cause. "Because I know," said the prophet, "the evil that thou wilt do to the children of Israel: their strong holds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their infants against the stones, and rip up their women with child." Hazael indignantly exclaimed, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" Elisha merely answered, "The Lord hath showed me that thou shalt be king over Syria." On his return home, Hazael concealed from his master Benhadad the prophet's answer, and inspired him with hopes of recovery; but, on the following day, he took effectual means to prevent it, by stifling the king with a thick cloth dipped with cold water; and, as Benhadad had no son, and Hazael was a man much esteemed in the army, he was without difficulty declared his successor, A. M. 3120. Mr. Taylor thinks Hazael did not intend the death of his master, since similar applications are sometimes used in the East, in cases of fever. This seems an excess of charity. Hazeal soon inflicted upon Israel all the cruelties which Elisha had foretold, 2 Kings 10: 32. 12: 17, 18. 13: 22. 2 Chron. 24: 23.—Calmet; Watson.

HAZERIM, HAZEROTH, HAZOR, AZEROTHAIM, are all names which signify villages or hamlets; and are often put before the names of places. There is a town called Hazer in Arabia Petrea, in all probability the same as Hazerim, the ancient habitation of the Hivites, before they were driven away by the Caphtorim, (Deut. 2: 23.) who settled in Palestine. It seems also to be the Hazeroth, where the Hebrews encamped, Num. 11: 35. 12: 16. 33: 15.—Calmet.

HAZEON-TAMAR; a town (Gen. 14: 7.) called Engedi in Josh. 15: 62. 1 Sam. 24: 1. 2 Chron. 20: 2. Cant. 1: 14. Ezek. 47: 10.—Calmet.

HEAD. This word has several significations, besides its natural one, which denotes the head of a man.

It is taken for one that hath rule and pre-eminence over others. Thus God is the head of Christ; as Mediator, from him he derives all his dignity and authority. Christ is the only spiritual head of the church, both in respect of eminence and influence; he communicates life, motion, and strength to every believer. Also the husband is the head of his wife, because by God's ordinance he is to rule over her; (Gen. 3: 16.) also in regard to pre-eminence of sex, (1 Peter 3: 7.) and excellency of knowledge, 1 Cor. 14: 35. The apostle mentions this subordination of persons in 1 Cor. 11: 3:—"But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God." "The stone which the builders rejected was made the head of the corner," Ps. 118: 22. It was the first in the angle, whether it were disposed at the top of that angle, to adorn and crown it, or at the bottom, to support it. This, in the New Testament, is applied to Christ, who is the strength and beauty of the church, to unite the several parts of it, namely, both Jews and Gentiles, together.—Watson.

HEAP. In early times heaps of stones were erected to preserve the memory of events. (See STONES.)—Calmet.

HEAR, or HEARING. It literally denotes the exercise of that bodily sense, of which the ear is the organ; to receive information by the ear; (2 Sam. 15: 10.) and, as hearing is a sense by which instruction is conveyed to the mind, and the mind excited to attention and obedience, so the ideas of attention and obedience are grafted on the expression of sense or hearing. The caution to take heed how we hear, or what we hear, as it includes application, reception, and practice, was never more necessary than in the present day among ourselves; never was the necessity greater for appealing "to the law and to the testimony."—Calmet.

HEARING THE WORD OF GOD. is an ordinance of divine appointment, Rom. 10: 17. Prov. 8: 4. Mark 4: 24.

Public reading of the Scriptures was a part of synagogue worship, (Acts 13: 15. 15: 21.) and was the practice of the Christians in primitive times. Under the former dispensation there was a public hearing of the law at stated seasons, Deut. 31: 10, 13. Neh. 8: 2, 3. It seems, therefore, that it is a duty incumbent on us to hear, and, if sensible of our ignorance, we shall also consider it our privilege. As to the manner of hearing, it should be constantly, Prov. 8: 34. Jam. 1: 24, 25. Attentively, Luke 21: 38. Acts 10: 33. Luke 4: 20, 22. With reverence, Ps. 69: 7. With faith, Heb. 4: 2. With an endeavor to retain what we hear, Heb. 2: 1. Ps. 119: 11. With an humble, docile disposition, Luke 10: 42. With prayer, Luke 18.

HEART. The Hebrews used this word for the soul, comprehending all its feelings and faculties. Hence are derived many modes of expression. "An honest and good heart," (Luke 8: 15.) is a heart studious of holiness, being prepared by the Spirit of God to receive the word with due affections, dispositions, and resolutions. We read of an evil heart, a broken heart, a clean heart, a liberal heart. To "turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers," (Mal. 4: 6.) signifies to cause them to be perfectly reconciled, on the principles of true piety. To want heart, sometimes denotes to want wisdom and resolution:—"Ephraim is like a silly dove, without heart;" Hosea 7: 11. "O fools, and slow of heart;" (Luke 24: 25.) that is, ignorant, and reluctant to admit unwelcome truth. "This people's heart is waxed gross, lest they should understand with their heart;" (Mat. 13: 15.) their heart is through sin become incapable of understanding spiritual things; they resist the light, and are proof against all impressions of truth. "The prophets prophesy out of their own heart;" (Ezek. 13: 2.) that is, according to their own imagination, without any warrant from God. To walk in the ways of one's heart, is to prefer pleasures to God, Eccl. 11: 9.

The heart is said to be dilated by joy, contracted by sadness, broken by sorrow, to grow fat, and be hardened, by prosperity. The heart melts under discouragement, forsakes one under terror, is desolate in affliction, and fluctuating in doubt. To speak to any one's heart is to comfort him, to say pleasing and affecting things to him.

The heart of man is naturally depraved and inclined to evil, Jer. 17: 9. A divine power is requisite for its renovation, Deut. 30: 6. Jer. 31: 33. 32: 38—40. Ez. 18: 31. John 3: 1—11. When thus renewed, the effects will be seen in the temper, conversation, and conduct at large.

Hardness of heart is that state in which a sinner is inclined to, and actually goes on in rebellion against God. This state evidences itself by light views of the evil of sin; partial acknowledgment and confession of it; frequent commission of it; pride and conceit; ingratitude; unconcern about the word and ordinances of God; inattention to divine providences; stifling convictions of conscience; shunning reproof; presumption, and general ignorance of divine things. We must distinguish, however, between that hardness of heart which even a good man complains of, and that of a judicial nature. 1. Judicial hardness is very seldom perceived, and I never lamented; a broken and contrite heart is the last thing such desire; but it is otherwise with believers, for the hardness they feel is always a matter of grief to them, Rom. 7: 21. 2. Judicial hardness is perpetual; or, if ever there be any remorse or relenting, it is only at such times when the sinner is under some outward afflictions, or filled with the dread of the wrath of God; but as this wears off, or abates, his stupidity returns as much as, or more than ever; (Exod. 9: 27.) but true believers, when no adverse dispositions trouble them, are often distressed because their hearts are no more affected in holy duties, or inflamed with love to God, Rom. 7: 15. 3. Judicial hardness is attended with a total neglect of duties, especially those that are secret; but that hardness of heart which a believer complains of, though it occasions his going uncomfortably in duty, yet does not keep him from it, Job. 23: 2, 3. 4. When a person is judicially hardened, he makes use of indirect and unwarrantable methods to maintain that false peace which he thinks himself happy in the enjoyment of; but a believer, when complaining of the hardness of his heart, cannot be satisfied with any thing short of Christ, Ps. 131: 2. 5. Judicial hardness generally opposes the interest of truth and godliness; but a good man considers this as a cause nearest his heart; and although he have to lament his lukewarmness, yet he constantly desires to promote it, Ps. 72: 19. (See BLINDNESS; and HARDNESS OF HEART.)

Keeping the heart is a duty enjoined in the sacred Scriptures. It consists, says Mr. Flavel, in the diligent and constant use and improvement of all holy means and duties to preserve the soul from sin, and maintain communion with God; and this, he properly observes, supposes a previous work of sanctification, which hath set the heart right by giving it a new bent and inclination. 1. It includes frequent observation of the frame of the heart, Ps. 77: 6. 2. Deep humiliation for heart evils and disorders, 2 Chron. 32: 26. 3. Earnest supplication for heart purifying and rectifying grace, Ps. 19: 12. 4. A constant, holy jealousy over our hearts, Prov. 27: 14. 5. It includes the realizing of God's presence with us, and setting him before us, Ps. 16: 8. Gen. 17: 1.

This is, 1. The hardest work; heart work is hard work indeed. 2. Constant work, Exod. 17: 12. 3. The most important work, Prov. 23: 26.

This is a duty which should be attended to, if we consider it in connexion with, 1. The honor of God, Isa. 66: 3. 2. The sincerity of our profession, 2 Kings 10: 31. Ezek. 33: 31, 32. 3. The beauty of our conversation, Prov. 12: 26. Ps. 45: 1. 4. The comfort of our souls, 2 Cor. 13: 5. 5. The improvement of our graces, Ps. 63: 5, 6. 6. The stability of our souls in the hour of temptation, 1 Cor. 16: 13.

The seasons in which we should more particularly keep our hearts are, 1. The time of prosperity, Deut. 6: 10, 12. 2. Under afflictions, Heb. 7: 5, 6. 3. The time of Zion's troubles, Ps. 46: 1, 4. 4. In the time of great and threatening dangers, Isa. 26: 20, 21. 5. Under great wants, Phil. 4: 6, 7. 6. In the time of duty, Lev. 10: 3. 7. Under injuries received, Rom. 11: 17, &c. 8. In the critical hour of temptation, Matt. 26: 41. 9. Under dark and doubting seasons, Heb. 12: 8. Isa. 50: 10. 10. In time of opposition and suffering, 1 Pet. 4: 12, 13. 11. The time of sickness and death, Jer. 49: 11.

The means to be made use of to keep our hearts are, 1. Watchfulness, Mark 13: 37. 2. Examination, Prov. 4: 26. 3. Prayer, Luke 18: 1. 4. Reading God's word, John 5: 39. 5. Dependence on divine grace, Ps. 86: 11. HEATH, Jer. 17: 6. Taylor and Parkhurst render it, "a blasted tree stripped of its foliage." If it be a particular tree, the tamarisk is as likely as any. Celsius thinks it to be the juniper; but from the mention of it as growing in a salt land, in parched places, the author of "Scripture Illustrated" is disposed to seek it among the lichenes, a species of plants which are the last production of vegetation under the frozen zone, and under the glowing heat of equatorial deserts; so that it seems best qualified to endure parched places, and a salt land. Hasselquist mentions several kinds seen by him in Egypt, Arabia, and Syria. The Septuagint translators render it in Jer. 48: 6, onos agrios, (wild ass;) and as this seems best to agree with the flight recommended in the passage, it is to be preferred. (See Ass, Wild.)—Watson.

HEATHEN, (from heath, barren, uncultivated;) pagans who worship false gods, and are not acquainted either with the doctrines of the Old Testament or the Christian dispensation.

For many ages before Christ, the nations at large were destitute of the true religion, and gave themselves up to the grossest ignorance, the most absurd idolatry, and the greatest crimes. Even the most learned men among the heathens were in general inconsistent, and complied with, or promoted, the vain customs they found among their countrymen. It was, however, divinely foretold, that in Abraham's seed all nations should be blessed; that the heathen should be gathered to the Savior, and become his people, Gen. 22: 18. 49: 10. Ps. 2: 8. Isa. 42: 6, 7. Ps. 72: 15a. 60. In order that these promises might be accomplished, vast numbers of the Jews, after the Chaldean captivity, were left scattered among the heathen; the Old Testament was translated into Greek, the most common language of the heathen; and a rumor of the Savior's appearance in the flesh was spread far and wide among them. When Christ came, he preached chiefly in Galilee, where there were multitudes of Gentiles. He assured the Greeks that vast numbers of the heathen should be brought into the church, Matt. 4: 23. John 12: 20, 24.

For seventeen hundred years past the Jews have been generally rejected, and the church of God has been composed of the Gentiles. Upwards of four hundred and eighty millions, (nearly half the globe,) however, are supposed to be yet in pagan darkness. Considerable attempts have been made of late years for the enlightening of the heathen; and there is every reason to believe immense good has been done. From the aspect of Scripture prophecy, we are led to expect that the kingdoms of the heathen at large shall be brought to the light of the gospel, Matt. 24: 14. Isa. 60. Ps. 22: 28, 29. 2: 7, 8.

It has been much disputed whether it be possible that the heathen should be saved without the knowledge of the gospel: some have absolutely denied it, upon the authority of those texts which universally require faith in Christ; but to this it is answered, that those texts regard only those to whom the gospel comes, and are capable of understanding the contents of it. The truth, says Dr. Doddridge, seems to be this: that none of the heathens will be condemned for not believing the gospel, but they are liable to condemnation for the breach of God's natural law; nevertheless, if there be any of them in whom there is a prevailing love to the Divine Being, there seems reason to believe that, for the sake of Christ, though to them unknown, they may be accepted by God; and so much the rather, as the ancient Jews, and even the apostles, during the time of our Savior's abode on earth, seem to have had but little notion of evangelical truth, Rom. 2: 10—22. Acts 10: 34, 35. Matt. 8: 11, 12. Saurin, Mr. Grove, Dr. Watts, and Mr. Newton, favor the same opinion. Still whether there are any such where the gospel has not penetrated, must ever be a matter of uncertainty; and the language of our Lord's commission binds us to send them the gospel as the only known means of salvation, Mark 16: 16. HEAVEN; the centre and metropolis of the universe, in which the omnipresent Deity affords a nearer and more immediate view of his perfections, and a more sensible manifestation of his glory, than in the other parts of the divine kingdom, 1 Kings 8: 27. Isa. 63: 15. 66: 1. Matt. 6: 9.

The Jews enumerated three heavens: the first was the region of the air, where the birds fly, and which are therefore called "the fowls of heaven," Job 35: 11. It is in this sense also that we read of the dew of heaven, the clouds of heaven, and the wind of heaven. The second is that part of space in which are fixed the heavenly luminaries, the sun, moon, and stars, and which Moses was instructed to call "the firmament or expanse of heaven," Gen. 1: 8. The third heaven, of which the Jewish holy of holies was the interesting type, is the seat of God and of the holy angels; the place into which Christ ascended after his resurrection, and into which St. Paul was caught up, though it is not, like the other heavens, perceptible to mortal view, John 3: 12, 13. Heb. 8: 1. 9: 24.

That there is a state of future happiness, both reason and Scripture indicate; a general notion of happiness after death has obtained among the wiser sort of heathens, who have only had the light of nature to guide them. If we examine the human mind, it is also evident that there is a natural desire after happiness in all men; and, which is equally evident, is not attained in this life. It is no less observable, that in the present state there is an unequal distribution of things, which makes the providences of God very intricate, and which cannot be solved without supposing a future state. Revelation, however, puts it beyond all doubt. The Divine Being hath promised it, (1 John 2: 25. 5: 11. James 1: 12.) hath given us some intimation of its glory, (1 Pet. 3: 4, 22. Rev. 3: 4.) declares Christ hath taken possession of it for us, (John 14: 2, 3.) and informs us of some already there, both as to their bodies and souls, Gen. 5: 24. 2 Kings 2.

Heaven is to be considered as a place as well as a state; it is expressly so termed in Scripture; (John 14: 2, 3.) and the existence of the body of Christ, and those of Enoch and Elijah, is a further proof of it. For if it be not a place, where can these bodies be? and where will the bodies of the saints exist after the resurrection? Where this place is, however, cannot be determined. Suppositions are more curious than edifying, and it becomes us to be silent where divine revelation is so.

Heaven, however, we are assured, is a place of inexpressible felicity. The names given to it are proofs of this: it is called "paradise," (Luke 23: 43.) "light," (Rev. 21: 23.) "a building and mansion of God," (2 Cor. 5: 1. John 14: 2.) "a city," (Heb. 11: 10, 16.) "a better country," (Heb. 11: 16.) "an inheritance," (Acts 20: 32.) "a kingdom," (Matt. 25: 34.) "a crown," (2 Tim. 4: 8.) "glory," (Ps. 84: 11. 2 Cor. 4: 17.) "peace, rest, and joy of the Lord," (Isa. 57: 2. Heb. 4: 9. Matt. 25: 21, 23.) The felicity of Heaven will consist in freedom from all evil, both of soul and body; (Rev. 7: 17.) in the enjoyment of God as the chief good; in the company of angels and saints; in perfect holiness, and extensive knowledge, 1 Cor. 13: 10—12.

It has been disputed whether there are degrees of glory in Heaven. The arguments against degrees are, that all the people of God are loved by him with the same love, all chosen together in Christ, equally interested in the same covenant of grace, equally redeemed with the same price, and all predestinated to the same adoption of children; to suppose the contrary, it is said, is to eclipse the glory of divine grace, and carries with it the legal idea of being rewarded for our works. On the other side it is observed, that if the above reasoning would prove any thing, it would prove too much, viz. that we should all be upon an equality in the present world, as well as that which is to come; for we are now as much the objects of the same love, purchased by the same blood, &c., as we shall be hereafter. That rewards contain nothing inconsistent with the doctrine of grace, because those very works which it pleaseth God to honor are the effects of his own operation. That all rewards to a guilty creature have respect to the mediation of Christ. That God's graciously connecting blessings with the obedience of his people, serves to show not only his love to Christ and to them, but his regard to righteousness. That the Scriptures expressly declare for degrees, Dan. 12: 3. Matt. 10: 41, 42. 19: 28, 29. Luke 19: 16, 19. Rom. 2: 6. 1 Cor. 3: 8. 15: 41, 42. 2 Cor. 5: 10. Gal. 6: 9.

Another question has been sometimes proposed, viz. Whether the saints shall know each other in Heaven.

The arguments in favor of it, are taken from those instances recorded in Scripture, in which persons, who have never seen one another before, have immediately known each other in this world, by a special, immediate, divine revelation given to them, in like manner that Adam knew Eve, Gen. 2: 23. Moreover, we read that Peter, James, and John knew Moses and Elias, Matt. 17. Christ also represents the redeemed from all nations as sitting down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, Matt. 8: 11. Luke 13: 28—30. From such like arguments, it may be inferred that the saints shall know one another in Heaven, when joined together in the same assembly.

Moreover, this may be proved from the apostle's words, in 2 Cor. 1: 14. Phil. 4: 1, and especially 1 Thess. 2: 19, 20. "What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? for ye are our glory and joy." Therefore it follows that they shall know one another; and consequently they who have walked together in the ways of God, and have been useful to one another as relations and intimate friends, in what respects more especially their spiritual concerns, shall bless God for the mutual advantages which they have received, and consequently shall know one another. To which may be added that expression of our Savior, in Luke 16: 9, "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations;" especially if by these "everlasting habitations" be meant Heaven, as many suppose it is; and then the meaning is, that they whom you have relieved, and shown kindness to in this world, shall express a particular joy upon your being admitted into Heaven; and consequently they shall know you, and bless God for your having been so useful and beneficial to them.

It has been objected, that if the saints shall know one another in Heaven, they shall know that several of those who were their intimate friends here on earth, whom they loved with very great affection, are not there; and this will have a tendency to give them some uneasiness, and a diminution of their joy and happiness.

To this it may be replied, that if it be allowed that the saints shall know that some whom they loved on earth are not in Heaven, this will give them no uneasiness: since that affection which took its rise principally from the natural relation which we stood in to persons on earth, or the domestic intimacy that we have contracted with them, will cease in another world, Matt. 22: 29, 30. Our affections will there be excited by superior motives: namely, their relation to Christ; that perfect holiness with which they are adorned; their being joined in the same blessed society, and engaged in the same employment: together with their former usefulness one to another in promoting their spiritual welfare, as made subservient to the happiness they enjoy there. And as for others, who are excluded from their society, they will think themselves obliged, out of a due regard to the justice and holiness of God, to acquiesce in his righteous judgments. Thus, the inhabitants of Heaven are represented as adoring the divine perfections, when the vials of God's wrath were poured out upon his enemies, and saying, "Thou art righteous, O Lord, because thou hast judged thus: true and righteous are thy judgments," Rom. 16: 5, 7.

We have reason to believe then, that Heaven will be a social state, and that its happiness will, in some measure, arise from mutual communion and converse, and the expressions and exercises of mutual benevolence. All the views presented to us of this eternal residence of good men are pure and noble; and form a striking contrast to the low hopes, and the gross and sensual conceptions of a future state, which distinguish the pagan and Mahometan systems. The Christian heaven may be described to be a state of eternal communion with God, and consecration to hallowed, devotional and active services; from which will result an uninterrupted increase of knowledge, holiness, and joy to the glorified and immortalized assembly of the redeemed.

However inadequate may be our conceptions as to this and some other circumstances, thus we may be assured of, that the happiness of Heaven will be perfect and eternal. That it will be progressive, and that the saints shall always be increasing in their knowledge, joy, &c., is almost equally clear. Some indeed have supposed that this indicates an imperfection in the felicity of the saints for any addition to be made; but when we reflect that it is perfectly analogous to the dealings of God with us here; and that it corresponds with the language of Scripture, and the nature of the mind itself, it may be concluded certain, Isa. 9: 7. 2 Cor. 3: 18. 4: 17. HEAVINESS, of heart and ears. (See BLINDNESS.)

HEBER, or EBEB, the father of Peleg, and the son of Salah, who was the grandson of Shem, one of Noah's sons, was born A. M. 1723; B. C. 2281. From him some have supposed that Abraham and his descendants derived the appellation of Hebrews. But others have suggested, with greater probability, that Abraham and his family were thus called, because they came from the other side of the Euphrates into Canaan; Heber signifying in the Hebrew language one that passes, or a pilgrim. According to this opinion, Hebrew signifies much the same as foreigner among us, or one that comes from beyond sea. Such were Abraham and his family among the Canaanites; and his posterity, learning and using the language of the country, still retained the appellation originally given them, even when they became possessors and settled inhabitants as far as dying men ever can be.

2. HEBER the Kenite, of Jethro's family, husband to Jael, who killed Sisera, Judges 4: 17. See—Watson.

HEBER, (Bp. REGINALD, D. D.) a distinguished poet and divine, was born, in 1783, at Malpas, in Shropshire; received his education at Brazenose college, Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his poetical and other talents; travelled in Germany, Russia, and the Crimea; was for some years rector of Hodnet, in Shropshire; was appointed bishop of Calcutta in 1823; and had already accomplished much in his high office, and projected the accomplishment of more, when his career was suddenly closed by apoplexy, at Trichinopoly, April 1, 1826.

Bishop Heber was a man of high attainments and brilliant genius; but the qualities of his heart far transcended the talents of his mind. His disposition was sweet and affable, his temper most conciliating, and his piety fervent, humble, and sincere; he pursued the path of duty with cheerful alacrity, steadfast devotedness, and incessant activity; making every sacrifice to duty, even of those literary projects which his ardent spirit had once fondly cherished, and for the realization of which the circumstances and events of his life seemed to afford every facility. From the moment that he devoted himself to the ministry of the gospel among the heathen, he gave his heart to the work; and some of the latest and sweetest efforts of his muse breathe a missionary spirit of the most apostolic order. To the distinguishing doctrines of Christianity he was ardently attached; he felt their value, and was desirous to spread the knowledge of them, laboring in season and out of season, and exhibiting a bright example of faith and love, humility and meekness, gentleness and compassion for the necessities and miseries of his fellow men, both temporal and spiritual.

He is the author of Poems, full of spirit and elegance; (one of the best of which, his Palestine, gained the prize at Oxford;) Hymns; Bampton Lectures, for 1815; a Life of Bishop Taylor; and a Narrative of a Journey in Upper India. The last was a posthumous work, as is also the volume of his Sermons.—Life of Bishop Heber; Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

HEBREW OF THE HEBREWS; an appellation which the apostle Paul applies to himself, (Phil. 3: 5.) concerning the meaning of which there has been some difference of opinion. It is not likely that St. Paul would have mentioned it as a distinguishing privilege and honor, that neither of his parents were proselytes. It is more probable that a Hebrew of the Hebrews signifies a Hebrew both by nation and language, which many of Abraham's posterity, in those days, were not; or one of the Hebrew Jews who performed their public worship in the Hebrew tongue; for such were reckoned more honorable than the Jews born out of Judæa, and who spoke the Greek tongue. HEBREW LANGUAGE; one of the branches of an extensive linguistic family, which, besides Palestine, originally comprehended Syria, Phœnicia, Mesopotamia, Babylon, Arabia, and Ethiopia, and extending even to Carthage and other places along the Mediterranean sea. It is confessedly one of the oldest of the Oriental or Semitic dialects, and is deserving of particular regard, not only as containing the most ancient written documents in existence, some of which are upwards of three thousand two hundred and eighty years old, but as being the depository of the ancient divine revelations to mankind. Proofs that the Hebrew was the primitive language, have been drawn from the names of individuals, nations, and places; from the names of the heathen gods; from the traces of it in all languages; and from its great purity and simplicity. Its principal characteristics, which apply, however, more or less to the kindred Semitic dialects, are, stated by Gesenius to be the following:—1. It is fossil of gutturals, which appear to have been pronounced with considerable force, but which our organs cannot enunciate. 2. The roots, from which other words are derived, generally consist of two syllables, and are more frequently verbs than nouns. 3. The verb has only two temporal forms, the past and the future. 4. The oblique cases of the pronouns are always affixed to the verb, the substantive, or the particle, with which they stand connected. 5. The genders are only two,—masculine and feminine. 6. The only way of distinguishing the cases is by prepositions, only the genitive is formed by a noun being placed in construction with another noun, by which it is governed. 7. The comparative and superlative have distinct or separate forms. 8. The language exhibits few compounds, except in proper names. 9. The syntax is extremely simple, and the diction is in the highest degree unperiodical.

The Hebrew language is found in its greatest purity in the writings of Moses. It was in a very flourishing state in the time of David and Solomon; but towards the reign of Hezekiah it began to decline, was subjected to an intermixture of foreign words, principally Aramæan, and gradually deteriorated till the captivity, during which it became in a great measure forgotten, the Jews adopting the eastern Aramæan in Babylon; and on their return to their native land they spoke a mixed dialect, composed principally of the dialects just mentioned, and otherwise made up of Syriacisms, or western Aramæan materials. Some knowledge, however, of the ancient language continued to exist among the learned of the nation; but they no longer spoke it in purity, and mixed it up with a number of Persian, Greek, and Latin words, and thus formed the Talmudic dialect, which exhibits the language as preserved in the Talmud. The rabbinical Hebrew, which, that of a still later age, contains a further mixture from the different languages with which the rabbins were conversant. See Robinson's Biblical Repository.—Hend. Buck.

HEBREW PHILOLOGY. In no department of sacred learning have the wild vagaries of a playful imagination, or the stubborn hardness of preconceived opinions, and favorite theological theories, produced greater confusion, and thrown more formidable obstacles in the way of the youthful student, than that of Hebrew philology. The very facts, that some of the documents comprised in the sacred volume are upwards of three thousand years old, and were penned several centuries before the Greeks became acquainted with the use of letters; and, that a period of not fewer than twelve centuries intervened between the composition of the earliest and the most recent of its records, together with the wide difference which is known to exist between the forms and structure of the Oriental languages and those of western Europe, present considerations which are of themselves sufficiently intimidating, and calculated to make a beginner despair of ever acquiring a satisfactory knowledge of the language in which it is written; but when, in addition to these facts, we reflect on the various conflicting systems of Hebrew grammar and lexicography, the high-pretending, but contradictory hypotheses of divines eminent for their erudition and piety, and the circumstance that few years elapse without some production of novel and original claims being obtruded on the attention of the theological world in reference to this subject, it cannot be matter of surprise, that numbers even of those whose sacred engagements would naturally lead them to cultivate the study of Hebrew, are induced to abandon it as altogether unprofitable and vain.

Such as have never particularly directed their attention to the subject, can scarcely form any idea of the widely diversified views that have been entertained respecting the only proper and legitimate methods by which to determine the true meaning of the words constituting the ancient language of the Hebrews. We shall, therefore, here attempt a brief sketch of the different schools of Hebrew philology.

1. The Rabbinical. This school, which is properly indigenous among the Jews, derives its acquaintance with the Hebrew from the tradition of the synagogue; from the Chaldee Targums; from the Talmud; from the Arabic, which was the language of some of the most learned rabbins; and from conjectural interpretation. In this school, at one of its earlier periods, Jerome acquired his knowledge of the language; and, on the revival of learning, our first Christian Hebraists in the West were also educated in it, having had none but rabbins for their teachers. In consequence of this, the Jewish system of interpretation was introduced into the Christian church by Reuchlin, Sebastian Munster, Sanctes Pagninus, and the elder Duxtorf; and its principles still continue to exert a powerful and extensive influence through the medium of the grammatical and lexicographical works of the last-mentioned author, and the tinge which they gave to many parts of the biblical translations executed immediately after the Reformation.

2. The Forsterian school, founded about the middle of the sixteenth century, by John Forster, a scholar of Reuchlin's, and professor in Tübingen and Wittenberg. This author entirely rejected the authority of the rabbins; and, not being aware of the use to be made of the versions and cognate dialects, laid it down as an incontrovertible principle of Hebrew philology, that a perfect knowledge of the language is to be derived from the sacred text alone, by consulting the connexion, comparing the parallel passages, and transposing and changing the Hebrew letters, especially such as are similar in figure. His system was either wholly adopted and extended, or, in part, followed by Bohl, Gusset, Driessen, Stock and others, whose lexicons all proceed on this self-interpreting principle; but its insufficiency has been shown by J. D. Michælis, in his "Investigation of the Means to be employed in order to attain to a Knowledge of the Dead Language of the Hebrews," and by Bauer, in his "Hermeneut. V. T."

3. The Avenarian school, which proceeds on the principle that the Hebrew, being the primitive language from which all others have been derived, may be explained by aid of the Greek, Latin, German, English, &c. Its founder, John Avenarius, professor at Wittenberg, has had but few followers; but among these we may reckon the eccentric Hermann van der Hardt, who attempted to derive the Hebrew from the Greek, which he regarded as the most ancient of all tongues.

4. The Hieroglyphic, or cabalistic system, long in vogue among the Jews, but first introduced into Christendom by Caspar Neumann, professor at Breslau. It consists in attaching certain mystical and hieroglyphical powers to the different letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and determining the signification of the words according to the position occupied by each letter. This ridiculously absurd hypothesis was ably refuted by the learned Christ. Bened. Michælis, in a dissertation printed at Halle, 1709, in 4to. and has scarcely had any abettors: but recently it has been revived by a French academician, whose work on the subject exhibits a perfect anomaly in modern literature. Its title is, "La Langue Hébraïque Restituée, et le véritable sens des mots Hébreux rétabli et prouvé par leur analyse radicale. Par Fabre D'Olivet, à Paris, 1815;" quarto.

5. The Hutchinsonian school, founded by John Hutchinson, originally steward to the duke of Somerset, and afterwards master of the horse to George I., who maintained, that the Hebrew Scriptures contain the true principles of philosophy and natural history; and that, as natural objects are representative of such as are spiritual and invisible, the Hebrew words are to be explained in reference to these sublime objects. His principles pervade the lexicons of Bates and Parkhurst; but though they have been embraced by several learned men in England, they are now generally scouted, and have never been adopted, as far as we know, by any of the continental philologists. The disciples of this school are violent anti-punctists.

6. The Cocceian, or polydynamic hypothesis, according to which the Hebrew words are to be interpreted in every way consistent with their etymological import, or, as it has been expressed, in every sense of which they are capable. Its author, John Cocceius, a learned Dutch divine, regarded every thing in the Old Testament as typical of Christ, or of his church and her enemies; and the lengths to which he carried his views on this subject, considerably influenced the interpretations given in his Hebrew lexicon, which is, nevertheless, a work of no ordinary merit. This system has been recently followed by Mr. Von Meyer, of Frankfurt, in his improved Version of the Holy Scriptures, with short Notes.

7. The Schultensian school, by which, to a certain extent, a new epoch was formed in Hebrew philology. Albert Schultens, professor of the Oriental languages at Leyden, was enabled, by his profound knowledge of Arabic, to throw light on many obscure passages of Scripture, especially on the book of Job; but, carrying his theory so far as to maintain, that the only sure method of fixing the primitive significations of the Hebrew words, is to determine what are the radical ideas attaching to the same words, or words made up of the same letters in Arabic, and then to transfer the meaning from the latter to the former, a wide door was opened for speculative and fanciful interpretation; and the greater number of the derivations proposed by this celebrated philologist and his admirers, have been rejected as altogether untenable, by the first Hebrew scholars, both in England and on the continent. The great faults of the system consisted in the disproportionate use of the Arabic, to the neglect of the other cognate dialects, especially the Syriac, which, being the most closely related, ought to have the primary place allotted to it; want of due attention to the context; an inordinate fondness for emphases; and far-fetched etymological hypotheses and combinations.

8. The last school of Hebrew philology is that of Halle, so called from the German university of this name, where most of the Hebrew scholars have received their education, or resided, by whom its distinguishing principles have been originated, and brought to their present advanced state of maturity. Its foundation was laid by J. H. and Ch. B. Michælis, and the superstructure has been carried up by J. D. Michælis, Simon, Eichhorn, Dindorf, Schurrer, Rosenmüller, and Gesenius, who is allowed to be one of the first Hebraists of the present day.

The grand object of this school is to combine all the different methods by which it is possible to arrive at a correct and indubitable knowledge of the Hebrew language, as contained in the Scriptures of the Old Testament:—alotting to each of the subsidiary means its relative value and authority, and proceeding, in the application of the whole, according to sober and well-matured principles of interpretation.

The first of these means is the study of the language itself, as contained in the books of the Old Testament. Though by some carried to an unwarrantable length, it cannot admit of a doubt, that this must ever form the grand basis of Scripture interpretation. Difficulties may be encountered at the commencement; but when, as we proceed, we find from the subject-matter, from the design of the speaker or writer, and from other adjuncts, that the sense we have been taught to affix to the words must be the true one, we feel ourselves possessed of a key, which, as far as it goes, we may safely and confidently apply to unlock the sacred writings. When, however, the signification of a word cannot be determined by the simple study of the original Hebrew, recourse must then be had to the ancient versions, the authors of most of which, living near the time when the language was spoken in its purity, and being necessarily familiar with Oriental scenes and customs, must be regarded as having furnished us with the most important and valuable of all the subsidiary means by which to ascertain the sense in cases of apax legomena, words or phrases of rare occurrence, or connexions which throw no light on the meaning. Yet, in the use of these versions, care must be taken not to employ them exclusively, nor merely to consult one or two of them to the neglect of the rest. It must also be ascertained, that their text is critically correct in so far as the passage to be consulted is concerned; and the biblical student must not be satisfied with simply guessing at their meaning, or supposing that they either confirm or desert what he may have been led to regard as the sense of the original; but must be practically acquainted with the established usage obtaining in each version, and the particular character of their different renderings.

The rabbinical Lexicons and Commentaries furnish the next source of Hebrew interpretation. Not that this source is to be admitted as a principium cognoscendi, or an infallible criterion, by which to judge of the true signification of Hebrew words; but, considering that the rabbins of the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, whose works alone are here taken into account, possessed a knowledge of the Arabic as their vernacular language, or in which, at least, they were well versed; that they were familiar with the traditional interpretation of the synagogue, as contained in the Talmud and other ancient Jewish writings, or transmitted through the medium of oral communication; and, that they were mostly men of great learning, who rose superior to the trammels of tradition, and did not scruple to give their own views respecting the meaning of certain words and phrases in opposition to the voice of antiquity; it must be conceded, that no small degree of philological aid may reasonably be expected from their writings.

The last means consists in a proper use of the cognate dialectis. These are the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Samaritan, Phœnician, and the Talmudical Hebrew. All these dialects possess, to a great extent, in common with the Hebrew, the same radical words, the same derivatives, the same mode of derivation, the same forms, the same grammatical structure, the same phrases, or modes of expression, and the same, or nearly the same, signification of words. They chiefly differ in regard to accentuation, the use of the vowels, the transmutation of consonants of the same class, the extent of signification in which certain words are used, and the peculiar appropriation of certain words, significations, and modes of speech, which are exhibited in one dialect to the exclusion of the rest.

These languages, when judiciously applied to the illustration of the Hebrew Scriptures, are useful in many ways. They confirm the precise signification of words, both radicals and derivatives, already ascertained and adopted from other sources. They discover many roots or primitives, the derivatives only of which occur in the Hebrew Bible. They are of eminent service in helping to a knowledge of such words as occur but once, or at least but seldom, in the sacred writings, and they throw much light on the meaning of phrases, or idiomatical combinations of words; such combinations being natural to them all as branches of the same stock, or to some of them in common, in consequence of certain more remote affinities.

The best Hebrew grammars are those of Vater, Wexherlin, Jahn, Gesenius, and Ewald, in German; and those of Marcus, Seixas, and Prof. Lee and Stuart, in English.—Hebd. Euck.

HEBREWS, (EPISTLE TO THE.) Though the authorship of this epistle has been disputed both in ancient and modern times, its antiquity has never been questioned. It is generally allowed that there are references to it, although the author is not mentioned, in the remaining works of Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Justin Martyr; and that it contains, as was first noticed by Chrysostom and Theodoret, internal evidence of having been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, Heb. 8: 4. 9: 25. 10: 11, 37. 13: 10. The earliest writer now extant who quotes this epistle as the work of St. Paul, is Clement of Alexandria, towards the end of the second century; but, as he ascribes it to St. Paul repeatedly and without hesitation, we may conclude that in his time no doubt had been entertained upon the subject, or, at least, that the common tradition of the church attributed it to St. Paul. Clement is followed by Origen, by Dionysius and Alexander, both bishops of Alexandria, by Ambrose, Athanasius, Hilary of Poitiers, Jerome, Chrysostom, and Cyril, all of whom consider this epistle as written by St. Paul; and it is also ascribed to him in the ancient Syriac version, supposed to have been made at the end of the first century. Eusebius says, "Of St. Paul there are fourteen epistles manifest and well known; but yet there are some who reject that to the Hebrews, urging for their opinion that it is contradicted by the church of the Romans, as not being St. Paul's." In Dr. Lardner we find the following remark: "It is evident that this epistle was generally received in ancient times by those Christians who used the Greek language, and lived in the eastern parts of the Roman empire." And in another place he says, "It was received as an epistle of St. Paul by many Latin writers in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries." The earlier Latin writers take no notice of this epistle, except Tertullian, who ascribes it to Barnabas. It appears, indeed, from the following expression of Jerome, that this epistle was not generally received as canonical Scripture by the Latin church in his time: "Licet eam Latina consuetudo inter canonicas Scripturas non recipiat." The same thing is mentioned in other parts of his works. But many individuals of the Latin church acknowledged it to be written by St. Paul, as Jerome himself, Ambrose, Hilary, and Philaster; and the persons who doubted its Pauline origin were those the least likely to have been acquainted with the epistle at an early period, from the nature of its contents not being so interesting to the Latin churches, which consisted almost entirely of gentile Christians, ignorant, probably, of the Mosaic law, and holding but little intercourse with Jews.

2. The moderns, who, upon grounds of internal evidence, contend against the Pauline origin of this epistle, rest principally upon the two following arguments: the omission of the writer's name, and the superior elegance of the style in which it is written. It is indeed certain that all the acknowledged epistles of St. Paul begin with a salutation in his own name, and that, in the epistle to the Hebrews, there is nothing of that kind; but this omission can scarcely be considered as conclusive against positive testimony. St. Paul might have reasons for departing, upon this occasion, from his usual mode of salutation, which we at this distant period cannot discover. Some have imagined that he omitted his name, because he knew that it would not have much weight with the Hebrew Christians, to whom he was in general obnoxious, on account of his zeal in converting the Gentiles, and in maintaining, that the observance of the Mosaic law was not essential to salvation: it is, however, clear, that the persons to whom this epistle was addressed knew from whom it came, as the writer refers to some acts of kindness which he had received from them, and also expresses a hope of seeing them soon, Heb. 10: 34. 13: 18, 19, 23. As to the other argument, it must be owned that there does not appear to be such superiority in the style of this epistle, as should lead to the conclusion that it was not written by St. Paul. Those who have thought differently have mentioned Barnabas, St. Luke, and Clement, as authors or translators of this epistle. But surely the writings of St. Paul, like those of other authors, may not all have the same precise degree of merit; and if, upon a careful perusal and comparison, it should be thought that the epistle to the Hebrews is written with greater elegance than the acknowledged compositions of this apostle, it should also be remembered that the apparent design and contents of this epistle suggest the idea of more studied composition. And yet, there is nothing in it which amounts to a marked difference of style: on the other hand, there is the same concise, abrupt, and elliptical mode of expression, and it contains many phrases and sentiments which are found in no part of Scripture, except in St. Paul's epistles. We may further observe, that the manner in which Timothy is mentioned in this epistle makes it probable that it was written by St. Paul. Compare Heb. 13: 23. with 2 Cor. 1: 1. and Col. 1: 1. It was certainly written by a person who had suffered imprisonment in the cause of Christianity; and this is known to have been the case of St. Paul, but of no other person to whom this epistle has been attributed. Upon the whole, both the external and internal evidence appear to preponderate so greatly in favor of St. Paul's being the author of this epistle, that it cannot but be considered as written by that apostle.

3. "They of Italy salute you," is the only expression in the epistle which can assist us in determining from whence it was written; and the only inference to be drawn from these words, seems to be, that St. Paul, when he wrote this epistle, was at a place where some Italian converts were. This inference is not incompatible with the common opinion, that this epistle was written from Rome, and therefore we consider it as written from that city. It is supposed to have been written towards the end of St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, or immediately after it, because the apostle expresses an intention of visiting the Hebrews shortly: we therefore place the date of this epistle in the year 63.

4. Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Jerome, thought that this epistle was originally written in the Hebrew language; but all the other ancient fathers who have mentioned this subject speak of the Greek as the original work; and as no one pretends to have seen this epistle in Hebrew, as there are no internal marks of the Greek being a translation, and as we know that the Greek language was at this time very generally understood at Jerusalem, we may accede to the more common opinion, both among the ancients and moderns, and consider the present Greek as the original text. It is no small satisfaction to reflect, that those who have denied either the Pauline origin or the Greek original of this epistle, have always supposed it to have been written or translated by some fellow-laborer or assistant of St. Paul, and that almost every one admits that it carries with it the sanction and authority of the inspired apostle.

5. There has been some little doubt concerning the persons to whom this epistle was addressed; but by far the most general and most probable opinion is, that it was written to those Christians of Judea who had been converted to the gospel from Judaism. That it was written, notwithstanding its general title, to the Christians of one certain place or country, is evident from the following passages: "I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner," Heb. 13: 19. "Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty, with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you," Heb. 13: 23. And it appears from the following passage in the Acts, "When the number of the disciples was multiplied, there arose a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews," (Acts 6: 1.) that certain persons were at this time known at Jerusalem by the name of Hebrews. They seem to have been native Jews, inhabitants of Judea, the language of which country was Hebrew, and therefore they were called Hebrews, in contradistinction to those Jews who, residing commonly in other countries, although they occasionally came to Jerusalem, used the Greek language, and were therefore called Grecians, or Hellenists.

6. The general design of this epistle was to confirm the Jewish Christians in the faith and practice of the gospel, which they might be in danger of deserting, either through the persuasion or persecution of the unbelieving Jews, who were very numerous and powerful in Judea. We may naturally suppose, that the zealous adherents to the law would insist upon the majesty and glory which attended its first promulgation, upon the distinguished character of their legislator, Moses, and upon the divine authority of the ancient Scriptures; and they might likewise urge the humiliation and death of Christ as an argument against the truth of his religion. To obviate the impression which any reasoning of this sort might make upon the converts to Christianity, the writer of this epistle begins with declaring to the Hebrews, that the same God who had formerly, upon a variety of occasions, spoken to their fathers by means of his prophets, had now sent his only Son for the purpose of revealing his will; he then describes, in most sublime language, the divine dignity of the person of Christ, (Heb. 1.) and thence infers the duty of obeying his commands, the divine authority of which was established by the performance of miracles, and by the gifts of the Holy Ghost; he points out the necessity of Christ's incarnation and passion; (Heb. 2.) he shows the superiority of Christ to Moses, and warns the Hebrews against the sin of unbelief; (Heb. 3.) he exhorts to steadfastness in the profession of the gospel, and gives an animated description of Christ as our perpetual High Priest; (Heb. 4—7.) he shows that the Levitical priesthood and the old covenant were abolished by the priesthood of Christ, and by the new covenant; (Heb. 8.) he points out the inefficacy of the ceremonies and sacrifices of the law, and the sufficiency of the atonement made by the sacrifice of Christ; (Heb. 9, 10.) he fully explains the nature, value, and effects of faith; (Heb. 11.) and in the last two chapters he gives a variety of exhortations and admonitions, all calculated to encourage the Hebrews to bear with patience and constancy any trials to which they might be exposed. He concludes with the valedictory benediction usual in St. Paul's epistles:—"Grace be with you all. Amen." The most important articles of our faith are explained, and the most material objections to the gospel are answered with great force, in this celebrated epistle. The arguments used in it, as being addressed to persons who had been educated in the Jewish religion, are principally taken from the ancient Scriptures; and the connexion between former revelations and the gospel of Christ, is pointed out in the most perspicuous and satisfactory manner.

HEBRON, or CHEBRON; one of the most ancient cities of Canaan, being built seven years before Tanis, the capital of Lower Egypt, Num. 13: 22. It is thought to have been founded by Arba, an ancient giant of Palestine, and hence to have been called Kirjath-arba, Arba's city, (Josh. 14: 15.) which name was afterwards changed into Hebron. The Anakim dwelt at Hebron when Joshua conquered Canaan, Josh. 15: 13.

Hebron, which was given to Judah, and became a city of refuge, was situated on an eminence, twenty miles south of Jerusalem, and about the same distance north of Beersheba. Abraham, Sarah, and Isaac were buried near the city, in the cave of Machpelah, Gen. 23: 7, 8, 9. After the death of Saul, David fixed his residence at Hebron, and it was for some time the metropolis of his kingdom, 2 Sam. 2: 2—5. It is now called El Ilhalil, and contains a population of about four hundred Arabs. "They are so mutinous," says D'Arvieux, "that they rarely pay [the duties] without force, and commonly a reinforcement from Jerusalem is necessary. The people are brave, and when in revolt extend their incursions as far as Bethlehem, and make amends by their pillage for what is exacted from them. They are so well acquainted with the windings of the mountains, and know so well how to post themselves to advantage, that they close all the passages, and exclude every assistance from reaching the Soubachi. The Turks dare not dwell here, believing that they could not live a week if they attempted it. The Greeks have a church in the village." The mutinous character of this people, one would think, was but a continuation of their ancient disposition; which might render them fit instruments for serving David against Saul, and Absalom against David. The advantage they possessed in their knowledge of the passes, may account also for the protracted resistance which David made to Saul, and the necessity of the latter employing a considerable force in order to dislodge his adversary. David was so well aware of this advantage of station, that when Absalom had possessed himself of Hebron, he did not think of attacking him there, but fled in all haste from Jerusalem northward.—Cabnet.

HECATOMB, (hecaton bous; a hundred oxen;) the sacrifice of a hundred oxen, or, in a large sense, of a hundred animals of any sort. Such sacrifices were offered by the ancient heathen on extraordinary occasions.—Hend. Buck.

HECKEWEELDER, (JONS,) many years employed by the Moravian brethren as a missionary to the Delaware Indians, was a native of England. In 1819, he published at Philadelphia a history of the Manners and Customs of the Indian nations, who once inhabited Pennsylvania; and in 1820, a narrative of the Moravian mission among the Delaware Indians, &c. from 1740 to 1808. He died at Bethlehem, in 1823, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.—Davenport; Allen.

HEDGE, for protecting fields, gardens, &c. 1-Chron. 4: 13. God's protecting providence, magistrates, government, or whatever defends from hurt and danger, is called a hedge, Job 1: 10. Isa. 5: 2. Ezek. 13: 6. Troubles and hinderances are called hedges, as they stop our way, and prevent our doing and obtaining what we please, Lam. 3: 7. Job 19: 8. Hos. 2: 6. The way of the slothful is a hedge of thorns: he always apprehends great difficulties in the way of doing any good, and often he entangles himself in inextricable difficulties, Prov. 15: 19.—Brown.

HEDIO, (CASPAR, D. D. ;) one of the reformers of the sixteenth century, the intimate friend of Capito, Eucer, and Oecolampadius. This truly excellent, learned, and useful man, was born at Eting, and studied at Friburg and Basil. He preached successively at Mentz, Strassburg, Borin; and returning to Strassburg, there died in 1552. He published many works.—Middleton, vol. i. 291.

HEEL. As heels are the lowest parts of the body, Christ's heel bruised by Satan is his humble manhood, and his people who are subject to him, Gen. 3: 15. To have the heels bare, denotes shame, contempt, captivity, or distress, Jer. 13: 22. To lift up the heel, or kick, is to render evil for good to a superior, as a beast when it strikes its master. So Judas acted in betraying our Lord, Ps. 41: 6 John 13: 18. Men are taken by the heels in a snare, when they suddenly fall into some calamity, from which they cannot free themselves, Job. 18: 19.—Brown.

HEGIRAH; an Arabic word, signifying flight, and specially used to mark the flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina. As from that event, which took place A. D. 622, the Mohammedans date their computations, the term is employed to denote their era or period.—Hend. Buck.

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM; a work of great celebrity in the history of the Reformation. Frederic III., elector of the palatinate, belonging to the Calvinistic church, caused it to be written, for the purpose of having an uniform rule of faith. The principal contributors were Ursinus, professor of theology at Heidelberg; and Olevianus, minister and public teacher at the same place. The catechism was first published in 1563, under the title, "Catechism, or Short System of Christian Faith, as it is taught in the Churches and Schools in the Palatinate." It has been translated into many languages.—Hend. Buck.

HEIFER; a young cow, used in sacrifice at the temple, Num. 19: 1—10. Moses and Aaron were instructed to deliver the divine command to the children of Israel that they should procure "a red heifer, without spot," that is, one that was entirely red, without one spot of any other color; "free from blemish, and on which the yoke had never yet come," that is, which had never yet been employed in ploughing the ground or in any other work; for, according to the common sense of all mankind, those animals which had been made to serve other uses, became unfit to be offered to God,—a sentiment which we find in Homer and other heathen writers. The animal was to be delivered to the priest, who was to lead her forth out of the camp, and there to slay her; the priest was then to take of the blood with his finger, and sprinkle it seven times before the tabernacle, and afterwards to burn the carcass: then to take cedar wood and hyssop, and scarlet wood, and cast them into the flames. The ashes were to be gathered up, and preserved in a secure and clean place, for the use of the congregation, by the sprinkling of which ashes in water, it became a water of separation, by means of which a typical or ceremonial purification for sin was effected, Heb. 9: 13.—Watson.

HEIR; a person who succeeds by right of inheritance to an estate, property, &c. But the principles of heirship in the East differ from those among us; so that children do not always wait till their parents are dead, before they receive their portions. Hence, when Christ is called "heir of all things" it does not imply the death of any former possessor of all things; and when saints are called heirs of the promise, of righteousness, of the kingdom, of the world, of God, "joint heirs" with Christ, it implies merely participants in such or such advantages, but no decease of any party in possession would be understood by those to whom these passages were addressed; though among ourselves there is no actual heirship till the parent, or proprietor, is departed. (See ADOPTION; BERTHERIGHT; INHERITANCE.)—Calmet.

HELBON, or HEBAR; (Judg. I: 31.) a city of Syria famous for its wines, (Ezek. 27: 18,) and supposed to be the present Haleb, or as called in Europe, Aleppo. It is situated, according to Russell, who has given a very full description of it, in lat. 36 deg. 11 min. 25 sec. north; longitude, 37 deg. 9 min. east; about one hundred and eighty miles north of Damascus, and about eighty inland from the coast of the Mediterranean sea. In 1822, Aleppo was visited by a dreadful earthquake, by which it was almost entirely destroyed.—Calmet.

HELIOPOLIS. (See OX.)

HELL. Four distinct words in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, Sheol, Hades, Tartarus, and Gehenna, are in our common version translated Hell. The two first signify, like the Hindoo Padalou, or Patala, the Egyptian Amenti, and the Latin Pluto, Orcus, and Infernus, the world of departed souls in general; without any distinction, in ordinary cases, between the good and the bad, the happy or the miserable. (See HADES.) But the two last are more specific in their character, and strictly signify, (as our English word Hell does now, in the language of theology,) the place of divine punishment after death. As all religions have supposed a future state of existence after this life, so all have their hell, or place of torment, in which the wicked are to be punished. Ancient and modern heathens, the Jews, and the Mahometans, we find believe in a future state of retribution; it is not, therefore, a sentiment peculiar to Christianity.

We have already shown under the word Hades, that neither Sheol nor Hades usually denote Hell in the strict sense, but the regions of the dead in general; including both Paradise and Gehenna, the world of bliss, and the world of woe. To denote this latter, the New Testament writers make use of the Greek word Gehenna, which is compounded of two Hebrew words, Ge Hinnom, that is, "The Valley of Hinnom," a place near Jerusalem, in which children were cruelly sacrificed by fire to Moloch, the idol of the Ammonites, 2 Chron. 33: 6. This place was also called Tophet, (2 Kings 23: 10,) alluding, as is supposed, to the noise of drums, (toph signifying a drum,) there raised to drown the cries of helpless infants. (See GEHENNA.) As in process of time this place came to be considered an emblem of Hell, or the place of torment reserved for the punishment of the wicked in a future state, (see Dr. Campbell's sixth Dissertation;) the name Tophet came gradually to be used in this sense, and at length to be confined to it. In this sense, also, the word Gehenna, a synonymous term, is always to be understood in the New Testament, where it occurs twelve times; always in addressing Jews, to whom the analogical sense was easily intelligible, Matt. 5: 22, 29, 30, 10: 28. 18: 9, 23: 15, 33. Mark 9: 43, 45, 47. Luke 12: 5. James 3: 6. Mr. Balfour, of Charlestown, in an "Inquiry into the scriptural import of Sheol, Hades, &c." has undertaken to set aside the received meaning of Gehenna. He strenuously denies that it has the signification of the place of future punishment. This position is more bold than wise; since his arguments and expositions in support of it are founded in a total misapprehension of the context of the New Testament, of the philosophy and laws of language, and in the most serious perversion of the Scriptures. See Campbell's Dissertations; Spirit of the Pilgrims, 1828; Balfour's Inquiry and Essays; Hudson's Reply; Whitman's Letters; but especially Cooke's Examination of the Writings of Rev. Walter Balfour.

There have been many curious and useless conjectures respecting the location of Hell. But, as Dr. Doddridge observes, we must here confess our ignorance; and shall be much better employed in studying how we may avoid this place of horror, than in laboring to discover where it is.

Of the nature of this punishment we may form some idea from the expressions made use of in Scripture. It is called a place of torment, (Luke 16: 21.) the bottomless pit, (Rev. 20: 3—6.) a prison, (1 Pet. 3: 19.) darkness, (Matt. 8: 12. Jud. 13.) fire, (Matt. 13: 42, 50.) the worm that never dies, (Mark 9: 44, 48.) the second death, (Rev. 21: 8.) the wrath of God, Rom. 2: 5. It has been debated whether there will be a material fire in Hell. On the affirmative side it is observed, that fire and brimstone are represented as ingredients in the torment of the wicked, Rev. 14: 10, 11. 20: 10. That as the body is to be raised, and the whole man to be condemned, it is reasonable to believe there will be some corporeal punishment provided, and, therefore, probably material fire. On the negative side it is alleged, that the terms above mentioned are metaphorical, and signify no more than the violence of raging desire or acute pain; and that the Divine Being can sufficiently punish the wicked, by immediately acting on their minds, or even by delivering them up to their guilty passions and the stings of their own consciences.

According to several passages, it seems there will be different degrees of punishment in Hell, Luke 12: 47. Rom. 2: 12. Matt. 10: 20, 21. Matt. 12: 25, 32. Heb. 10: 28, 29. God will regard the measure of men's works.

As to its duration, it has been alleged that it cannot be eternal, because there is no proportion between temporal crimes and eternal punishments; that the word everlasting is not to be taken in its utmost extent; and that it signifies no more than a long time, or a time whose precise boundary is unknown. But in answer to this it is observed, that the same word is used, and that sometimes in the very same place, to express the eternity of the happiness of the righteous, and the eternity of the misery of the wicked; and that there is no reason to believe that the words express two such different ideas, as standing in the same connexion. (See ATON, and ATONIOS.) Besides, it is not true, it is observed, that temporary crimes do not deserve eternal punishment, because the length of punishment is never measured by the time occupied in the commission of crimes, and because the infinite majesty of an offended God and the endless future existence of man, justly expose the sinner to an endless punishment; and that hereby God vindicates his injured majesty, and glorifies his justice. HELL, CHRIST'S DESCENT INTO. That Christ locally descended into hell, is a doctrine believed not only by the papists, but by many among the reformed. The text chiefly brought forward in support of this doctrine, is 1 Pet. 3: 19:—"By which he went and preached to the spirits in prison." But it evidently appears, 1. That the "Spirit" there mentioned was not Christ's human soul, but the Holy Spirit, (by which he was quickened, and raised from the dead;) and by the inspiration of which, granted to Noah, he preached to those notorious sinners who are now in the prison of hell for their disobedience. See a similar form of expression, in Ephes. 2: 17: "And came and preached peace," &c. where it is certain that the personal presence of Christ is not intended. 2. Christ, when on the cross, promised the penitent thief his presence that day in paradise; and accordingly, when he died, he committed his soul into his heavenly Father's hand: in heaven, therefore, and not in hell, we are to seek the separate spirit of our Redeemer in this period, Luke 23: 43, 46. That his soul was in Hades, or the unseen world, is however admitted; for this state includes both heaven and hell. 3. Had our Lord descended to preach to the damned, there is no supposable reason why the unbelievers in Noah's time only should be mentioned rather than those of Sodom, and the unhappy multitudes that died in sin, Ps. 16: 10. Acts 2: 21, 31. (See HADES.) Bishop Pearson and Dr. Barrow on the Creed; Edwards' Hist. of Redemption, notes, pp. 351, 377; Ridgley's Body of Div. p. 308, 3d ed.; Doddridge and Guise on 1 Pet. 3: 19; Campbell's Dissertations; Stuart's Eschatological Essays.—Hend. Buck.

HELLENISTS; a term occurring in the Greek text of the New Testament, and which, in the English version, is rendered Grecians, Acts 6: 1. The authors of the Vulgate version render it like ours, Græci; but the Messieurs Du Port Royal, more accurately, Juifs Grecs, Greek or Grecian Jews, it being the Jews who spoke Greek that are here treated of, and are hereby distinguished from the Jews called Hebrews—that is, who spoke the Hebrew tongue of that time.

The Hellenists, or Grecian Jews, were those who lived in Egypt, and other parts where the Greek tongue prevailed. These Hellenists first settled in Egypt about six hundred years before Christ. Their number was increased by the numerous colonies of Jews planted there by Alexander the Great, B. C. 336, and still later by Ptolemy Lagus. Under the reign of Augustus, they amounted to nearly a million. The mixture of the Jewish and Egyptian national characters, and the influence of the Greek language and philosophy, which were adopted by these Jews, laid the foundation of a new epoch of Græco-Jewish literature, which, from its prevailing character, received the name of the Hellenistic. The systems of Pythagoras and Plato were strangely combined with those Oriental phantasies, which had been reduced to a system in Egypt, and with which the mystical doctrines of the Gnostics were imbued. The most noted of the Jewish Hellenistic philosophers was Philo of Alexandria; and the principal of the learned labors of the Alexandrian Jews was the Greek translation of the Old Testament. The Hellenists, (Acts 6: 1, 11. 19: 20.) are properly distinguished from the Hellenes, or Greeks, mentioned John 12: 20, who were Greeks by birth and nation, and yet proselytes to the Jewish religion.

The term Hellenists is also given to those who maintained the classical purity of the New Testament Greek. Their opponents were called Hebraists.—Hend. Buck.

HELMET; a piece of defensive armor for the head. (See ΑΡΜΑ, and ΑΡΜΟΡ.)—Cabnet.

HEMERO-BAPTISTS; a sect among the ancient Jews, thus called from their washing and bathing every day, in all seasons; and performing this custom with the greatest solemnity, as a religious rite necessary to salvation.

Epiphanius, who mentions this as the fourth heresy among the Jews, observes, that in other points these heretics had much the same opinion as the scribes and Pharisees; only that they denied the resurrection of the dead, in common with the Sadducees, and retained a few other of the improprieties of these last. (See CHRISTIANS of ST. JOHN.)—Hend. Buck.

HEMLOCK, (rush and rash;) Deut. 29: 18. 32: 32. Ps. 69: 21. Jer. 8: 14. 9: 15. 23: 15. Lam. 3: 5, 19. Hos. 10: 4. Amos 6: 12. In the two latter places our translators have rendered the word hemlock, in the others, gall. Hiller supposes it the centaureum, described by Pliny; but Celsius shows it to be the hemlock. It is evident, from Deut. 29: 18, that some herb or plant is meant of a malignant or nauseous kind, being there joined with wormwood, and in the margin of our Bibles explained to be "a poisonous herb." In like manner see Jer. 8: 14. 9: 15, and 23: 15. In Hosea 10: 4, the comparison is to a bitter herb, which, growing among grain, overpowers the useful vegetable, and substitutes a pernicious weed. The prophet appears to mean a vegetable which should appear wholesome, and resemble those known to be salutary, as judgment, when just, properly is; but experience would demonstrate its malignity, as unjust judgment is when enforced. Hemlock is poisonous, and water-hemlock especially; yet either of these may be mistaken, and some of their parts, the root particularly, may deceive but too fatally.—Watson.

HEMMENWAY, (Moses, D. D.,) minister of Wells, Maine, was born in Framingham, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1755; was ordained Aug. 8, 1759; and died April 5, 1811, aged about seventy-five, having been a minister fifty-one years.

Dr. Hemmenway was a faithful preacher, and a learned theologian. His controversies were conducted with fairness and candor. He published seven sermons on the obligation of the unregenerate to strive for eternal life, 1767; a pamphlet on the same subject, against Dr. Hopkins, pp. 127, 1772; remarks on Hopkins' answer, pp. 166, 1774; at the election, 1784; discourse concerning the church, 1792; at the ordination of M. Calef, 1795. Greenleaf's Sketches, ap. 4—9.—Allen.

HEN, (ornis;) 2 Esdras 1: 30. Matt. 23: 37. Luke 13: 34. The affection of the hen to her brood is so strong as to have become proverbial. There is a beautiful Greek epigram in the Anthologia, which affords a very fine illustration of the affection of this bird in another view. It has been thus translated:—

"Beneath her fostering wing the hen defends
Her darling offspring, while the snow descends;
And through the winter's day unmoved sates
The chilling fleeces and inclement skies;
Till vanquish'd by the cold and piercing blast,
True to her charge, she perishes at last."

Plutarch, in his book De Philostorgia, represents this parental attachment and care in a very pleasing manner:—"Do we not daily observe with what care the hen protects her chickens; giving some shelter under her wings, supporting others upon her back, calling them around her, and picking out their food; and if any animal approaches that terrifies them, driving it away with a courage and strength truly wonderful."—Watson.

HENA; an idol, (2 Kings 18: 34.) thought to be the Anais of the Persians; or the deity Næuea, Veaus, the star of Venus, or Lucifer.—Watson.

HENOTICON, (Gr. unitio into one;) a famous edict or decree of the Greek emperor Zeno, issued in the year 482, with a view to reconcile all the different parties in religion to the profession of one faith. It is generally agreed that Peter, the false patriarch of Alexandria, and Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, were the authors of this decree, and that their design was to compliment the emperor with the right of prescribing regulations in matters of faith. Zeno was caught by their flattery, and the Henoticon was drawn up. It soon appeared that the emperor, by this decree, arrogated to himself the right of being head of the church, and that it covertly favored the Epythian heretics, who approved the council of Chalcedon. Accordingly, pope Simplicius condemned it in the year 483, and cited Acacius, who had been the chief promoter of it, to appear before him at Rome. But it was not till the year 518, that it was entirely suppressed, when, in the reign of Justinian, and the pontificate of Hormisdas, the name of Zeno was struck out of the diptychs, or sacred registers, of such deceased persons for whom particular prayers were offered up.—Hend. Buck.

HENRICIANS; a sect so called from Henry, its founder, who, though a monk and hermit, undertook to reform the superstition and vices of the clergy. For this purpose he left Lausanne, in Switzerland, and removing from different places, at length settled at Thoulouse, in the year 1147, and there exercised his ministerial function; till, being overcome by the opposition of Bernard, abbot of Clairval, and condemned by pope Eugenius III. at a council assembled at Rheims, he was committed to a close prison, in 1148, where he soon ended his days. This reformer rejected the baptism of infants, severely censured the corrupt manners of the clergy, treated the festivals and ceremonies of the church with the utmost contempt, and held private assemblies for inculcating his peculiar doctrines.—Hend. Buck.

HENRY, (PHILIP, A. M.), was born at Hitchall, Eng. August 24, 1631. Mr. Philip Henry's mother was a very pious woman, and took great pains to bring up her children in the fear of the Lord: but of her, in early life, he was deprived. The celebrated Dr. Busby became his tutor, and under him he became eminent for his attainments in the learned languages. To him he was much attached, as from him he received the kindest attention. When Mr. Henry was ejected from the establishment, the doctor meeting him, said, "Who made you a non-conformist?" "You, Sir," replied he. "I made you a non-conformist?" "Yes, Sir; you taught me those principles which forbade me to violate my conscience." While at Westminster school, in compliance with the request of his father, he was allowed to attend the ministry of Mr. Marshall, who then preached in Westminster, at seven o'clock in the morning, and under whose ministration he derived his first serious impressions. From that establishment he removed to Christ church, Oxford, where he was soon after called to yield to the parliamentary visitation, which he did in these words:—"I submit to the power of the parliament, in the present visitation, as far as I may with a safe conscience and without perjury." Dr. Owen, when vice-chancellor, noticed the college exercises of young Henry with high approbation. Some of his Latin verses were among the poems which the university published in the year 1651, on the peace with Holland. But when he afterwards visited Oxford, he inserted in his book, "A tear dropped over my university sins."

On leaving college, he first settled at Worthenbury, in Flintshire, where he was ordained by Presbyters, and labored with so much ardor and piety, that through all the surrounding country he was known by the name of heavenly Henry. There he married Miss Catharine Matthews, of Broad Oak. She was heiress to a good estate, which promoted the temporal comfort of her husband, and enabled him not only to preach the gospel, but also to relieve many ministers in the day of persecution, while the personal excellencies of his wife were with him a constant theme of praise to God. By her he had two sons, John and Matthew, and four daughters: John died young, but his son Matthew, whose praise is in all the churches, was his father's biographer, and records, with interesting and instructive minuteness, the beautiful order of religion which was established in his paternal abode.

At the restoration, Mr. Philip Henry was first deprived, by his enemies, of his useful sphere of labor, and afterwards entirely expelled from the establishment by the act of uniformity. He says, "Our sins have made Bartholomew-day, in the year 1662, the saddest day for England since the death of Edward the Sixth, but even this for good." By the operation of the conventicle and five-mile acts, he was driven from his house, and compelled to seek the retirements of seclusion or imprisonment, for safety.

In the year 1687, when king James promulgated his celebrated declaration for liberty of conscience, Mr. Henry immediately availed himself of it. He now fitted up an out-building of his own, and held constant worship there, according to the forms used by dissenters, and with great zeal and piety. He also preached with the same ardor around the country on every day, riding, after having delivered one sermon, six or eight miles to preach another; and the next day repeating the same laborious exercise. The joy which he felt in this opportunity for labor, the success which attended his efforts, and the happy settlement of all his children, crowned his latter end with gladness. But his labors hastened his rest; for when writing to a friend, who anxiously inquired after his health, he says, "I am always habitually weary, and expect no other till I lie down in the bed of spices." After preaching one Lord's day, with his usual vivacity and energy, he was seized with a fatal sickness. He expired June 24, 1696, exclaiming, "O death, where is thy sting?" His "Sayings," which constitute a chapter in his biography, resemble those of Holy Writ. (See his Life by his Son.)—Jones' Chris. Biog.

HENRY, (MATTHEW), author of the celebrated "Commentary," bearing his name, was born on the 18th of October, 1662, at Broad Oak, in Flintshire. He was the son of the celebrated Philip Henry. Matthew, like many other eminent persons, was a child of infirm health, and early displayed a mind too vigorous and active for the frame which it inspired. At the early age of ten years he was deeply affected by convictions of the evil of sin, in consequence of hearing his father preach on Ps. 51: 7.—"Furge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." When he was thirteen years of age, his diary indicates decided piety. That the child of Philip Henry should early love to imitate preaching, and wish to be a minister, is not surprising; but of those who observed his puerile essays, some wondered at the wisdom and gravity which they displayed, and many expressed their fears lest he should be too forward; but the father replied, "Let him go on: he fears God, and designs well; and I hope God will keep him and bless him."

After having been at the seminary of Mr. Thomas Doolittle, young Henry was induced, by the influence of friends, to remove to Gray's Inn, in order to study the law. But, true to his original purpose, keeping his eye on the advancement of Christianity as his polar star, he quickly returned to the work of the ministry. His first public services were at his father's residence, where he received the most pleasing testimonies of his usefulness. Being afterwards invited to spend a few days with a friend at Nantwich, in Cheshire, he preached on the words of Job, "With God is terrible majesty," which produced the most striking and delightful effects. He was now invited to Chester, where he preached at the house of Mr. Henthorne, a sugar-baker, which laid the foundation of the church of which he was many years the faithful and beloved pastor. But having been called back to London, in 1687, he found that the king, James II., was issuing out licences to empower non-conformists to preach. This led him to prepare seriously for his future office; and, in a private paper, entitled "Serious Self-Examination before Ordination," he expresses his determination to be zealous and faithful in the discharge of his ministerial duties.

By the dissenters, he was ordained with great privacy, on the 9th of May, 1687. Mr. Henry was well received at Chester, and was successful in raising a large congregation. Of his ministry, it may be truly said, that, like the apostle, he was in labors more abundant; for his constant work, on the Lord's day, was to pray six times in public, to expound twice, and preach twice. His two public services seem to have been fully equal to three in the present day. He went through the whole Bible, by way of exposition, more than once. The list of subjects on which he preached is in print, and displays a comprehensive mind, anxious to declare the whole counsel of God; but, in his private notes, he says, "I find myself most in my element when preaching Christ, and him crucified; for the more I think and speak of him, the more I love him."

Eager to seize every opportunity of usefulness, he dili gently visited the prisoners in the castle of Chester, where his benevolent compassion and zeal introduced him to some very affecting scenes. But he never confined his labors to Chester, for he was the life of the dissenting communion through all that country; and constantly preached in the adjoining towns and villages every week. After having refused several invitations from churches in London, he at length consented to leave Chester, in order to take the pastoral charge of a congregation at Hackney, first collected by Dr. Baes. He has left on record his reasons for quitting the first scene of his labors, where he had preached nearly five-and-twenty years, where he had three hundred and fifty communicants, and probably a thousand hearers; a people of whom he said, with a heavy heart at parting, "They love me too well."

He commenced the 18th day of May, in the year 1712, his pastoral care at Hackney, expounding the first chapter of Genesis in the morning; and in the afternoon, the first of Matthew, as if beginning life anew. That he removed to the vicinity of London to enjoy, not ease, but labor, was evident; for his unexhausted zeal blazed forth with greater ardor, to fill his new and enlarged sphere. He devised additional modes of usefulness; preaching not only at Hackney, but in London also, early and late on the same Sabbath. He often preached lectures every evening in the week, and sometimes two or three on the same day; so that his biographer says, "If ever any minister, in our days, erred in excess of labors, he was the person." But one of the principal motives which led him to London, was to be able to print the remaining volumes of his "Exposition."

He now drew near to the goal for which he panted. Having alleviated the pains of separation from his friends at Chester, by promising to visit them every year, he made his last journey to them in the month of June, 1714. On his return, he was taken ill at Nantwich, where he said to his friend Mr. Illidge, You have been used to take notice of the sayings of dying men; this is mine: that a life spent in the service of God, and communion with him, is the most pleasant life that any one can live in this world. On the 22d of June, 1714, he expired, in the fifty-second year of his age.

The death of Henry was universally lamented; even those who loved not the communion to which he belonged, owned that it had lost its brightest ornament. He has left behind him, in his works, a library of divinity, which supercedes all eulogium on his character. His mind was not, indeed, formed for metaphysical abstraction, or elegant sublimity; nor was his pen celebrated for those splendid ornaments which feast the fancy, nor those vigorous strokes which thrill through the soul; but he possessed a peculiar faculty, which may be called a religious naïveté, which introduced well-known sentiments in an enchanting air of novel simplicity, while his style abounded with antitheses, which Attic taste would sometimes refuse, but which human nature will ever feel and admire. The mere plans of his sermons and expositions contain more vivid, lucid instruction, and less deserve the name of skeletons, than the finished discourses of many other divines. Life of M. Henry; Jones' Chris. Biog.—Hend. Burk.

HENRY, (PATRICK,) an American orator and statesman, was born in Virginia, in 1736, and, after receiving a common school education, and spending some time in trade and agriculture, commenced the practice of the law, after only six weeks of preparatory study. After several years of poverty, with the incumbrance of a family, he first rose to distinction in managing the popular cause in the controversy between the legislature and the clergy, touching the stipend which was claimed by the latter. In 1765, he was elected member of the house of burgesses, with express reference to an opposition to the British stamp act. In this assembly he obtained the honor of being the first to commence the opposition to the measures of the British government, which terminated in the revolution. He was one of the delegates sent by Virginia to the first general congress of the colonies, in 1774, and in that body distinguished himself by his boldness and eloquence. In 1776, he was appointed the first governor of the commonwealth, and to this office was repeatedly re--elected. In 1791, he retired from the bar, and died in 1799.

Without extensive information upon legal or political topics, Patrick Henry was a natural orator of the highest order, possessing great powers of imagination, sarcasm, and humor, united with great force and energy of manner, and a deep knowledge of human nature.

His principles of liberty and regard to Christianity led him to deplore the practice of slavery. On this subject, in a letter written in 1773, he inquires, "Is it not amazing, that at a time when the rights of humanity are defined and understood with precision, in a country above all others fond of liberty; that in such an age, and such a country we find men, professing a religion the most humane, mild, gentle, and generous, adopting a principle as repugnant to humanity as it is inconsistent with the Bible, and destructive to liberty?—Would any one believe, that I am master of slaves of my own purchase? I am drawn along by the general inconvenience of living here without them. I will not—I cannot justify it."

He was not a member of any church. He said to a friend, just before his death, who found him reading the Bible, "Here is a book worth more than all the other books that were ever printed; yet it is my misfortune never to have found time to read it, with the proper attention and feeling, till lately. I trust in the mercy of heaven, that it is not yet too late." Mr. Wirt's very interesting life of Henry was published, 3d ed. Svo. 1818.—Davenport; Allen.

HENRY, (THOMAS CHARLTON, D. D.,) author of the Letters to an Anxious Inquirer, was born in Philadelphia, Sept. 22, 1790. He was the eldest son of Alexander Henry, Esq. president of the Am. Sunday School Union, who originally intended him for enlarged mercantile pursuits, on which account he went through an unusually extended course of literature. Immediately after his graduation at Middlebury college, in Aug. 1814, the most tempting and splendid prospects of affluence and distinction, invited his entrance on a secular career; but having felt the power of renewing grace while at college, he conferred not with flesh and blood, but cordially embraced the laborious and self-denying duties of the Christian ministry. He went through his theological course at Princeton, N. J., and in 1816, entered on his great work with such rare endowments and polished eloquence, as attracted uncommon attention. In Nov. 1818, he became pastor of the Presbyterian church in Columbia, S. C., where he labored faithfully for five years, with great success.

In Jan. 1824, he accepted the invitation of the second Presbyterian church in Charleston. In this new and more ample field, his full soul was poured forth into his work, and a rich harvest of souls was gathered home to God. His health becoming impaired, he visited Europe, in 1826, and after spending six months in Great Britain and France, returned in the fall of the same year with renewed vigor and zeal to his pastoral duties. At the same time, he began to devote himself with inconceivable ardor to laborious study and composition, with a view to extend his ministerial usefulness. But, alas, on the 1st of October, of the next year, he was seized with the yellow fever, and in four days fell a victim to its ravages, at the age of thirty-seven; leaving his beloved family and flock to mourn the loss of such a husband, father, and pastor, as few ever had to lose.

Dr. Henry possessed as to person, manners, mind, voice, look and action, the attributes of a finished orator. In classical and theological learning he had few equals, of his own age and country. To a critical acquaintance with the ancient languages, he added a correct knowledge of several modern ones. Especially with the original Scriptures, and the writings of the Fathers, he was quite familiar. But the crowning excellence of his character was his entire self-consecration to the blessed Redeemer, and his deep experience of the power of religion. This it was which made him a rich blessing in life, and so richly blessed in death. His last hours afford one of the most beautiful scenes in the history of Christianity.

On the evening of his seizure, he said to a friend, "I know not what the Lord intends, but if my work is done,

I shall be glad to go home ;" and then repeated the following lines :

" Sweet to rejoice in lively hope,
That, when my change shall come,
Angels shall hover round my bed,
And waft my spirit home."

" And can you leave me," said Mrs. Henry, " and the dear little children, and the church, in God's hands ?"— " Yes," he replied, " I know he can provide for you all, and I can rely on his promises and grace. I can leave you all—my work is done." Having expressed his will, as to the disposal of his affairs, he requested that he might be left alone with his wife. Afterwards he called for his children, spoke to them affectionately, and gave them his last embrace. He then said, " I shall soon know more of eternity than I now do. ETERNITY! THERE IS MY EXALTED, GLORIOUS, HOME! Oh, how vain, how little, how trifling, does every thing appear in the light of a nearing eternity." " You have chosen," it was said, " the good part." " Oh! I have won it," he replied; " I have not the shadow of a doubt, or a fear, upon my mind. I have not a wish, desire, hope, or thought on earth; they are all above; nothing can turn my thoughts." Some time after he exclaimed, " Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly, come now, come immediately, this moment, just as suits thy holy will." Observing the grief of his wife, he said, " Is that right, my dear, is that right? we shall soon meet in heaven." " I hope so," she replied. " Hope so," he answered, " we must, we shall—how could it be otherwise." He afterwards remarked, " God has been very merciful in sparing me so long, and making me an instrument of good. We have often conversed together about heaven; I shall know and love you there." He concluded a short, but comprehensive, and fervent prayer, by saying very emphatically, " for the Redeemer's sake; for the Redeemer's—Amen." In his last moments, being asked, " Do you find that gloom in death which some apprehend?" he replied, though with difficulty from the shortness of his breathing, " A sweet falling of the soul in Jesus. Oh! what mercy! what mercy!—I don't understand it!" A friend addressing him near the close of this scene of triumphant grace, when apparently lost to all earthly sounds, he exclaimed, " Oh! you interrupted me; I had a beautiful train of thought then." In a little while after, that thinking mind, which thus asserted its indestructibility, by continuing its functions active and vigorous in the very juncture of separation from the body, went rejoicing from this stage of trial, to commingle with pure spirits before the throne of God. He died at the South, the same year with Dr. Payson at the North.

Dr. Henry's published works are, An Inquiry into the Consistency of Popular Amusements with a Profession of Christianity; Letters to an Anxious Inquirer; and Moral Etchings—Memoir prefixed to his Letters.

HERACLEONITES; a sect of Christians, the followers of Heracleon, who refined upon the Gnostic divinity, and maintained that the world was not the immediate production of the Son of God, but that he was only the occasional cause of its being created by the demiurgus. The Heracleonites denied the authority of the prophecies of the Old Testament; maintained that they were mere random sounds in the air; and that John the Baptist was the only true voice that directed to the Messiah.—Hend. Buck.

HERBERT, (EDWARD,) lord of Cherbury, was born, in 1581, at Montgomery castle; was sent at the early age of twelve years to University college, Oxford; was made a knight of the Bath soon after the accession of James I.; travelled on the continent in 1608, and attracted much attention by his manners and accomplishments; served in the Netherlands in 1610 and 1614, and displayed consummate bravery; was twice sent ambassador to France, where he distinguished himself by resenting the insolence of the worthless favorite de Luynes; was made an Irish peer, in 1625, and, soon after, an English baron; espoused the parliamentary cause during the civil wars; and died in 1648. Herbert was one of the most chivalrous characters of his time, with considerable talents, and some vanity. He was a deist, and was one of the first who reduced deism into a system. His principles are expounded in his works De Veritate, and De Religione Laici, which he believed God miraculously bid him publish. Lord Herbert also wrote his own Memoirs; a Life of Henry VIII.; and a Treatise on the Religion of the Heathens—Davensport.

HERBERT, (GEORGE,) brother to lord Herbert of Cherbury, was born April 3, 1593, and received a religious education under the eye and care of his prudent mother. His lovely behavior, even in childhood, with the evident marks of genius and piety, endeared him to all that knew him. He entered Cambridge at sixteen, and the same year composed a volume of poems, which he terms his first fruits unto God, and which he published partly, as he writes to his mother, " to reprove the vanity of those many love-poems that are daily writ and consecrated to Venus, and to bewail that so few are writ that look towards God and heaven."

In the year 1619, he was made orator of the university, and a letter of thanks which he wrote in that capacity to James I. excited the monarch's attention, who declared him to be the jewel of that university, and gave him a sinecure of one hundred and twenty pounds per annum. He became intimate with the great Bacon, Wotton, Andrews, and Donne, was much caressed by the most eminent nobility, and it was supposed would be made secretary of state. The death of his two principal friends, the duke of Richmond, and the marquis of Hamilton, followed by that of king James, frustrated these expectations, and Mr. Herbert determined to devote his fine powers to a holier employment. No sooner was this determination known, than his court friends endeavored to dissuade him from it, urging among other things that the office of a clergyman was too mean, too much below his high birth and abilities, to which he replied, " It has been formerly judged that the domestic servants of the King of heaven, should be of the noblest families on earth; and though the iniquity of the late times has made clergymen meanly valued, and the sacred name of priest contemptible, yet I will labor to make it honorable, by consecrating all my learning, and all my poor abilities to advance the glory of that God who gave them; knowing that I can never do too much for him who hath done so much for me, as to make me a CHRISTIAN. And I will labor to be like my Savior, by making humility lovely in the eyes of all men, and by following the merciful and meek example of my dear Jesus."

After much preparation of heart, he was accordingly ordained, and in 1626, was made prebend of Layton church, in the diocese of Lincoln. In 1630, he was transferred to the living of Bemerton near Salisbury. Here he wrote, " I now look back upon my aspiring thoughts, and think myself more happy than if I had attained what I so ambitiously thirsted for. I can now behold the court with an impartial eye, and see plainly that it is made up of frauds, and titles, and flattery, and other such empty, imaginary pleasures; but in God and his service is a fullness of all joy, and pleasure, and no satiety; and I will now use all my endeavors to bring my relations and dependants to a love and reliance on him, who never fails those who trust him."—" I know the ways of learning; I know what nature does willingly, and what, when it is forced by fire; I know the ways of honor, and when glory inclines the soul to noble expressions; I know the court; I know the ways of pleasure, of love, of wit, of music, and upon what terms I declined all these for the service of my Master Jesus." Here he faithfully, humbly, and successfully labored in his Master's work till his happy death, in 1635, at the age of forty-two.

His poems entitled " The Temple," and his " Priest to the Temple, or the Country Parson's Character and Rules of Holy Life," are still admired for their beautiful and holy simplicity. His works have been published in one volume.—Middleton, vol. iii. 48.

HERDER, (JOHN GODFREY,) a German divine, philosopher, and writer, was born, in 1744, of poor parents, at Mohrungen, in Prussia; was educated for the church, became court preacher, ecclesiastical counsellor, and vice president of the consistory to the duke of Saxe Weimar; and died, beloved and venerated by all who knew him, in 1803. At the moment when he expired he was writing a hymn to the Deity, and the pen was found on the unfinished line. Though a model of virtue and piety, to whom Germany is deeply indebted for valuable works in almost every branch of literature and taste, as well as theology, yet he often exclaimed, in moments of melancholy reflection, "O, my profitless life!" His beautiful work on the Spirit of the Hebrew Poetry is well known and highly valued. "In many respects," says DeGerando, "Herder is the Fenelon of Germany, and of the reformed religion." His works, philological, philosophical, and poetical, form forty-five volumes, octavo.—Davenport.

HERESIARCH; one who introduces or founds any particular heresy: a leader of any body of heretics.—Hend. Buck.

HERESY; a term borrowed from the Greek word hairesis, which, in its primary signification, implies a choice or election, whether of good or evil. It seems to have been principally applied to what we would call moral choice, or the adoption of one opinion in preference to another. Philosophy was in Greece the great object which divided the opinions and judgments of men; and hence the term hairesis, (heresy,) being most frequently applied to the adoption of this or that particular dogma, came by an easy transition to signify the sect or school in which that dogma was maintained. Thus, though the heresy of the academy, or of Epicurus, would sound strange to our ears, and though the expression was not common with the early Greek writers, yet in later times it became familiar, and we find Cicero speaking of the heresy to which Cato belonged, when he described him as a perfect Stoic. The Hellenistic Jews made use of the same term to express the leading sects which divided their countrymen. Thus Josephus speaks of the three heresies of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes; and since he was himself a Pharisee, he could only have used the term as equivalent to sect or party.

Luke also, in the Acts of the Apostles, (5: 17. 15: 5.) speaks of the heresy of the Pharisees and Sadducees; and we learn from the same book, (24: 5, 14.) that the Christians were called by the Jews the heresy of the Nazarenes. With this opprobrious addition, the term was undoubtedly used as one of insult and contempt; and the Jews were more likely than the Greeks to speak reproachfully of those who differed from them, particularly in matters of religion. The three Jewish sects already mentioned were of long standing, and none of them were considered to be at variance with the national creed; but the Christians differed from all of them; and in every sense of the word, whether ancient or modern, they formed a distinct heresy.

The apostles would be likely to use the term with a mixture of Jewish and Gentile feelings; but there was one obvious reason why they should employ it in a new sense, and why at length it should acquire a signification invariably expressive of reproach. The Jews, as we have seen, allowed of three, or perhaps more, heresies among their countrymen. In Greece, opinions were much more divided; and twelve different sects have been enumerated, which, by divisions and subdivisions, might be multiplied into many more. The shades of difference between these diverging sects were often extremely small; and there were many bonds of union, which kept them together, as members of the same family, or links of the same chain. In addition to which we must remember, that these differences were not always or necessarily connected with religion. Persons might dispute concerning the summum bonum, and yet they might worship, or at least profess to worship, the same God. But the doctrine of the gospel was distinct, uncompromising, and of such a nature that a person must believe the whole of it, and to the very letter, or he could not be admitted to be a Christian. There is one body, and one Spirit, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, &c.; (Eph. 4: 4, 5.) which words, if rightly understood, evidently mean, that the faith of the gospel is one and undivided. Hence arose the distinction between orthodox and heterodox. He who believed the gospel, as the apostles preached it, was orthodox; he who did not so believe it, was heterodox. He embraced an opinion,—it mattered not whether his own, or that of another, but he made it his own choice, and in the strict sense of the term he was an heretic. It was no longer necessary to qualify the term by the addition of the sect or party which he chose: he was not a true Christian, and therefore he was an heretic.

It was in this sense that it was applied by the early fathers. If a man admitted a part, or even the whole of Christianity, and added to it something of his own; or if he rejected the whole of it, he was equally designated as an heretic. Thus, by degrees, it came to be restricted to those who professed Christianity, but professed it erroneously; and in later times, the doctrine of the Trinity, as defined by the council of Nice, was almost the only test which decided the orthodoxy or the heresy of a Christian. Differences upon minor points were then described by the milder term of schism; and the distinction seems to have been made, that unity of faith might be maintained, though schism existed; but if the unity of faith was violated, the violator of it was an heretic: a distinction which appears hardly to have been observed in the apostolic age; and Paul has been thought to use the term heresy, where later writers would have spoken of schisms. Diss. to the Gospels*; Dr. Burton on the Heresies of the Apostolic Age, p. 8.—Hend. Buck.

HERETIC; a general name for all such persons under any religion, but especially the Christian, as profess or teach opinions contrary to the established faith, or to what is made the standard of orthodoxy. (See the preceding article, and Lardner's History of the Heretics of the first two Centuries.)—Hend. Buck.

HERMAS, a disciple mentioned Rom. 16: 14, was, according to several of the ancients, and many learned modern interpreters, the same as Hermas, whose works are said to be still extant; but this is doubtful.—Calmet.

HERMENIGILDUS; a Gothic prince of the sixth century, the eldest son of Leovigildus, king of the Goths in Spain. He was originally an Arian, but, by means of his wife Ingonda, became a convert to the orthodox faith. His father, enraged at the change, stripped him of the command of Seville, and threatened him with death. The prince put himself and the city in the posture of defence; on which his exasperated father commenced a severe persecution against the orthodox, and did all in his power to detach them from his son, who in vain sought assistance from Rome and Constantinople. Being driven, after a siege of twelve months, from Seville to Asseto, he was compelled to surrender, and depending on a promise of pardon, threw himself at his father's feet. The king, however, loaded him with chains, and finding him inflexible in his opposition to Arianism, in a fit of rage ordered his guards to cut him in pieces, which was done, April 13, A. D. 586.—For., p. 78.

HERMENEUTICS, (from the Greek hermeneuō, to interpret;) the science or theory of interpretation, comprising and exhibiting the principles and rules according to which the meaning of an author may be judiciously and accurately ascertained. It consists of two parts: the theoretical, which includes the general principles which respect the meaning of words and the kinds of them; and the preceptive, which embraces the rules founded on these principles, by which we are to be guided in our philological inquiries, and all our attempts to investigate the meaning of any writer. Sacred hermeneutics comprise the principles and rules of this science as made to bear on the interpretation of the holy Scriptures. (See BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.)—Hend. Buck.

HERMES; a Christian deacon and martyr, of the fourth century, under Diocletian. (See PHILIP OF HERACLEA.)

HERMIANI; a sect in the second century, so called from their leader Hermias. One of their distinguishing tenets was, that God is corporeal; another, that Jesus Christ did not ascend into heaven with his body, but left it in the sun.—Hend. Buck.

HERMIT; a person who retires into solitude for the purpose of devotion. Who were the first hermits cannot easily be known; though Paul, surnamed the Hermit, is generally reckoned the first. The persecutions of Decius and Valerian were supposed to have occasioned their first rise. See Natural History of Enthusiasm.—Hend. Buck.

HERMOGENIANS; a sect of ancient heretics, denominated from their leader Hermogenes, who lived towards the close of the second century. Hermogenes established matter as his first principle; and regarding matter as the fountain of all evil, he maintained, that the world, and every thing contained in it, as also the souls of men and other spirits, were formed by the Deity from an uncreated and eternal mass of corrupt matter. The opinions of Hermetogenes with regard to the origin of the world, and the nature of the soul, were warmly opposed by Tertullian. (See Gnostics.)—Hend. Buck.

HERMON; a celebrated mountain in the Holy Land, often spoken of in Scripture. It was in the northern boundary of the country, beyond Jordan, and in the territories which originally belonged to Og, king of Bashan, Josh. 12: 5. 13: 5. The Psalmist connects Tabor and Hermon together, upon more than one occasion; (Ps. 89: 12. 133: 3.) from which it may be inferred that they lay contiguous to each other. This is agreeable to the account that is given us by travellers. Mr. Maundrell, in his journey from Aleppo, says that in three hours and a half from the river Kishon, he came to a small brook, near which was an old village and a good kane, called Legune; not far from which his company took up their quarters for the night, and from whence they had an extensive prospect of the plain of Esdraelon. At about six or seven hours' distance eastward, stood, within view, Nazareth, and the two mountains Tabor and Hermon. He adds, that they were sufficiently instructed by experience what the holy Psalmist means by the dew of Hermon; their tents being as wet with it as if it had rained all night, Ps. 133: 3.—Watson.

HERNHUTERS. (See MORAVIANS.)

HEROD, surnamed the Great; king of the Jews, second son of Antipater the Idumean, born B. C. 71. At the age of twenty-five he was made by his father governor of Galilee, and distinguished himself by the suppression of a band of robbers, with the execution of their leader, Hezekiah, and several of his comrades. In the civil war between the republican and Cæsarian parties, Herod joined Cassius, and was made governor of Cælo-Syria; and when Mark Antony arrived victorious in Syria, Herod and his brother found means to ingratiate themselves with him, and were appointed as tetrachs in Judea; but in a short time an invasion of Antigonus, who was aided by the Jews, obliged Herod to make his escape from Jerusalem, and retire first to Idumæa, and then to Egypt. He at length arrived at Rome, and obtained the crown of Judea upon occasion of a difference between the two branches of the Asmodean family. Having met with this unexpected success, he returned without delay to Judea, and in about three years got possession of the whole country. Antigonus was taken prisoner and put to death, which opened the way to Herod's quiet possession of the kingdom. His first cares were to replenish his coffers, and to repress the faction still attached to the Asmodean race, and which regarded him as a usurper. He was guilty of many extortions and cruelties in the pursuit of these objects.

2. In the war between Antony and Octavius, Herod raised an army for the purpose of joining the former; but he was obliged first to engage Malchus, king of Arabia, whom he defeated and obliged to sue for peace. After the battle of Actium, his great object was to make terms with Octavius the conqueror; and, as a preliminary step, he put to death Hyrcanus, the only surviving male of the Asmodeans; and, having secured his family, he embarked for Rhodes, where Augustus at that time was. He appeared before the master of the Roman world in all the regal ornaments excepting his diadem, and related the faithful services he had performed for his benefactor, Antony, adding, that he was ready to transfer the same gratitude to a new patron, from whom he should hold his crown and kingdom. Augustus was struck with the magnanimity of the defence, and replaced the diadem on the head of Herod, who remained the most favored of the tributary sovereigns. When the emperor afterwards travelled through Syria, in his way to and from Egypt, he was entertained with the utmost magnificence by Herod; in recompense for which he restored to him all his revenues and dominions, and even considerably augmented them. His good fortune as a prince, however, was poisoned by domestic broils, and especially by the insuperable aversion of his wife Mariamne, whom at length he brought to trial, convicted, and executed. She submitted to her fate with all the intrepidity of innocence, and was sufficiently avenged by the remorse of her husband, who seems never after to have enjoyed a tranquil hour. At times he would fly from the sight of men, and on his return from solitude, which was ill suited to a mind conscious of the most ferocious deeds, he became more brutal than ever, and in fits of fury spared neither foes nor friends.

3. At length he recovered some portion of self-possession, and employed himself in projects of regal magnificence. Besides building Sebaste and Cesarea, and many fortresses, he erected at Jerusalem a stately theatre and amphitheatre, in which he celebrated games in honor of Augustus, to the great displeasure of the zealous Jews, who discovered an idolatrous profanation in the theatrical ornaments and spectacles. Nothing, it is said, gave them so much offence as some trophies which he had set round his theatre in honor of Augustus, and in commemoration of his victories, but which the Jews regarded as images devoted to the purposes of idol worship. For this and other acts of the king a most serious conspiracy was formed against him, which he, fortunately for himself, discovered; and he exercised the most brutal revenge on all the parties concerned in it.

4. To acquire popularity among the Jews, and to exhibit an attachment to their religion, he undertook the vast enterprise of rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, which he finished in a noble style of magnificence in about a year and a half, although it received splendor by new additions for more than forty years. During the progress of this work he visited Rome, and brought back his sons, who had attained to man's estate. These at length conspired against their father's person and government, and were tried, convicted, and executed. Notwithstanding the execution of his sons, he was still a slave to conspiracies from his other near relations.

In the thirty-third year of his reign, our SAVIOR was born. This event was followed, according to the gospel of St. Matthew, by the massacre of the children at Bethlehem. About this time, Antipater, returning from Rome, was arrested by his father's orders, charged with treasonable practices, and was found guilty of conspiring against the life of the king. This and other calamities, joined to a guilty conscience, preying upon a broken constitution, threw the wretched monarch into a mortal disease, which was doubtless a just judgment of heaven on the many foul enormities and impieties of which he had been guilty. His disorder was attended with the most loathsome circumstances that can be imagined. A premature report of his death caused a tumult in Jerusalem, excited by the zealots, who were impatient to demolish a golden eagle which he had placed over the gate of the temple. The perpetrators of this rash act were seized, and, by order of the dying king, put to death. He also caused his son Antipater to be slain in prison, and his remains to be treated with every species of ignominy. He bequeathed his kingdom to his son Archelaus, with tetrarchies to his two other sons.

Herod, on his dying bed, planned a scheme of horrible cruelty, which was to take place at the instant of his own death. He had summoned the chief persons among the Jews to Jericho, and caused them to be shut up in the hippodrome, or circus, and gave strict orders to his sister Salome to have them all massacred as soon as he should have drawn his last breath; "for this," said he, "will provide mourners for my funeral all over the land, and make the Jews in every family lament my death, who would otherwise exhibit no signs of concern." Salome and her husband, Alexas, chose rather to break their oath extorted by the tyrant, than be implicated in so cruel a deed; and accordingly, as soon as Herod was dead, they opened the doors of the circus, and permitted every one to return to his own home. Herod died in the sixty-eighth year of his age. His memory has been consigned to merited detestation, while his great talents, and the active enterprise of his reign, have placed him high in the rank of sovereigns.—Watson.

HEROD ANTIPAS. (See ANTIPAS.)

HERODIANS; a sect among the Jews, at the time of our Savior, Matt. 22: 16. Mark 3: 6. The critics and commentators are very much divided with regard to the Herodians. St. Jerome, in his dialogue against the Luciferians, takes the name to have been given to such as owned Herod for the Messiah; and Tertullian and Epiphanius are of the same opinion. But the same Jerome, in his comment on Matthew, treats this opinion as ridiculous; and maintains that the Pharisees gave this appellation, by way of ridicule, to Herod's soldiers, who paid tribute to the Romans; agreeable to which the Syrian interpreters render the word by the domestics of Herod, i. e. "his courtiers." M. Simon, in his notes on the 22d chapter of Matthew, advances a more probable opinion: the name Herodian he imagines to have been given to such as adhered to Herod's party and interest, and were for preserving the government in his family, about which were great divisions among the Jews. F. Hardouin will have the Herodians and Sadducees to have been the same. Dr. Prideaux is of opinion that they derived their name from Herod the Great; and that they were distinguished from the other Jews by their concurrence with Herod's scheme for subjecting himself and his dominions to the Romans, and likewise by complying with many of their heathen usages and customs. This symbolizing with idolatry upon views of interest and worldly policy, was probably that leaven of Herod, against which our Savior cautioned his disciples. It is further probable that they were chiefly of the sect of the Sadducees: the leaven of Herod is also denominated the leaven of the Sadducees.—Head. Buck.

HERODIAS, daughter of Aristobulus and Berenice, and granddaughter of Herod the Great. Her first husband was her uncle Philip, by whom she had Salome; but he falling into disgrace, and being obliged to live in private, she left him, and married his brother Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, who offered her a palace and a crown. As John the Baptist censured this incestuous marriage, (Matt. 14: 3. Mark 6: 17.) Antipas ordered him to be imprisoned. Some time afterwards, Herodias suggested to her dancing daughter, Salome, to ask John the Baptist's head, which she procured. (See ANTRAS.) Mortified to see her husband tetrarch only, while her brother Agrippa, whom she had known in a state of indigence, was honored with the title of king, Herodias persuaded Antipas to visit Rome, and procure from the emperor Caius the royal title. Agrippa, however, sent letters to the emperor, informing him that Herod had arms in his arsenals for seventy thousand men, and by this means procured his banishment to Lyons. Herodias, who accompanied her husband, followed him in the calamity she had brought upon him.—Calmet.

HERON, (anaph, Lev. 11: 19. Dent. 14: 18.) This word has been variously understood. Some have rendered it the kite, others the woodcock, others the curlew, some the peacock, others the parrot, and others the crane. The root, anaph, signifies to breathe short through the nostrils, to snuff, as in anger; hence to be angry; and it is supposed that the word is sufficiently descriptive of the heron, from its very irritable disposition. Bochart, however, thinks it the mountain falcon; the same that the Greeks call ano- paia, mentioned by Homer; and this bears a strong resemblance to the Hebrew name.—Watson.

HERRING, (ΤΥΡΩΝΑΣ,) archbishop of Canterbury, an eminent prelate, was born, in 1693, at Walsoken, in Norfolk, of which his father was rector; studied at Cambridge; and, after having possessed various livings, was raised, in 1737, to the see of Bangor, whence, in 1743, he was translated to York. After the defeat of the king's troops at Preston Pans, in 1745, the archbishop exerted himself in his diocese with so much patriotism and zeal, that he repressed the disaffected, inspired the desponding, and procured, at a county meeting, a subscription of forty thousand pounds, towards the defence of the country. In 1747, he was removed to the see of Canterbury; and he died at Croydon, in 1756. Herring was a man of learning, piety, and tolerant principles. Dr. Jortin, who knew him well, tells us, that he had piety without superstition, and moderation without meanness; an open and liberal way of thinking, and a constant attachment to the cause of sober and rational liberty, both civil and religious; that he was a prelate of uncommon virtues, a man of extraordinary accomplishments, a candid divine, a polite scholar, a warm lover of his country, one whose memory can never cease to be revered. In short, "he was," says the earl of Corke, "what a bishop ought to be; and is, I doubt not, where all bishops ought to be." His Sermons and Letters were published after his death.—Biog. Brit. and Monthly Review, vols. 28. and 57.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

HERVEY, (JAMES, M. A.) the distinguished author of "Meditations," bearing his name, was born at Hardingsstone, near Northampton, February 26, 1713. His father was a clergyman, then residing at Collingtree; and Mr. Hervey received from him, and his excellent mother, his early education. At the age of eighteen he was sent to the university of Oxford; and there, becoming acquainted with the distinguished John Wesley, he devoted himself with great zeal to various studies, and became seriously impressed with the importance of religion. For some years afterwards he felt a peculiar attachment to the doctrinal sentiments of Mr. Wesley; but subsequently conceiving such sentiments to be erroneous, he attached himself to the Calvinists.

At the age of twenty-two, his father appointed him to the situation of curate of Weston Favel, and he discharged the duties of his office with piety and integrity. In a few years he was curate at Biddelton, and several other places in the west of England; and, during that time, he wrote his celebrated "Meditations and Contemplations," which he published in 1746, and which have been universally read, and very generally admired. In 1750, on the death of his father, he succeeded to the livings of Weston and Collingtree, and he devoted most of his time in attention to the duties of his profession. In 1753, he published "Remarks on Lord Bolingbroke's Letters on the Study and Use of History, so far as they relate to the History of the Old Testament, &c.;" in a Letter to a Lady of Quality; and a recommendatory Preface to Burnham's Pious Memorials. In 1755, he published his "Theron and Aspasio," which is regarded as decidedly the best effort of his genius; but it was attacked by Mr. Robert Sandeman, of Edinburgh, with extraordinary ability, on the nature of justifying faith, and other points connected with it, in a work, entitled, "Letters on Theron and Aspasio," two volumes. (See SANDEMAN.) This attack threw Mr. Hervey into the arms of Mr. W. Cudworth, a dissenting minister in London, in whom he found a powerful coadjutor; but Mr. Hervey does not appear to have understood Cudworth's system, which, in some important points, was very different from his own, though they were agreed in making appropriation essential to the nature of true faith.

The health of Mr. Hervey was generally imperfect, and for many years he was the subject of affliction; till, at length, on December the 25th, 1758, his labors were terminated by death, and his spirit, emancipated from the burdens of mortality, was conducted to regions of purity and peace.

Mr. Hervey's writings have had an extensive circulation; for many years the press could with difficulty supply the demand for them. Yet his style has been severely censured by Dr. Blair, and others, for its rigid qualities.

Of his character, however, there is little difference of opinion. He was eminently pious, though not deeply learned; habitually spiritually minded; zealous for the doctrines of divine grace; animated with ardent love to the Savior; and his humility, meekness, submission to the will of God, and patience under his afflicting hand, exemplified the Christian character, and adorned his profession. His writings were collected and published after his death, in six volumes, octavo and duodecimo, and have often been reprinted in both sizes. See Ryland's Life of Hervey; Letters of Hervey, and Life prefixed.—Jones' Christ.

HESHBON; a celebrated city of the Ammonites, twenty miles east of Jordan, Josh. 13: 17. It was given to Reuben; but was afterwards transferred to Gad, and then to the Levites. It had been conquered from the Moabites, by Sihon, and was taken by the Israelites a little before the death of Moses. After the ten tribes were transplanted into the country beyond Jordan, the Moabites recovered it. Pliny and Jerome assign it to Arabia. Solomon speaks of the pool of Heshboo, Cant. 7: 4. The town still subsists under its ancient name, and is situated, according to Burckhardt, on a hill.—Calmet.

HESYCASTS, or QUIETISTS; certain eastern monks, so called from the Greek word hēsychazō, which signifies to be quiet. Their distinguishing tenet was that of the Messalians, who maintained that, abandoning all labor, we should give ourselves wholly to religious exercises, especially to contemplation. They appeared about Constantinople in the year 1340; and because they fixed their eyes upon their belly, while engaged in prayer, regarding the same as the seat of the soul, they were likewise called Omphalopsychi or Umbilici. They were joined by Gregory Palamas, archbishop of Thessalonica, who was attacked by the monk Barlaam, and the order was condemned in a synod held at Constantinople, in the year 1342.—H. Buck.

HESYCHIUS, a lexicographer, appears to have been a native of Alexandria; but whether he existed in the fourth or the sixth century is doubtful. He compiled a lexicon, which is considered as one of the most valuable treasures of the Greek language.—Davenport.

HETERODOX, (thinking otherwise;) something contrary to the faith or doctrine established in what has been accounted the true church. (See ORTHODOX).—Hend. Buck.

HETEROUSII, HETEROUSIANS, (of other essence;) a sect or branch of Arians, the followers of Aëtius, and from him denominated Aëtians. (See AETIANS.) They were called the Heterousii, because they held, not that the Son of God was of a substance like, or similar to, that of the Father, which was the doctrine of another branch of Arians, thence called Homousians, Homoousii; but that he was of another substance different from that of the Father.—Watson.

HETH, father of the Hittites, was eldest son of Canaan, and dwelt south of the promised land, at or near Hebron, Ephron, or Hebron, was of the race of Heth; and that city, in Abraham's time, was peopled by the children of Heth. Some think there was a city called Heth; but we find no traces of it in Scripture.—Calmet.

HEXAPLA; a Bible disposed in six columns, containing the text, and divers versions thereof, compiled and published by Origen, with a view to secure the sacred text from future corruptions, and to correct those that had been already introduced. Eusebius relates that Origen, after his return from Rome under Caracalla, applied himself to learn Hebrew, and began to collect the several versions that had been made of the sacred writings, and of these to compose his Tetrapla and Hexapla; others, however, will not allow him to have begun till the time of Alexander, after he had retired into Palestine, about the year 213. To conceive what this Hexapla was, it must be observed, that, besides the translation of the sacred writings, called the Septuagint, made under Ptolemy Philadelphus, above 280 years before Christ, the Scripture had been since translated into Greek by other interpreters. The first of these versions, or (reckoning the Septuagint) the second, was that of Aquila, a proselyte Jew, the first edition of which he published in the 12th year of the emperor Adrian, or about the year of Christ 128; the third was that of Symmachus, published, as is commonly supposed, under Marcus Aurelius, but as some say, under Septimius Severus, about the year 200; the fourth was that of Theodotian, prior to that of Symmachus, under Commodus, or about the year 175. These Greek versions, says Dr. Ken- nicott, were made by the Jews from their corrupted copies of the Hebrew, and were designed to stand in the place of the Seventy, against which they were prejudiced, because it seemed to favor the Christians. The fifth was found at Jericho, in the reign of Caracalla, about the year 217; and the sixth was discovered at Nicopolis, in the reign of Alexander Severus, about the year 228; lastly, Origen himself recovered part of a seventh, containing only the Psalms. Now, Origen, who had held frequent disputations with the Jews in Egypt and Palestine, observing that they always objected to those passages of Scripture quoted against them, appealed to the Hebrew text, the better to vindicate those passages, and confound the Jews, by showing that the Seventy had given the sense of the Hebrew; or rather to show, by a number of different versions, what the real sense of the Hebrew was, undertook to reduce all these several versions into a body, along with the Hebrew text, so as they might be easily confronted, and afford a mutual light to each other. He made the Hebrew text his standard; and allowing that corruptions might have happened, and that the old Hebrew copies might and did read differently, he contented himself with marking such words or sentences as were not in his Hebrew text, nor the later Greek versions, and adding such words or sentences as were omitted in the Seventy, prefixing an asterisk to the additions, and an obelisk to the others. In order to this, he made choice of eight columns; in the first he made the Hebrew text, in Hebrew characters; in the second, the same text in Greek characters; the rest were filled with the several versions above mentioned; all the columns answering verse for verse, and phrase for phrase; and in the Psalms there was a ninth column for the seventh version. This work Origen called Hexapla, or work of six columns, as only regarding the first six Greek versions. Epiphanius, taking in likewise the two columns of the text, calls the work Octapla, as consisting of eight columns. This celebrated work, which Montfaucon imagines consisted of sixty large volumes, perished long ago; probably with the library at Cesarea, where it was preserved in the year 653; though several of the ancient writers have preserved us pieces thereof, particularly Chrysostom on the Psalms, Phileponus in his Hexameron, &c. Some modern writers have earnestly endeavored to collect fragments of the Hexapla, particularly Flaminius, Nobilius, Drusius, and F. Montfaucon, in two folio volumes, printed at Paris, in 1713. An edition was also published by Bahrtdt, in two volumes octavo, which is convenient for reference.—Hend. Buck.

HEYLIN, (PETER;) a divine, was born, in 1600, at Burford, in Oxfordshire; was educated at Hart Hall and Magdalen college, Oxford; obtained various livings and clerical offices through the patronage of Laud, from which he was expelled by the republicans; was the editor of the Mercurius Aulicus, the royalist paper; recovered his preferments at the restoration; and died in 1662. Among his works are, Lives of Laud, and of Charles I.; Histories of the Presbyterians, and of the Reformation of the Church of England; and a Help to English History.—Davenport.

HEYWOOD, (OLIVER;) an eminent minister among the non-conformists of the seventeenth century, was born in March, 1629, at Little Lever, in the parish of Bolton, Lancashire. Soon after leaving the university, he began to preach occasionally in his own neighborhood, and received an invitation to Coley chapel, in the parish of Halifax, which he accepted, and on the 23d of June, 1652, he was solemnly invested with the pastoral office. This was the period of Oliver Cromwell's protectorate, and it was a most trying time to many of the fearers of God, and to Mr. Heywood among the rest. He, however, continued his ministerial functions for about ten years, and kept his station amidst the turbulence of those distracted times. The prudence of Mr. Heywood led him studiously to avoid, as much as possible, all meddling with the political disputes which were agitated in his day; but he was involved with the rest of his brethren in the act of uniformity, passed in August, 1662, and ejected from his living. In 1664, a writ was issued for his apprehension as an excommunicated person, but he evaded his pursuers, and found safety in the bosom of his friends. During this trying period he was reduced to great straits and difficulties to provide for his family, consisting of a wife and several children, the means of subsistence; but he who feeds the ravens, and clothes the lilies of the field, wonderfully interposed for them, and sent them relief from unexpected quarters. It would carry us much too far into detail to trace the history of this good man, in his sufferings for conscience' sake, the privations and hardships to which he was exposed, to the period of his death, which took place on the 4th of May, 1702, in the seventy-third year of his age. He was the author of numerous detached publications, which have recently been carefully collected and reprinted, with a memoir of his life, in five volumes, octavo, by the Rev. Mr. Vint, master of a dissenting academy at Bradford, in Yorkshire.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

HEZEKIAH, the virtuous king of Judah, was the son of Ahaz, and born in the year of the world 3251. At the age of five-and-twenty he succeeded his father in the government of the kingdom of Judah, and reigned twenty-nine years in Jerusalem, namely, from the year of the world 3277 to 3306, 2 Kings 18: 1, 2. 2 Chron. 29: 1. His reign is distinguished by the glorious reformation from idolatry—the rapid progress of public improvements—the overthrow of the Assyrian power in Judea—Hezekiah's miraculous recovery from sickness—his weakness when left of God to his own heart—and the prophetic declaration of its fatal consequences in the Babylonish captivity.

Hezekiah bowed submissively to the will of God, and acknowledged the divine goodness towards him, in ordaining peace and truth to continue during the remainder of his reign, 2 Chron. 32: 31. He accordingly passed the latter years of his life in tranquillity, and contributed greatly to the prosperity of his people and kingdom. He died in the year of the world 3306, leaving behind him a son, Manasseh, who succeeded him in the throne: a son every way unworthy of such a father.—Watson.

HIACOMES, the first Indian in New England who was converted to Christianity, and a minister at Martha's Vineyard, lived upon this island when a few English families first settled there, in 1642. Under the instruction of Thomas Mayhew, he eagerly received the truths of the gospel. Having learned to read, he in 1645 began to teach his brethren the Christian doctrines, and he did not labor in vain. A number of them were soon impressed with a sense of their guilt in living as they had lived, and sought for pardon from him who is the propitiation for the sins of the world.

The sachems and pawaws, or priests, did not observe this progress of Christianity with indifference. While the latter threatened to destroy all the praying Indians with witchcraft, their menaces were particularly directed against Hiacomés; but he said to them, "I believe in God, and put my trust in him, and therefore all the pawaws can do me no hurt." In 1650, when he lost a young child, the funeral was performed in the English manner. The mourners did not discolor their faces, nor deposit any tentsils or goods in the grave, nor howl over the dead. After the death of Mr. Mayhew, in 1657, he continued his benevolent labors, though he greatly lamented the loss of that good man, by whom he had been enlightened in the knowledge of the truth, and whose instructions gave him the power of instructing others. August 22, 1670, an Indian church was regularly formed on Martha's Vineyard, and Hiacomés and Tackanash were ordained its pastor and teacher by Eliot and Cotton. Hiacomés survived his colleague, and died about the year 1690, aged near eighty. In his last sickness he expressed the hopes of a Christian, and gave exhortations to those around; and at his death he without doubt entered into that rest, from which many of the learned and refined, who love not the Lord Jesus Christ, will be excluded. Mayhew's Indian Conv.; Martha's Magnalia, iii. 199.—Allen.

HICKS, (ELIAS), a Quaker, died at Jericho, Long Island, February 27, 1830, aged eighty-one. His wife, Jimema, with whom he had lived in harmony fifty-eight years, died in 1829. In the last years of his life he was the cause, by some new doctrines of a Socinian cast, which he advanced, of a great discord and division among the Friends.—

HIDDEKEL. (See EDEN.)

HIDE; (1.) To cover, to keep secret: so God hides his commandments, when he shows not their meaning, Ps. 119: 19. To hide his righteousness in our heart, is sinfully to neglect the due publishing and declaring of it, Ps. 40: 10. (2.) To lay up: so saints hide God's word in their heart when they lay it up in their memories, judgments, consciences, and affections, that it may influence and regulate their whole exercise in heart and life, Ps. 119: 11. (3.) To protect. God hides his people in his pavilion, in the secret of his presence, and under the shadow of his wings; and is their hiding-place when, in the exercise of his perfections, he gives them the most safe and refreshing protection from danger and hurt, Ps. 27: 3, and 32: 7. Jesus Christ is a hiding-place; under the covert of his righteousness are we secured from the vengeance of God: and by his providence, power, and love, are we secured from the danger of sin, Satan, and the world, Isa. 32: 2. God hides himself, hides his face, when he forbears kindly to show his favor in his word, ordinances and providence, Ps. 89: 46. Whatever is secret, hard to be known, or found, is called hid or hidden: saints are God's hidden ones; their state and happy privileges are unknown to the world, and they are protected of God, Ps. 83: 3. The gospel and Christ are a hidden treasure, and hidden wisdom, unknown to natural men, Matt. 13: 41. 1 Cor. 2: 7.—Brown.

HIEL, of Bethel, rebuilt Jericho, notwithstanding the predictive curse of Joshua against the person who should attempt it, and of which he experienced the effects, by losing his eldest son Abiram, while laying the foundations, and his youngest son Segub, when hanging up the gates. (See ABIRAM: and JERICHO).—Calmet.

HIERACITES; heretics in the third century, so called from their leader, Hierax, a philosopher of Egypt, who taught that Melchisedec was the Holy Ghost, denied the resurrection, and condemned marriage.—Head. Buck.

HIERAPOLIS; a city of Phrygia, not far from Colosse and Laodicea, Colos. 4: 13. "Hierapolis, (now called by the Turks Pambuck-Kulasi, or the Cotton Tower, by reason of the white cliffs lying thereabouts,) a city of the greater Phrygia, lies under a high hill to the north, having to the southward of it a fair and large plain about five miles over, almost directly opposite to Laodicea, the river Lycus running between, but nearer the latter; now utterly forsaken and desolate, but whose ruins are so glorious and magnificent, that they strike one with horror at the first view of them, and with admiration too; such walls, and arches, and pillars of so vast a height, and so curiously wrought, being still to be found there, that one may well judge, that when it stood, it was one of the most glorious cities not only in the East, but of the world. The numerousness of the temples there erected in the times of idolatry with so much art and cost, might sufficiently confirm the title of the holy city, which it at first derived from the hot waters flowing from several springs, to which they ascribed a divine healing virtue, and which made the city so famous; and for this cause Apollo, whom both Greeks and Romans adored as the god of medicine, had his votaries and altars here, and was very probably their chief deity. Several tombs still remain: some of them almost entire, very stately and glorious, as if it had been accounted a kind of sacrilege to injure the dead, and upon that account they had abstained from defacing their monuments; entire stones of a great length and height, some covered with stone shaped into the form of a cube, others ridge-wise. On the 14th in the morning, we set forward for Colosse, where within an hour and a half we arrived." Travels by T. Smith, B. D. 1678.—Calmet.

HIERARCHY; an ecclesiastical establishment, or a church governed by priests, from hier, (sacred), and arche, (government.) Though elders, called presbyters and bishops, stood at the head of the primitive churches, yet their constitution was democratic, each of the members having a share in all the concerns of the association, and voting in the election of office-bearers, the admission of new members, and the expulsion of offenders. Soon, however, the government was transferred into the hands of the officers, or, more properly speaking, was assumed by them; and, in the second century, some of their number, arrogating to themselves exclusively the title of bishops, acquired a superiority over the other presbyters, though these, and, in many cases, all the members of the churches, retained some share in the government. The bishops residing in the capitals of provinces soon acquired a superiority over the provincial bishops, and were called metropolitans. They, in their turn, became subject to a still higher order, termed patriarchs; and thus a complete aristocratic constitution was formed, which continues in the Greek church to this day; but in the Latin it was speedily transformed into a monarchy, centring in the person of the pope.

Besides thus designating the internal government of the church, the term hierarchy is sometimes used to denote the dominion of the church over the state. In the first centuries the church had no connexion with the state, and was for the most part persecuted by it. After its amalgamation with it, under Constantine the Great, it obtained protection, but was dependent on the temporal ruler, who asserted the right of convoking general councils, and nominating the metropolitans, and otherwise frequently interfering in the internal affairs of the church. It was the same in the Gothic, Lombard, and Frankish states. The hierarchical power, however, was incessantly at work; Gregory VII. especially, exerted himself to enforce its claims. It was greatly promoted by the crusades; and thus, from the end of the eleventh to the middle of the thirteenth century, the hierarchical influence was rendered predominant. The church became an institution elevated above the state, and stood, in public opinion, above all secular princes. The papal tiara was the sun; the imperial crown the moon. From the fourteenth century the hierarchy began gradually to decline; it was shaken almost to its foundations by the attacks of the reformers; and the remains of its principles, as still existing in the different Protestant establishments, as well as in the Roman, are daily becoming more and more weakened by the influence of public opinion, and a firm determination, on the part of the people, to obtain the full enjoyment of those civil and religious rights, which have been arrogantly and wantonly wrested from them.

The word is also used in reference to the subordination some suppose there is among the angels; but whether they are to be considered as having a government or hierarchy among themselves, so that one is superior in office and dignity to others; or whether they have a kind of dominion over one another; or whether some are made partakers of privileges others are deprived of, cannot be determined, since Scripture is silent as to this matter, Col. 1: 16, &c.—Hend. Buck.

HIERONYMITES, or JEROMITES; hermits of the order of St. Jerome, established in 1373, which wears a white habit with a black scapulary. In the Netherlands, and in Spain, where it was devoted to a contemplative life, and possessed among other convents the splendid one of St. Laurence, in the Escorial, the sepulchre of the kings, this order became one of the most opulent and considerable. In Sicily, the West Indies, and Spanish America, it possesses convents.—Hend. Buck.

HIGGAION signifies meditation, and imports that what is said deserves to be carefully and frequently thought upon, Ps. 9: 16.—Brown.

HIGGINSON, (FRANCIS,) first minister of Salem, Massachusetts, after receiving his education at Emanuel college, in Cambridge, became the minister of a church at Leicester, in England. While his popular talents filled his church with attentive hearers, such was the divine blessing upon his labors, that a deep attention to religious subjects was excited among his people. Becoming at length a conscientious non-conformist to the rites of the English church, some of which he thought not only were unsupported by Scripture, but corrupted the purity of Christian worship and discipline, he was excluded from the parish church, and became obnoxious to the high commission court. One day two messengers came to his house, and with loud knocks cried out, "Where is Mr. Higginson? We must speak with Mr. Higginson!" His wife ran to his chamber and entreated him to conceal himself; but he replied, that he should acquiesce in the will of God. He went down, and as the messengers entered the hall they presented him with some papers, saying in a rough manner, "Sir, we came from London, and our business is to convey you to London, as you may see by those papers." "I thought so," exclaimed Mrs. Higginson, weeping; but a woman's tears could have but little effect upon hard-hearted pursuivants. Mr. Higginson opened the packet to read the form of his arrest, but, instead of an order from bishop Laud for his seizure, he found a copy of the charter of Massachusetts, and letters from the governor and company, inviting him to embark with them for New England. The sudden transition of feeling from despondence to joy, may be better imagined than described.

Having sought advice and implored the divine direction, he resolved to accept the invitation. In his farewell sermon, preached before a vast assembly, he declared his persuasion, that England would be chastised by war, and that Leicester would have more than an ordinary share of sufferings. It was not long before his prediction was verified. It is not meant, that he claimed the power of foretelling future events; but he could reason with considerable accuracy from cause to effect, knowing that iniquity is generally followed by its punishment; and he lived in an age, when it was usual for ministers to speak with more confidence, and authority, and efficacy, than at present. He sailed from Gravesend, April 25, 1629, accompanied by Mr. Skelton, whose principles accorded with his own. When he came to the land's end, he called his children and the other passengers on deck to take the last view of their native country; and he now exclaimed, "Farewell England, farewell the church of God in England, and all the Christian friends there. We do not go to America as separatists from the church of England, though we cannot but separate from its corruptions." He then concluded with a fervent prayer for the king, church, and state in England. He arrived at Cape Ann, June 27, 1629, and having spent the next day there, which was Sunday, on the 29th he entered the harbor of Salem. July the 20th was observed as a day of fasting by the appointment of governor Endicott, and the church then made choice of Mr. Higginson to be their teacher, and Mr. Skelton their pastor.

Thus auspicious was the commencement of the settlement of Naumkeag, or Salem; but the scene was soon changed. During the first winter about one hundred persons died, and Mr. Higginson was soon seized with a hectic, which terminated his days in August, 1630, aged forty-two. In his last sickness he was reminded of his benevolent exertions in the service of the Lord Jesus Christ. To consoling suggestions of this kind he replied, "I have been an unprofitable servant, and all my desire is to win Christ, and be found in him, not having my own righteousness." Magnalia, i. 18, 19; iii. 79—75; *Collect. HIGH CHURCHMEN; a term first given to the non-jurors, who refused to acknowledge William III. as their lawful king, and who had very proud notions of church power; but it is now commonly used in a more extensive signification, and is applied to all those who, though far from being non-jurors, yet form pompous and ambitious conceptions of the authority and jurisdiction of the church. It has generally been found that, both in the Episcopal and Presbyterian establishments, those who have been most violent in their efforts to uphold and vindicate hierarchical power, and the exclusive claims of the church, have been the most indifferent to the interests of evangelical truth, and the practice of scriptural piety; but within these few years many of those who are in repute as the advocates of gospel-doctrine, have gradually been contracting in their liberality, and assuming an air and tone of high churchmanship, approximating to those of the party who regard them as a kind of half dissenters or schismatics.—Hend. Buck.

HIGH MASS, is that mass which is read before the high altar on Sundays, feast days, and particular occasions, such as the celebration of a victory, &c. (See MASS.)—Hend. Buck.

HIGH PLACES, (banath.) The prophets reproach the Israelites for nothing with more zeal than for worshipping upon the high places. The destroying of these high places is a commendation given only to few princes in Scripture; and many, though zealous for the observance of the law, had not courage to prevent the people from sacrificing upon these eminences. Before the temple was built, the high places were not absolutely contrary to the law, provided God only was there adored, and not idols. They seem to have been tolerated under the judges; and Samuel offered sacrifices in several places where the ark was not present. Even in David's time they sacrificed to the Lord at Shiloh, Jerusalem, and Gibeon. But after the temple was built at Jerusalem, and the ark had a fixed settlement, it was no longer allowed to sacrifice out of Jerusalem. The high places were much frequented in the kingdom of Israel. The people sometimes went upon those mountains which had been sanctified by the presence of patriarchs and prophets, and by appearances of God, to worship the true God there. This worship was lawful, except as to its being exercised where the Lord had not chosen. But they frequently adored idols upon these hills, and committed a thousand abominations in groves, and caves, and tents; and hence arose the zeal of pious kings and prophets to suppress the high places.—Watson.

HILDERSHAM, (ARTHUR,) a Puritan divine, was born at Stechworth, Cambridgeshire, October 6, 1663, of an honorable family. He was brought up a papist; but while at Cambridge university avowed himself a Protestant, and was in consequence cast off by his father. The earl of Huntingdon, a distant kinsman, on hearing of the circumstance, became his patron, and carried him through the university, where he gained great esteem and love by his uncommon piety, learning, ingenuousness and affability, and was chosen divine of Trinity hall. In 1687, he was settled as lecturer at Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire, where (though often persecuted, and forced to change his dwelling) he lived for the most part of forty-three years, with great success in his ministry, and love and reverence of all sorts. He suffered for conscience' sake in 1598, 1605, 1611, 1612, 1616, and 1630, being repeatedly silenced, deprived, censured, and fined to the amount of two thousand pounds. This was the result of the high commission court in the time of James I. and Charles I. He died March 4, 1631, aged sixty-eight. His last words were in reference to 1 Tim. 3: 5, addressing himself to his son, "O son, son, that care of the flock is the main thing."

His character was rich in Christian excellence. His unwearied delight was to do good. He was a close student, frequent in ejaculations, and fervent in prayer. His published works were widely read, and highly esteemed, especially by Dr. Preston, and the celebrated John Cotton. They consist of one hundred and eight lectures on John IV.; eight sermons on Ps. XXXV.; one hundred and fifty-two sermons on Ps. LI., and a Treatise on the Doctrine of the Lord's Supper.—Middleton, vol. ii. p. 25.

HILL, (GEORGE, D. D.,) a divine of the church of Scotland, was born at St. Andrews, in 1748. He was educated in his native place, where he obtained the Greek professorship of St. Salvator's college, and that of divinity in succession. He subsequently became principal of St. Mary's, chaplain to the King for Scotland, and fellow of the Royal society of Edinburgh. He first appeared as an author in a volume of sermons, London, 1795. In 1803 was published an octavo volume, entitled "Theological Institutions;" by the Rev. George Hill, D. D.; and in 1812, "Lectures on portions of the Old Testament, illustrative of the Jewish History," one volume, octavo. But his greatest work, and that by which he will live in the recollection of posterity, is his "Lectures in Divinity," delivered to the students, while principal of St. Mary's college, St. Andrews. These lectures were given to the public, in 1821, in three volumes, octavo, with a short preface by his son. The plan is sufficiently comprehensive, and the execution everywhere discovers the hand of a master. Dr. Hill's doctrinal sentiments were in strict consonance with the standards of the church of Scotland; that is, they corresponded with those of Calvin and Knox. A second edition of this valuable work was published in 1825. Gen's. Mag. and Watt's Bib. Brit.; Pref. to Author's Lectures.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

HILL, (ROWLAND, M. A.,) author of the Village Dialogues. Few men have been more known and honored among Christians of the present age than Rowland Hill, the Whitfield of his time. Few, in any age, have had so long a ministry, or so fruitful in conversions to God. He was born at Hawkstone, in 1744, and educated at Eton and Cambridge. While at Eton he embraced the views of the Calvinistic Methodists, and at Cambridge, before entering into holy orders, he preached in the prison and in private houses; he also preached in the tabernacle and chapel of Whitfield, in London. In imitation of his illustrious patron and pattern, he, soon after entering into orders, began to lift up his voice in a wider sphere of labor—to proclaim the gospel to listening crowds in barns, meeting-houses, and when they were too small, or too distant, or not to be procured, in streets and fields, by the highways and hedges. In 1783, he laid the foundation of Surry chapel, in the Blackfriars road, London, in the duties of which he afterwards spent about the half of each year, employing the rest of the time in provincial excursions. He died in 1833, aged eighty-nine, after a ministry of seventy years.

Mr. Hill was a wonderful, and, with all his eccentricities, an excellent man. His manner only was eccentric, and occasionally facetious; but this never appeared in the subject-matter of his preaching. The propensity to be humorous exceedingly decreased with growing years and experience. A thousand things too of this kind reported of him were false or exaggerated, to point a story or to raise a laugh. His real improprieties were only such as he was led into by the peculiarity of his genius, and his ardent desire to attract and strike, in order that he might save, the neglected multitudes of the lower orders.

Never was there, says Mr. Jay, a preacher who more entirely adhered to the determination to "know nothing save Jesus Christ and him crucified." He was never higher or lower in his sentiments. Truths were always duly balanced in his mind; and his heart was established with grace. He always blended together doctrine, experience, and practice. He fell into no errors. He embraced no whims. He made no new discoveries in religion. He never supposed any were to be made. He never pretended to speak with new tongues; and was never found neglecting his work, to break open the seals and blow the trumpets of the Apocalypse.—Jay's Sermon on Sensibility to the Fall of Eminence; Ency. Amer.; Christian Gazette, May, 1834.

HILLEL, surnamed Hassaken; a famous Jewish rabbi, who lived a little before the time of Christ. He was born at Babylon, B. C. 112, and was the disciple of Shammai. At the age of forty he went to Jerusalem, where he applied himself to the study of the law, and, at the age of fourscore, was made head of the sanhedrim. Of all their ancient doctors, he is unanimously regarded as the most learned in the Jewish laws and traditions. Differing in opinion from his master Shammai, their disciples engaged in the quarrel, and several persons were killed on both sides. By the Jews, Hillel is extolled to the skies, and is said to have educated upwards of a thousand pupils in the knowledge of the law, among whom were thirty who were worthy that the Spirit of God should have rested on them as he did on Moses; thirty who, like Joshua, were worthy to stop the sun in his course; and twenty little inferior to the first, and superior to the second. Rabbi Hillel was one of the compilers of the Talmud, and was the grandfather of Gamaliel, Paul's teacher.—Hend. Buck.

HIN; a Hebrew measure containing half a seah, or the sixth part of a bath: one gallon and two pints. The hin was a liquid measure; as of oil, (Exod. 30. Ezek. 45: 46.) or of wine, Exod. 29. Lev. 23. The prophet Ezekiel was commanded to drink an allowance of water to the quantity of the sixth part of a hin, that is, one pint, nine teen thousand six hundred and seventy-two solid inches.—Culmet.

HIND, (aish; Gen. 49: 21. 2 Sam. 23: 31. Job 39: 1. Ps. 18: 33. 29: 9. Prov. 5: 19. Cant. 2: 7. 3: 5. Jer. 14: 5. Hab. 3: 19.) the male or female of the stag. It is a lovely creature, and of an elegant shape. It is noted for its swiftness and the sureness of its step as it jumps among the rocks. David and Habakkuk both allude to this character of the hind: "The Lord maketh my feet like hind's feet, and causeth me to stand on the high places," Ps. 18:

33. Hab. 3: 19. The circumstance of their standing on the high places or mountains is applied to these animals by Xenophon. Our translators make Jacob, prophesying of the tribe of Naphtali, say, "Naphtali is a hind let loose: he giveth goodly words," Gen. 49: 21. There is a difficulty and incoherence here, which the learned Bochart remedies by altering a little the punctuation of the original; and it then reads, "Naphtali is a spreading tree, shooting forth beautiful branches." This, indeed, renders the simile uniform; but another critic has remarked, that "the allusion to a tree seems to be purposely reserved by the venerable patriarch for his son Joseph, who is compared to the boughs of a tree; and the repetition of the idea in reference to Naphtali is every way unlikely. For these reasons he proposes to read the passage, "Naphtali is a deer roaming at liberty: he shooteth forth spreading branches," or "majestic antlers." Here the distinction of imagery is preserved, and the fecundity of the tribe and the fertility of their lot intimated. In our version of Ps. 29: 9, we read, "The voice of the Lord maketh the binds to calve, and discovereth the forests." Mr. Merrick, in an ingenious note on the place, attempts to justify the rendering; but bishop Lowth, in his "Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews," observes that this agrees very little with the rest of the imagery, either in nature or dignity; and that he does not feel himself persuaded, even by the reasonings of the learned Bochart on this subject: whereas the oak, struck with lightning, admirably agrees with the context. The Syriac seems, for alveh, hinds, to have read alveh, oaks, or rather, perhaps, terbinths. The passage may be thus versified:—

"Hark! his voice in thunder breaks,
And the lofty mountain quakes;
Mighty trees the tempests tear,
And lay the spreading forests bare!"

HINDOOISM, or BRAHMINISM. "The Hindoo religion, in one form or other, (says Mr. Ward, the missionary,) it is highly probable, is professed by more than half the human race: the doctrines of the Vedu, it is well known, are acknowledged all over India; the religion of Boodh, a Hindoo incarnation, prevails throughout the Burman empire, Siam, Ceylon, &c. Lamaism, spread throughout Tartary, may also be traced to a Hindoo origin; and if, as is conjectured, the Fo of the Chinese be the Boodh of India, then it will be evident, that for more than half the population of the world remain under the influence of the superstitions taught in the Vedu." (See BUDDHISTS; Fo, &c.)

Mr. Maurice, in his elaborate work, entitled, "A History of the Antiquities of India," (6 vols. 8vo.) traced the origin of the Hindoo nation, and developed their religious system. The following imperfect sketch of the religion of Hindostan, is chiefly taken from that author.

He supposes that the first migration of mankind took place before the confusion of tongues at Babel, from the region of Ararat, where the ark rested. By the time the earth became sufficiently dry, either Noah himself, or some descendant of Shem, gradually led on the first journey to the western frontiers of India; that this increasing colony flourished for a long succession of ages in primitive happiness and innocence; practised the purest rites of the patriarchal religion, without images and temples, till at length the descendants of Ham invaded and conquered India, and corrupted their ancient religion.

According to the Hindoo theology, Brahme, the great Being, is the supreme, eternal, uncreated God. Brama, the first created being, by whom he made and governs the world, is the prince of the beneficent spirits. He is assisted by Veeshnu, the great preserver of men, who, nine several times, appeared upon earth, and under a human form, for the most beneficent purposes. Veeshnu is often styled Creeshna, the Indian Apollo, and in his character greatly resembles the Mithra of Persia. This prince of benevolent Dewtas, (or demons,) has for a coadjutor Mahadeo, or Seeva, the destroying power of God. And this threefold divinity, armed with the terrors of almighty power, pursue through the whole extent of creation the rebellious Dewtas, headed by Mahasoor, the great malignant spirit who seduced them, and dart upon their flying bands the fiery shafts of divine vengeance.

According to Sir William Jones, the supreme god Brahme, in his triple form, is the only self-existent divinity acknowledged by the philosophical Hindoos. When they consider the divine power as exerted in giving existence to that which existed not before, they call the deity Brahme. When they view him in the light of destroyer, or rather changer of forms, he is called Mahadeo, Seeva, and by various other names. When they consider him as the preserver of created things, they give him the name of Veeshnu; for since the power of preserving creation by a superintending providence belongs eminently to the god-head, they hold that power to exist transcendently in the preserving member of the triad, whom they suppose to be always everywhere; not in substance, but in spirit and energy.

Following the leading ideas of Sir William Jones, Mr. Maurice asserts, that there is a perpetual recurrence of the sacred triad in the Asiatic mythology; that the doctrine of a trinity was promulgated in India, in the geeta, fifteen hundred years before the birth of Plato; for that remote date are the Elephanta cavern, of which we present an engraving, and the Indian history of Mahabharat, in which a triad of deity is alluded to and designated. Hence he supposes that the doctrine of a trinity was delivered from the ancient patriarchs, and diffused over the East during the migration and dispersion of their Hebrew posterity.

But to return to Hindooism, we are told the nine incarnations of Veeshnu, represent the deity descending in a human shape to accomplish certain awful and important events, as in the instance of the three first; to confound blaspheming vice, to subvert gigantic tyranny, and to avenge oppressed innocence, as in the five following; or finally, as in the ninth, to abolish human sacrifices.

The Hindoo system teaches the existence of good and evil genii, or, in the language of Hindostan, debtas, devatas, or devitas. These are represented as eternally conflicting together; and the incessant conflict which subsisted between them, filled creation with uproar, and all its subordinate classes with dismay.

The doctrine of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, is universally believed in India, from which country it is supposed to have originated many centuries before the birth of Plato, and was first promulgated in the geeta of Uyasa, the Plato of India. This doctrine teaches that degenerate spirits, fallen from their original rectitude, migrate through various spheres, in the bodies of different animals.

The Hindoos suppose that there are fourteen bobuns, or spheres; seven below, and seven above the earth. The spheres above the earth are gradually ascending. The highest is the residence of Brama and his particular favorites. After the soul transmigrates through various animal mansions, it ascends up the great sidereal ladder of seven gates, and through the revolving spheres, which are called in India the bobuns of purification.

It is the invariable belief of the Bramins, that man is a fallen creature. Their doctrine of the transmigration of the soul is built upon this foundation. The professed design of the metempsychosis was to restore the fallen soul to its pristine state of perfection and blessedness. The Hindoos represent the deity as punishing only to reform his creatures. Nature itself exhibits one vast field of purgatory for the classes of existence. Their sacred writings represent the whole universe as an ample and august theatre for the probationary exertion of millions of beings, who are supposed to be so many spirits degraded from the high honors of angelical distinction, and condemned to ascend, through various gradations of toil and suffering, to that exalted sphere of perfection and happiness which they enjoyed before their defection.

It is supposed that Pythagoras derived his doctrine of transmigration from the Indian Bramins; for in the Institutes of Menu, said to be compiled many centuries before Pythagoras was born, there is a long chapter on transmigration and final beatitude. It is there asserted, that so far as vital souls, addicted to sensuality, indulge themselves in forbidden pleasures, even to the same degree shall the acuteness of their senses be raised in their future bodies, that they may suffer analogous pain.

This doctrine, so universally prevalent in Asia, that man is a fallen creature, gave birth to the persuasion, that by severe sufferings, and a long series of probationary discipline, the soul might be restored to its primitive purity. Hence, oblations the most costly, and sacrifices the most sanguinary, in the hope of propitiating the angry powers, forever loaded the altars of the pagan deities. They had even sacrifices denominated those of regeneration, and those sacrifices were always profusely stained with blood.

The Hindoos suppose that the vicious are consigned to perpetual punishment in the animation of successive animal forms, till, at the stated period, another renovation of the four yugs, or grand astronomical periods, shall commence upon the dissolution of the present. Then they are called to begin anew the probationary journey of souls, and all will be finally happy.

The destruction of the existing world by fire is another tenet of the Bramins.

Besides their various and frequent ablutions, and the daily offerings of rice, fruits, and ghee, at the pagodas, the Hindoos have a grand annual sacrifice, not very unlike that of the scape-goat among the Hebrews, only that it is a horse, and not a goat, which they offer with great ceremony.

The temples, or pagodas, for divine worship in India, are magnificent; and their religious rites are pompous and splendid. Since the Hindoos admit that the deity occasionally assumes an elementary form, without defiling his purity, they make various idols to assist their magi-nations, when they offer up their prayers to the invisible deity.

From the same conviction of human depravity, and the necessity of atonement, arises the practice of voluntary torture which they inflict upon themselves. Mr. Swartz, one of the Malabarian missionaries, who was instrumental in converting two thousand persons to the Christian religion, relates, that a certain man on the Malabar coast had inquired of various devotees and priests how he might make atonement; and at last he was directed to drive iron spikes, sufficiently blunted, through his sandals; and on these spikes he was to place his naked feet, and walk about four hundred and eighty miles. If, through loss of blood, or weakness of body, he was necessitated to halt, he was obliged to wait for healing and strength. He undertook his journey; and while he halted under a large shady tree, where the gospel was sometimes preached, one of the missionaries came and preached in his hearing from these words: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseeth from all sin." While he was preaching, the man rose up, threw off his torturing sandals, and cried out aloud, This is what I want; and he became a living witness of the truth of that passage of Scripture, which had such a happy effect upon his mind. See Baptist Annual Register for 1791.

Mr. Ward, one of the Baptist missionaries at Serampore, has published an elaborate work on "the Religion, History, and Literature of the Hindoos," which it would be unpardonable not to notice; and we shall avail ourselves of a summary of their principles, as given in his "Farewell Letters, on returning to India."

We have already mentioned, under the term Castes, the various tribes into which the nation is divided. As to the number of their gods, it is stated by Mr. Ward at three hundred and thirty millions; and their representative idols are diversified into almost every form the imagination could suggest: some highly ridiculous, (as the monkey gods,) and others grossly obscene, as the Lingu, the Phallus of Hindostan. This is worshipped by the women to promote fruitfulness.

Kartikeya, the god of war, is represented as riding on a peacock, with six faces and twelve arms, and presents a singular specimen of the curious manner in which the Hindoos portray their deities.

Their sects were numerously diversified, but the following three are stated as the principal:—

1. The Saivus, the worshippers of Shivu, who is represented as a white man, with five faces and four arms, riding on a bull. In one hand he holds an axe to destroy the wicked; in a second, a deer, alluding to one said to have fled from sacrifice, and taken refuge under his protection, &c. He resembles the Greek Bacchus, both in his form, and the obscenity of his rites.

Shivu and his wife Doorga.

2. The Voisnavus, or worshippers of Vishnu, who is drawn as a black man with four arms, sitting on a monster called Guroora. He bears in his hands the sacred shell, the chukra, the lotus, and a club. Vishnu is called the preserver, and though without temples, has the greatest number of worshippers.

3. The Shaktus, or worshippers of Doorga, the wife of Shivu, who is represented as a yellow female, with arms, (holding weapons,) and sitting on a bier. She is the Minerva of India, and her festivals are numerously attended. The Brahmans have chiefly worshippers of Shivu and Doorga.

Beside these, there are two other sects of some celebrity. 1. The Sourus, or worshippers of Sooryu, or the sun; and, 2. The Ganuputyus, or worshippers of Guneshu, a fat, short, red man, with four arms and an elephant's head, sitting on a rat; a very popular and common idol.

But these are merely images to amuse the vulgar: the Brahmans have a secret doctrine, as well as the Greek philosophers; and that doctrine, according to Mr. Ward, is a specious atheism:—

"Three of the six schools of philosophy once famous in India, were atheistical. The doctrines of these atheists were established, for a considerable period, in India; and they are still taught in the Boodhist system which prevails throughout China, Japan, the Burman empire, Siam, Ceylon, &c. What an awful thought, that three hundred millions of the human race are, to this hour, under a system of avowed atheism! (See BUDHISM.)

"A view of the speculations of the Hindoo theists, or Brahminism, will unfold a system little better, I presume, than atheism.

"These philosophers, of whom Vedras, the compiler of the Védu, was one of the most distinguished, taught that every thing we can see, or form any conception of, is to be referred to one or the other of these two principles: it is either spirit or matter; since, besides these, nothing else exists: that all spirit is God; that God exists, without attributes, in a state of eternal repose, intangible, unconnected with any forms of matter. A state of profound sleep, in which the individual has no mental exercise whatever, and the state of the unruffled ocean, are alluded to by this philosopher as emblems of the state and blessedness of spirit. Speculations, like these, making known a being without attributes, and having no connexion with creatures, is surely nothing better than pure atheism; nor is the practical system founded on these theories an atom better than the theory.

"These philosophers further teach, that the spirit in man is individuated deity; that, in this connexion with matter, spirit is degraded and imprisoned; that the great and only business of man on earth is to seek emancipation, and return to the blessed source from which he (that is, spirit; for I, thou, and he, are referable only to spirit) has been severed. (See PANTHEISM.)

"The mode of obtaining emancipation, is by the practice of the ceremonies denominated jogee, all which ceremonies are connected with bodily austerities, having for their object the annihilation of all conscious connexion with the body, and with material things. Deliverance from the influence of the body, and all material things, will leave spirit, even while in the body, in a state of divine tranquility, resembling that of God; (for the passions alone are the sources of pain;) and will fit the individuated spirit for reunion to God; for the passions are the sources of life and death, and confine the individuated spirit to a continued course of transmigration, and rivet its union to matter.

"And now comes a long list of these jogees, exhibited to us as practising these austerities, which are intended to extinguish all attachments, all desires, all cherished union between the spirit and the body, and between the spirit and the material existences with which it is surrounded. We see these jogees retiring to forests, renouncing all communion with other beings, living in solitude and silence, inflicting on the body the most shocking austerities, and increasing as the body is able to bear them, till the poor wretches sink under the experiment."

This, however, is still not the worst part of Hindooism:

the following is a sketch of its farther cruelties, from the same pen as the above:—

“One tribe puts to death its female offspring! A few were saved by the benevolent efforts of colonel Walker, when in India; but, since his return, the very families among whom the horrible practice had ceased, have again returned to the work of murder; not one survives. In and around Benares, infanticide is practised to a horrible extent.

“Instigated by the demon of superstition, many mothers, in fulfilment of a vow entered into for the purpose of procuring the blessing of children, drown their first-born! When the child is two or three years old, the mother takes it to the river, encourages it to enter, as though about to bathe it, but suffers it to pass into the midst of the current, when she abandons it, and stands an inactive spectator, beholding the struggles, and hearing the screams, of her perishing infant! At Sangur island, formerly, mothers were seen casting their living offspring among a number of alligators, and standing to gaze on these monsters quarrelling for their prey; beholding the writhing infant in the jaws of the successful animal, and standing motionless while it was breaking the bones, and sucking the blood, of the poor innocent! What must be that superstition, which can thus transform a being, whose distinguishing quality is tenderness, into a monster, more unnatural than the tiger prowling through the forests for its prey?

“The Hindoo writings encourage persons, afflicted with incurable distempers, to cast themselves under the wheels own head. An English officer assured a friend of mine, that he saw a Hindoo sacrifice himself in a boat in the Ganges: laying his head over the side of the boat, with a scimitar he aimed a dreadful blow at his own neck; and though he failed to sever the head from the body, he fell senseless into the river, and perished!

“Human sacrifices, not very different from these, are still very common, especially at Allahabad. While the late Dr. Robinson, of Calcutta, resided at that place, twelve men were immolated at once, as sixteen females had been. Earthen pans were fastened to a stick tied to the waist. As long as these pans remained empty, they kept the men afloat; but each man with a cup continued filling the pans from the river; and, as soon as filled, they dragged the victim to the bottom.

“But the most horrible of all the immolations among the Hindoos, is the burning alive of widows; between eight and nine hundred, in the presidency of Bengal alone, every year! This is the official statement, signed by the English magistrates. How many in the presidencies of Madras and Bombay? And then how many more, where the British power does not extend? Where shall we find any thing like this in all the annals of time? Let us suppose, that in each of the other presidencies four hundred each year are immolated, and five hundred in all the other parts of India; and then we have the awful spectacle of two thousand widows burnt or buried alive annually, in India! Search every human record, and bring forward every thing that has ever been practised by the scalping Indian, the cannibals in the South seas, &c., and all is civilization and the most refined benevolence, compared with this!”

Among other happy fruits of missionary labors in India, may be mentioned the recent abolition of this last horrid custom, by the British government. The public honor of suppressing the suttees, as they are termed, belongs to lord Bentick, governor-general of British India. It took place in 1831.

But the burying alive of widows manifests, if that of the car of Juggernaut, or into some sacred river, or into a fire prepared for the purpose; promising such self-murderers, that they shall rise to birth again in a healthful body; whereas, by dying a natural death, they would be liable to have the disease perpetuated in the next and succeeding births. Multitudes of lepers, and other children of sorrow, perish annually in these prescribed modes. Mr. W. Carey was one morning informed that some people had dug a deep hole in the earth, not far from his own house, and had begun to kindle a fire at the bottom. He immediately proceeded to the spot, and saw a poor leper, who had been deprived of the use of his limbs by the disease, roll himself over and over, till at last he fell into the flames. Smarting with agony, his screams became most dreadful. He called upon his family, who surrounded the pit, and entreated them to deliver him from the flames. But he called in vain. His own sister, seeing him lift his hands to the side, and make a dreadful effort to escape, pushed him back again; when (these relations still coolly gazing upon the sufferer) he perished, enduring indescribable agonies.

“Human sacrifices are enjoined in the sacred books, and made a part of the Hindoo superstitions in very early times. They describe the rites to be observed at the sacrifice of a man; and declare the degree of merit attached to such a sacrifice, compared with the offering of a goat, a buffalo, &c. The Hindoos speak of an instrument used in times not very remote, by which, with the jerk of his foot, a man, lying prostrate before an image, might cut off his were possible, a still more abominable state of feeling towards women, than even burning them alive, as the process of burying is more deliberate—more diabolical. In this kind of sacrifice, the children and relations dig the grave. This horrid practice, we believe, is not yet abolished. Ward's Farewell Letters, nos. vi. and vii.; Ward's Hindoos, vol. i. book i., vol. ii. book vii.—Williams.

HINNOM, (VALLEY OF;) called also Tophet, and by the Greeks (or rather Grecian Jews) Gehenna; a small valley on the south-east of Jerusalem, at the foot of mount Zion, where the Canaanites, and afterwards the Israelites, sacrificed their children to the idol Moloch, by making them "pass through the fire," or burning them. (See GEHENNA, and HELL.)—Watson.

HIPPOLITUS; a Christian bishop of Cappadocia, who suffered martyrdom in the persecution under Maximinus, A. D. 235. He was tied to a wild horse, and dragged through fields, stony places, bushes, &c. till he expired.—Fox, 25.

HIRAM; a king of Tyre, distinguished in profane authors for his magnificence, and for adorning the city of Tyre. When David was acknowledged king by Israel, Hiram sent ambassadors with artificers, and cedar, to build his palace. He also sent ambassadors to Solomon, to congratulate him on his accession to the crown; and subsequently supplied him with timber, stones, and laborers for building the temple. These two princes lived in mutual friendship for many years. It is said that in Josephus' time, their letters, with certain riddles, which they proposed one to the other, were extant.—Calmet.

HIRESLING. Moses requires that the hiresling should be paid as soon as his work is over: "The wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night unto the morning," Lev. 19: 19. An hiresling's days, or year, is a kind of proverb, signifying a full year, without abating any thing of it: "His days are like the days of an hiresling;" (Job 7: 1.) the days of man are like those of an hiresling; as nothing is deducted from them, so nothing, likewise, is added to them. And again: "Till he shall accomplish as an hiresling his day;" (Job 14: 6.) to the time of death, which he waits for as the hiresling for the end of the day.

The following passage from Morier's Travels in Persia, illustrates one of our Lord's parables:—"The most conspicuous building in Hamadan is the Mesjid Jumah, a large mosque now falling into decay, and before it a maiden or square, which serves as a market-place. Here we observed, every morning before the sun rose, that a numerous band of peasants were collected with spades in their hands, waiting, as they informed us, to be hired for the day to work in the surrounding fields. This custom, which I have never seen in any other part of Asia, forcibly struck me as a most happy illustration of our Savior's parable of the laborers in the vineyard, in Matt. 20; particularly when, passing by the same place late in the day, we still found others standing idle, and remembered his words, 'Why stand ye here all the day idle?' as most applicable to their situation; for, in putting the very same question to them, they answered us, 'Because no man hath hired us.'"—Watson.

HISS, usually expresses insult and contempt: "All they, who shall see the destruction of this temple, shall be astonished and shall hiss, and say, How comes it that the Lord hath thus treated this city?" 1 Kings 9: 8. Job 27: 23. Jer. 19: 8. 49: 17. 51: 13. Lam. 2: 15, 16. Ezek. 28: 36. Zeph. 2: 15.

To call any one with hissing, is a mark of power and authority, Isa. 5: 26. 7: 18. Theodoret and Cynl of Alexandria, writing on Isaiah, remark, that in Syria and Palestine, those who looked after bees drew them out of their hives, carried them into the fields, and brought them back again with the sound of a flute, and the noise of hissing. Zechariah, (10: 8.) speaking of the return from Babylon, says, that the Lord will gather the house of Judah, as it were, with a hiss, and bring them back into their own country; which shows the ease and authority with which he would perform that great work.—Calmet.

HISTORY, ECCLESIASTICAL. (See ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.)

HITCHIN, (EDWARD, B. D.), an excellent minister and so-lid divine, of London, was born 1726, of pious parents, whose care of his education was early blessed to lead his soul to God. His fine understanding was early devoted to the Christian ministry. He was a dissenter of most catholic and unbogoted spirit. He was settled as an assistant to Mr. Richard Rawlin, to whom, as well as to the flock of their common charge, he was highly acceptable. He was chosen successor to Mr. Andrews, and continued with the congregation till his death, in 1774, in the forty-eighth year of his age. It was pleasing to witness the cheerful resignation, and firm trust which he manifested in his last sickness, while committing his family to the care of a covenant God, and desiring to depart and be with Christ.—Middleton, vol. iv. p. 466.

HITTITES; the descendants of Heth, Gen. 15: 20. (See HETH.)

HIVITES; a people descended from Canaan, Gen. 10: 17. They are also mentioned, Deut. 2: 23. The inhabitants of Shechem, and the Gibeonites, were Hivites, Josh. 11: 19. Gen. 34: 2. Mr. Bryant supposes the Hivites to be the same as the Ophites, or ancient worshippers of the sun under the figure of a serpent; which was, in all probability, the deity worshipped at Baal-Hermon.—Watson.

HOADLEY, (BENJAMIN, D. D.) an eminent prelate, distinguished equally for learning, liberality, piety, and usefulness, was born, in 1676, at Westerham, in Kent; was educated partly by his father, and partly at Catharine hall, Cambridge; was for some years lecturer of St. Mildred's; and, in 1704, was made rector of St. Peter le Poor, Broad street. He soon distinguished himself as a champion of freedom, in his controversy with Calamy and Atterbury; and the commons addressed the queen to promote him, but, as may be supposed, no favor was dispensed to him by a tory government. The accession of George I., however, brightened his prospects. In 1715 he was raised to the see of Bangor; whence he was translated to Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester, in 1720, 1723, and 1734. He died in 1761. It was in 1717 that he preached the celebrated sermon which drove the high church party almost to madness, and gave rise to the Bangorian controversy. His works form three folio volumes. (See BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY.)—Jones' Chris. Biog.; Davenport.

HOBAB; son of Jethro, and brother-in-law of Moses. The inspired legislator prevailed upon him to accompany Israel when departing from mount Sinai for the promised land, Num. 10: 29. Some think that the Kenites, who dwelt south of Judah, were the descendants of Hobab, Judg. 1: 16. 1 Sam. 15: 6.—Calmet.

HOBABH, (Gen. 14: 15.) is thought by Calmet to be Abila, in the valley between Libanus and Antilibanus. Mr. Taylor takes it for the present Habaya, west of Damascus. It is, probably, some hollow, between mountains, which effectually secludes those who occupy it.—Calmet.

HOBART, (JOHN HENRY, D. D.) was born in Philadelphia, on the 14th of September, 1775. He was educated at the college in Princeton, New Jersey, and was noted in early life for his industry and proficiency in his studies. On leaving this institution he was engaged a short time in mercantile pursuits, was subsequently a tutor at Nassau hall, and after two years service in this capacity, he was determined upon the study of theology. In 1798, he was admitted into orders, and was first settled in the two churches at Perkiomen, near Philadelphia, but soon after accepted a call to Christ church, New Brunswick. In about a year he removed from this place to become an assistant minister of the largest spiritual cure in the country, comprising three associated congregations in the city of New York. In 1811, he was elected assistant bishop, and in 1816, became diocesan of New York; and in performing the severe duties of the office, his labors were indefatigable. From 1818 to 1823, he was employed in editing the American edition of D'Oyley and Mant's Bible, with notes. In September, 1823, the state of his health required a visit to Europe, where he remained about two years. He died in 1830. He was incessantly active in performing his religious offices, and made several valuable compilations for the use of the church.—Davenport.

HOBBS, (THOMAS,) a celebrated philosopher, was born, in 1588, at Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, and was educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. In 1608, he became tutor to lord Hardwick, who was subsequently earl of Devonshire; and, after their return from travelling, he resided in the family for many years, during which period he translated Thucydides, and made a Latin version of some of lord Bacon's works. In 1640 he retired to Paris, to avoid being involved in the contest which was about to take place in his country. It was during this voluntary exile that he produced his celebrated works, De Cive; Human Nature; De Corpore Politico; and the still more famous and obnoxious Leviathan. About 1652 he returned to England, and in 1654 published a Letter on Liberty and Necessity, which led to a controversy with bishop Bramhall. He now again resided in the Devonshire family, and continued to do so for the remainder of his days. Charles II. gave him a pension of one hundred pounds a-year. Among his later works are, Decameron Physiologicum; a Dialogue between a Philosopher and a Student of the Common Law; Behemoth, or a History of the Civil Wars; and translations of the Iliad and Odyssey. He died in 1679. The charge of atheism, which has been urged against him, is undoubtedly groundless; but it seems to require no small share of hardihood to maintain, that his doctrines, religious and political, do not lead to consequences of the most pernicious nature.—Davenport.

HOFFMANIANS, or HOFFMANISTS; those that espoused the sentiments of Daniel Hoffman, professor of theology in the university of Helmstadt, who, in 1598, distinguished himself by his opposition to the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle. They appear to have been Lutheran dissenters; nor is it unlikely that they imbibed the dread of philosophical inquiry, lest it should lead them to that rational theology (so called) which reasons away the great principles of the Reformation. There seems no doubt, but these Hoffmannians, by all that we can learn, were offended by some alterations in the established liturgy, intended to gratify the Socinian party; such as, in baptism, the omission of the words, "renouncing the devil," &c. Their being called Pietists and Enthusiasts, looks the same way; and it is not unlikely, that observing how much these philosophical divines leaned towards Socinianism, might lead them to abjure all philosophical inquiries. See Philanthropic Gazette, 1819, pp. 237—8; and see HARMONISTS above, p. 598.—Williams.

HOHENLOHE, (Prince)—the eighteenth son of Charles Albert, the crown prince of Austria, who was disqualified for taking the reins of government by mental derangement. At the wish of his mother, he determined to study for the clerical profession, and an ex-Jesuit was his first instructor. He studied in Vienna and Berne, and finished his studies at Ellwangen, under the care of his uncle, the suffragan bishop, and was ordained deacon by the chapter of Olmutz. At this time he was fond of conversing with such as believed in wonders; and after visiting Rome, where he lived in a Jesuits' college, he returned to Germany, where he was considered by his colleagues as devoted to the interests of Jesuitism, and the inveterate enemy of knowledge.

In 1820 he wrote a pamphlet, dedicated to the emperors Francis and Alexander, and the king of Prussia, in which he attempts to prove that none but a true Christian, by which he means a Roman Catholic, can be a faithful subject of government. Having become acquainted with a Baden peasant, Martin Michel, who for several years had the repute of working miraculous cures, he was persuaded by this pretended thaumaturgist, that, being a priest, it would be much easier for him to perform miracles! The experiment was made. The princess Matilda, of Schwartzenberg, who had been grievously afflicted with a distortion of the spine, from which she had been partially cured by a skillful physician, was called on by the priest and the peasant to walk, and she succeeded.

He now tried his powers alone, and multitudes flocked to him for cures. Many were in fact benefited; many believed that they were; but many went away in despair, because they could not believe. His attempts in the hospitals of Würzburg and Bamberg failed, and the police were ordered not to allow him to try his experiments, except in their presence. A prince of Hildburghausen called in his aid; but his suffering eyes soon became worse in consequence of his exchanging the use of medicine for faith in the miraculous energies of Hohenlohe. In 1821 he laid a statement of his miracles before the pope, the answer to which is not known; only it is rumored that his Holiness expressed much doubt respecting them, and hints were received from Rome, that the process should no longer be called the working of miracles, but priestly prayers for healing. Since then he has pretended to cure persons at a distance, and cases have been published of cures performed, in one instance at Marseilles, and in another in Ireland, and several others, by appointing an hour in which the individuals should unite their prayers with his. Much has been done by Mr. Horntal, an officer of Bamberg, towards checking the progress of this delusion. The price is a person of fine exterior, gentle manners, a most insinuating voice, and good pulpit talents.—Hend. Buck.

HOLD. To take hold of God and his covenant is to embrace him as given in the gospel, and by faith to plead his promises and relations, Isa. 64: 7, and 56: 4. Christians hold forth the word of life; they, by practising it in their lives, give light and instruction to others, Phil 2: 16. Not holding of Christ the head, is neglecting to draw gracious influence from him, and to yield due subjection to him; and admitting saints and angels as mediators in his stead, Col. 2: 18.—Brown.

HOLINESS; devotedness to the great end, of being and doing good; hence, consequently, freedom from sin, or the conformity of the heart to God. It does not consist in knowledge, talents, nor outward ceremonies of religion, but hath its seat in the heart, and is the effect of the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit, Eph. 2: 8, 10. John 3: 5. Rom. 5: 5. 6: 22. It is the essence of happiness and the basis of true dignity, Prov. 3: 17. 4: 8. It will manifest itself by the propriety of our conversation, regularity of our temper, and uniformity of our lives. It is a principle progressive in its operation, (Prov. 4: 18.) and absolutely essential to the enjoyment of God here and hereafter, Heb. 12: 14. (See SANCTIFICATION; WORKS.)—Hend. Buck.

HOLINESS OF GOD, is the purity and rectitude of his character, or the consecration of all his high attributes to promote the highest good of the universe. It is an essential attribute of God, and the glory, lustre, and harmony of all his other perfections, Ps. 27: 4. Exod. 15: 11. He could not be God without it, Deut. 32: 4. It is infinite and unbounded; it cannot be increased or diminished. Immutable and invariable, Mal. 3: 6. God is originally holy; he is so of and in himself, and the author and promoter of all holiness among his creatures. The holiness of God is visible by his works; he made all things holy, Gen. 1: 31. By his providences, all which are to promote holiness in the end, Heb. 12: 10. By his grace, which influences the subjects of it to be holy, Tit. 2: 10, 12. By his word, which commands it, 1 Pet. 1: 15. By his ordinances, which he hath appointed for that end, Jer. 44: 4, 5. By the punishment of sin in the death of Christ, (Isa. 53.) and by the eternal punishment of it in wicked men, Matt. 25, last verse. (See ATTRIBUTES.)—Hend. Buck.

HOLLAND, (THOMAS, D. D.) This excellent man was born in Shropshire, 1539, and graduated at Exeter college, Oxford, (where he received his education,) with great applause. But he valued knowledge only as the nutriment and instrument of piety. In process of time he was chosen master of his college, and afterward Regius professor of divinity. He was esteemed and admired in this station for every kind of attainment, divine and human, and his fame extended to foreign universities. Like the eloquent Apollon, he was mighty in the Scriptures; like the illuminated Paul, he was faithful in explaining them. His example answered to his doctrine; he lived himself what he preached to others. Such was his zeal for the reformed religion, that whenever he left his college on a journey, he used to call the society together, and commend them to the love of God and the abhorrence of popery. Nor was this perpetual caution at that time unnecessary.

Thus for twenty years he filled his high office with honor and usefulness. And as age and death drew near, his ardor increased for the presence and enjoyment of God. His soul was framed for heaven, and could find no rest till it came there. All the comforts he found on earth resulted from heaven, or related to it. In the solemn moments of dissolution, he often prayed, "Come, O come, Lord Jesus, thou morning star! Come, Lord Jesus; I desire to be dissolved, and to be with thee." He died in 1612, aged seventy-three.—Middleton, vol. ii. 372.

HOLDEN, (SAMUEL,) a benevolent Christian, died in London, in 1740. Mr. Holden was at the head of the dissenters in England, and at the head of the bank of England. Such was his benevolence and regard to religion, that he sent to Dr. Colman, of Boston, thirty-nine sets of Baxter's Practical Works, in four massy folios, to be distributed among the churches of Massachusetts. The amount of these charities for promoting the gospel and other useful purposes, was four thousand eight hundred and forty-seven pounds. After his death his widow and daughters gave, in the same liberal and benevolent spirit, five thousand five hundred and eighty-five pounds. Holden chapel for the college at Cambridge was built by their donation.

Mr. Holden was a man of unfeigned piety. He says in a letter, "I hope my treasure is in heaven, and would to God my heart were more there. Abstract from God and futurity, I would not accept of an eternity here in any given circumstances whatever." Colman's Sermon.—Allen.

HOLLEY, (HORACE, LL. D.), a distinguished pulpit orator, and president of Transylvania university, Kentucky, was born in Salisbury, Connecticut, February 13, 1781; was graduated at Yale college in 1803; in 1805 was ordained as the minister of Greenfield hill, Fairfield, and in 1809, installed the minister of Hollis street, Boston. In 1818, he became the president of the university of Kentucky, in Lexington; but his Unitarian views giving offence, he was induced to resign his office in 1827. On his voyage to New York, he died of the yellow fever, July 31, 1827, aged forty-six. He published a discourse on the death of Col. James Morrison, 1823. Interesting Memoirs of his Life were written by his widow.—Allen.

HOLLIS, (TUOMAS,) of London, a most liberal benefactor of Harvard college, was born in 1659, of pious parents. At the age of twenty he became pious, and having embraced the principles of the Baptists, was baptized in 1679. He died in February, 1731, aged about seventy-two.

Mr. Hollis was for many years an eminent merchant, and, while success attended his exertions, it pleased God to incline him also to charitable and benevolent deeds in proportion to his wealth. He founded two professorships in Harvard college, the professorship of divinity and mathematics. He also presented a valuable apparatus for mathematical and philosophical experiments, and at different times augmented the library with many valuable books. In 1727, the net produce of his donation, exclusive of gifts not vendible, amounted to four thousand nine hundred pounds, the interest of which he directed to be appropriated to the support of the two professors, to the treasurer of the college, and to ten poor students in divinity of suitable qualifications.

The liberality of Mr. Hollis flowed from a Christian heart. He says in a letter, after speaking of some of his efforts to do good, "I think not hereby to be justified. My rejoicing is in Christ, my God and Savior." He also ascribes all his virtues and hopes "to rich, free, and sovereign, electing love."

Being a Calvinist in his sentiments, he required his professor of divinity to be "of sound or orthodox principles." Still he was not governed by a sectarian spirit; he did not require the preference of his own denomination, the Baptist; but the professorship was open to every one, who, in his view, embraced the important and fundamental doctrines of the gospel. Colman's and Wigglesworth's Sermons, Greenwood's Discourse, and Rudd's Poem on his Death; Memoirs of T. Hollis, i. 1; ii. 598—601; Morse's true Reasons, &c.; Holmes; Backus; Benedict; Finney.—Allen.

HOLLIS, (TUOMAS,) nephew of the above, born in London, in 1720, was in his principles a dissenter and a warm advocate for liberty. He was a man of large fortune, and devoted above half of it to charitable purposes. He presented to the library of Harvard college, works to the value of fourteen hundred pounds sterling. He died in 1774.—Davenport.

HOLMES, (OBADIAH,) This noble sufferer for conscience' sake was born in Preston Lancashire, (Eng.) in 1606, of highly respectable parents, from whom he received a good education. He became pious at an early age, and came to America in 1639. He was a member of the Congregational church first at Salem, and then at Rehoboth, about eleven years; when he became a Baptist, and on joining the church in Newport, in 1650, like Roger Williams, was excommunicated from that at Salem. In 1651, in company with Messrs. Clark and Crandal, he was arrested at Lynn, on a charge of heresy, for denying infant baptism, and sent to prison in Boston. The sentence of the court on these worthy men was, that they should pay, Mr. Crandal five, Mr. Clark twenty, and Mr. Holmes thirty pounds, or be publicly whipped. All declined paying the fine, but Mr. Clark's friends paid his fine without his consent, and Mr. Crandal was released on his promise of appearing at the next court. On Mr. Holmes the sentence was executed with such severity, (thirty strokes with a three-corded whip,) "that for many days," governor Jenks remarks, "he could take no rest, but as he lay upon his knees and elbows, not being able to suffer any part of his body to touch the bed whereon he lay."

Nothing can be more touching than his own simple narrative of the whole transaction, as preserved by Benedict, or more honorable to his Christian character. On hearing his sentence pronounced, the good man said, "I bless God I am counted worthy to suffer for the name of Jesus." While in private, seeking strength of God, he was strongly tempted with this thought, "Remember thyself, thy birth, breeding, and friends; thy wife, children, name, and credit;" but, he adds, "as this was sudden, so there came in sweetly from the Lord as sudden an answer: 'Tis for my Lord; I must not deny him before the sons of men, (for that were to set men above him,) but rather lose all, yea, wife, children, and mine own life also.'" And at the place of execution, his supports were such as to illustrate the source of the astonishing fortitude of the early martyrs. "It pleased the Lord," he observes, "to come in, and so to fill my heart and tongue as a vessel full, that with an audible voice I broke forth, praying unto the Lord not to lay this sin to their charge; and telling the people that now I found he did not fail me, and therefore now I should trust him forever who failed me not; for in truth as the strokes fell on me, I had such a spiritual manifestation of God's presence as I never had, nor felt, nor can with fleshly tongue express, and the outward pain was now so removed from me that in a manner I felt it not. I told the magistrates, You have struck me as with roses. I pray God, (who hath made it easy to me,) that it may not be laid to your charge." On his recovery and return home, he observes, "the brethren of our town and Providence, having taken pains to meet me four miles in the woods, we there rejoiced together in the Lord."

When Mr. Clark went to England, in 1652, Mr. Holmes was invested with the pastoral office of the first Baptist church in Newport, which he filled thirty years, till his death in 1682, at the age of seventy-six. He left eight children, and his descendants in 1790 were estimated at five thousand. At the same ratio, the second centenary of his sufferings, 1851, will find eighty thousand descendants of this venerable patriarch spread abroad in the United States.—Allen; Farmer; Benedict, vol. i. 496, and 364—376.

HOLOCAUST, formed from holos, "whole," and kaiō, "I consume with fire;" a kind of sacrifice, wherein the whole burnt-offering was burnt or consumed by fire, as an acknowledgment that God, the Creator, Preserver, and Lord of all, was worthy of all honor and worship, and as a token of men's giving themselves entirely up to him. It is called in Scripture a burnt-offering. Sacrifices of this sort are often mentioned by the heathens as well as Jews. They appear to have been in use long before the institution of the other Jewish sacrifices by the law of Moses, Job 1: 5. 42: 8. Gen. 22: 13. 8: 20. On this account, the Jews, who would not allow the Gentiles to offer on their altar any other sacrifices peculiarly enjoined by the law of Moses, admitted them by the Jewish priests to offer holocausts, because these were a sort of sacrifice prior to the law, and common to all nations. During their subjection to the Romans, it was no uncommon thing for those Gentiles to offer sacrifices to the God of Israel at Jerusalem. Holocausts were deemed by the Jews the most excellent of all their sacrifices. (See SACRIFICE.)—Hend. Buck.

HOLY; set apart from a common to a special use; devoted to God. (See HOLINESS.)

HOLY ALLIANCE; a misnomer used for—1. A confederation formed by Heldo, vice-chancellor of the emperor, in the year 1538, to counteract the privileges derived by the Protestants from the league of Smalcald, and support and further the Catholic faith. It was acceded to by the archbishops of Metz and Salzburg, by William and Lewis, dukes of Bavaria, George, duke of Saxony, and Eric and Henry, dukes of Brunswick. It was to have remained a profound secret, but the rumor of it soon got abroad, and the Protestants were greatly alarmed; it was feared that their rights and liberties would be suppressed; and they concerted how to raise a sufficient force to defend themselves. But the convention of Frankfurt, in 1539, allayed their fears, and effectually prevented the evils that had been apprehended.

2. HOLY ALLIANCE; the league entered into by the emperor Alexander of Russia, the emperor Francis of Austria, and Frederic William king of Prussia, after the defeat of Napoleon in 1815, consisting of a declaration signed by them personally, that, in accordance with the precepts of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the principles of justice, charity, and peace, should be the basis of the internal administration of their empires, and of their international relations; and that the happiness and religious welfare of their subjects should be the great objects they should ever keep in view. It originated with Alexander, who, it is said, imagined that it would introduce a new era of Christian government; but whatever may have been the original intentions, it soon became, in the hands of the wily Metternich, an instrument for the support of tyranny and oppression, and laid the foundation of the congressional system of politics, which, while it professes to have for its object the support of legitimacy, is a horrid conspiracy against the rights and privileges of the subject.—Hend. Buck.

HOLY DAY; a day set apart by the church for the commemoration of some saint, or some remarkable particular in the life of Christ. It has been a question agitated by divines, whether it be proper to appoint or keep any holy days, (the Sabbath excepted.) The advocates for holy days suppose that they have a tendency to impress the minds of the people with a greater sense of religion; that if the acquisitions and victories of men be celebrated with the highest joy, how much more those events which relate to the salvation of man, such as the birth, death, and resurrection of Christ, &c. On the other side it is observed, that if holy days had been necessary under the present dispensation, Jesus Christ would have ordained something respecting them, whereas he was silent about them; that it is bringing us again into that bondage to ceremonial laws from which Christ freed us; that it is a tacit reflection on the head of the church in not appointing them; that such days, on the whole, are more pernicious than useful to society, as they open a door for indolence and profaneness; yea, that Scripture speaks against such days, Gal. 4: 9—11. Cave's Prim. Christ.; Nelson's Fasts and Feasts; Robinson's History and Mystery of Good Friday, and Lectures on Non-conformity; A Country Vicar's Sermon on Christmas Day, 1753; Brown's Nat. and Rev. Rel. p. 535; Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 116, qu.—Hend. Buck.

HOLY GHOST; the third person in the Trinity, the conforter of the church of Christ. (See PROCESSION.)

1. The Holy Ghost is a real and distinct person in the Godhead. 1. Personal powers of rational understanding and will are ascribed to him, 1 Cor. 2: 10, 11. 12: 11. Eph. 4: 3. 2. He is joined with the other two divine persons, as the object of divine worship and fountain of blessings, Matt. 28: 19. 2 Cor. 13: 14. 3. In the Greek, a masculine article or epithet is joined to his name, Pneuma, which is naturally of the neuter gender, John 14: 26. 15: 26. 16: 13. Eph. 1: 13. 4. He appeared under the emblem of a dove, and of cloven tongues of fire, Matt.

3. Acts 2. 5. Personal offices of an intercessor belong to him, Rom. 8: 26. 6. He is represented as performing a multitude of personal acts,—as teaching, speaking, witnessing, &c., Mark 13: 11. Acts 20: 23. Rom. 8: 15, 16. 1 Cor. 6: 19. Acts 15: 28. 16: 6, 7, &c. &c.

11. It is no less evident that the Holy Ghost is a divine person, equal in power and glory with the Father and Son. 1. Names proper only to the Most High God are ascribed to him; as Jehovah, Acts 28: 25, with Is. 6: 9, and Hebrews 3: 7, 9, with Exod. 17: 7. Jer. 31: 31, 34. Heb. 10: 15, 16. God, Acts 5: 3, 4. Lord, 2 Cor. 3: 17, 19. "The Lord, the Spirit." 2. Attributes proper only to the Most High God are ascribed to him; as omniscience, 1 Cor. 2: 10, 11. Is. 40: 13, 14. Omnipresence, Ps. 139: 7. Eph. 2: 17, 18. Rom. 8: 26, 27. Omnipotence, Luke 1: 35. Eternity, Heb. 9: 14. 3. Divine works are evidently ascribed to him, Gen. 2: 2. Job 26: 13. Ps. 32: 6. 104: 30. 4. Worship, proper only to God, is required and ascribed to him, Is. 6: 3. Acts 28: 25. Rom. 9: 1. Rev. 1: 4. 2 Cor. 13: 14. Matt. 28: 19.

III. The agency or work of the Holy Ghost is divided by some into extraordinary and ordinary. The former by immediate inspiration, making men prophets; the latter by his regenerating and sanctifying influences, making men saints. It is only the latter which is now to be expected. This is more particularly displayed in—1. Conviction, Luke 1: 16. 8, 9. 2. Conversion, 1 Cor. 12: 2, 10, 12. Eph. 1: 17, 18. John 3: 5, 6. 3. Sanctification, 2 Thess. 2: 13. 1 Cor. 6: 11. Rom. 15: 16. 4. Consolation, John 14: 16, 26. 5. Direction, John 14: 17. Rom. 8: 14. 6. Confirmation, Rom. 8: 16, 26. 1 John 2: 21. Eph. 1: 13, 14.

As to the gift of the Holy Spirit, though bestowed in answer to our prayers, it is not expected. 1. To inform us immediately, as by a whisper, when either awake or asleep, that we are the children of God; or in any other way than by enabling us to exercise repentance and faith and love to God and our neighbor. 2. We are not to suppose that he reveals any thing contrary to the written word, or more than is contained in it, or through any other medium. 3. We are not so led by, or operated upon by the Spirit, as to neglect the means of grace. 4. The Holy Spirit is not promised nor given to render us infallible. 5. Nor is the Holy Spirit given in order that we may do any thing, which was not before our duty. HOLY WATER: in the Greek and Roman Catholic churches, water which has been consecrated by prayer, exorcism, and other ceremonies, for the purpose of sprinkling the faithful, and things used in the church. It is placed, in vases, at the doors of churches, and also within them at certain places, from which the Catholics sprinkle themselves before prayer. Holy water is also often found in their chambers, and is used before prayer, particularly before going to bed. The Romanists consider it an effectual exorcism. In Rome, animals are also sprinkled, on a certain feast, with holy water, to keep them healthy and thriving. The same thing is done at Moscow, where there is a particular church, to which the horses are annually driven on purpose. It does not appear that vessels were placed at the doors of churches, for washing the hands, till the fourth century, or that the water was blessed or consecrated till the sixth.—Hend. Buck.

HOMER, the same as the Cor, a Hebrew measure of ten baths, or six hundred and five pints, our measure, Isa. 5: 10. It is about seventy-six gallons. (See COR.)

HOMILETICS; the technical term for the art of preaching; or rather of composing sermons. (See SERMONS.) Dr. Porter's Lectures on Homiletics.

HOMILY, (Gr. homilia); a sermon or discourse upon some point of religion delivered in a plain manner, so as to be easily understood by the common people. The Greek, says M. Fleury, signifies a familiar discourse, like the Latin sermo; and discourses delivered in the church took these denominations, to intimate that they were not harangues, or matters of ostentation and flourish, like those of profane orators, but familiar and useful discourses, as of a master to his disciples, or a father to his children. All the homilies of the Greek and Latin fathers are composed by bishops.

The practice of compiling homilies which were to be committed to memory, and recited by ignorant or indolent priests, commenced towards the close of the eighth century; when Charlemagne ordered Paul the deacon, and Alcuin, to form homilies or discourses upon the gospels and epistles from the ancient doctors of the church. This gave rise to that famous collection entitled the "Homiliarium of Charlemagne;" and which, being followed as a model by many productions of the same kind, composed by private persons, from a principle of pious zeal, contributed much (says Mosheim) to nourish the indolence and to perpetuate the ignorance of a worthless clergy. There are still extant several fine homilies composed by the ancient fathers, particularly St. Chrysostom and St. Gregory. The "Clementine Homilies" are forgeries.

"Homilies of the church of England," are those which were composed at the Reformation, to be read in churches, in order to supply the defect of sermons. See the quarto edition of the Homilies, with notes, by a divine of the church of England.—Hend. Buck.

HOMIOUSIANS; a branch of the high Arians, who maintained that the nature of the Son, though not the same, was very similar to that of the Father. (See ARIANS.)—Williams.

HOMOUSIANS, or HOMUSIANS, was, on the other hand, a name applied to the Athanasians, who held the Son to be homousios, or consubstantial, with the Father. (See ATHANASIANS.)—Williams.

HONESTY, is that principle which makes a person prefer his promise or duty to his passion or interest. (See JUSTICE.)—Hend. Buck.

HONEY, was formerly very plentiful in Palestine; and hence frequent expressions of Scripture, which import that that country was a land flowing with milk and honey. Moses says, that the Lord brought his people into a land whose rocks drop oil, and whose stones produce honey, Deut. 32: 13. See also Psal. 81: 16. Modern travellers observe, that it is still very common there, and that the inhabitants mix it in all their sauces. Forskal says, the caravans of Mecca bring honey from Arabia to Cairo; and often in the woods in Arabia has been honey flowing. It would seem that this flowing honey is bee-honey, which may illustrate the story of Jonathan, 1 Sam. 14: 27. John the Baptist, too, fed on wild honey, Matt. 3: 4.

There is, however, a vegetable honey that is very plentiful in the East. Burckhardt, speaking of the productions of the Ghor, or valley of the Jordan, says, one of the most interesting productions of this place is the Beyrouk honey, or as the Arabs call it, Assal Beyrouk. It was described to him as a juice dropping from the leaves and twigs of a tree called gharrab, of the size of an olive tree, with leaves like those of the poplar, but somewhat broader. The honey collects upon the leaves like dew, and is gathered from them, or from the ground under the tree, which is often found completely covered with it. It is very sweet when fresh, but turns sour after being kept for two days. The Arabs eat it with butter; they also put it into their gruel, and use it in rubbing their water-skins, for the purpose of excluding the air. Travels in Syria, p. 392.

Children were fed with milk, cream, and honey. (Isa. 7: 15.) which was the sweetest substance in use before sugar was manufactured. The following extracts will give a different idea of this mixture from that generally entertained:—"D'Arvieux, (p. 205.) speaking of the Arabs, says, "One of their chief breakfasts is cream, or fresh butter, MIXED IN A MESS OF HONEY: these do not seem to suit very well together, but experience teaches that this is no bad mixture, nor disagreeable in its taste, if one is ever so little accustomed to it." "Honey and milk are under thy tongue," says the spouse, Cant. 4: 11. Perhaps this mixture was not merely a refreshment, but an elegant refreshment; which heightens the inference from the predictions of Isaiah, and the description of Zophar, who spoke of its abundance; and it increases the respect paid to David, by his faithful and loyal subjects at Mahanaim.

HONOR; a testimony of esteem or submission, expressed by words and an exterior behavior, by which we make known the veneration and respect we entertain for any one, on account of his dignity or merit. The word is also used in general for the esteem due to virtue, glory, reputation, and probity; as also, for an exactness in performing whatever we have promised; and in this last sense we use the term, a man of honor. It is also applied to two different kinds of virtue; bravery in men, and chastity in women. In every situation of life, religion only forms the true honor and happiness of man. "It cannot," as one observes, "arise from riches, dignity of rank or office, nor from what are often called splendid actions of heroes, or civil accomplishments; these may be found among men of no real integrity, and may create considerable fame; but a distinction must be made between fame and true honor. The former is a loud and noisy applause; the latter is a more silent and internal homage. Fame floats on the breath of the multitude; honor rests on the judgment of the thinking. In order, then, to discern where true honor lies, we must not look to any adventitious circumstance, not to any single sparkling quality, but to the whole of what forms a man; in a word, we must look to the soul. It will discover itself by a mind superior to fear, to selfish interest, and corruption; by an ardent love to the Supreme Being, and by a principle of uniform rectitude. It will make us neither afraid nor ashamed to discharge our duty, as it relates both to God and man. It will influence us to be magnanimous without being proud; humble without being mean; just without being harsh; simple in our manners, but manly in our feelings. This honor, thus formed by religion, or the love of God, is more independent, and more complete, than what can be acquired by any other means. It is productive of higher felicity, and will be commensurate with eternity itself; while that honor, so called, which arises from any other principle, will resemble the feeble and twinkling flame of a taper, which is often clouded by the smoke it sends forth, but is always wasting, and soon dies totally away." Barron's Works, vol. i. ser. 4; Blair's Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 1; Watts's Sermons, ser. 30, vol. ii.; Ryland's Cont., vol. i. p. 343; Jortin's Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 6; Thatcher's Sermons.—*Hend. HOODS; another name for turbans, which see, ISA. 3: 23.

HOOKER, (RICHARD), an eminent divine, of the church of England, was born, in 1553, at Heavitree, near Exeter; and, under the patronage of bishop Jewel, was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he was distinguished for his piety and exemplary conduct. An unhappy marriage, which he contracted before he was thirty, with a scold who had neither beauty, money, nor manners, lost him his college fellowship, and was a fertile source of annoyance to him. In 1585, he was made master of the Temple; but, weary of disputes with the afternoon lecturer, a violent Presbyterian, and longing for rural retirement, he relinquished this preferment, and obtained the rectory of Bishop's Bourne, in Kent, at which he resided till his decease, in 1600. His great work is the treatise on Ecclesiastical Polity; of which pope Clement VIII. said, "there are in it such seeds of eternity as will continue till the last fire shall devour all learning."—Davenport.

HOOPER, (JOHN), an English bishop and martyr, was a native of Somersetshire, born in 1495; was educated at Merton college, Oxford; and, having embraced the reformed faith, was made bishop of Gloucester and Worcester by Edward VI. In the reign of the sanguinary Mary he was brought to the stake. He firmly refused the offered pardon, and though, the wood being green, he suffered for nearly an hour the severest torments, his lower parts being consumed, and one of his hands dropping off before he expired, he manifested unshaken fortitude. He died in 1555. Hooper wrote some sermons and controversial pieces.—Davenport.

HOPE, is the desire of some good, attended with the possibility, at least, of obtaining it; and is enlivened with joy, greater or less, according to the probability there is of possessing the object of our hope. Scarcely any passion seems to be more natural to man than hope, and, considering the many troubles he is encompassed with, none is more necessary; for life, void of all hope, would be a heavy and spiritless thing, very little desirable, perhaps hardly to be borne; whereas hope infuses strength into the mind, and, by so doing, lessens the burdens of life. If our condition be not the best in the world, yet we hope it will be better, and this helps us to support it with patience. The hope of the Christian is an expectation of all necessary good both in time and eternity, founded on the promises, relations, and perfections of God, and on the offices, righteousness, and intercession of Christ. It is a compound of desire, expectation, patience, and joy, Rom. 8: 24, 25. It may be considered, 1. As pure, (1 John 3: 2, 3.) as it is resident in that heart which is cleansed from sin. 2. As good, (2 Thess. 2: 16, in distinction from the hope of the hypocrite) as deriving its origin from God, and centering in him. 3. It is called lively, (1 Pet. 1: 3.) as it proceeds from spiritual life, and renders one active and lively in good works. 4. It is courageous, (Rom. 5: 5. 1 Thess. 5: 8.) because it excites fortitude in all the troubles of life, and yields support in the hour of death, Prov. 14: 32. 5. Sure, (Heb. 6: 19.) because it will not disappoint us, and is fixed on a sure foundation. 6. Joyful, (Rom. 5: 2.) as it produces the greatest felicity in the anticipation of complete deliverance from all evil. Grove's Moral Phil., vol. i. p. 381; Gill's Body of Div. p. 82. vol. iii.; No. 471, Spect.; Jay's Sermons, vol. ii. ser. 2.—*Hend. HOPHNI, and PHINEHAS, sons of Eli, the high-priest, were sons of Belial; that is, wicked and dissolute persons, 1 Sam. 2: 12. They knew not the Lord, nor performed the functions of their ministry, as they ought, but disgraced their office by the most odious rapacity and impurity. The Lord threatened them and their father by the young prophet Samuel, (1 Sam. 3: 11, 12.) and soon afterwards Hophni and Phinehas were slain in battle by the Philistines, together with thirty thousand men of Israel. (See ELI.)—Calmet.

HOPHRAH. (See APRIES.)

HOPKINS, (EZEKIEL, D. D.), bishop of Londonderry, the son of an English clergyman, of Stamford, in Devonshire, was born in 1663. His father got him admitted into the choir of Magdalen college, Oxford, of which society he afterwards became chaplain. Being presented to the rectory of St. Mary Woolnoth, in the city of London, the bishop of that diocese made some difficulty of instituting him, on account of his opinions, which leaned towards Presbyterianism. This circumstance, and the breaking out of the plague, induced him to remove to Exeter; where, forming an acquaintance with the family of lord Robartes, afterwards earl of Truro, he married Araminta, a daughter of that nobleman; and, on the appointment of his father-in-law to the lord lieutenancy of Ireland, accompanied him to his seat of government. Before his patron's recall, he had already obtained the deanery of Raphoe; and, in 1671, the new lord lieutenant, the earl of Berkeley, raised him, on the strong personal recommendation of his predecessor, to the bishopric of the same diocese. In this see he continued ten years, when he was translated to that of Londonderry. On the city's being besieged in 1688, he came to London, and the following year was made minister of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, and continued so till his death, in June, 1690. Three editions of his works, among which are "Expositions of the Decalogue and the Lord's Prayer," besides Sermons, &c. have been printed in folio, quarto, and octavo.

He was a pious and learned prelate, of excellent doctrinal sentiments, richly impregnated with evangelical truth; and his elaborate "Discourse on the Vanity of the World" should be read by every one who would form a just estimate of human life. An edition of his works was published a few years ago, in four volumes, octavo, to which was prefixed a Memoir, by the Rev. Josiah Pratt.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

HOPKINSIANS, so called from the Rev. Samuel Hopkins, D. D., an American divine, who, in his sermons and tracts, has made several additions to the sentiments first advanced by the celebrated Jonathan Edwards, late president of New Jersey college. Dr. Hopkins was born at Waterbury, in Connecticut, 1721, and graduated at Yale college, in 1741. Soon after, he engaged in theological studies, at Northampton, Massachusetts, under the superintendance of Jonathan Edwards, and, in 1743, was ordained at Housatonic, now Great Barrington, Massachusetts, where he continued till he removed to Newport, Rhode Island, in consequence of the diminution of his congregation, and his want of support. When he had resided some time in this place, the people became dissatisfied with his sentiments, and resolved, at a meeting, to intimate to him their disinclination to his continuance among them. On the ensuing Sabbath, he preached his farewell discourse, which was so interesting and impressive, that they besought him to remain, which he did till his death, in 1803. He was a pious and zealous man, of considerable talents, and almost incredible powers of application. He is said to have been sometimes engaged during eighteen hours in his studies. His doctrinal views are contained in his "System of Divinity," published in a second edition at Boston, in 1811, in two vols. 8vo.

The following is a summary of the distinguishing tenets of the Hopkinsians, together with a few of the reasons they bring forward in support of their sentiments.

I. That all true virtue, or real holiness, consists in disinterested benevolence. The object of benevolence is universal being, including God, and all intelligent creatures. It wishes and seeks the good of every individual, so far as is consistent with the greatest good of the whole, which is comprised in the glory of God and the perfection and happiness of his kingdom. The law of God is the standard of all moral rectitude or holiness. This is reduced into love to God, and our neighbor as ourselves; and universal good-will comprehends all the love to God, our neighbor, and ourselves, required in the divine law, and therefore must be the whole of holy obedience. Let any serious person think what are the particular branches of true piety; when he has viewed each one by itself, he will find that disinterested friendly affection is its distinguishing characteristic. For instance, all the holiness in pious fear, which distinguishes it from the fear of the wicked, consists in love. Again; holy gratitude is nothing but good-will to God and our neighbor, in which we ourselves are included; and correspondent affection, excited by a view of the good-will and kindness of God. Universal good-will also implies the whole of the duty we owe to our neighbor, for justice, truth, and faithfulness, are comprised in universal benevolence; so are temperance and chastity. For an undue indulgence of our appetites and passions is contrary to benevolence, as tending to hurt ourselves or others; and so opposite to the general good, and the divine command, in which all the crime of such indulgence consists. In short, all virtue is nothing but benevolence acted out in its proper nature and perfection; or love to God and our neighbor, made perfect in all its genuine exercises and expressions.

II. That all sin consists in selfishness. By this is meant an interested, selfish affection, by which a person sets himself up as supreme, and the only object of regard; and nothing is good or lovely in his view, unless suited to promote his own private interest. This self-love is, in its whole nature, and every degree of it, enmity against God; it is not subject to the law of God, and is the only affection that can oppose it. It is the foundation of all spiritual blindness, and therefore the source of all the open idolatry in the heathen world, and false religion under the light of the gospel; all this is agreeable to that self-love which opposes God's true character. Under the influence of this principle, men depart from truth; it being itself the greatest practical lie in nature, as it sets up that which is comparatively nothing above universal existence. Self-love is the source of all profaneness and impiety in the world, and of all pride and ambition among men, which is nothing but selfishness, acted out in this particular way. This is the foundation of all covetousness and sensuality, as it blinds people's eyes, contracts their hearts, and sinks them down, so that they look upon earthly enjoyments as the greatest good. This is the source of all falsehood, injustice, and oppression, as it excites mankind by undue methods to invade the property of others. Self-love produces all the violent passions—envy, wrath, clamor, and evil speaking : and every thing contrary to the divine law is briefly comprehended in this fruitful source of all iniquity—supreme self-love.

III. That there are no promises of regenerating grace made to the doings of the unregenerate. For as far as men act from self-love, they act from a bad end ; for those who have no true love to God, really do no duty when they attend on the externals of religion. And as the unregenerate act from a selfish principle, they do nothing which is commanded : their impotent doings are wholly opposed to repentance and conversion ; therefore not implied in the command to repent, &c. : so far from this, they are altogether disobedient to the command. Hence it appears that there are no promises of salvation to the doings of the unregenerate.

IV. That the impotency of sinners, with respect to believing in Christ, is not natural, but moral ; for it is a plain dictate of common sense, that natural impossibility excludes all blame. But an unwilling mind is universally considered as a crime, and not as an excuse, and is the very thing wherein our wickedness consists. That the impotency of the sinner is owing to a disaffection of heart, is evident from the promises of the gospel. When any object of good is proposed and promised to us upon asking, it clearly evinces that there can be no impotence in us with respect to obtaining it, beside the disapprobation of the will ; and that inability, which consists in disinclination, never renders any thing improperly the subject of precept or command.

V. That, in order to faith in Christ, a sinner must approve in his heart of the divine conduct, even though God should cast him off forever ; which, however, neither implies love of misery, nor hatred of happiness. For if the law is good, death is due to those who have broken it. The Judge of all the earth cannot but do right. It would bring everlasting reproach upon his government to spare us, considered merely as in ourselves. When this is felt in our hearts, and not till then, we shall be prepared to look to the free grace of God, through the redemption which is in Christ, and to exercise faith in his blood, who is set forth to be a propitiation to declare God's righteousness, that he might be just, and yet be the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus.

VI. That the infinitely wise and holy God has exerted his omnipotent power in such a manner as he purposed should be followed with the existence and entrance of moral evil into the system. For it must be admitted on all hands, that God has a perfect knowledge, foresight, and view of all possible existences and events. If that system and scene of operation, in which moral evil should never have existed, was actually preferred in the divine mind, certainly the Deity is infinitely disappointed in the issue of his own operations. Nothing can be more dishonorable to God than to imagine that the system which is actually formed by the divine hand, and which was made for his pleasure and glory, is yet not the fruit of wise contrivance and design.

VII. That the introduction of sin is, upon the whole, for the general good. For the wisdom and power of the Deity are displayed in carrying on designs of the greatest good ; and the existence of moral evil has undoubtedly occasioned a more full, perfect, and glorious discovery of the infinite perfections of the divine nature than could otherwise have been made to the view of creatures. If the extensive manifestation of the pure and holy nature of God, and his infinite aversion to sin, and all his inherent perfections, in their genuine fruits and effects, is either itself the greatest good, or necessarily contains it, it must necessarily follow that the introduction of sin is for the greatest good.

VIII. That repentance is before faith in Christ. By this is not intended, that repentance is before a speculative belief of the being and perfections of God, and of the person and character of Christ ; but only that true repentance is previous to a saving faith in Christ, in which the believer is united to Christ, and entitled to the benefits of his mediation and atonement. That repentance is before faith in this sense, appears from several considerations.

1. As repentance and faith respect different objects, so they are distinct exercises of the heart ; and therefore one not only may, but must be prior to the other. 2. There may be genuine repentance of sin without faith in Christ, but there cannot be true faith in Christ without repentance of sin ; and since repentance is necessary in order to faith in Christ, it must necessarily be prior to faith in Christ. 3. John the Baptist, Christ and his apostles, taught that repentance is before faith. John cried, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand ;" intimating, that true repentance was necessary in order to embrace the gospel of the kingdom. Christ commanded, "Repent ye, and believe the gospel." And Paul preached "repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ."

IX. That though men became sinners by Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have, and are accountable for no sins but personal ; for, 1. Adam's act, in eating the forbidden fruit, was not the act of his posterity : therefore they did not sin at the same time he did. 2. The sinfulness of that act could not be transferred to them afterwards, because the sinfulness of an act can no more be transferred from one person to another than an act itself. 3. Therefore Adam's act, in eating the forbidden fruit, was not the cause, but only the occasion of his posterity's being sinners. God was pleased to make a constitution, that, if Adam remained holy through his state of trial, his posterity should in consequence be holy also ; but if he sinned, his posterity should in consequence be sinners likewise. Adam sinned, and now God brings his posterity into the world sinners. By Adam's sin we are become sinners, not for it ; his sin being only the occasion, not the cause of our committing sins.

X. That though believers are justified through Christ's righteousness, yet his righteousness is not transferred to them. For, 1. Personal righteousness can no more be transferred from one person to another, than personal sin. 2. If Christ's personal righteousness were transferred to believers, they would be as perfectly holy as Christ ; and so stand in no need of forgiveness. 3. But believers are not conscious of having Christ's personal righteousness, but feel and bewail much indwelling sin and corruption. 4. The Scripture represents believers as receiving only the benefits of Christ's righteousness in justification, or their being pardoned and accepted for Christ's righteousness sake, and this is the proper Scripture notion of imputation. Jonathan's righteousness was imputed to Mephibosheth when David showed kindness to him for his father Jonathan's sake.

The Hopkinsians warmly contend for the doctrine of the divine decrees, that of particular election, total depravity, the special influences of the Spirit of God in regeneration, justification by faith alone, the final perseverance of the saints, and the consistency between entire freedom and absolute dependence ; and therefore claim it as their just due, since the world will make distinctions, to be called Hopkinsian Calvinists. Adam's View of Religions ; Hopkins on Holiness ; Edwards on the Will, p. 234, 282 ; Edwards on Virtue ; West's Essay on Moral Agency, p. 170, 181 ; Spring's Nature of Duty, 23 ; Moral Disquisitions, p. 40.—*Hend. HOR ; a mountain in Arabia Petrea, on the confines of Idumea, and probably the same with mount Seir. One particular mountain of this tract, however, seems to be particularly intended in Scripture. Here Aaron died and was buried, in the fortieth year after the departure from Egypt, Deut. 33: 50. Num. 20: 26. 27: 13. A small building is shown in mount Hor, which is said to be the tomb of Aaron. It is a white building, surmounted by a cupola, and having a descent of several steps into a chamber excavated in a rock.—Calmet.

HORITES ; an ancient people, who dwell in the mountains of Seir, Gen. 14: 6. They had princes, and were powerful before Esau conquered their country. The Horites and the Edomites seem afterwards to have composed but one people, Deut. 2: 1. 23: 2. Judg. 5: 4.—Calmet.

HORN ; an eminence or angle, a corner or rising, Isa. 5: 1. By horns of the altar of burnt-offerings, many understand the angles of that altar ; but there were also horns or eminences at these angles, Exod. 27: 2. 30: 2. (See ALTAR.) As the ancients frequently used horns to hold liquors, vessels containing oil, and perfumes, are often so called, whether made of horn or not, 1 Sam. 16: 1. 1 Kings 1: 39.

"Horns" also signify, by a natural metaphor, rays of light; the face of Moses was encompassed with horns, that is, it was radiant, or, as it were, horns of light issued from it. This illustrates the true sense of Heb. 3: 4.

The principal defence and strength of many animals are in their horns; and hence the horn is often a symbol of power. The Lord exalted the horn of David, and the horn of his people; he breaketh the horn of the ungodly; he cutteth off the horn of Moab; he cutteth off, in his fierce anger, all the horn of Israel. He promises to make the horn of Israel to bud forth; to re-establish its honor, and restore its vigor. Kingdoms and great powers are also described by the symbol of horns, 1 Mac. 7: 46. In Dan. 7, 8, horns represent the power of the Persians, of the Greeks, of Syria, and of Egypt. The prophet describes these animals as having many horns, one of which grew from another. In 1 Mac. 9: 1, the wings of an army are called its horns.—Calmet.

HORNE, (GEORGE, D. D.) a pious and learned prelate, was born, in 1730, at Otham, in Kent, and was educated at Maidstone grammar-school, and at University college, Oxford. He took orders in 1753, and his graceful elocution and excellent style rendered him a popular preacher. He was successively president of Magdalen college, chaplain to the king, vice-chancellor of the university, and dean of Canterbury. In 1790, he was raised to the see of Norwich, which, however, he held less than two years; he dying in January, 1792. In early life he was a strenuous Hutchinsonian, and attacked the system of Newton with a violence which he subsequently regretted. Of his numerous works the principal is, a Commentary on the Book of Psalms, on the composition of which he bestowed nearly twenty years.

He was a prelate of no inconsiderable learning, and universally respected for his excellent qualities as a man and a Christian. His writings, which are invariably characterized by their pious and evangelical tendency, have been held in high repute, and as deservedly esteemed by the friends of piety and virtue. They were published in six volumes, octavo, London, 1795, with a life of the author prefixed, by the Rev. W. Jones, of Nayland. Aikin's Gen. Biog.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

HORNET; a kind of large wasp, which has a powerful sting. The Lord drove out the Canaanites before Israel by means of this insect, Deut. 7: 20. Josh. 24: 12. (See FLY.) For an illustration of the manner in which this might be effected, it should be remarked, that the Israelites, in the sandy wilderness, would escape this creature.—Calmet.

HORROR; a passion excited by an object which causes a high degree of fear and detestation. It is a compound of wonder and fear. Sometimes it has a mixture of pleasure, from which, if predominant, it is denominated a pleasing horror. Such a horror seizes us at the view of vast and hanging precipices, a tempestuous ocean, or wild and solitary places. This passion is the original of superstition, as a wise and well-tempered awe is of religion. Horror and terror seem almost to be synonymous; but the former refers more to what disgusts; the latter to that which alarms us.—Hend. Buck.

HORROX, (JEREMIAH,) a young and religious astronomer, was born, about 1619, at Toxteth, near Liverpool; was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; and died prematurely, to the great loss of science, in 1640-1, aged twenty-one. Horrox was the first who observed the transit of Venus over the solar disk; and he formed a theory of lunar motion, which Newton did not disdain to adopt. He is the author of Venus in Sole visus; and of astronomical papers, which were published by Dr. Wallis, under the title of Opera Posthuma.—Davenport.

HORSE, (mum.) Horses were very rare among the Hebrews in the early ages. The patriarchs had none; and after the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, God expressly forbade their ruler to procure them:—"He shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses; forasmuch as the Lord hath said, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way." Deut. 17: 16. As horses appear to have been generally furnished by Egypt, God prohibits these, 1. Lest there should be such commerce with Egypt as might lead to idolatry. 2. Lest the people might depend on a well-appointed cavalry, as a means of security, and so cease from trusting in the promised aid and protection of Jehovah. 3. That they might not be tempted to extend their dominion by means of cavalry, and so get scattered among the surrounding idolatrous nations, and thus cease, in process of time, to be that distinct and separate people which God intended they should be, and without which the prophecies relative to the Messiah could not be known to have their due and full accomplishment.

In the time of the judges we find horses and war chariots among the Canaanites, but still the Israelites had none; and hence they were generally too timid to venture down into the plains, confining their conquests to the mountainous parts of the country. David's enemies brought against him a strong force of cavalry into the field; and in the book of Psalms the horse commonly appears only on the side of the enemies of the people of God, 2 Sam. 8: 4. Solomon, having married a daughter of Pharaoh, procured a breed of horses from Egypt; and so greatly did he multiply them, that he had four hundred stables, forty thousand stalls, and twelve thousand horsemen, 1 Kings 4: 26. 2 Chron. 9: 25. It seems that the Egyptian horses were in high repute, and were much used in war. When the Israelites were disposed to place too implicit confidence in the assistance of cavalry, the prophet remonstrated in these terms:—"The Egyptians are men, and not God; and their horses are flesh, not spirit," Isaiah 31: 3.

Josiah took away the horses which the kings of Judah, his predecessors, had consecrated to the sun, 2 Kings 23: 11. This luminary was worshipped over all the East, and was represented as riding in a chariot, drawn by the most beautiful and swiftest horses in the world, and performing every day his journey from east to west, to enlighten the earth. In Persia, and among the Massagetæ, horses were sacrificed to the sun, (Herodot. lib. i. cap. 55. Ovid. Fast. lib. viii. Xenoph. Cyropæd. lib. viii.) It is thought that those which Josiah removed from the court of the temple, were appointed for a similar purpose.—Watson; Calmet.

HORSE-LEECH, (olukch;) from a root which signifies to adhere, stick close, or hang fast, Prov. 30: 15. A sort of worm that lives in the water, of a black or brown color, which fattens upon the flesh, and does not quit it till it is entirely full of blood. Solomon says, "The horse-leech hath two daughters, Give, give." This is so apt an emblem of an insatiable rapacity and avarice, that it has been generally used by different writers to express it. Thus Plautus makes one say, speaking of the determination to get money, "I will turn myself into a horse-leech, and suck out their blood;" and Cicero, in one of his letters to Atticus, calls the common people of Rome horse-leeches of the treasury. Solomon, having mentioned those that devoured the property of the poor as the worst of all the generations which he had specified, proceeds to state the insatiable cupidity with which they prosecuted their schemes of rapine and plunder. As the horse-leech had two daughters, cruelty and thirst of blood, which cannot be satisfied, so the oppressor of the poor has two dispositions, rapacity and avarice, which never say they have enough, but continually demand additional gratifications.—Calnet.

HORSLEY, (SAMUEL, D. D.) a celebrated prelate and mathematician, was born in 1733; was educated at Westminster, and Trinity college, Cambridge; and became curate to his father. After having held the livings of Albury, Newington, Thorley, and South Weald, the archdeaconry of St. Alban's, and prebends of St. Paul's and of Gloucester, he was raised, in 1788, to the see of St. David's, whence, in 1793, he was removed to Rochester, and, in 1802, to St. Asaph. For a part of this preferment he was indebted to his controversy with Dr. Priestly, on the subject of the divinity of Christ; his tracts relating to which he collected and published in an 8vo volume. While he was thus rising in the church, he was not neglectful of science. In 1769, he printed an edition of Apollonius, and in 1775, an edition of Newton's works, in five 4to volumes. From 1773 till the election of Sir Joseph Banks, he was secretary of the Royal society; when, deeming the dignity of the society lessened by the choice of a man who was ignorant of the higher sciences, he resigned his office. Bishop Horsley died at Brighton, in 1806. He was a very eloquent preacher, and performed all his episcopal duties in an admirable manner. Besides the works already mentioned, he produced many others, biblical, theological, classical, and scientific.

He was the author of "Critical Disquisitions on the Eighteenth Chapter of Isaiah," 4to; "Hosea, a new Translation, with Notes," 4to; a "Translation of the Psalms," 2 vols.; "Biblical Criticisms," 4 vols. 8vo; Sermons; Charges; elementary Treatises on the Mathematics, on the Prosodies of the Greek and Latin Languages; and papers in the Philosophical Transactions. Nichol's Lit. Anec.

Dr. Horsley has been, not inaptly, described as the last of the race of episcopal giants of the Warburtonian school. He was a man of an original and powerful mind, of very extensive learning, and profoundly versed in the article of ecclesiastical history, of which he gave ample evidence in his controversy with Dr. Priestly, while archdeacon of St. Alban's. Even Gibbon says, "his spear pierced the Socinian's shield. His sermons and critical disquisitions frequently display a rich fund of theological acumen, and of successful illustration of the sacred writings; but his temper did not exhibit much of the meekness and gentleness of his divine Master; and he was too fond of meddling in political discussions, for which he did not escape the censure of Mr. Pitt. Jones' Chris. Biog.—Davenport; Hend. Buck.

HOSAI; a prophet or seer, in the time of Manasseh, king of Judah, 2 Chron. 33: 19, margin. The Jews are of opinion, that Hosai and Isaiah are the same person; the LXX take Hosai in a general sense for prophets and seers; the Syriac calls him Hanan; the Arabic Saphan.—Calnet.

HOSANNA; "Save, I beseech thee," or; "Give salvation;" a well-known Jewish form of blessing, Matt. 21: 9, 15. Mark 11: 9, 10. John 12: 13.—Watson.

HOSEA; son of Beeri, the first of the minor prophets. He is generally considered as a native and inhabitant of the kingdom of Israel, and is supposed to have begun to prophesy about B. C. 800. He exercised his office sixty years; but it is not known at what periods his different prophecies now remaining were delivered. Most of them are directed against the people of Israel, whom he reproves and threatens for their idolatry and wickedness, and exhorts to repentance, with the greatest earnestness, as the only means of averting the evils impending over their country. The principal predictions contained in this book, are the captivity and dispersion of the kingdom of Israel; the deliverance of Judah from Sennacherib; the present state of the Jews; their future restoration, and union with the Gentiles in the kingdom of the Messiah; the call of our Savior out of Egypt, and his resurrection on the third day. The style of Hosea is peculiarly obscure; it is sententious, concise, and abrupt; the transitions of persons are sudden; and the connexive and adversative particles are frequently omitted. The prophecies are in one continued series, without any distinction as to the times when they were delivered, or the different subjects to which they relate. They are not so clear and detailed, as the predictions of those prophets who lived in succeeding ages. When, however, we have surmounted these difficulties, we shall see abundant reason to admire the force and energy with which this prophet writes, and the boldness of the figures and similitudes which he uses.

As the circumstances recorded in the third chapter appear sufficiently strange to us, it may be worth while to add Baron du Tot's account of marriages by Capin;—which agrees with the relations of other travellers into the East: "There is another kind of marriage, which, stipulating the return to be made, fixes likewise the time when the divorce is to take place. This contract is called Capin; and, properly speaking, is only an agreement made between the parties to live together, for such a price, during such a time." (Preliminary Discourse, p. 23.) It is scarcely possible to expect more direct illustration of the prophet's conduct than this extract affords. We learn from it that this contract is a regular form of marriage, and that it is so regarded, generally, in the East; consequently, such a connexion and agreement could give no scandal, in the days of Hosea, though it would not be justifiable under Christian manners. It may easily be imagined that this kind of marriage was liable to be abused; and that it was glanced at, and included, in our Lord's prohibition of hasty divorces, need not be doubted.—Watson; Calnet.

HOSPINIEN, (RALPH), a learned Swiss writer, who did eminent service to the Protestant cause, was born at Altorf, in 1547, and studied at Zurich, Marburg, and Heidelberg. He was settled in the ministry, in 1568, at Zurich, obtained the freedom of the city, and was made provisor of the Abbey school, in 1571. It was here he undertook his great work, a History of the Errors of Popery, to which he was led by accidentally hearing the landlord of a country ale-house express the silly idea that the monastic life came immediately from paradise. He published it in six parts, folio, from 1587 to 1602, enlarging each succeeding edition, and adding confutations of Bellarmine, Baronius, and Gretser. He published besides several works, the most important being a History of the Jesuits, from their origin to 1619, in which he fully exposes the abominable maxims and intrigues of the order. These works gave him the very highest reputation. In 1623, his powers of intellect began to fail, and in 1626, he rested from his labor, at the age of seventy-nine.—Middleton, vol. ii. 443.

HOSPITALITY; kindness exercised in the entertainment of strangers. This virtue, we find, is explicitly commanded by, and makes a part of the morality of the New Testament. Indeed, that religion which breathes nothing but charity, and whose tendency is to expand the heart, and call forth the benevolent exertions of mankind, must evidently embrace the practice.

If it be asked, of whom is this required? it is answered, that the principle is required of all, though the duty itself can only be practised by those whose circumstances will admit of it. Dr. Stennet, in his discourse on this subject, (Domestic Duties, ser. 10.) justly observes, that hospitality is a species of charity to which every one is not competent. But the temper from which it proceeds, I mean a humane, generous, benevolent temper, that ought to prevail to every breast. Some are miserably poor, and it is not to be expected that their doors should be thrown open to entertain strangers; yet the cottage of the peasant may exhibit noble specimens of hospitality. Here distress has often met with pity, and the persecuted an asylum. Nor is there a man who has a house to sleep in, but may be benevolent to strangers. But there are persons of certain characters and stations who are more especially obliged to it; as, particularly, magistrates and others in civil offices, who would forfeit the esteem of the public, and greatly injure their usefulness, were they not to observe the rites of hospitality. Ministers also, and such Christians as are qualified by their particular offices in the church, and their affluent circumstances, may be eminently useful in this way. The two grand virtues which ought to be studied by every one, in order that he may have it in his power to be hospitable, are industry and economy.

But it may be asked o' n, to whom is this duty to be practised? To strangers: but here it is necessary to observe, that the term strangers hath two acceptations. It is to be understood of travellers, or persons who come from a distance, and with whom we have little or no acquaintance; and more generally of all who are not of our house,—strangers, as opposed to domestics. Hospitality is especially to be practised to the poor; they who have no houses of their own, or possess few of the conveniences of life, should occasionally be invited to our houses, and refreshed at our tables, Luke 14: 13, 14. Hospitality also may be practised to those who are of the same character and of the same community with ourselves. As to the various offices of hospitality, and the manner in which they should be rendered, it must be observed, that the entertainments should be plentiful, frugal, and cordial, Gen. 18: 6, 8. John 12: 3. Luke 15: 17.

The obligations to this duty arise from the fitness and reasonableness of it; it brings its own reward, Acts 20: 35. It is expressly commanded by God, Lev. 25: 35, 38. Luke 16: 19. 14: 13, 14. Rom. 12. Heb. 13: 1, 2. 1 Pet. 4: 9. We have many striking examples of hospitality on divine record: Abraham, Gen. 18: 1, 8. Lot, Gen. 19: 1, 3. Job. 31: 17, 22. Shunamite, 2 Kings 4: 8, 10. The hospitable man mentioned in Judges, 19: 16, 21. David, 2 Sam. 6: 19. Obadiah, 1 Kings 18: 4. Nehemiah, Neh. 5: 17, 18. Martha, Luke 10: 38. Mary, Matt. 26: 6, 13. The primitive Christians, Acts 2: 45, 46. Priscilla and Aquila, Acts 18: 26. Lydia, Acts 16: 15, &c. &c. Lastly, what should have a powerful effect on our minds, is the consideration of divine hospitality. God is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works. His sun shines and his rain falls on the evildoers as well as the good. His very enemies share of his bounty. He gives liberally to all men, and upbraids not; but especially we should remember the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus. Let us lay all these considerations together, and then ask ourselves whether we can find it in our hearts to be selfish, parsimonious, and inhospitable.—Hend. Buck.

HOST, (from the Latin hostia, in the church of Rome, a victim or sacrifice;) a name given to the elements used in the eucharist, or rather to the consecrated wafer, which they pretend to offer up every day, as a new host or sacrifice for the sins of mankind. They pay adoration to the host upon a false presumption that the elements are no longer bread and wine, but transubstantiated into the real body and blood of Christ. (See TRANSUBSTANTIATION.) Pope Gregory IX. first decreed a bell to be rung, as a signal for the people to betake themselves to the adoration of the host. The vessel wherein the hosts are kept is called the cibory, being a large kind of covered chalice.—Hend. Buck.

HOSTAGE; a person delivered into the hand of another as the security for the performance of some engagement. Conquered kings or nations often gave hostages for the payment of their tribute, or continuance of subjection, 2 Kings 14: 14.—Brown.

HOTTENTOTS; the native inhabitants of South Africa, who are gross pagans, having no idea of a Supreme Being, though they pay a superstitious regard to evil demons. Their only object of worship worthy of mention, is a peculiar insect, called the Mantis, or walking-leaf, from its resemblance to the leaf of a tree in the path-way. The Hottentots call it "the Child of Heaven;" and, when it alights on any person, consider it as a celestial visitant, and a token of great good fortune.—Williams.

HOURS. (See DAY; DIAL; and WATCH.)

HOUSE; a place of residence. The purpose of a house being for dwelling, and that of tents being the same, they are called by one name (beth) in the Hebrew. On the same principle, the tabernacle of God, though only a tent, is sometimes called the temple; that is, the residence of God.

The general method of building, in the East, seems to have continued the same, from the earliest ages, without the least alteration or improvement. Large doors, spacious chambers, marble pavements, cloistered courts, with fountains sometimes playing in the midst, are certainly conveniences very well adapted to the circumstances of the climate, where the summer heats are generally so intense. The jealousy likewise of the people is less apt to be alarmed, whilst all the windows open into their respective courts, if we except a latticed window or balcony which sometimes looks into the streets.

The streets of the cities, the better to shade them from the sun, are usually narrow, with sometimes a range of shops on each side. If from these we enter into one of the principal houses, we shall first pass through a porch or gateway, with benches on each side, where the master of the family receives visits and despatches business; few persons, not even the nearest relations, having a further admission, except upon extraordinary occasions. From hence we are received into the court, or quadrangle, which lying open to the weather, is, according to the ability of the owner, paved with marble, or such materials as will immediately carry off the water into the common sewers. There is something very analagous betwixt this open space in these buildings, and the Impluvium, or Cava Edium, of the Romans; both of them being alike exposed to the weather, and giving light to the house.

For the accommodation of the guests, the pavement is covered with mats or carpets; and as it is secured against all interruption from the street, is well adapted to public entertainments. It is called, says Dr. Shaw, the middle of the house, and literally answers to the (to meson) "the midst" of the evangelist, into which the man afflicted with the palsy was let down through the ceiling, with his couch, before Jesus, Luke 5: 19. Hence, he conjectures that our Lord was at this time instructing the people in the court of one of these houses; and it is by no means improbable, that the quadrangle was to him and his apostles a favorite situation, while they were engaged in disclosing the mysteries of redemption. To defend the company from the scorching sun-beams, or "windy storm and tempest," an awning or canopy was expanded upon ropes from one side of the parapet wall to the other, which might be unfolded or folded as pleasure. This is the covering which was removed on the occasion above referred to; though our translation conveys a different idea. The court is for the most part surrounded with a cloister, over which, when the house has a number of stories, a gallery is erected of the same dimensions with the cloister, having a balustrade, or else a piece of carved or latticed work, going round about, to prevent people from falling from it into the court.

The doors of the inclosure round the house are made very small; but the doors of the houses very large, for the purpose of admitting a copious stream of fresh air into their apartments. The windows which look into the street are very high and narrow, and defended by lattice work; as they are only intended to allow the cloistered inmate a peep of what is passing without, while he remains concealed behind the casement. This kind of window the ancient Hebrews called arubah, which is the same term that they used to express those small openings through which pigeons passed into the cavities of the rocks, or into those buildings which were raised for their reception. Irwin describes the windows in Upper Egypt as having the same form and dimensions; and says expressly, that one of the windows of the house in which they lodged, and through which they looked into the street, more resembled a pigeon-hole than any thing else. But the sacred writers mention another kind of window, which was large and airy; it was called halum, and was large enough to admit a person of mature age being cast out of it; a punishment which that profligate woman Jezebel suffered by the command of Jehu, the authorized exterminator of her family. These large windows admit the light and the breeze into spacious apartments of the same length with the court, but which seldom or never communicate with one another.

In the houses of the fashionable and the gay, the lower part of the walls is adorned with rich hangings of velvet or damask, tinged with the liveliest colors, suspended on hooks, or taken down at pleasure, Esther 1: 6. The upper part of the walls is adorned with the most ingenious wreathings and devices, in stucco and fret-work. The ceiling is generally of wainscot, painted with great art, or else thrown into a variety of pannels with gilded mouldings. In the days of Jeremiah the prophet, when the profusion and luxury of all ranks in Judea were at their height, their chambers were ceiled with fragrant and costly wood, and painted with the richest colors, Jer. 22: 14. The floors of these splendid apartments were laid with painted tiles, or slabs of the most beautiful marble. Plaster of terrace is often used for the same purpose; and the floor is always covered with carpets, which are for the most part of the richest materials.

Upon these carpets, a range of narrow beds, or mattresses, is often placed along the sides of the wall, with velvet or damask bolsters, for the greater ease and convenience of the company. To these luxurious indulgences the prophets occasionally seem to allude, Ezek. 13: 18. Amos 6: 4. At one end of each chamber is a little gallery, raised three or four feet above the floor, with a balustrade in front, to which they go up by a few steps. Here they place their beds; a situation frequently alluded to in the Holy Scriptures, Gen. 49: 4. 2 Kings 1: 4, 16. Ps. 132: 3.

The roof of the house is always flat, and often composed of branches of wood laid across rude beams; and, to defend it from the injuries of the weather, to which it is peculiarly exposed in the rainy season, it is covered with a strong terrace of plaster. It is surrounded by a wall breast high, which forms the partition with the contiguous houses, and prevents one from falling into the street on the one side, or into the court on the other, 2 Kings 1: 2. This answers to the battlements which Moses commanded the people of Israel to make for the roof of their houses, for the same reason, Dent. 22: 8. "When thou buildest a new house, then thou shalt make a battlement for thy roof, that thou bring not blood upon thine house, if any man fall from thence." Deut. 22: 8. Instead of the parapet wall, some terraces are guarded, like the galleries, with balustrades only, or latticed work.

In Judea, the inhabitants sleep upon the tops of their houses during the heats of summer, in arbors made of the branches of trees, or in tents of rushes. When Dr. Pococke was at Tiberias in Galilee, he was entertained by the sheik's steward, and with his company supped upon the top of the house for coolness, according to their custom, and lodged there likewise, in a sort of closet of about eight feet square, formed of wicker work, plastered round towards the bottom, but without any door, each person having his cell. In like manner, the Persians take refuge during the day in subterraneous chambers, and pass the night on the flat roofs of their houses.

The houses of the poorer class of people in the East are very bad constructions, consisting of mud walls, reeds and rushes; whence they become apt comparisons to the fragility of human life. Niebuhr describes and represents an Arabian hut, in Yemen, composed of stakes, and plastered with clay. To such a one Job seems to allude, (chap. 4: 19.) "God putteth no confidence in his angels; how much less in them who dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust; who are crushed by a moth striking against them!" He compares the human body and constitution to one of these tenements of clay, by reason of its speedy dissolution under any one accident of the many to which it is exposed. How uncertain is health, strength, favor! a breeze of wind too strong, a shower of rain too heavy, often produces disorders which demolish the tenement.

The expression, "to dig through houses," occurs, Job 24: 16. "Thieves," says Mr. Ward, "in Bengal very frequently dig through the mud walls, and under the clay floors of houses, and, entering unperceived, plunder them while the inhabitants are asleep."

Our Lord's parable of the foolish man who built his house on the sand, derives illustration from the following passage in Ward's valuable "View of the Hindoos." "The fishermen in Bengal build their huts in the dry season on the beds of sand, from which the river has retired. When the rains set in, which they often do very suddenly, accompanied by violent north-west winds, the water pours down in torrents from the mountains. In one night multitudes of these huts are frequently swept away, and the place where they stood is the next morning undiscoverable."

Heaven is considered as the house of God: (John 14: 2.) "In my Father's house are many mansions;" where we observe a remarkable implication—mansions are great, noble, hereditary dwellings, among men, abounding with conveniences, &c. "My Father's house—his ordinary residence—contains many of what the sons of men esteem capital residences—mansions."

2. House is taken for household, or family: "The Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house," Gen. 12: 17. "What is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?" 2 Sam. 7: 18. So Joseph was of the house of David, (Luke 1: 27. 2: 4.) but more especially he was of his royal lineage, or family; and, as we conceive, in the direct line or eldest branch of the family; so that he was next of kin to the throne, if the government had still continued in possession of the descendants of David. House is taken for kindred; it is a Christian's duty to provide first for those of his own house, (1 Tim. 5: 8.) his family, his relatives.—Calmet & Watson.

HOUSEHOLD. (See HOUSE.)

HOWARD, (JOHN,) the celebrated philanthropist, was born, in 1726, at Hackney, and was bound apprentice to a grocer by his guardians; but, being possessed of a fortune, he purchased his indentures, and made two tours on the continent; one of them for the purpose of viewing the ruins of Lisbon. Having lost his first wife, who was much older than himself, and whom he married out of gratitude for her attention during sickness, he made a second choice in 1758. For several years he resided on his estate at Cardington, near Bedford, occupied in educating his son, and in executing plans to render comfortable the situation of his tenants and laborers. Nor was his kindness limited to worldly benefits; it extended to eternity; watching over their morals, and inculcating the principles of vital Christianity in their hearts; in short, he was a universal blessing. He had already obtained experimentally some knowledge of a prison, having been captured on his return to Lisbon, and confined in France; but his appointment, in 1773, to the office of high sheriff of Bedford, induced him to look more narrowly into the subject, with the hope of ameliorating the condition of the captive. Here, then, commenced that philanthropical career which closed but with his life. Not only were all the prisons of his own country repeatedly visited, but, in several journeys, he examined minutely those of the continent, "to remember (as Mr. Burke beautifully expresses it) the forgotten, to attend to the neglected, to visit the forsaken, and to compare and collate the distresses of all men in all countries." His glorious course was terminated, by fever, at Cherson, in Russia, January 20, 1790,

The amavity and the benevolence of a man, who, at the expense of thirty thousand pounds, travelled between fifty and sixty thousand miles, enduring the fatigues, and dangers, and changes of heat and cold, rain and snow, is indeed above all praise. Yet it was unstained by pride. The love of Christ which ruled his heart in life, led him to request that no other inscription might be put on his grave than this: "Christ is my hope."

He wrote the State of the Prisons in England and Wales; and an Account of the principal Lazarettos in Europe. See his Life, by J. B. Brown, Esq., of the Inner Temple.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

HOWE, (John, A. M.,) was born at Loughborough, in the year 1630. His father was minister of that place, who, having lost his benefice for strong attachment to the Puritans, settled in Lancashire. There his son acquired his classical knowledge, and was sent early to Cambridge. After continuing some years in that university, and taking his first degree, he removed to Oxford; where he made considerable progress in literature, obtained the degree of master of arts, and was then elected fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford. Soon after taking his second degree, he was ordained by Mr. Herle, of Witwick, assisted by the ministers of the chapels in this very extensive parish. The field of ministerial labor, to which he afterwards removed, was Great Torrington, in Devon; and his eminent services were crowned with considerable success. Business calling him to London, he had the curiosity to go to the chapel at Whitehall. Cromwell observing him, thought that he saw something extraordinary in him, and after hearing him two or three times, insisted that Mr. Howe should come to Whitehall, and be his domestic chaplain. With very great reluctance he was compelled to gratify a man who would have his own way; as Howe felt that it did not appear disinterested so to act. Such, however, really was his disinterestedness, that once, when he was applying for a favor, the Protector said, "Mr. Howe, you often come to me in behalf of others, but you never have asked one benefit for your own family: how comes it that you do not rather seek to advance their interest?"

He was a man of unalterable fidelity, and nothing could move him from the path of duty. After Cromwell's death, he continued about three months in the service of his son Richard, and then returned to his old people at Torrington, and labored among them till the act of uniformity passed. Soon after the restoration, he was unjustly accused of having uttered something seditious, if not treasonable, in his sermon; but by the testimony of more than twenty of his most judicious hearers, he was cleared from the malicious charge. Nothing, however, could free him from the effects of the Bartholomew act; and he retired from the station of a parish minister to be a silenced non-conformist.

He was now compelled to steal opportunities of usefulness, and to preach the gospel in secret. For several years he was an itinerant preacher in the habitations of his friends. Seeing no prospect of extensive usefulness at home, he accepted an offer from lord Mazarene, to be his chaplain; and in the year 1671, went over with his family to Ireland. The mansion of his patron was in the neighborhood of Antrim. There Mr. Howe stately officiated in the church of that city, and was admitted into the churches in the neighboring towns.

From this situation he was, in the year 1675, called to be pastor of a church, formed of persons who had belonged to his congregation; and he returned to London to exercise the office of the ministry. For ten years he labored with extraordinary acceptance in the service of his people, among whom were not a few eminently distinguished, not only for their piety, but their talents, their education, and their respectability in social life.

In the year 1685, he complied with an invitation from lord Wharton, to travel with him to the continent; and after visiting many foreign parts, as it was still unsafe for him to return to England, he took up his residence at Utrecht, and continued there some time, greatly respected by all ranks of people, preaching stately at his own house, and frequently in the English church. In the year 1687, when king James afforded to the dissenters in England more enlarged toleration, Mr. Howe returned with pleasure to his flock, and took the benefit of the indulgence. After the revolution, Mr. Howe continued to labor among his people in Silver street, who are said to have been a society peculiarly select. He took an active part in every thing relating to the concerns of religion; and ever appeared the powerful advocate of truth, of piety, of moderation, and liberality. In every part of his conduct, his entire devotedness to the service of God shone forth; and in the end, he exhibited the resemblance of the sun in a summer evening, setting in mildness of glory. He died on the 2d of April, 1705, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

Mr. Howe's person was the index of his mind. He was above the common size; there was a dignity in his countenance, and something unusually great and venerable in his whole deportment. His talents were of the highest order. His application to study was close and unremitting; and his faculties were roused with their utmost energies, in order to attain every branch of knowledge which could conduce to improve, and aid the researches and pursuits of a divine.

Unfeigned and exalted piety filled the soul of John Howe: the great end of his life was to please God, and to advance his glory; and it would not be easy to find a man equal to him in universal benevolence, and in that purity and humility which adorn the Christian character. He had his sentiments as to lesser points in religion, and as to church government; he acted according to his own judgment, and would be guided by no other man's opinion. But his soul appears to have been filled with the great things of Christianity, and with them alone. His works, in the estimation of the public, have deserved a high place in the theological library. They have lately been collected into eight octavo volumes, and published, in both the demy and royal size, with his Life prefixed; also in one royal octavo volume.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

HUGUENOTS; a term of uncertain origin, which was given, by way of contempt to the French Protestants. Though Francis I. used every effort to prevent the principles of the Reformation from spreading in France, and persecuted the Calvinists, by whom they were most zealously propagated, yet they took root, in the same proportion as they were attempted to be suppressed. The persecutions of such as professed them, were frequently most cruel and bloody; owing to the cupidity of certain parties at court, who thought to enrich themselves by seizing on the estates of the heretics. Under Francis II. the Huguenots were made a hand-ball to gratify the political intrigues of the day. They were dreadfully harassed by the princes of the house of Guise, through whose influence a chamber of parliament was established, called the burning chamber, the duty of which was to convict and burn heretics. Still they suffered in a most exemplary manner; and would not have thought of a rebellion, had they not been encouraged to it, in 1560, by a prince of the blood, Louis of Condé, to whom they leagued themselves, having previously consulted lawyers and theologians, both in France and Germany, as to the legality of such a measure. In pursuance of their plan, it was determined, that on an appointed day, a certain number of Calvinists should appear before the king at Blois, to present a petition for the free exercise of their religion; and in case this request was denied, as it was foreseen it would be, a chosen band of armed Protestants were to make themselves masters of the city at Blois, seize the Guises, and compel the king to name the prince of Condé regent of the realm. The plot, however, was betrayed, and most of the armed conspirators were executed or imprisoned. The contest between the two parties became yet more violent, in the reign of Charles IX., but, from motives of policy, the Protestants were allowed the privilege of toleration, chiefly owing to the influence of the queen mother; but her instability and intrigues, at last, only rendered their case the more deplorable, and produced the horrible St. Bartholomew massacre, in 1572. (See BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY.) After many struggles, they had their civil rights secured to them under Henry IV., by the edict of Nantes, in 1598, which gave them equal claims with the Catholics to all offices and dignities, and left them in possession of the fortresses which had been ceded to them. In the reign of Louis

XIII. they were again molested, again took to arms, but were again worsted, and ultimately obliged to surrender all their strong holds. They were now left at the mercy of the monarch; but were not disturbed till Louis XIV., led on by his confessor and Madame de Maintenon, was induced to persecute them, with a view to bring them back to the true church. In 1681, he deprived them of most of their civil rights, and sent large bodies of dragoons into the provinces to compel them to renounce their principles. Though the frontiers were vigilantly guarded, upwards of five hundred thousand Huguenots made their escape to Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and England. Supposing them either to be extirpated or converted to Catholicism, Louis revoked the edict of Nantes in 1685. Since that time, at which there were still half a million of them in France, they have alternately enjoyed repose, and been the subjects of alarm and persecution. In 1746, they ventured to appear publicly in Languedoc and Dauphiny; and as the principles of toleration and general liberty matured, they gradually recovered their place in society, till at last the revolution placed them on the same footing with their fellow-citizens. The troubles, attended with bloodshed, which occurred at Nismes, soon after the restoration, were merely accidental, and were suppressed by the judicious measures of government.—Hend. Buck.

HUMANITARIANS; those who believe in the simple humanity of Christ, or that he was nothing more than a mere man, born according to the usual course of nature, and who lived and died according to the ordinary circumstances of mankind. (See SOCINIANS.)—Hend. Buck.

HUMANITY; the exercise of the social and benevolent virtues; a fellow-feeling for the distresses of another. It is properly called humanity, because there is little or nothing of it in brutes. The social affections are conceived by all to be more refined than the selfish. Sympathy and humanity are universally esteemed the finest temper of mind; and for that reason the prevalence of the social affections in the progress of society is held to be a refinement of our nature. Kaime's El. of Crit., p. 104, vol. i.; Robinson's Sermon on Christianity a System of Humanity; Pratt's Poem on Humanity.—Hend. Buck.

HUMANITY OF CHRIST, is his possessing a true human body, and a true human soul, and which he assumed for the purpose of rendering his mediation effectual to our salvation. (See JESUS CHRIST.)—Hend. Buck.

HUMANITY, NEUL; a term recently introduced by Mr. Irving, late of the Scotch church, London, in reference to the human nature of our Lord; respecting which he maintains, in opposition to the express statements of Scripture, that it possessed sinful properties, dispositions, and inclinations, till the period of his resurrection; when, having condemned sin in his flesh, he entered into glory in flesh free from sin, and consequently free from death and corruption.—Hend. Buck.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST, is that state of meanness and distress to which he voluntarily descended for the purpose of executing his mediatorial work. This appears, 1. In his birth. He was born of a woman—a sinful woman; though he was without sin, Gal. 4: 4. A poor woman, Luke 2: 7, 24. In a poor country village, John 1: 46. In a stable, an abject place. Of a nature subject to infirmities, (Heb. 2: 9.) hunger, thirst, weariness, pain, &c. 2. In his circumstances:—laid in a manger when he was born; lived in obscurity for a long time; probably worked at the trade of a carpenter; had not a place where to lay his head; and was oppressed with poverty while he went about preaching the gospel. 3. It appeared in his reputation:—he was loaded with the most abusive railing and calumny; (Is. 53.) the most false accusations; (Matt. 26: 59, 67.) and the most ignominious ridicule; Ps. 22: 6. Matt. 22: 68. John 7: 35. 4. In his soul he was often tempted; (Matt. 4: 1, &c. Heb. 2: 17, 18. 1: 15.) grieved with the reproaches cast on himself, and with the sins and miseries of others; (Heb. 12: 3. Matt. 11: 19. John 11: 35.) was burdened with the hidings of his Father's face, and the fears and impressions of his wrath, Ps. 22: 1. Luke 22: 43. Heb. 5: 7. 5. In his death:—scourged, crowned with thorns, received gall and vinegar to drink, and was crucified between two thieves, Luke 23. John 19. Mark 15: 24, 25. 6. In his burial:—not only was he born in another man's house, but he was buried in another man's tomb; for he had no tomb of his own, or family vault to be interred in, Isa. 53: 10, &c. Matt. 13: 46. The humiliation of Christ was necessary, 1. To execute the purpose of God, and covenant engagements of Christ, Acts 2: 23, 24. Ps. 40: 6, 7, 8. 2. To fulfil the manifold types and predictions of the Old Testament. 3. To satisfy the broken law of God, and procure eternal redemption for us, Is. 53. Heb. 9: 12, 15. 4. To leave us an unspotted pattern of holiness and patience under suffering. Tillotson's Sermons; Gill's Body of Divinity, p. 66. vol. ii.; Brown's Natural and Revealed Religion, p. 357; Ridgley's Body of Divinity, qu. 48; Maclaurin's Sermons; Works of Robert Hall, vol. iii.—*Hend. HUMILITY; a lovely disposition of mind, wherein a person has a low opinion of himself in comparison with God and good men. It is a branch of internal worship, or of experimental religion and godliness. It is the effect of divine grace operating on the soul, and always characterizes the true Christian. The heathen philosophers were so little acquainted with this virtue, that they had no name for it: what they meant by the word we use, was meanness and baseness of mind.

To consider this grace a little more particularly, it may be observed, 1. That humility does not oblige a man to wrong the truth or himself, by entertaining a meaner or worse opinion of himself than he deserves. 2. Nor does it oblige a man, right or wrong, to give every body else the preference to himself. A wise man cannot believe himself inferior to the ignorant multitude; nor the virtuous man that he is not so good as those whose lives are vicious. 3. Nor does it oblige a man to treat himself with contempt in his words or actions: it looks more like affectation than humility, when a man says such things in his own dispraise as others know, or he himself believes, to be false; and it is plain, also, that this is often done merely as a bait to catch the praises of others.

Humility consists, 1. In not attributing to ourselves any excellence or good which we have not. 2. In not overrating anything we do. 3. In not taking an immoderate delight in ourselves. 4. In not assuming more of the praise of a quality or action than belongs to us. 5. In an inward sense of our many imperfections and sins. 6. In ascribing all we have and are to the grace of God.

True humility will express itself, 1. By the modesty of our appearance. The humble man will consider his age, abilities, character, function, &c., and act accordingly. 2. By the modesty of our pursuits. We shall not aim at anything above our strength, but prefer a good to a great name. 3. It will express itself by the modesty of our conversation and behavior: we shall not be loquacious, obstinate, forward, envious, discontented, or ambitious.

The advantages of humility are numerous: 1. It is well-pleasing to God, 1 Pet. 3: 4. 2. It has great influence on us in the performance of all other duties, praying, hearing, converse, &c. 3. It indicates that more grace shall be given, James 4: 6. Ps. 25: 9. 4. It preserves the soul in great tranquillity and contentment, Ps. 69: 32, 33. 5. It makes us patient and resigned under afflictions, Job 1: 22. 6. It enables us to exercise moderation in every thing.

To obtain this excellent spirit, we should remember, 1. The example of Christ, Phil. 2: 6, 7, 8. 2. That heaven is a place of humility, Rev. 5: 8. 3. That our sins are numerous, and deserve the greatest punishment, Lam. 3: 39. 4. That humility is the way to honor, Prov. 16: 18. 5. That the greatest promises of good are made to the humble, Isa. 57: 15. 56: 2. 1 Pet. 5: 5. Ps. 147: 6. Matt. 5: 5. Grove's Mor. Phil., vol. ii. p. 286; Evans' Christian Temper, vol. i. ser. 1; Watts on Humility; Baxter's Christian Directory, vol. i. p. 496; Hale's Cont., p. 110; Gill's Body of Div., vol. iii. p. 151; Walker's Sermons, iv. ser. 3; Dwight's Theology; Fuller's Works; Works of Robert Hall.—*Hend. HUNGER. Spiritual desire after Jesus and his righteousness is called hunger; how it pains men till the blessings desired are obtained! Matt. 5: 6. Luke 1: 53. Such as feed on Christ never hunger nor thirst; finding enough in him, they never desire any thing else as the chief portion of their soul, John 5: 35. A man's strength is hunger-bitten when it decays for want of food, Job 18: 12.—Brown.

HUNTER, (HENRY, D. D. ;) an eloquent Presbyterian divine, born at Culross, in Perthshire, in 1741. At the age of thirteen he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, where his literary acquirements were such, that when but seventeen he became tutor to a gentleman who was afterwards one of the lords of the session. The illness and death of his father having prevented him from retaining that situation, he next accepted one of the same description in the family of lord Dundonald, at Culross Abbey. In 1764, he obtained a license to preach, and in 1766, was ordained minister of South Leith. In 1771, he removed to London, to become pastor to the Scottish congregation at London Wall; and about the same time, he was admitted to the degree of doctor in divinity by the university of Edinburgh. His most popular literary production, the "Sacred Biography," a series of discourses on the lives of the most eminent persons mentioned in the Bible, was commenced in 1783, and was subsequently extended to seven volumes, octavo. During the progress of this work, Dr. Hunter became a convert to the physiognomical system of Lavater, and in 1787 he made a visit to Switzerland, for the purpose of procuring intelligence from the author, preparatory to an English translation of his works, which he executed and published, with splendid graphic illustrations, by Mr. Thomas Holloway, the engraver. In 1790, he was chosen secretary to the corresponding board of the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge in the Highlands of Scotland. In 1795, he published "Sermons preached on various Occasions," to which were subjoined illustrative Memoirs and Anecdotes; and in 1798, appeared his "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," in conjunction with those of the Rev. John Fell. He died at Bristol hot wells, October 27, 1802.

Besides his original literary performances, he translated from the French, Euler's Letters on Natural Philosophy, two volumes; St. Pierre's Studies of Nature, four volumes; a volume of Saurin's Sermons, additional to those translated by Mr. Robinson; Sonnini's Travels, two volumes; and Castern's Memoirs of Catharine the Second of Russia, two volumes. Two volumes of his Sermons, &c., with a biographical memoir, were published posthumously. Aikin's Gen. Biog.—Jones's Chris. Biog.

HUNTING. Hunting is a kind of apprenticeship to war, and an imitation of the hazards and occurrences of the chase. Nimrod was a mighty hunter (persecutor) before God, Gen. 10: 9. He was a warrior, a conqueror, a tyrant, who subdued free people, and who put to death those who would not submit to his dominion. The prophets sometimes depict war under the idea of hunting: "I will send for many hunters," says Jeremiah, "and they shall hunt them from every mountain, and from every hill, and out of the holes of the rocks," ch. 16: 16. He speaks of the Chaldeans or Persians, who hunted or subdued the Jews, and held them under their dominion.—Calmet.

HUNTINGDON, (Countess of,) the founder of the denomination of Christians bearing her name, was the daughter of Washington, earl of Ferrers, and was born August 24, 1707. When very young, her mind was impressed with the importance of religion, and she frequently retired to her chamber to supplicate the favor and blessing of God. At the age of twenty-one she was married to Theophilus, earl of Huntingdon, and was thus connected with a family distinguished alike for piety and respectability. She attended on the ministry of the celebrated George Whitfield; and although lord Huntingdon entertained different opinions, he did not oppose such attendance, deeming the rights of conscience as sacred and unalienable. To Mr. Whitfield she was particularly attached, and warmly supported the erection of chapels, and the diffusion of those principles and opinions which he professed and inculcated.

Lady Huntingdon, after the death of lord Huntingdon, devoted a great part of her large property to the building of chapels in London and throughout Wales; and for the supply of which she first confined herself to the ministers of the established church, as her preachers, many of whom accepted her invitation, and labored in the places which she had opened; but finding that the ministers, who before labored for her, were unequal to the task, she determined on erecting a college in South Wales, for the purpose of providing, successively, able and pious teachers. That college, and an accompanying chapel, in the parish of Talgarth, in Brecknockshire, was erected in the year 1768. From that seminary many students emanated, not indeed celebrated for their learning, but many of them for their piety and devotedness to God. They were itinerant—moved from congregation to congregation, in an established rotation; and she alone maintained a correspondence with them, by which she regulated and provided a constant supply.

In 1769, she erected a chapel at Tunbridge Wells; and a large building at Spa-fields, London, called the Pantheon, which had been erected for the entertainment of parties of pleasure, especially on the Sabbath day, she purchased for religious worship, and it was first opened in the year 1777. In that chapel, the Rev. Herbert Jones and William Taylor officiated as clergymen; and as some alterations had been made by the countess in the liturgy, although the Episcopalian mode of worship was used, a suit was instituted against them, by the minister of the parish of Clerkenwell, in the consistorial court of the bishop of London. That court determined, that if they proceeded in preaching there any longer, they should be expelled from the church. The threatened expulsion did not intimidate them; and they, with several other clergymen, seceded from the establishment, and put themselves under the protection of the toleration act. Those clergymen drew up, and subscribed the Confession of Faith, which was afterwards signed by all the ministers of her ladyship's connexion, and by candidates for ordination. The first six were ordained at Spa-fields chapel, in 1783. Some years afterwards, she purchased another large place in Whitechapel, which had been intended for a theatre, but which, with a few alterations, she converted into a place of worship, and which is now called Sion chapel.

The companions of lady Huntingdon, for many years, were Miss Scutt and lady Ann Erskine, who co-operated with her for several years in all her exertions. Notwithstanding the prodigious efforts of this lady, she lived to the age of eighty-four, and died at her house in Spa-fields, on June 17, 1791: her body was buried in the family vault, at Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire. The seminary in Wales ceased at her death, the lease being just expired; but a new college has been erected at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, in which a number of students are yearly educated. The temper of lady Huntingdon was warm and sanguine; her predilections and prejudices were too hastily adopted, and she therefore frequently formed conclusions not correspondent with truth and wisdom. Notwithstanding such failings, she was distinguished for a fervent zeal to propagate the gospel of Jesus Christ; and multitudes have, doubtless, through her instrumentality, been converted.—Hend. Buck.

HUNTINGDON, (WILLIAM, S. S., Sinner Saved;) a notorious Antinomian preacher in London, towards the end of the eighteenth century. He was the son of a farmer's laborer in Kent, and passed the early part of his life in menial service, and in the occupation of a coal-heaver. Having been reclaimed from dissipated and irreligious courses, he became a zealous preacher; and, though a man of little education, he possessed considerable natural talent, and soon succeeded in drawing together a large body of followers; to whom, in the most familiar and popular, but frequently in the most absurd, eccentric, and unwarrantable manner, he expounded the Scriptures; crying down all other ministers as unsound in the faith, and exalting his own system as the paragon of gospel divinity. Travelling throughout the country, he collected disciples wherever he went; and there still exist a considerable number of chapels, especially in Sussex, in which his Antinomian tenets continue to be taught. After having lost his first wife by death, Mr. Huntingdon married the wealthy relict of Sir James Sanderson, a London alderman, and passed the latter part of his life in affluence. His publications are very numerous, and some of them contain curious details relative to his personal history and experience.—Hend. Buck.

HUNTINGTON, (JOSEPH, D. D.,) minister of Coventry.

Connecticut, was graduated at Yale college, in 1762, and died in the year 1795. He is well known as the author of a work, entitled, "Calvinism Improved, or the Gospel illustrated as a System of real Grace, issuing in the Salvation of all Men," which was published, after his death, in 1796. It was answered, in the same year, by Dr. Strong. Setting out with the grand error of an absolute decree of sin, and the consequent denial of human responsibility, Dr. Huntington founds his argument for universal salvation on another error in regard to the atonement of Christ, which, he thought, included the endurance of all the punishment threatened the sinner, and thus a satisfaction of the law, so that all sinful men are released from its curse. Hence he says, by a wild perversion of the plain language of Scripture, that sinners, "in their surety, vicar, or substitute, i. e. in Christ, the Head of every man, go away into everlasting punishment, in a true gospel sense. In him they suffer infinite punishment, i. e. he suffers for them, in their room and stead." By another strange perversion, revolting to common sense, he represents that in the day of judgment, not men of all nations, but "characters shall be separated one from another, as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats." "The character of sinners was always at God's left hand, and always will be." In the resurrection, he maintains that our sins will arise, "in the holy voice of the law," and that this will be the only resurrection to condemnation and everlasting shame and contempt, while all men will arise to everlasting life. It is by such strange departure from Scripture and common sense, that error is built up and miserable men are deluded.—Allen.

HUNTINGTON, (JOSHUA,) minister of Boston, son of the excellent Gen. Huntington, of New London, (Conn.,) was born January 31, 1786, and graduated at Yale college, in 1804. During a revival, in 1802, he became pious. He was ordained colleague with Dr. Eckley, May 18, 1803, and on his return from a journey for his health to Canada, died at Groton, September 11, 1819, aged thirty-three. He was a very faithful and useful minister, and an humble, disinterested, excellent Christian. When, in his sickness, told that he was about to meet his father, he replied, "Yes; it will be a glorious meeting." He published Memoirs of the Life of Abigail Waters, 1817. Panoplist, xvi. 529—535.—Allen.

HUNTINGTON, (SUSAN,) wife of the preceding, the daughter of Achilles Mansfield, minister of Killingworth, Connecticut, was born January 27, 1791. At the age of sixteen she made a profession of religion. She was married May 18, 1809. After surviving her husband four years, she died in Boston, December 4, 1823, aged thirty-two. Her four surviving children have become partakers of the same grace, in which their parents rejoiced.

Mrs. Huntington was a very intelligent and remarkably pious woman. She wrote a letter to a friend recovered from sickness, which is tract No. 88 of the American Tract society, and the story of Little Lucy. Her Memoirs by B. B. Wisner, with an introductory essay and poem by James Montgomery, were published, third edition, 1829, containing her letters, journal, and some pieces of poetry. Five editions have been published in Scotland.—Allen.

HUR, son of Caleb, of Ebron, and, according to Josephus, husband of Miriam, sister of Moses. We know but few particulars concerning his life; but by the little which Scripture relates, we see that Moses had a great affection for him, Exod. 17. 10. 24: 14.—Calmet.

HURD, (RICHARD, D. D.,) an eminent prelate and writer, the son of a farmer, was born, in 1720, at Congreve, in Staffordshire; was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; and, after having been rector of Hurcaston, preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and archdeacon of Gloucester, was raised, in 1767, to the bishopric of Litchfield and Coventry, and, soon after, was appointed preceptor to the prince of Wales and duke of York. In 1781, he was translated to Worcester, and in 1783, he declined the see of Canterbury. He died in 1808. Among his works are, Sermons; Commentaries on Horace's Art of Poetry; Dialogues; and Letters on Chivalry and Romance. He was the bosom friend of Warburton; and his friendship for that eminent man (which has been censured as of somewhat too subservient a nature) led him to attack Dr. Jortin in a pamphlet. He also wrote a biographical sketch of Warburton, edited an edition of his writings, and published a volume of his Correspondence.—Davenport.

HUSBAND, (DUTIES OF.) (See MARRIAGE STATE.)

HUSBANDMAN; one whose profession and labor is to cultivate the earth; to dress it, to render it fertile, and generally to manage it. This is the most noble as well as the most ancient of all professions; it was begun by Adam, resumed by Noah, and has been always the most comfortable state of human life. (See AGRICULTURE.)

God is compared to a husbandman; (John 15: 1. 1 Cor. 3: 9.) and the simile of land carefully cultivated, or of a vineyard carefully dressed, is often used in the sacred writings.—Calmet.

HUSBANDRY. (See AGRICULTURE.)

HUSHAI, the Archite, David's friend, 2 Sam. 15: 32, &c. Hushai, by defeating the counsel of Ahithophel, and gaining time for David, to whom he sent advices, was the cause of Ahithophel's suicide, and of Absalom's miscarriage, ch. 16: 16—19. 18: 5, &c.—Calmet.

HUSKS, (keratia; siliqua;) shells, as of peas or beans. The prodigal son, oppressed by want, and pinched by hunger, desired to feed on the husks given to the hogs, Luke 15: 16. The most learned interpreters are of opinion, that the Greek word signifies carob-beans, the fruit of a tree of the same name. There was a sort of wine or liquor much used in Syria drawn from it, and the lees of it were given to the hogs. The Greeks and Latins both name carob-beans Ceratia; and Pliny, as well as the Vulgate, calls them Siliqua. This fruit is common in Palestine, Greece, Italy, Provence, and Barbary: it is suffered to ripen and grow dry on the tree; the poor eat it, and cattle are fattened with it. The tree is of a middle size, full of branches, and abounding with round leaves, an inch or two in diameter. The blossoms are little red clusters, with abundance of yellowish stalks. The fruits are flat pods, from half a foot to fourteen inches long, and an inch and a half broad; they are brown at the top, sometimes crooked, composed of two husks, separated by membranes into several cells, and containing flat seeds, something like those of cassia. The substance of these husks is filled with a sweetish, honey-like kind of juice, not unlike that of the pith of cassia. In all probability its crooked figure occasioned its being called in Greek Keratia, which signifies little horns.—Calmet.

HUSS, (JOHN,) the celebrated Bohemian reformer, was born near Prague, in Bohemia, about the year 1376, at a village called Hussinez, upon the borders of the Black forest. His parents were not affluent, but his father paid great attention to his education, which he improved by his strong mental capacities, and by close application to his studies in the university of Prague, where he obtained the degree of bachelor of arts in 1393, master of arts in 1395, and bachelor in divinity in 1408. During the course of his university honors, he obtained also a benefice. John Mulheim, a person of large fortune in Prague, erected a chapel, which he called Bethlehem; and, having amply endowed it, appointed Huss as minister. Huss was at this time a Catholic. The opinions of Wickliffe, though then extending, had not reached Bohemia. Having, about the year 1382, perused, through the medium of a young Bohemian nobleman, the writings of Wickliffe, his mind was greatly impressed by them; and he would call him an angel sent from heaven to enlighten mankind. He would mention, among his friends, his meeting with the works of that reformer, as the most fortunate circumstance of his life. From this time, both in the schools and in the pulpit, he would inveigh with great warmth against ecclesiastical abuses; point out the bad government of the church, and the bad lives of the clergy; and lament the state of the people who were under the government of the one, and the influence of the other. The state of religion in Bohemia was, indeed, at that time, very low; it was the subject of barter, and the clergy were most corrupt; Huss, therefore, attracted not only notice, but attention. The followers of Huss became numerous; many members of the university followed him. The works of Wickliffe were translated into the Slav-ian tongue, and read with great attention in every part of Bohemia; and as soon as pope Alexander V. was seated in the chair, observing the diffusion of Protestant principles and writings, he issued a bull, directed to the archbishop of Prague, ordering him to collect the writings of Wickliffe, and to apprehend and imprison his followers. By virtue of that bull, the archbishop condemned the writings of Wickliffe, proceeded against four doctors who had not delivered up their copies of his writings, and prohibited them from again preaching. Pope John XXIII. soon after followed it up by the excommunications of Huss and his followers.

This treatment had no tendency to lessen the popularity of Huss. His sufferings increased his influence; and multitudes of all ranks, either impelled by gratitude or by compassion, hastened to enlist themselves in his cause. Thus supported, he did not despond; and, although he was prohibited from preaching, he continued to discharge every other branch of the pastoral office; and, among other plans adopted by him, he gave out questions, which he encouraged the people to discuss in private, and to come to him with their difficulties. Thus disappointed and chagrined in his attempts to suppress the reformed, the new archbishop convened a council of doctors, who drew up and published some articles against Huss and his adherents. But to them he wrote a spirited and judicious reply. Soon after this performance, Huss published another piece against the usurpations of the court of Rome; and to this the archbishop and council replied. But with writing alone they were dissatisfied, and therefore applied to the pope for assistance, who merely recommended the subject to the king of Bohemia. The letters which Huss wrote at this time are very numerous. He justified Wickliffe's book on the Trinity, and defended the character of that reformer against a charge brought by a man of the name of Stokes, and others, who accused him of disobedience. He also wrote many discourses against the peculiar doctrines of the Catholic church.

About this time Peter of Dresden was obliged to fly from Saxony, and seek a refuge at Prague, where he encouraged a priest of St. Michael's chapel to preach up the establishment of the communion under the species of wine. Huss embraced these sentiments, for which he was exposed to persecution; but eventually the Hussites were permitted to continue their sermons, and their sentiments became general. In 1412, Huss left his retirement, and returned to Prague. Pope John XXIII. at this time published his bulls against the king of Naples, ordering a crusade against him, and granting indulgences to all who engaged in that war. Huss declaimed against such bulls, crusades, and indulgences. The populace espoused the opinions of Huss: the magistrates imprisoned and persecuted them, and a massacre ensued; but through the whole affair he displayed a true Christian spirit. Immediately after that melancholy affair, Huss retired to his native place, where he lived protected by the principal persons of the country. Thither some of the most eminent men of every country resorted, to obtain his directions, his assistance, and his advice. During his retreat at Hussinez, he spent much of his time in writing. There he wrote his treatise "Upon the Church;" his paper entitled "The Six Errors," levelled against indulgences, simony, excommunication, &c. These treatises were much opposed, and Huss defended them. Huss, soon after, once more returned to Prague, and engaged in other controversies. At Constance, at this time, the famous council was held, at which it was determined, that a reformation was necessary; and pope John was deposed and imprisoned. But against Huss and his followers, it also directed its thunderbolts. Wickliffe was now dead; but they reviled his memory, burnt his books, and even ordered his bones to be dug up and consigned to ashes. To Constance Huss travelled, there determined to defend his principles, and support the cause of truth. On his journey he was received with acclamations, and in three weeks arrived at that place. He was nominally examined before the pope and the cardinals; and, after remaining there some time, he was one day suddenly seized by a party of guards, in the gallery of the council, although the pope had assured him of liberty and protection. At such perfidy the assembly was surprised; and the pope, confounded and alarmed, could only say that it was the act of the cardinals.

In a lonely monastery on the banks of the Rhine, he longed to the Franciscans, who, as an order, were bitterly opposed to him, Huss was now confined. Yet even there he composed some interesting tracts, among which was one entitled, "A Comment upon the Commandments;" another, "Upon the Lord's Prayer;" a third, "On the Knowledge and Love of God;" and a fourth, "On the Three great Enemies of Mankind." For a long time Huss remained in prison. Catholics of more liberal principles interceded for his acquittal, but in vain. Many sessions elapsed prior to the exhibition of articles against him; but on the 5th and 6th of June, 1415, after a previous examination, he was tried for maintaining the doctrines afterwards professed in the Reformed church, and was advised to abjure his books and recant. But he magnanimously refused: and on the 7th of July, the council censured him for being obstinate and incorrigible, and ordered "that he should be degraded from the priesthood, his books publicly burnt, and himself delivered to the secular power." That sentence he heard without emotion. He immediately prayed for the pardon of his enemies. The bishops appointed by the council stripped him of his priestly garments, and put a mitre of paper on his head, on which devils were painted, with this inscription: "A Ringleader of Heretics." The bishops delivered him to the emperor, and he delivered him to the duke of Bavaria. His books were burnt at the gate of the church, and he was led to the suburbs to be burnt alive. Prior to his execution, he made a solemn, public appeal to God, from the judgment of the pope and council, which was fervent and energetic. He was then surrounded with fagots, his mind all the while composed and happy. The flames were then applied to the fagots; when the martyr sang a hymn, with so loud and cheerful a voice, that he was distinctly heard through all the noise of the combustibles and of the multitude. At last he uttered, "Jesus Christ, thou Son of the living God, have mercy upon me!" and he was consumed; after which, his ashes were carefully collected and cast into the Rhine. Huss was a true ecclesiastic, and a real Christian. Gentle and condescending to the opinions of others, this amiable pattern of virtue was strict only in his principles. His great contest was with vice. His piety was calm, rational, and manly; his fortitude was undaunted. "From his infancy," said the university of Prague, "he was of such excellent morals, that during his stay here, we may venture to challenge any one to produce a single fault against him." His writings were simple, pious, affectionate, and intelligent. Luther said he was the most rational expounder of Scripture he ever met with.—Hend. Buck.

HUSSITES; the followers of John Huss. (See TABORITES.)

HUTCHESON, (Dr. FRANCIS,) a Christian divine, philosopher and writer, was born, in 1694, in the north of Ireland; studied at the university of Glasgow; and, after having for many years kept an academy at Dublin, was invited, in 1729, to Glasgow, to fill the chair of professor of philosophy; a situation which he held till his decease, in 1747. He is the author of an Inquiry into the Ideas of Beauty and Virtue; a Treatise on the Passions; and a System of Moral Philosophy. Hutcheson is an elegant writer; his metaphysics are of the school of Shaftesbury.

According to professor Dugald Stuart, his fame rests on the taste that his works and lectures contributed to diffuse for analytical discussion in Scotland, which led to the production of some of the most valuable writings of the eighteenth century. Biog. Brit. and Stewart's Life of Dr. Adam Smith.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

HUTCHINSONIANS, the followers of John Hutchinson, who was born in Yorkshire, in 1674. In the early part of his life he served the duke of Somerset in the capacity of steward; and in the course of his travels from place to place employed himself in collecting fossils. We are told that the large and noble collection bequeathed by Dr. Woodward to the university of Cambridge was actually made by him, and even unfairly obtained from him. In 1724, he published the first part of his curious book, called "Moses' Principia," in which he ridiculed Dr. Woodward's Natural History of the Earth, and exploded the doctrine of gravitation established in Newton's Principia. In 1727, he published a second part of "Moses' Principia," containing the principles of the Scripture philosophy. From this time to his death he published a volume every year or two, which, with the manuscripts he left behind, were published in 1748, in twelve volumes 8vo. On the Monday before his death, Dr. Mead urged him to be blest; saying, pleasantly, "I will soon send you to Moses," meaning his studies; but Mr. Hutchinson, taking it in the literal sense, answered in a mattering tone, "I believe, doctor, you will;" and was so displeased, that he dismissed him for another physician; but he died in a few days after, August 28, 1737.

It appears to be a leading sentiment of his disciples, that all our ideas of divinity are formed from the ideas in nature; that nature is a standing picture, and Scripture an application of the several parts of the picture, to draw out to us the great things of God, in order to reform our mental conceptions. To prove this point, they allege, that the Scriptures declare the invisible things of God from the formation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things which are made; even his eternal power and Godhead, Rom. 1: 20. The heavens must declare God's righteousness and truth in the congregation of the saints, Ps. 89: 5. And, in short, the whole system of nature, in one voice of analogy, declares and gives us ideas of his glory, and shows us his handy work. We cannot have any ideas of invisible things till they are pointed out to us by revelation: and as we cannot know them immediately, such as they are in themselves, after the manner in which we know sensible objects, they must be communicated to us by the mediation of such things as we already comprehend. For this reason the Scripture is found to have a language of its own, which does not consist of words, but of signs or figures taken from visible things: in consequence of which the world which we now see becomes a sort of commentary on the mind of God, and explains the world in which we believe. The doctrines of the Christian faith are attested by the whole natural world: they are recorded in a language which has never been confounded; they are written in a text which shall never be corrupted.

The Hutchinsonians maintain that the great mystery of the Trinity is conveyed to our understandings by ideas of sense; and that the created substance of the air, or heaven, in its threefold agency of fire, light, and spirit, is the enigma of the one essence or one Jehovah in three persons. The unity of essence is exhibited by its unity of substance; the trinity of conditions, fire, light, and spirit. Thus the one substance of the air, or heaven in its three conditions, shows the unity in trinity; and its three conditions in or of one substance, the trinity in unity. For (says this denomination) if we consult the writings of the Old and New Testament, we shall find the persons of the Deity represented under the names and characters of the three material agents, fire, light, and spirit, and their actions expressed by the actions of these their emblems. The Father is called a consuming fire; and his judicial proceedings are spoken of in words which denote the several actions of fire: Jehovah is a consuming fire; our God is a consuming fire, Deut. 4: 24. Heb. 12: 29. The Son has the name of light, and his purifying actions and offices are described by words which denote the actions and offices of light. He is the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, John 1: 9. Mal. 4: 2. The Comforter has the name of Spirit; and his animating and sustaining offices are described by words, for the actions and offices of the material spirit. His actions in the spiritual economy are agreeable to his type in the natural economy; such as inspiring, impelling, driving, leading, Matt. 2: 1. The philosophic system of the Hutchinsonians is derived from their views of the Hebrew Scriptures. It rests on these suppositions:—1. That the Hebrew language was formed under divine inspiration, either all at once, or at different times, as occasion required; and that the Divine Being had a view, in constructing it, to the various revelations which he in all succeeding times should make in that language: consequently, that its words must be the most proper and determinate to convey such truths as the Deity, during the Old Testament dispensation, thought fit to make known to the sons of men. Farther than this: that the inspired penmen of those ages at least were under the guidance of heaven in the choice of words for recording what was revealed to them; therefore that the Old Testament, if the language be rightly understood, is the most determinate in its meaning of any other book under heaven.—2. That whatever is recorded in the Old Testament is strictly and literally true, allowing only for a few common figures of rhetoric; that nothing contrary to truth is accommodated to vulgar apprehensions.

In proof of this the Hutchinsonians argue in this manner:—The primary and ultimate design of revelation is indeed to teach men divinity; but in subserviency to that, geography, history, and chronology, are occasionally introduced; all which are allowed to be just and authentic. There are also innumerable references to things of nature, and descriptions of them. If, then, the former are just, and to be depended on, for the same reason the latter ought to be esteemed philosophically true. Farther: they think it not unworthy of God, that he should make it a secondary end of his revelation to unfold the secrets of his works; as the primary was to make known the mysteries of his nature, and the designs of his grace, that men might thereby be led to admire and adore the wisdom and goodness which the great Author of the universe has displayed throughout all his works. And as our minds are often referred to natural things for ideas of spiritual truths, it is of great importance, in order to conceive aright of divine matters, that our ideas of the natural things referred to be strictly just and true.

Mr. Hutchinson imagined he found that the Hebrew Scriptures had some capital words, which he thought had not been duly considered and understood; and which, he has endeavored to prove, contain in their radical meaning the greatest and most comfortable truths. The cherubim he explains to be a hieroglyphic of divine construction, or a sacred image, to describe, as far as figures could go, the humanity united to Deity: and so he treats of several other words of similar import. From all which he concluded, that the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish dispensation were so many delineations of Christ, in what he was to be, to do, and to suffer; that the early Jews knew them to be types of his actions and sufferings; and, by performing them as such, were so far Christians both in faith and practice.

The Hutchinsonians, how fanciful soever many of their views of philosophy, and how utterly untenable their system of Hebrew philology, have, for the most part, been men of devout minds, zealous in the cause of Christianity, and untainted with heterodox opinions, which have so often divided the church of Christ. The names of Romaine, bishop Horne, Parkhurst, and others of this denomination, will be long esteemed, both for the piety they possessed, and the good they have been the instruments of promoting amongst mankind. Should the reader wish to know more of the philosophical and theological opinions of Mr. Hutchinson, he may consult a work, entitled "An Abstract of the Works of John Hutchinson, Esq., Edinburgh, 1753." HYACINTH. By this word we understand, (1.) a precious stone; (2.) a sort of flower; and, (3.) a particular color. The flower hyacinth is not spoken of in Scripture, but the color and the stone of this name are. The sponse compares her beloved's hands to gold rings set with hyacinth; (Cant. 5: 14.) [Eng. Tr. beryl;] and John (Rev. 21: 20.) says, that the eleventh foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem is of a hyacinth. There are four sorts of hyacinths. The first is something of the color of a ruby; the second is of a gilded yellow; the third of a citron yellow; the fourth the color of a granite. The Hebrew of Canticles, instead of hyacinth, reads the stone of Tarshish, mentioned also in Exod. 28: 20. [Eng. Tr. beryl.] We do not certainly know what stone it is, but interpreters generally explain it of the chrysolite; or the yellow topaz of modern travellers.

Of the hyacinth color—according to the most learned interpreters, an azure blue, or very deep purple, like a violet color—Moses often speaks. It was dyed with the blood of a shell-fish, in Latin, murex, in Hebrew, chilson.—Calmet.

HYDE, (THOMAS, D. D.,) an eminent orientalist, was born, in 1636, at Billingsley, in Shropshire, and studied at King's college, Oxford. Before he was eighteen he assisted Walton in the Polyglot Bible. He was successively Hebrew reader, keeper of the Bodleian library, prebendary of Salisbury, archdeacon of Gloucester, and Arabic and Hebrew professor. He died in 1703. Of his numerous learned works the principal is, a History of the Religion of the Ancient Persians.—Davenport; Jones' Chris. Biog.

HYENA; a wild beast. The Hebrew, Lev. 11: 16, and Job 30: 29, &c. reads, "the daughter of the kicna," (Ueth-hoiana; Eng. Tr. "owl,") instead of struthio, as the Vulgate. The same in several other places of the Hebrew, where it is generally translated struthio, the ostrich; though it is not clear that this is its true signification. (See OS-TRICH.) The animal known to us as the hyena, is a quadruped almost as large as a wolf; whose hair is rough, and its skin spotted or streaked. It has no length of neck, but is forced to turn itself quite round, when it would look behind. It is very cruel and voracious; drags dead bodies out of their graves, and devours them: instead of teeth, has one continued bone in the jaw. It is said to imitate the voice of a man, and by this it often deceives travellers. Hyenas were formerly produced at Rome in the public games, and they are represented on ancient medals.—Calmet.

HYMENÆUS, was probably a citizen of Ephesus, converted by some of the early discourses of Paul. He fell afterwards into the heresy which denied the resurrection of the body, and said it was already accomplished, 2 Tim. 2: 17. Augustine thinks, that the error of such opinions consisted in saying, there was no resurrection beside that of the soul, which by faith, profession, and baptism is revived from sin to grace. Paul informs Timothy, that he had excommunicated Hymenæus, and given him over to Satan, 1 Tim. 1: 20. Two years afterwards Hymenæus engaged with Philetus in some new error, 2 Tim. 2: 17. We know nothing of the end of Hymenæus.—Calmet.

HYMN; a song, or ode, composed in honor of God. The Jewish hymns were accompanied with trumpets, drums, and cymbals, to assist the voices of the Levites and people. The word is used as synonymous with canticle, song, or psalm, which the Hebrews scarcely distinguish, having no particular term for a hymn, as distinct from a psalm or canticle. St. Paul requires Christians to edify themselves and one another with "psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs." St. Matthew says, that Christ, having supped, sung a hymn, and went out. It is supposed he recited the hymns or psalms which the Jews were used to sing after the passover; which they called the Hallel; that is, the Hallelujah Psalms.—Watson.

HYPERBOLE. Hyperbolic language is among the loftiest flights of poetic composition—of untraiated imagination; and it prevails principally among those who are in the habit of associating combinations of fanciful imagery; or these who, being well acquainted with the ideas drawn from natural things, which it means to convey, readily admit such exalted phraseology, because they understand its import, and the intention of the author who employs it. On the contrary, those who have little or no acquaintance with the natural ideas meant to be conveyed by hyperbolic extravagances, are always surprised, and sometimes shocked, when they meet with them in works where simple truth is the object of the reader's researches. Hyperbolic expressions are but rare in Scripture, though figurative or poetic expressions are abundant; rare as they are, however, they have been severely commented on by infidels, and have occasionally embarrassed believers. There is certainly some force in the reflection, "What would infidels have said, had it pleased God to have chosen eastern Asia, instead of western Asia, for the seat of revelation? What would they have thought of the most correct truth, had it happened, under the influence of such locality, to have been arrayed in the hyperbolic attire of that country?"

It is hoped that the style of the following extracts may moderate the surprise of some at certain poetic phrases which occur in Holy Writ. They are transcribed from the Asiatic Researches. "Gospaat, king of the world, possessed matchless good fortune: he was lord of two brides, the earth and her wealth. When his innumerable army marched, the heavens were so filled with the dust of their feet, that the birds of the air could rest upon it." "At Moodgohiree, where is encamped his victorious army; across whose river a bridge of boats is constructed for a road, which is mistaken for a chain of mountains; where immense herds of elephants, like thick black clouds, so darken the face of day, the people think it the season of the rains; whether the princes of the north send so many troops of horse, that the dust of their hoofs spreads darkness on all sides; whether resort so many mighty chiefs of Iumbodweep to pay their respects, that the earth sinks beneath the weight of their attendants."—After this, how flat and low is the fulsome toast of the haughty Sennacherib! 2 Kings 19: 24.

By making western Asia the seat of revelation, a medium is obtained between European frigidity, as Asiatics would think it, and Asiatic hyperbole, as Europeans would think it; so that the Asiatic may find some similarity to his own metaphorical manner, and suited to excite his attention; while the European, who professes to be charmed with the simplicity of truth, may find in Scripture abundance of that simplicity, most happily adapted to his more sober judgment, his more correct and better regulated taste.—Calmet.

HYPOCRISY, is a seeming or professing to be what in truth and reality we are not. It consists in assuming a character which we are conscious does not belong to us, and by which we intentionally impose upon the judgment and opinion of mankind concerning us. The name is borrowed from the Greek tongue, in which it primarily signifies the profession of a stage-player, which is to express in speech, habit, and action, not his own person and manners, but his whom he undertakes to represent. And so it is; for the very essence of hypocrisy lies in apt imitation and deceit; in acting the part of a member of Christ without any saving grace. The hypocrite is a double person; he has one person, which is natural; another, which is artificial: the first he keeps to himself; the other he puts on as he doth his clothes, to make his appearance in before men. It was ingeniously said by Basil, "that the hypocrite has not put off the old man, but put on the new upon it."

Hypocrites have been divided into four sorts:—1. The worldly hypocrite, who makes a profession of religion, and pretends to be religious, merely from worldly considerations, Matt. 23: 5.—2. The legal hypocrite, who relinquishes his vicious practices, in order thereby to merit heaven, while at the same time he has no real love to God, Rom. 10: 3.—3. The evangelical hypocrite, whose religion is nothing more than a bare conviction of sin; who rejoices under the idea that Christ died for him, and yet has no desire to live a holy life, Matt. 13: 20. 2 Pet. 2: 20.—4. The enthusiastic hypocrite, who has an imaginary sight of his sin, and of Christ; talks of remarkable impulses and high feelings; and thinks himself very wise and good while he lives in the most scandalous practices, Matt. 13: 39. 2 Cor. 11: 14. Crook on Hypocrisy; Deceit-legend's Sermon on Ps. 51: 6; Grove's Moral Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 253; South's Sermon on Job 8: 13, vol. x.; Bellamy's Relig. Delin. p. 166; R. Walker's Sermons.—Hend. Buck.

HYPOSTASIS; a term literally signifying substance or subsistence, or that which is put and stands under another thing, and supports it, being its base, ground, or foundation. Thus faith is the substantial foundation of things hoped for, Heb. 11: 1. The word is Greek, hypostasis, compounded of hupo, under, and istēmi, I stand, I exist, q. d. subsistentia. It hence likewise signifies confidence, stability, firmness, 2 Cor. 9: 4. It is also used for person, Heb. 1: 3. Thus we hold that there is but one nature or essence in God, but three hypostases or persons. The word has occasioned great dissensions in the ancient church, first among the Greeks, and afterwards among the Latins; but an end was put to them by a synod held at Alexandria, about the year 362, at which Athanasius assisted; from which time the Latins made no great scruple of saying three hypostases, nor the Greeks of three persons. The hypostatical union is the union of the human nature of Christ with the divine: constituting two natures in one person, and not two persons in one nature, as the Nestorians believe. (See JESUS CHRIST.)—Hend. Buck.

HYSSISTARII; the same as ΚΑΛΥΚΟΛΑΞ, which see.

HYSSOP, is an herb generally known, and often mentioned in Scripture. It was commonly used in purifications as a sprinkler. God commanded the Hebrews, when they came out of Egypt, to take a bunch of hyssop, to dip it in the blood of the paschal lamb, and sprinkle the lintel and the two side-posts of the door-way with it. Sometimes they added a little scarlet wool to it, as in the purification of lepers. Hyssop is mentioned as one of the smallest of herbs, 1 Kings 4: 33. It is of a bitter taste, and grows on the mountains near Jerusalem. The hyssop of John 19: 29 is probably what is called a reed, or cane, in Mark 15: 36. Matt. 27: 48; or else this hyssop was like a sponge imbedded with the drink; it was perhaps a handful gathered of the nearest herbs to the spot, which might be mostly hyssop. Hasselquist says, there grows out of Jerusalem, near the fountain of Siloam, a very minute moss; and he asks, "Is not this the hyssop? It is at least as diminutive as the cedar is tall and majestic." Letter, Sept. 22, 1751.—Calmet.

I.

I, is often used emphatically in Scripture. When it relates to God, it is expressive of his dignity; (Ps. 81: 14.) his power; (Gen. 17: 1.) his self-existence and unchangeableness; (Exod. 3: 14.) or the certainty of his promises and threatenings, Exod. 6: 2. Numb. 14: 35. When used with reference to men it expresses their pride; (Isa. 47: 8.) or the certainty of what they say; (Gal. 5: 2. Phil. 3: 19.) and their readiness to perform their duty, Mic. 3: 8. Matt. 21: 30.—Evren.

IBERIANs; a denomination of Eastern Christians, who derive their name from Iberia, a province of Asia, now called Georgia: hence they are also called Georgians. Their tenets are nearly the same with those of the Greek church; which see.—Hend. Buck.

IBEX; a wild goat. (See GOAT.)

IBIS, (Heb. yanshuph; Eng. Trans. owī;) an unclean bird, common in Egypt, Lev. 11: 17. Strabo describes it as being like a stork; some are black, and others white. The Egyptians worshipped them because they devour the serpents, which otherwise would overrun the country. It was a capital crime to kill an ibis, though inadvertently. Cambyses, king of Persia, being acquainted with this, placed some of them before his army, while he besieged Damietta. The Egyptians, not daring to shoot against them, suffered the town to be taken. Mr. Taylor is of opinion that the yanshuph is not the ancient ibis, but the ardea ibis, described by Hasselquist. (See EGYPT.)—Calmet.

ICHABOD; son of Phinehas, and grandson of Eli, the high-priest. He was born at the moment when his mother heard the fatal news of the ark being taken; whence he obtained his name—"where is the glory?" 1 Sam. 4: 19—21.—Calmet.

ICHTHUS, (a fish;) a word found on many seals, rings, lamps, urns, and tombstones, belonging to the earliest Christian times. Each character forms an initial letter in the following Greek words: Iēsous Christos Theos Uios Sōtēr; i. e. Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Savior. The picture of a fish is sometimes engraved on similar objects, bearing doubtless the same mystical meaning. By whom, on what occasion, and for what particular purpose, this symbol was introduced, has never been determined.—Hend. Buck.

ICONIUM; formerly the chief city of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor. It is situated about a hundred and twenty miles inland from the Mediterranean, on the lake Trogilis. Mr. Kinner says, Iconium, the capital of Lycaonia, is mentioned by Xenophon, and afterwards by Cicero and Strabo. It is represented as enjoying a fine climate, and pleasantly situated among gardens and meadows; while it is nearly surrounded, at some distance, with mountains which rise to the regions of perpetual snow. Here St. Paul miraculously escaped with his life, Acts 14. The church planted at this place by St. Paul (Acts 13.) A. D. 45, and visited by him again A. D. 51, continued to flourish, until, by the persecutions of the Saracens, and afterwards of the Seljukian Turks, who made it the capital of one of their sultanies, it was nearly extinguished. But some Christians of the Greek and Armenian churches, with a Greek archbishop, are yet found in the suburbs of this city, who are not permitted to reside within the walls.

Iconium is now called Cogni, and is still a considerable city; being the capital of the extensive province of Caramania; as it was formerly of Lycaonia, and the seat of a Turkish beglerberg, or viceroy. It is the place of chief strength and importance in the central parts of Asiatic Turkey, being surrounded by a strong wall of four miles in circumference; but, as is the case with most Eastern cities, much of the inclosed space is waste. The modern city has an imposing appearance from the number and size of its mosques, colleges, and other public buildings; but these stately edifices are crumbling into ruins, whilst the houses of the inhabitants consist of a mixture of small huts built of sun-dried bricks, and wretched hovels thatched with reeds. The city contains about eighty thousand inhabitants, principally Turks, with only a small proportion of Christians.—Watson.

ICONOCLASTES, image-breakers; or ICONOMACHI, image-opposers, were names given to those who rejected the use of images in churches, and, on certain occasions, vented their zeal in destroying them. The word is Greek, formed from eikōn, an image, and klastein, to break. The great opposition to images began under Bardanes, a Greek emperor, in the beginning of the eighth century; and was revived again, a few years after, under Leo the Isaurian, who issued an edict against image-worship, which occasioned a civil war in the islands of the Archipelago, and afterwards in Italy; the Roman pontiffs and Greek councils alternately supporting it. At length images were rejected by the Greek church, which however retains pictures in churches, though her members do not worship them; but the Latin church, more corrupt, not only retained images, but made them the medium, if not the object, of their worship, and are therefore Iconoduli, or Iconolatæ, image-worshippers.

The worship of images was disapproved, and opposed by several considerable parties, as the Petrobussians, Albigenes, Waldenses, &c.; till at length this idolatrous practice was abolished in many parts of the Christian world by the Reformation. (See IMAGE).—Watson; Hend. Buck.

ICONOLATRY, (from eikōn, an image, and latría, worship;) the worship or adoration of images. Hence image-worshippers are called Iconolatæ, or Iconolaters.—H. Buck.

IDDO; a prophet of Judah, who wrote the history of Rehoboam and Abijah. It seems by 2 Chron. 13: 22, that he had entiled his work Midrash, or Inquiries. Probably he also wrote prophecies against Jeroboam, son of Nebat, chap. 10: 2. Josephus and others are of opinion, that he was sent to Jeroboam, at Bethel, and that it was he who was killed by a lion, 1 Kings 13.—Calmet.

IDLENESS; a reluctance to be employed in any kind of work. The idle man is in every view both foolish and criminal. He neither lives to God, to the world, nor to himself.

"He does not live to God, for he answers not the end for which he was brought into being. Existence is a sacred trust; but he who misemploys and squanders it away, thus becomes treacherous to its Author. Those powers which should be employed in his service, and for the promotion of his glory, lie dormant. The time which should be sacred to Jehovah is lost; and thus he enjoys no fellowship with God, nor any way devotes himself to his praise.

"He lives not to the world, nor for the benefit of his fellow-creatures around him. While all creation is full of life and activity, and nothing stands still in the universe, he remains idle, forgetting that mankind are connected by various relations and mutual dependencies, and that the order of the world cannot be maintained without perpetual circulation of active duties.

"He lives not to himself. Though he imagines that he leaves to others the drudgery of life, and betakes himself to enjoyment and ease, yet, in fact, he has no true pleasure. While he is a blank in society, he is no less a torment to himself; for he who knows not what it is to labor, knows not what it is to enjoy. He shuts the door against improvement of every kind, whether of mind, body, or fortune. Sloth enfeebles equally the bodily and the mental powers. His character falls into contempt. Disorder, confusion, and embarrassment, mark his whole situation. Idleness is the inlet to a variety of other vices. It undermines every virtue in the soul. Violent passions, like rapid torrents, run their course; but after having overflowed their banks, their impetuosity subsides: but sloth, especially when it is habitual, is like the slowly-flowing putrid stream, which stagnates in the marsh, breeds venomous animals, and poisonous plants, and infects with pestilential vapors the whole country round it. Having once tainted the soul, it leaves no part of it sound; and at the same time gives not those alarms to conscience which the eruptions of bolder and fiercer emotions often occasion." Logan's Sermons, vol. i. ser. 4; Blair's Sermons, vol. iii. ser. 4; Idler, vol. i. p. 5, 171, 172; Cooper's Poems, 228, vol. i. duod.; Johnson's Rambler, vol. ii. p. 162, 163.—*Hend. IDOLATRY, (Gr. eidōlon, an idol, and latría, worship;) the worship of idols, or the act of ascribing to things and persons, properties which are peculiar to God alone. The principal sources of idolatry seem to be the extravagant veneration for creatures and beings from which benefits accrue to men. Dr. Jortin says, that idolatry had four privileges to boast of. The first was a venerable antiquity, more ancient than the Jewish religion; and idolaters might have said to the Israelites, "Where was your religion before Moses and Abraham? Go, and inquire in Chaldea, and there you will find that your fathers served other gods." 2. It was wider in its spread than the Jewish religion. It was the religion of the greatest, the wisest, and the politest nations of the Chaldeans, Egyptians, and Phœnicians—the parents of civil government, and of arts and sciences. 3. It was more adapted to the Lent which men have towards visible and sensible objects. Men want gods who shall go before them, and be among them. God, who is everywhere in power, and nowhere in appearance, is hard to be conceived. 4. It favored human passions; it required no morality; its religious ritual consisted of splendid ceremonies, revelling, dancing, nocturnal assemblies, impure and scandalous mysteries, debauched priests, and gods, who were both slaves and patrons to all sorts of vices. (See GODS.)

"All the more remarkable false religions that have been or are in the world, recommend themselves by one or other of these four privileges and characters."

The first objects of idolatrous worship are thought to have been the sun, moon, and stars. Others think that angels were first worshipped. Soon after the flood, we find idolatry greatly prevailing in the world. Abraham's father's family served other gods beyond the river Euphrates; and Laſan had idols which Rachel brought along with her. In process of time, noted patriots, or kings deceased, animals of various kinds, plants, stones, and, in fine, whatever people took a fancy to, they idolized. The Egyptians, though high pretenders to wisdom, worshipped pied bulls, snipes, leeks, onions, &c. The Greeks had about thirty thousand gods. The Gomerinns deified their ancient kings; nor were the Chaldeans, Romans, Chinese, &c. a whit less absurd. Some violated the most natural affections by murdering multitudes of their neighbors and children, under pretence of sacrificing them to their god. Some nations of Germany, Scandinavia, and Tartary, imagined that violent death in war, or by self-murder, was the proper method of access to the future enjoyment of their gods. In far later times, about sixty-four thousand and eighty persons were sacrificed at the dedication of one idolatrous temple in the space of four days in America. The Hebrews never had any idols of their own, but they adopted those of the nations around.

The veneration which the papists pay to the virgin Mary, and other saints and angels, and to the bread in the sacrament, the cross, relics, and images, lays a foundation for the Protestants to charge them with idolatry, though they deny the charge. It is evident that they worship them, and that they justify the worship, but deny the idolatry of it, by distinguishing subordinate from supreme worship: the one they call latría, the other adlía; but this distinction is thought by many of the Protestants to be vain, futile, and nugatory.

Idolatry has been divided into metaphorical and proper. By metaphorical idolatry is meant that inordinate love of riches, honors, and bodily pleasures, whereby the passions and appetites of men are made superior to the will of God: man, by so doing, making a god of himself and his sensual temper. Proper idolatry is giving the divine honor to another. The objects or idols of that honor which are given, are either personal, i. e. the idolatrous themselves, who become their own idols; or internal, such as fancying God to be a light, flame, matter, &c., or which is perhaps more common, entertaining and admiring false ideas of his moral character; or external, as worshipping angels, the sun, stars, animals, &c., instead of God. Tenison on Idolatry; *A. IDUMEA, or EDOM. (See EDOM.)

IGNATIUS, (bishop of Antioch,) an illustrious martyr of the second century, was educated under the apostle John, and intimately acquainted in early life with St. Peter and St. Paul. Being chosen bishop of Antioch (see ANTIOCH) about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, (A. D. 70,) he continued to fill it for upwards of forty years, in the face of persecution, being from the excellence of his character at once an honor and a safeguard to the Christian religion. When the emperor Trajan came to Antioch, in A. D. 107, (or, as some say, A. D. 116,) to carry on his war against the Parthians and Armenians, Ignatius was summoned before him, and avowing his Christian faith, was cast into prison, and sentenced to be sent to Rome, and there be devoured by wild beasts. The venerable man received his sentence with joy. "I thank thee, O Lord," he exclaimed, "that thou hast condescended to honor me with thy love, and hast thought me worthy, with thy apostle Paul, to be bound in iron chains." With these words he cheerfully embraced his chains, and commending the church by fervent prayer to the care of the Savior, embarked for Rome. From Smyrna he wrote to the churches at Ephesus, Magnesia, Trallia, Rome, and Philadelphia, and on his voyage, to Polycarp and the church at Smyrna. These letters are still extant, though the genuineness of the three first is doubted by some learned men.

In the letter to Rome, he says, "Now I begin to be a disciple; nor shall any thing move me, whether visible or invisible, that I may attain to Christ Jesus. Let fire and the cross; let the companies of wild beasts; let breaking of bones, and tearing of members; let the shattering in pieces of the whole body, and all the wicked torments of the devil come upon me; only let me enjoy Jesus Christ. All the ends of the world and the kingdoms of it, will profit me nothing; I would rather die for Jesus Christ, than rule to the utmost ends of the earth. Him I seek who died for us; him I desire that rose again for us. This is the gain that is laid up for me. My love is crucified."

The Christians at Rome received Ignatius with an equal mixture of joy and sorrow. The interval of a few months, before his martyrdom, was spent in prayers for the peace and prosperity of the church. December 20, he was brought out into the amphitheatre, and the lions, being let loose upon him, quickly despatched him; leaving nothing but a few bones, which being gathered up by the two deacons who had been the companions of his journey, were transported to Antioch, and there interred in the cemetery without the gate. They were afterwards, by command of the emperor Theodotus, removed to the Tycheion, a temple within the city, now consecrated to the memory of St. Ignatius.—Chalmers; Cave; Fox; Clissold.

IGNATIUS DE LOYOLA, the founder of the order of the Jesuits, was born, in 1491, of a noble family, in the Spanish province of Guipuscoa. In 1521, he was severely wounded at the siege of Pampluna. The result of his meditations on a bed of pain was, sorrow for his past debauched life, and a determination to devote himself to works of piety. He began by a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; after which he studied at Alcalá, Salamanca, and Paris; and began to preach and to make disciples. At first he was opposed, and even imprisoned; but at length the pope, in 1540, gave his sanction to the new order which Loyola had established, and appointed him its first general. He died in 1556, and was canonized in 1622. (See JESUITS.)—Davenport.

IGNORANCE; the want of knowledge or instruction. It is often used to denote illiteracy. Mr. Locke observes, that the causes of ignorance are chiefly three:—1. Want of ideas. 2. Want of a discoverable connexion between the ideas we have. 3. Want of tracing and examining our ideas. As it respects religion, ignorance has been distinguished into three sorts:—1. An invincible ignorance, in which the will has no part. It is an insult upon justice to suppose it will punish men because they were ignorant of things which they were physically incapable of knowing. 2. There is a wilful and obstinate ignorance; such an ignorance, far from exculpating, aggravates a man's crimes. 3. A sort of voluntary ignorance, which is neither entirely wilful, nor entirely invincible; as when a man has the means of knowledge, and does not use them. ILLUMINATI; a term anciently applied to such as had received baptism. The name was occasioned by a ceremony in the baptism of adults, which consisted in putting a lighted taper in the hand of the person baptized, as a symbol of the faith and grace he had received in the sacrament. This was unknown in primitive times.

ILLUMINATI, was also the name of a sect which appeared in Spain about the year 1575. They were charged with maintaining that mental prayer and contemplation had so intimately united them to God, that they were arrived to such a state of perfection, as to stand in no need of good works, or the sacraments of the church, and that they might commit the grossest crimes without sin.

After the suppression of the Illuminati in Spain, there appeared a denomination in France which took the same name. They maintained that one Anthony Bucket had a system of belief and practice revealed to him, which exceeded every thing Christianity had yet been acquainted with: that by this method persons might in a short time arrive at the same degrees of perfection and glory to which the saints and the Blessed Virgin have attained; and this improvement might be carried on till our actions became divine, and our minds wholly given up to the influence of the Almighty. They said further, that none of the doctors of the church knew any thing of religion; that Paul and Peter were well-meaning men, but knew nothing of devotion; that the whole church lay in darkness and unbelief; that every one was at liberty to follow the suggestions of his conscience; that God regarded nothing but himself; and that within ten years their doctrine would be received all over the world; then there would be no more occasion for priests, monks, and such other religious distinctions.

ILLUMINATI; a name assumed by a secret society, founded on the 1st of May, 1776, by Dr. Adam Weishaupt, professor of canon law in the university of Ingolstadt. The avowed object of this order was, "to diffuse from secret societies, as from so many centres, the light of science over the world; to propagate the purest principles of virtue, and to reinstate mankind in the happiness which they enjoyed during the golden age fabled by the poets." Such a philanthropic object was doubtless well adapted to make a deep impression on the minds of ingenious young men; and to such alone did Dr. Weishaupt at first address himself. But "the real object," we are assured by professor Robison and abbé Barruel, "was, by clandestine arts, to overturn every government and every religion; to bring the sciences of civil life into contempt; and to reduce mankind to that imaginary state of nature, when they lived independent of each other on the spontaneous productions of the earth." Freemasonry being in high reputation all over Europe when Weishaupt first formed the plan of his society, he availed himself of its secrecy to introduce his new order; of which he constituted himself general, after initiating some of his pupils, whom he styled areopagites, into its mysteries. And when report spread the news throughout Germany of the institution of the order of Illuminées, it was generally considered as a mere college lodge, which could interest the students no longer than during the period of their studies. Weishaupt's character, too, which at this time was respectable for morality as well as erudition, prevented all suspicion of his harboring any such dark designs as have since come to light.

But it would far exceed the limits to which this work is restricted, to give even an outline of the nature and constitution of this extraordinary society—of its secrets and mysteries—of the deep dissimulation, consummate hypocrisy, and shocking impiety of its founder and his associates—of their Jesuitical art in concealing their real objects, and their incredible industry and astonishing exertions in making converts—of the absolute despotism and complete system of espionage established throughout the order—of its different degrees of novices, minerals, minor and major Illuminées, aposts, or priests, regents, magi, and man-kings—of the recruiters or insinulators, with their various subtle methods of insinuating into all characters and companies—of the blind obedience exacted of the novices, and the absolute power of life and death assumed by the order, and conceded by the novices—of the dictionary, geography, calendar, and cipher of the order—of the new names assumed by the members, such as Spartacus by Weishaupt, because he pretended to wage war against oppressors; Cato by Zwack; Ajax by Massenhausen, &c.—of the Mineral academy and library—of the questions proposed to the candidates for degrees, and the various ceremonies of admission to each—and of the pretended morality, real blasphemies, and absolute atheism, of the founder and his tried friends. Such of our readers as wish to be fully informed of these matters, we must refer to the abbé Barruel's works, and to professor Robison's "Proofs of a Conspiracy against all the Religions and Governments of Europe."

But while credit may be given to the general facts related in these works, some doubts respecting the ultimate object of Dr. Weishaupt and his associates in this conspiracy may be expressed. That men of their principles should secretly conspire to overthrow all the religions and governments at present in Europe, is by no means incredible; that they should even prevail on many well-meaning philanthropists, who are no enemies to rational religion or good government to join them, is also very credible;—but that a set of men of learning and abilities, such as Weishaupt and his associates are allowed to be, should form a conspiracy to overturn, and with more than Gothic rage utterly abolish the arts and sciences, and to restore the supposed original savage state of man, appears to us a phenomenon in the history of the human heart totally unaccountable. That "the heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked," is a melancholy truth, which not Scripture alone, but the history of mankind in all ages and nations, affords full proof of, as well as the shocking history of the Illuminati; but while pride and vanity have a place in the human heart, to say nothing of our other passions, which are more or less interested in the preservation of the discoveries and improvements in arts, sciences, and their inseparable concomitant, luxury, we are persuaded no man, or body of men, who have enjoyed the sweets of civilized life, ever formed a serious wish for the total abolition of the arts and sciences. In the fury and rage of war, Goths, Vandals, and Turks, may burn and destroy monuments of art and repositories of science; but when the wars are over, instead of returning to the savage state, the barbarous conquerors mix and amalgamate with the conquered, and become themselves more or less civilized. Dr. Weishaupt is allowed to have been influenced by a high degree of vanity; as an evidence of which he communicated as the last secret to his most favored adepts, that the mysteries of ILLUMINISM, which, in going through the inferior degrees, had been successively attributed to the most ancient patriarchs and philosophers, and even to Christ himself, owed its origin to no other than Adam Weishaupt, known in the order by the name of Spartacus.

The same vanity which led the doctor to take this traditional method, (while secrecy is deemed necessary,) of securing to himself the honor of having founded the society, would lead him, were the Illuminati actually victorious over all religions and governments, to wish to have his memory recorded in a more durable manner by writing or printing. But if these and all the other arts were to perish in a mass, then the memory of the doctor, and the important services he had done to the order and to savagism, must, within a century at the utmost, perish along with them. But if, in fact, the total annihilation of the arts and sciences, as well as of all religion and government, had been really the object of Weishaupt and his Illuminées, then we may agree with the celebrated Mandeville, that "human nature is the true Libyan desert, daily producing new monsters," and that of these monsters the doctor and his associates were beyond a doubt the most extraordinary.

Professor Robison informs us, that the order of the Illuminati was abolished in 1786 by the elector of Bavaria, but revived immediately after, under another name, and in a different form, all over Germany. It was again detected, and seemingly broken up; but it had by this time taken so deep a root, that it still subsists in some degree in different countries of Europe.—Hend. Buck.

ILLYRICUM; a province lying to the north and north-west of Macedonia, along the eastern coast of the Adriatic gulf, or gulf of Venice. It was distinguished into two parts: Liburnia to the north, where is now Croatia; and Dalmatia to the south, which still retains the same name, and to which, as St. Paul informs Timothy, Titus went, 2 Tim. 4: 10. St. Paul says, that he preached the gospel from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum, Rom. 15: 19. Hence it appears that this single missionary had evangelized Syria, Phœnicia, Arabia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Galatia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Phrygia, Troas, Asia, Caria, Lycia, Ionia, Lydia, the isles of Cyprus and Crete, Thracia, Macedonia, Thessalia, and Achaia; and this in less than twenty years!—Watson; Calmet.

IMAGE, in a religious sense, is an artificial representation of some person or thing used as an object of adoration; in which sense it is used synonymously with idol.

Professor Michaëlis, in his "Commentaries on the Laws of Moses," has marked a distinction between idols and images, or rather between idolatry and image-worship, which merits attention.

Micah, an Ephraimite, made an image of the deity, and, without doubt, of the true God; for it was not only made of silver which had been consecrated to Jehovah, (Judg. 17: 3.) but Micah expressed the greatest joy in having got a Levite to become its priest, in the expectation that Jehovah would thus do him good, and bless him, Judg. 17: 13. This image, so far from being kept in concealment in his house, was actually consulted as an oracle, and soon after, publicly set up by the Danites. The grandson of Moses, from poverty, became its priest; and that office descended hereditarily to his posterity for a long period, Judg. 18: 4—6, 14—17, 30, 31.

Gideon was an enemy of the worship of Baal; cut down the groves of that false god, and demolished his altars; but this same Gideon, from a mistaken idea of gratitude to Jehovah, as the author of his victories, made an image of the Deity, with the gold he had got in plunder from the Midianites, and set it up publicly in Ophra, Judg. 6: 25—33. 8: 24—27.

Jeroboam, who, from political reasons, wished to prevent his subjects from frequenting the high festivals at Jerusalem, set up in Dan and Bethel two golden calves, in which the God who had conducted the Israelites out of Egypt, was to be worshipped, 1 Kings 12: 26—31. This worship of the calves, which continued under the kings of the ten tribes, until the Assyrian captivity, and is, in the books of Kings, termed the sin of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, differed very materially from idolatry, properly so called, and is represented as a less heinous sin. When Ahab first allowed himself to be led astray by his superstitious consort, Jezebel, and introduced the worship of Baal, we find the historian making use of the following language:—"And as if it had not been enough that he continued the sin of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, he married Jezebel, the daughter of Echaal, king of Sidon, served Baal, adored him, and erected to him an image in the temple, which he had built to him in Samaria. And Ahab did more to provoke the wrath of Jehovah, than all the kings of Israel who had reigned before him," 1 Kings 16: 31—33. Concerning his son Joram, on the other hand, it is said, that "he did what was displeasing to Jehovah, though not in the same measure as his father and mother; for he caused the image of Baal, which his father had made, to be removed; only he still hankered after the sin of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, and departed not from it," 2 Kings 3: 3. In the ninth and tenth chapters of the same book, we find Jehu showing himself a mortal enemy and violent persecutor of the worship of Baal, which had been introduced in opposition to the fundamental laws; and as he himself expresses it, a zealot for Jehovah; on which account he was commended, and obtained a promise from God, that his descendants, down to his great great grandchildren, should fill the Israelitish throne, 2 Kings 10: 16, 30. At the same time, however, it is remarked, that from the sin of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, he had not abstained; and the very same thing is repeated of his posterity; of his son, (ch. 13: 6.) his grandson, (ch. 13: 11.) his great grandson, (ch. 14: 21.) and his great great grandson, ch. 15: 9. In the prophecies, also, of the lesser prophets, as they are called, we see the same distinction between calf-worship and Baal-worship duly observed.

All manner of image-worship, not excepting that which was paid to the true God, is, however, prohibited in Exod. 20: 4, 5; or if any doubt remain as to the extent of the prohibition in that passage, it is completely removed by the decision in ch. 32; where we find that the worship of a golden calf, set up, certainly not as the image of an Egyptian idol, but of Jehovah, the true God, is imputed to the Israelites as a great crime.

The use and adoration of images have been long controverted in Christendom. It is plain, from the practice of the primitive church, recorded by the earlier fathers, that Christians, during the first three centuries, and the greater part of the fourth, neither worshipped images, nor used them in their worship. The primitive Christians abstained from the worship of images, not, as the papists pretend, from tenderness to heathen idolaters, but because they thought it unlawful in itself to make any images of the Deity. Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Origen, were even of opinion, that, by the second commandment, painting and engraving were unlawful to a Christian, styling them evil and wicked arts. Tert. de Idol. cap. 3; Clem. Alex. Admon. ad Gent. p. 41; Origen contra Celsum, lib. vi. p. 182. This opinion however is untenable.

The use of images in churches, as ornaments, was first introduced by some Christians in Spain, in the beginning of the fourth century; but the practice was condemned as a dangerous innovation, in a council held at Eliberis, in 305. Epiphanius, in a letter preserved by Jerome, (tom. ii. ep. 6.) bears strong testimony against images; and he may be considered as one of the first iconoclasts. The custom of admitting pictures of saints and martyrs into churches, (for this was the first source of image-worship,) was rare in the end of the fourth century, but became common in the fifth. But they were still considered only as ornaments, and, even in this view, they met with very considerable opposition. In the following century, the custom of thus adorning churches became almost universal, both in the East and West. Petavius expressly says, (de Incar., lib. xv. cap. 14.) that no statues were yet allowed in the churches, because they bore too near a resemblance to the idols of the Gentiles. Towards the close of the fourth, or beginning of the fifth century, images, which were introduced by way of ornament, and then used as an aid to devotion, began to be actually worshipped. However, it continued to be the doctrine of the church in the sixth and in the beginning of the seventh century, that images were to be used only as helps to devotion, and not as objects of worship. The worship of them was condemned in the strongest terms by Gregory the Great, as appears by two of his letters written in 601. From this time to the beginning of the eighth century, there occurs no instance of any worship given, or allowed to be given, to any images, by any council or assembly of bishops whatever. But they were commonly worshipped by the monks and populace in the beginning of the eighth century; inasmuch, that in 726, when Leo published his famous edict, it had already spread into all the provinces subject to the empire. The Lutherans condemn the Calvinists for breaking the images in the churches of the Catholics, looking on it as a kind of sacrilege; and yet they condemn the Romanists (who are professed image-worshippers) as idolaters; nor can these last keep pace with the Greeks, who go far beyond them in this point, which has occasioned abundance of disputes among them. (See ICONOCLASTES.)

The Jews absolutely condemn all images, and do not so much as suffer any statues or figures in their houses, much less in their synagogues, or places of worship. The Mohammedans have an equal aversion to images; which led them to destroy most of the beautiful monuments of antiquity, both sacred and profane, at Constantinople. *Bingham's Orig. Eccl., b. viii. c. 8; Middleton's Letters from Rome, p. 21; Burnet on the Art., p. 209, 219; Doddridge's Lect., lect. 193; Tenison on Idolatry, p. 269, 275; Ridgley's Body of Div., qu. 110; Dnright's Theology; Douglas on Errors; Ward's History of the Hindoos.—Jones; Hend. IMAGE OF GOD, in the soul, is distinguished into natural and moral. By natural is meant the understanding, reason, will, and other intellectual faculties. By the moral image, the right use of those faculties, or what we term holiness. (See ADAM.)—Hend. Buck.

IMAGE OF NEBUCHADNEZZAR. (See BAEYLON.)

IMAGINATION, is the faculty of the mind, by which it conceives and combines anew ideas of things originally communicated to it by the outward organs of sense. The cause of the pleasures of the imagination in whatever is great, uncommon, or beautiful, is this: that God has annexed a secret pleasure to the idea of any thing that is new or rare, that he might encourage and stimulate us in the eager and keen pursuit after knowledge, and inflame our best passions to search into the wonders of creation and revelation; for every new idea brings such a pleasure along with it, as rewards any pains we have taken in its acquisition, and consequently serves as a striking and powerful motive to put us upon fresh discoveries in learning and science, as well as in the word and works of God. IMAN; a Mohammedan priest, or minister, who superintends the service and concerns of the mosques, reads prayers, and instructs the people. The term is also given, by way of eminence, to the chiefs or founders of the principal sects among the Mohammedans; and this dignity, or what is commonly called the Imanate, is hereditary, and possessed by the chief members of particular families in succession.—Hend. Buck.

IMMANUEL. (See EMMANUEL.)

IMMATERIALISM, the belief that the soul is a spiritual substance distinct from the body. (See MATERIALISM, and SOUL.)—Hend. Buck.

IMMENSITY, or unbounded or incomprehensible greatness; an unlimited extension, which no finite and determinate space, repeated ever so often, can equal. (See INFINITY OF GOD.)—Hend. Buck.

IMMORALITY; an action inconsistent with our duty towards men, and consequently a sin against God, who hath commanded us to do justly, and love mercy. (See MORALITY.)—Hend. Buck.

IMMORTALITY; a state which has no end; the impossibility of dying. It is applied to God, who is absolutely immortal, or incorruptible, (1 Tim. 1: 17.) and the human soul, which is only immortal by the will of God; as God, who at first gave it, could, if he please, deprive us of existence, Matt. 10: 28. (See SOUL, and INTERMEDIATE STATE.)—Hend. Buck.

IMMUTABILITY OF GOD, is his unchangeableness. He is immutable in his essence, Jam. 1: 17. In his attributes, Ps. 102: 27. In his purposes, Isa. 25: 1. Ps. 33: 11. In his promises, Mal. 3: 6. 2 Tim. 2: 12. And in his threatenings, Matt. 25: 41.

"This is a perfection," says Dr. Blair, "which, perhaps, more than any other, distinguishes the divine nature from the human, gives complete energy to all its attributes, and entitles it to the highest adoration. From hence are derived the regular order of nature, and the steadfastness of the universe. Hence flows the unchanging tenor of those laws which from age to age regulate the conduct of mankind. Hence the uniformity of that government, and the certainty of those promises, which are the ground of our trust and security. An objection, however, may be raised against this doctrine from the commands given us to prayer, and other religious exercises. To what purpose, it may be urged, is homage addressed to a being whose plan is unalterably fixed? This objection would have weight, if our religious addresses were designed to work any alteration in God, either by giving him information of what he did not know, or by exciting affections which he did not possess; or by inducing him to change measures which he had previously formed: but they are only crude and imperfect notions of religion which can suggest such ideas." The change which our devotions actually make is upon ourselves, in order to bring us within the range of the divine promises, which are always in harmony with the plan of God. By pouring out our sentiments and desires before God; by adoring his perfections, and confessing our unworthiness; by expressing our dependence on his aid, our gratitude for his past favors, our submission to his known will, and our trust in his promised mercy, we cultivate such affections as suit our place and station in the universe, and are to be exercised by us as men and as Christians. God is immutably determined to give or withhold blessings accordingly.

The contemplation of this divine perfection should raise in our minds admiration; should teach us to imitate, as far as our frailty will permit, that constancy and steadfastness which we adore; (2 Cor. 3: 18.) and, lastly, should excite trust and confidence in the Divine Being, amidst all the revolutions of this uncertain world. Blair's Sermons, ser. 4, vol. ii.; Charnock's Works, vol. i. p. 203; Gill's Body of Div., vol. i. p. 50; Lambert's Sermons, ser. on Mal. 3: 6; Magee on Atonement; Dwight's Theology.—Hend. Buck.

IMPANATION; a term used by divines to signify the opinion of the Lutherans with regard to the eucharist, who believe that the species of bread and wine remain together with the body of our Savior after consecration.—Hend. Buck.

IMPECCABLES; a name given to those heretics who boasted that they were impeccable, that is, incapable of sin, and that there was no need of repentance; such were the Gnostics, Priscillianists, &c.—Hend. Buck.

IMPECCABILITY; the state of a person who cannot sin; or a grace, privilege, or principle, which puts him out of a possibility of sinning. Divines have distinguished several kinds of impeccability; that of God belongs to him by nature; that of Jesus Christ, considered as man, belongs to him by the hypostatical union; that of the blessed, in consequence of their condition, &c.—Hend. Buck.

IMPLICIT FAITH, is that by which we take up any system or opinion of another, without examination. This has been one of the chief sources of ignorance and error in the church of Rome. The divines of that community teach, "that we are to observe, not how the church proves any thing, but what she says: that the will of God is, that we should believe and confide in his ministers in the same manner as himself." Cardinal Toletus, in his instructions for priests, asserts, "that if a rustic believes his bishop, proposing an heretical tenet for an article of faith, such belief is meritorious." Cardinal Cusaanus tells us, "that irrational obedience is the most consummate and perfect obedience, when we obey without attending to reason, as a beast obeys his driver." In an epistle to the Bohemians he has these words: "I assert, that there are no precepts of Christ but those which are received as such by the church, (the church of Rome.) When the church changes her judgment, God changes his judgment likewise."

What madness! What blasphemy! For a church to demand belief of what she teaches, and a submission to what she enjoins, merely upon her assumed authority, must appear, to unprejudiced minds, the height of unreasonableness and spiritual despotism. We could wish this doctrine had been confined to this church; but, alas! it has been too prevalent in other communities. A theological system, says Dr. Jortin, is too often no more than a temple consecrated to implicit faith; and he who enters in there to worship, instead of leaving his shoes, after the Eastern manner, must leave his understanding at the door; and it will be well if he find it when he comes out again.—Hend. Buck.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS; an ecclesiastical action, by which a bishop lays his hand on the head of a person in ordination, confirmation, or in uttering a blessing. This practice is also usually observed by the Dissenters at the ordination of their preachers; when the ministers present place their hands on the head of him whom they are ordaining, while one of them prays for a blessing on him, and on his future labors. They are not agreed, however, as to the propriety of this ceremony. Some suppose it to be confined to those who received extraordinary gifts in the primitive times: others think it ought to be retained, as it was an ancient practice used where no extraordinary gifts were conveyed, Gen. 48: 14. Matt. 19: 15. They do not suppose it to be of such an important and essential nature, that the validity and usefulness of a man's future ministry depend upon it in any degree.

Imposition of hands was a Jewish ceremony, introduced not by any divine authority, but by custom; it being the practice among those people, whenever they pray to God for any person, to lay their hands on his head. Our Savior observed the same custom, both when he conferred his blessing on children, and when he healed the sick, adding prayer to the ceremony. The apostles, likewise, laid hands on those upon whom they bestowed the Holy Ghost. The priests observed the same custom when any one was received into their body. And the apostles themselves underwent the imposition of hands afresh every time they entered upon any new design. In the ancient church, imposition of hands was even practised on persons when they married, which custom the Abyssinians still observe. Maurice's Dial. on Soc. Relig., pp. 163, 168; Watts's Rational Foundation of a Christian Ch., p. 31; Turner on Church Gov., p. 70; King's Primitive Christian Ch., p. 49; Fuller's Works.—Buck. Buck. (See HAND.)

IMPOSTORS, RELIGIOUS, are such as pretend to an extraordinary commission from heaven, and who terrify the people with false denunciations of judgments. Too many of these have abounded in almost all ages. They are punishable in the temporal courts of England, with fine, imprisonment, and corporeal punishment. (See FALSE MESSIAHS.)—Hend. Buck.

IMPROPRIATION; a parsonage or ecclesiastical living, the profits of which are in the hands of a layman; in which case it stands distinguished from appropriation, which is where the profits of a benefice are in the hands of a bishop, college, &c., though the terms are now used promiscuously. There are computed to be, in England, three thousand eight hundred and forty-five impropriations, which, on the dissolution of the monasteries, were granted by the king's letters-patent to lay persons.

IMPULSE; an influence, idea, or motive acting upon the mind. We must be careful how we are guided by impulses in religion. "There are many," as one observes, "who frequently feel singular impressions upon their minds, and are inclined to pay a very strict regard unto them. Yea, some carry this point so far, as to make it almost the only rule of their judgment, and will not determine any thing until they find it in their hearts to do it, as their phrase is. Others take it for granted, that the divine mind is notified to them by sweet or powerful impressions of some passages of sacred writ. There are others who are determined by visionary manifestations, or by the impressions made in dreams, and the interpretations they put upon them. All these things being of the same general nature, may very justly be considered together; and it is a matter of doubt with many how far these things are to be regarded, or attended to by us; and how we may distinguish any divine impressions of this kind from the delusions of the tempter, or of our own evil hearts. But, whoever makes any of these things his rule and standard, he forsakes the divine word; and nothing tends more to make persons unhappy in themselves, unsteady in their conduct, or more dangerously deluded in their practice, than paying a random regard to these impulses, as notifications of the divine will." (See ENTHUSIASM; PROVIDENCE.)—Hend. Buck.

IMPURITY; want of that regard to decency, chastity, or holiness, which our duty requires. Impurity, in the law of Moses, is any legal defilement. Of these there were several sorts: some were voluntary, as the touching a dead body, or any animal that died of itself; or any creature that was esteemed unclean; or touching things holy by one who was not clean, or was not a priest; the touching one who had a leprosy, one who had a gonorrhoea, or who was polluted by a dead carcass, &c. Sometimes these impurities were involuntary; as when any one inadvertently touched bones, or a sepulchre, or any thing polluted; or fell into such diseases as pollute, as the leprosy, &c.

The ba's, clothes, and movables, which had touched any thing unclean, contracted also a kind of impurity, and in some cases communicated it to others.

These legal pollutions were generally removed by bathing, and lasted no longer than the evening. The person polluted plunged over head in the water; and either had his clothes on when he did so, or washed himself and his clothes separately. Other pollutions continued seven days; as that which was contracted by touching a dead body. Some impurities lasted forty or fifty days; as that of women who were lately delivered, who were unclean forty days after the birth of a boy, and fifty after the birth of a girl. Others, again, lasted till the person was cured.

Many of these pollutions were expiated by sacrifices, and others by a certain water or lye made with the ashes of a red heifer, sacrificed on the great day of expiation. When the leper was cured, he went to the temple, and offered a sacrifice of two birds, one of which was killed, and the other set at liberty. He who had touched a dead body, or had been present at a funeral, was to be purified with the water of expiation, and this upon pain of death. The woman who had been delivered, offered a turtle and a lamb for her expiation; or if she was poor, two turtles, or two young pigeons.

These impurities, which the law of Moses has expressed with the greatest accuracy and care, were only figures of other more important impurities, such as the sins and iniquities committed against God, or faults committed against our neighbor. The saints and prophets of the Old Testament were sensible of this; and our Savior, in the gospel, has strongly inculcated, that they are not outward and corporeal pollutions which render us unacceptable to God, but such inward pollutions as infect the soul, and are violations of justice, truth, and charity.—Hend. Buck.

IMPUTATION, is the attributing of any matter, quality, or character, whether good or evil, to any person as his own; or the treating of him according to the character which he thus sustains. It may refer to what was originally his, antecedently to such imputation; or to what was not antecedently his, but becomes so by virtue of such imputation only, 2 Sam. 19: 19. Ps. 106: 31.

The imputation that respects our justification before God is of the latter kind, and may be defined thus: it is God's gracious reckoning of the righteousness of Christ to believers, and his acceptance of their persons as righteous on the account thereof. Their sins being imputed to him, and his obedience being imputed to them, they are, in virtue hereof, both acquitted from guilt, and accepted as righteous before God, Rom. 4: 6, 7. 5: 18, 19. 2 Cor. 5: 21.

When we speak of sin being imputed to Christ, it is not meant that there was such a transfer of it as actually to constitute him a sinner; such an idea being at once infinitely derogatory to the holy character which the Redeemer is ever represented as sustaining, and utterly repugnant to the moral principles of the divine government; but the meaning is, that sin was charged to his account, as a voluntary responsible agent, acting in the room of the guilty, in order that, in virtue of his expiating its guilt, such of them as should avail themselves of his atonement might be freed from their liability to suffer in their own persons the punishment they had merited. In like manner, the imputation of the righteousness of Christ does not consist in a transfer of his personal acts and sufferings in such a sense as would imply that they were really the acts and sufferings of those to whom they are imputed, but in a dealing with them on the ground of that righteousness, so as that they shall reap all the benefits resulting from it. Neither sin nor righteousness can ever be imputed so as to become the act and deed of any but the individual by whom it was performed. As our sins never were, and never could become Christ's sins, so his righteousness, strictly speaking, always continues his own, and can only be said to be ours in the sense of our enjoying its benefits or effects; a mode of speech, however, which receives no countenance from Scripture. He himself is spoken of as "our righteousness," and we are said to be made "the righteousness of God" in him; but these forms do not warrant the use of the phraseology to which we have adverted. (See RIGHTeousNESS; SIN.) Dickinson's Letters, p. 156; Hervey's Theron and Aspasio, vol. ii. p. 43; Doddridge's Works, vol. iv. p. 562; Watts' Works, vol. iii. p. 532; Works of Pres. Edwards; Fuller's Works.—Hend. Buck.

IMPUTED RIGHTEOUSNESS. (See JUSTIFICATION.) IN. The accurate consideration of the sense of this preposition IN, is often of great use to lead to the true meaning of many texts of Scripture. God is in Christ; is one with him as God; has the closest connexion, is well-pleased with, and reconciled to men in him; and Christ is in him; has the same nature as his Father, John 14: 10. 2 Cor. 5: 19. The truth is in Christ; he is the substance and exemplification of it; by his death it is ratified; and in beholding and receiving of him, its light and glory are perceived, and its power felt, Eph. 4: 21. 2 Cor. 1: 21. The law of the Spirit of life is in Christ; the new covenant is established with him; he is the great agent in it, and the means of its operation. The Holy Ghost, as the spirit of Christ, operates in us, by uniting us to, and maintaining our fellowship with Christ, Rom. 8: 2. We are blessed, chosen, called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and obtain an inheritance in Christ; our whole salvation was concerted with him as our Surety, purchased by him as our Ransomer, is lodged in him as our Treasury, and in a state of union to him we share of it; and the enjoyment of him as the Lord over wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, is the sum of it, Eph. 1: 3, 4, 6, &c. We are in Christ, and he in us. He dwells in our hearts by faith, and we are closely united to him as our Surety, our Head, Husband, and root of spiritual influence, John 17: 26. Rom. 16: 7. But persons are said to be in Christ, if they are members of his visible church, and in outward profession joined to him, John 15: 6. To believe or trust in Christ, or in God, or in his name, is, in a way of receiving Christ, and God in him, as the Husband and Savior of our souls, offered in the promises, to expect from his perfections, relations, and work, whatever is good and necessary for us, John 14: 1. To be strong in the Lord, faithful in the Lord, to labor in the Lord, and salute others in the Lord, is, in a state of union to Christ's person, and exercise of daily receiving out of his fulness, to study faithfulness and diligence in the work of preaching the gospel, or practising holiness, and to salute others from love to the Lord, and on account of their bearing his image, Eph. 6: 10. 1 Cor. 4: 17. Rom. 16: 12—22.—Brown.

INABILITY; want of power sufficient for the performance of any particular action or design. It has been divided into natural and moral. We are said to be naturally unable to do a thing when we cannot do it if we wish, because of some impeding defect or obstacle that is extrinsic to the will, either in the understanding, constitution of the body, or external objects. Moral inability consists not in any of these things, but either in the want of inclination, or the strength of a contrary inclination; or the want of sufficient motives in view to induce and excite the act of the will, or the strength of apparent motives to the contrary.

Infants and idiots are under a natural incapacity of knowledge; and every one of weak mental powers, though he should be neither infant nor idiot, yet in proportion to that weakness, is the subject of a natural inability. The same may be said of a defect of bodily powers; and a want of opportunities or external advantages constitutes the same thing. A man, for instance, in the perfect possession of all his faculties, may be cast upon an island, where there may be no Bible, nor any of the means of grace to be obtained: in which case he will be under a natural incapacity to read and hear God's word, just as much as if he were blind and deaf. In this point of view, that part of the heathen world who never heard the gospel are under a natural inability to believe it. By a moral ability to do good, is meant a disposition to use our natural ability to right purposes. It consists in a heart to know and love God, to devote all the powers of our souls and members of our bodies to be instruments of righteousness to serve him, to improve every opportunity that offers to glorify his name. Every wicked man is destitute of this, and consequently under the dominion of a moral inability.

Natural inability, so far as it prevails, excuses from all obligation and blame. It may be, and often is, an effect of sin; but it is not sin itself. But moral inability is so far from excusing men from blame, that it is itself that in which blame consists. Whatever good thing any person could do, not being hindered by any natural impediment; but will not; the common sense of mankind criminalizes him for not performing it.

It has been questioned whether the term inability, in the moral view of it, should be used at all, since it has been so fearfully abused, to the lulling of sinners asleep in carnal security, and the preventing of them from viewing and feeling the responsibility under which they lie, as God's rational creatures, if they do not render an immediate and unreserved compliance with his will. The substitution of the word indisposition is certainly to be approved; and there is reason to hope that the time is not distant, when preachers and theological writers will entirely banish from their vocabulary every phrase which in the smallest degree goes to diminish the sinner's criminality, and abate his sense of obligation. See Fuller's Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation; and Hinton on the Work of the Spirit in Conversion.—Hend. Buck.

INCARNATION; the act whereby the Son of God assumed the human nature; or the mystery by which Jesus Christ, the Eternal Word, was made man, in order to accomplish the work of our salvation. See NATIVITY; Tillotson's Sermons, and Meldrum on the Incarnation; Dwight's Theology; Works of Robert Hall.—Hend. Buck.

INCENSE, (thur;) so called by the dealers of drugs in Egypt, from thur, or thor, the name of a harbor in the north bay of the Red sea, near mount Sinai; thereby distinguishing it from the gum arabic, which is brought from Suez, another port in the Red sea, not far from Cairo. It differs also in being more pellucid and white. This gum is said to distil from incisions made in the tree during the heat of summer. At the present day it is brought from the East Indies, but not of so good a quality as that from Arabia. It burns with a bright and strong flame, not easily extinguished. It was used in the temple service as an emblem of prayer, Ps. 141: 2. Rev. 8: 3, 4.

The "sweet incense," mentioned Exodus 30: 7, and elsewhere, was a compound of several spices, agreeably to the direction in the thirty-fourth verse. To offer incense was an office peculiar to the priests. They went twice a day into the holy place; namely, morning and evening, to burn incense there. Upon the great day of expiation, the high-priest took incense, or perfume, pounded and ready for being put into the censer, and threw it upon the fire, the moment he went into the sanctuary. One reason of this was, that so the smoke which rose from the censer might prevent his looking with too much curiosity on the ark and mercy-seat. God threatened him with death upon failing to perform this ceremony, Lev. 16: 13. Generally, incense is to be considered as an emblem of the "prayers of the saints," and is so used by the sacred writers.—Watson.

INCEST; the crime of criminal and unnatural commerce with kindred within the degrees forbidden by the law of God. By the rules of the church, incest was formerly very absurdly extended even to the seventh degree; but it is now restricted to the third or fourth.

Most nations look on incest with horror, Persia and Egypt excepted. In the history of the ancient kings of those countries we meet with instances of brothers marrying their own sisters, because they thought it too mean to join in alliance with their own subjects, and still more so to marry into any foreign family. Vortigern, king of South Britain, equalled, or rather excelled them in wickedness, by marrying his own daughter. The queen of Portugal was married to her uncle; and the prince of Brazil, the son of that incestuous marriage, was wedded to his aunt. But they had dispensations for these unnatural marriages from his holiness.

"In order," says Dr. Paley, "to preserve chastity in families, and between persons of different sexes brought up and living together in a state of unreserved intimacy, it is necessary, by every method possible, to inculcate an abhorrence of incestuous conjunctions; which abhorrence can only be upheld by the absolute reprobation of all commerce of the sexes between near relations. Upon this principle the marriage, as well as other cohabitation of brothers and sisters of lineal kindred, and of all who usually live in the same family, may be said to be forbidden by the law of nature. Restrictions which extend to remoter degrees of kindred than what this reason makes it necessary to prohibit from inter-marriage, are founded in the authority of the positive law which ordains them, and can only be justified by their tendency to diffuse wealth, to connect families, or to promote some political advantage.

"The Levitical law, which is received in this country, and from which the rule of the Roman law differs very little, prohibits marriage between relations within three degrees of kindred; computing the generations not from, but through the common ancestor, and accounting affinity the same as consanguinity. The issue, however, of such marriages are not bastardized, unless the parents be divorced during their lifetime." Paley's Mor. Phil. vol. i. p. 316.—Hend. Buck.

INCEST, (SPIRITUAL;) an ideal crime, committed between two persons who have a spiritual alliance, by means of baptism or confirmation. This ridiculous fancy was made use of as an instrument of great tyranny in times when the power of the pope was unlimited, even queens being sometimes divorced upon this pretence. Incest Spiritual is also understood of a vicar, or other beneficiary, who enjoys both the mother and daughter; that is, holds two benefices, one whereof depends upon the collation of the other. Such spiritual incest renders both the one and the other of these benefices vacant.—Hend. Buck.

INCHANTMENTS. The law of God condemns enchantments and enchanters. Several terms are used in Scripture to denote enchantments:—1. Lelech, which signifies to mutter, to speak with a low voice, like magicians in their evocations and magical operations, Psalm 58: 6. 2. Letim, secrets, whence Moses speaks of the enchantments wrought by Pharaoh's magicians. 3. Kashaph, meaning those who practice juggling, legerdemain, tricks, and witchery, deluding people's eyes and senses, 2 Chron. 33: 6. 4. Hebar, which signifies, properly, to bind, assemble, associate, re-write: this occurs principally among those who charm serpents, who tame them, and make them gentle and sociable, which before were fierce, dangerous, and untractable, Deut. 18: 11. We have examples of each of these ways of enchanting. It was common for magicians, sorcerers, and enchanters, to speak in a low voice, to whisper: they are called ventriloqui, because they spake, as one would suppose, from the bottom of their stomachs. They affected secrecy and mysterious ways, to conceal the vanity, folly, or infamy of their pernicious art. Their pretended magic often consisted in cunning tricks only, in sleight of hand, or some natural secrets, unknown to the ignorant. They affected obscurity and night, or would show their skill only before the uninformed, or mean persons, and feared nothing so much as serious examinations, broad day-light, and the inspection of the intelligent. Respecting the enchantments practised by Pharaoh's magicians, (see Exod. 8: 18, 19,) in order to imitate the miracles which were wrought by Moses, it must be said, either that they were mere illusions, whereby they imposed on the spectators; or that, if they performed such miracles, and produced real changes of their rods, and the other things said to be performed by them, it must have been by a supernatural power which God had permitted Satan to give them, but the further operation of which he afterwards thought proper to prevent.—Iverson.

INCLINATION, is the propensity of the mind to any particular object or action; or a kind of bias upon nature, by the force of which it is carried towards certain actions previously to the exercise of thought and reasoning about the nature and consequences of them. Inclinations are of two kinds—natural or acquired. 1. Natural are such as we often see in children, who from their earliest years differ in their tempers and dispositions. In one you see the dawning of a liberal, diffusive soul; another gives us cause to fear he will be altogether as narrow and rigid. Of one we may say he is naturally revengeful; of another, that he is patient and forgiving.

2. Acquired inclinations are such as are superinduced by custom, which are called habits; and these are either good or evil. (See HABIT).—Head. Buck.

IN CENA DOMINI; the most remarkable of all the papal bulls, on account of the proofs which it furnishes of the arrogance of the popes, and their pretensions as absolute rulers of the church, and the authority which they claimed over temporal princes. It is founded on more ancient papal decrees, which declared all heretics, and favorers of heretics, without distinction, and those who imposed taxes on the clergy to supply the wants of the state, solemnly excommunicated. After the fourteenth century, it was modified and extended by several popes, and received its latest form from Urban VIII. in 1627. This pope, in behalf of God, and by virtue of the power committed to the apostles Peter and Paul, and himself, excommunicated and anathematized all Hussites, Wickliffites, Lutherans, Zuinglians, Calvinists, Huguenots, Ana-baptists, &c.; all who had apostatized from the Catholic faith; all who trusted, received, favored, or defended them; all who read heretical books without permission from the pope; all who possessed or printed such books, or defended them in any way, either in public or private, or on any pretence whatever; and, finally, all schismatics who obstinately avoided communion with the Roman church. It also goes on to denounce all who in any way shall injure the temporal possession or rights of the pope, the clergy, papal ambassadors, &c. This awful anathema the pope alone can remove, and that only at the hour of death, when the excommunicated person has satisfied the claims of the church. The bull was publicly posted up at Rome; and once a year, or oftener, every bishop was to read it to the assembled people. This was done till the middle of the eighteenth century, every Monday Thursday, in all the principal churches.—Head. Buck.

INCOMPREHENSIBILITY OF GOD. This is a relative term, and indicates a relation between an object and a faculty; between God and a created understanding; so that the meaning of it is this, that no created understanding can comprehend God; that is, have a perfect and exact knowledge of him, such a knowledge as is adequate to the perfection of the object, Job 11: 7. Isa. 40.

God is incomprehensible, 1. As to the nature of his essence. 2. The excellency of his attributes. 3. The depth of his counsels. 4. The works of his providence. 5. The dispensation of his grace, Eph. 3: 8. Job 37: 25. Rom. 11.

The incomprehensibility of God follows, 1. From his being a spirit endued with perfections greatly superior to our own. 2. There may be (for any thing we certainly know) attributes and perfections in God of which we have not the least idea. 3. In those perfections of the divine nature of which we have some idea, there are many things to us inexplicable, and with which, the more deeply and attentively we think of them, the more we find our thoughts swallowed up: such as his self-existence, eternity, omnipresence, &c.

This should teach us, therefore, 1. To admire and reverence the Divine Being, Zech. 9: 17. Neh. 9: 5. 2. To be humble and modest, Ps. 8: 1, 4. Eccl. 5: 2, 3. Job 37: 19. 3. To be serious in our addresses, and sincere in our behavior towards him. Caryl on Job 27: 25; Tillotson's Sermons, sermon 156; Abernethy's Sermons, vol. ii. nos. 6, 7; Doddridge's Lect., lect. 59.—Head. Buck.

INCONTINENCY, not abstaining from unlawful desires. (See CONTINENCY).—Head. Buck.

INCORPOREALITY OF GOD, is his being without a body. That God is incorporeal is evident; for 1. Materiality is incompatible with self-existence, and God being self-existent, must be incorporeal. 2. If God were corporeal, he could not be present in any part of the world where body is; yet his presence is necessary for the support and motion of body. 3. A body cannot be in two places at the same time; yet he is everywhere, and fills heaven and earth. 4. A body is to be seen and felt, but God is invisible and impalpable, John 1: 18. Charnock's Works, vol. i. p. 117; Doddridge's Lect., lect. 47; Gill's Body of Div. vol. i. p. 45, 8vo.—Head. Buck.

INCORRUPTIBLES, or INCORRUPTIBLES; the name of a sect which sprang out of the Eutychiens. Their distinguishing tenet was, that the body of Jesus Christ was incorruptible; by which they meant, that, after and from the time wherein he was formed in the womb of his mother, he was not susceptible of any change or alteration; not even of any natural or innocent passion, as of hunger, thirst, &c.; so that he ate without occasion before his death, as well as after his resurrection.—Head. Buck.

INCREDULITY; the withholding our assent to any proposition, notwithstanding arguments sufficient to demand assent. See Duncan Forbes's piece, entitled, Reflections on the Sources of Incredulity with regard to Religion, and Casaubon on Credulity and Incredulity. Also, Gambies on Moral Evidence.—Head. Buck.

INCUMBENT; a clergyman holding a living; and so called, because he does, or at least ought to, bend his whole study to discharge the cure of his church.—Head. Buck.

INDEED. 1. Truly; assuredly, Deut. 2: 15. 2. Eminently; in a very singular manner. So Christ makes free indeed, with a glorious liberty which can never be taken away, John 8: 35, 36. His flesh and blood are meat indeed, suited to every necessity, and quickening to the soul; secure everlasting life and strength; and are infinitely sweet and substantial, John 6: 55. And an Israelite indeed is one truly and eminently holy, and noted for wrestling with God, John 1: 47. Widows indeed are such as behave gravely and piously, suitably to their condition, and are really poor and destitute, 1 Tim. 5: 3, 5, 16.—Brown.

INDEPENDENCE OF GOD, is his existence in and of himself, without depending on any other. "His being and perfections," as Dr. Ridgley observes (Body of Div. qu. 7.) "are underived, and not communicated to him, as all finite perfections are by him to the creature. This attribute of independence belongs to all his perfections. 1. He is independent as to his knowledge. He doth not receive ideas from any object out of himself, as intelligent creatures do. This is elegantly described by the prophet, Isa. 60: 13, 14. 2. He is independent in power. As he receives strength from no one, so he doth not act dependently on the will of the creature, Job 36: 23. 3. He is independent as to his holiness, hating sin necessarily, and not barely depending on some reasons out of himself inducing him thereto; for it is essential to the divine nature to be infinitely opposite to sin, and, therefore, to be independently holy. 4. He is independent as to his bounty and goodness. He communicates blessings not by constraint, but according to his sovereign will. Thus he gave being to the world, and all things therein, which was the first instance of bounty and goodness; and this not by constraint, but by his free will; "for his pleasure they are and were created." In like manner, whatever instances of mercy he extends to miserable creatures, he acts independently, and not by force. He shows mercy, because it is his pleasure to do so, Rom. 9: 18.

That God is independent, let it farther be considered, 1. That all things depend on his power, which brought them into and preserves them in being. If, therefore, all things depend on God, then it would be absurdity to say that God depends on any thing, for this would be to suppose the cause and the effect to be mutually dependent on and derived from each other, which infers a contradiction. 2. If God be infinitely above the highest creatures, he cannot depend on any of them, for dependence argues inferiority, Isa. 40: 15, 17. 3. If God depend on any creature, he does not exist necessarily; and if so, then he might not have been; for the same will by which he is supposed to exist, might have determined that he should not have existed, which is altogether inconsistent with the idea of a God.

From God's being independent, we infer, 1. That we ought to conclude that the creature cannot lay any obligation on him, Rom. 11: 35. Job 22: 2, 3. 2. If independence be a divine perfection, then let it not in any instance, or by any consequence, be attributed to the creature; let us conclude that all our springs are in him; and that all we enjoy and hope for is from him, who is the author and finisher of our faith, and the fountain of all our blessedness.—Hend. Buck.

INDEPENDENTS; a denomination of Protestants, in England and Holland, originally called Brownists. They derive their name from their maintaining that every particular congregation of Christians has, according to the New Testament, a full power of ecclesiastical jurisdiction over its members, independent of the authority of bishops, synods, presbyteries, or any other ecclesiastical assemblies.

This denomination appeared in England, in the year 1516. John Robinson, a Norfolk divine, who, being banished from his native country for non-conformity, afterwards settled at Leyden, was considered as their founder and father. He possessed sincere piety, and no inconsiderable share of learning. Perceiving defects in the denomination of the Brownists, to which he belonged, he employed his zeal and diligence in correcting them, and in new modelling the society. Though the Independents considered their own form of ecclesiastical government as of divine institution, and as originally introduced by the authority of the apostles, nay, by the apostles themselves; yet they did not always think it necessary to condemn other denominations, but often acknowledged that true religion might flourish in those communities which were under the jurisdiction of bishops, or the government of presbyteries. They approved, also, of a regular and educated ministry; nor is any person among them now permitted to speak in public before he has submitted to a proper examination of his capacity and talents, and has been approved of by the church to which he belonged.

Their grounds of separation from the established church are different from those of other Puritans. Many of the latter objected chiefly to certain rites, ceremonies, vestments, or forms, or to the government of the church; while yet they were disposed to arm the magistrate in support of the truth, and regretted and complained that they could not on these accounts conform to it. But Robinson and his companions not only rejected the appointments of the church on these heads, but denied its authority to enact them; contending, that every single congregation of Christians was a church, and independent of all legislation, save that of Christ; standing in need of no such provision or establishment as the state can bestow, and incapable of soliciting or receiving it. Hence they sought not to reform the church, but chose to dissent from it. They admitted there were many godly men in its communion, and that it was reformed from the grossest errors of the man of sin; but thought it still wanted some things essential to a true church of Christ; in particular, a power of choosing its own ministers, and a stricter discipline among its members.

The creed of the Independents is uniformly Calvinistic, though with considerable shades of difference; and many in Scotland and Ireland have symbolized with the Sandemanians, or the Scottish Baptist denominations. Congregationalist and Independent have been generally considered as convertible and synonymous: many, however, in the present day, prefer the former appellation, considering it desirable, in many cases, to unite, for mutual advice and support, more closely than the term independent seems to warrant. (See CONGREGATIONALISTS.)—Watson.

INDEX, EXPURGATORY; a catalogue of prohibited books in the church of Rome. The first catalogues of this kind were made by the inquisitors, and these were afterwards approved of by the council of Trent, after some alteration was made in them by way of retrenchment or addition. Thus an index of heretical books being formed, it was confirmed by a bull of Clement VIII., in 1595, and printed with several introductory rules; by the fourth of which, the use of the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue is forbidden to all persons without a particular license; and by the tenth rule it is ordained, that no book shall be printed at Rome without the approbation of the pope's vicar, or some person delegated by the pope; nor in any other places, unless allowed by the bishop of the diocese, or some person deputed by him, or by the inquisitor of heretical pravity. The Trent Index being thus published, Philip II. of Spain ordered another to be printed at Antwerp in 1571, with considerable enlargements. Another index was published in Spain, in 1554, a copy of which was snatched out of the fire when the English plundered Cadiz. Afterwards there were several expurgatory indexes printed at Rome and Naples, and particularly in Spain.—Hend. Buck.

INDIA; the appellation which the ancients appear to have given to that vast region of Asia, stretching east of Persia and Bactria, as far as the country of Sinae, or China; its northern boundary being the Scythian desert, and its southern limit the ocean. The name is generally supposed to have been derived from the river Indus, which waters its western extremity, and which signifies, the Blue or Black river. Mr. Conder thinks, however, that the extensive application of the word renders it more probable, that it was employed to denote the country of the Indi, or Asiatic Ethiopians; answering to the Persian Hindostan, or the country of the Hindoos. In support of the idea that there are several allusions to this country in the Old Testament, Mr. Taylor has some remarks that are not without interest and weight, in support of the former opinion.

It is said in Esth. 1: 1, that Ahasuerus reigned from India to Ethiopia. This fixes the extent of the Persian dominions eastward to the original station of the Hindoos, at the head of the Indus. There is not, we believe, any memorial of the Persian power having permanently maintained itself east of the Indus, Alexander the Great only having ever thought of establishing a dominion in those countries. The Mahometans, indeed, have so done; but then they have renounced the west. Nadir Shah penetrated to Delhi, but he returned to Persia, and did not attempt to retain both regions under his rule. The Hindoos could not have adopted religious rites from the Romans, the Greeks, the Egyptians, or the Persians. Whoever has bestowed a moment's attention on this people, must know, that it would be in utter violation of their most sacred tenets to do so; and whoever recollects that the sages of Greece travelled into India to learn wisdom, will be confirmed in the persuasion, that others derived information from them, not they from others. In fact, all testimony brings letters, learning, and knowledge from the East.—Calnet.

INDIANS; the term is alike applicable to the natives of India and America; but as we have considered the former under the article HIPOCROISIS, we shall confine this article to the latter, and begin with the natives of North America, noticing some striking peculiarities of their ancient pagan notions and idolatries.

The Aborigines of New England not only believed a plurality of gods, who made and govern the several nations of the world, but they made deities of every thing they imagined to be great, powerful, beneficial, or hurtful to mankind; yet they conceived an almighty being, who dwells in the south-west regions of the heavens, to be superior to all the rest. This almighty being they called Kichtan, who at first, according to their tradition, made a man and woman out of a stone; but upon some dislike destroyed them again, and then made another couple out of a tree, from whom descended all the nations of the earth; but how they came to be scattered and dispersed into countries so remote from one another, they cannot tell. They believed their supreme god to be a good being, and paid a sort of acknowledgment to him for plenty, victory, and other benefits; but there is another power, which they call hobamocko, (i. e. the devil,) of whom they stood in greater awe, and worshipped merely from a principle of fear. The immortality of the soul was in some sort universally believed among them. When good men die, they said, their spirits go to Kichtan, where they meet their friends, and enjoy all manner of pleasures. When wicked men die, they go to Kichtan also; but are commanded to walk away, and to wander about in restless discontent and darkness forever.

Mr. Brainerd, in 1744, gives, in his journal, the following account of their religious sentiments:—"After the coming of the white people, the Indians in New Jersey who once held a variety of deities, supposed there were only three, because they saw people of three kinds of complexion; viz. English, negroes, and themselves. It is a notion pretty generally prevailing among them, that it was not the same god that made them who made us, but that they were created after the white people; and it is probable, they suppose, their god gained some special skill by seeing the white people made, and so made them better. With regard to a future state of existence, many of them imagine that the chichung, i. e. the shadow, or what survives the body, will at death go southward, to some unknown place, and enjoy some kind of happiness—such as hunting, feasting, dancing, or the like; and never be weary of these entertainments. They believe that most will be happy; and that those who are not so will be punished only with privation, being excluded from the walls of the good world, where happy spirits reside. These rewards and punishments they suppose to depend entirely on their behavior towards mankind; and to have no reference to any thing which relates to the worship of the Supreme Being."

The original inhabitants of Canada, like other heathen, had an idea of a Supreme Being, whom they considered as the creator and governor of the world. It is said that most of the nations of the Algonquin language give this being the appellation of the Great Hare, but some call him Michabou, and others Atahocan. They believe that he was born upon the waters, together with his whole court, who were composed of four-footed animals, like himself; that he formed the earth of a grain of sand taken from the bottom of the ocean, and that he created men of the bodies of the dead animals. Some mention a god of the waters, who opposed the designs of the Great Hare, who is called the Great Tiger. They have a third, called Matcomek, whom they invoke in the winter season.

The Agreskoui of the Hurons, and the Agreskoué of the Iroquois, is, in the opinion of these nations, the sovereign being, and god of war. These Indians do not give the same original to mankind with the Algonquins; for they do not ascend so high as the first creation. According to them, there were in the beginning six men in the world; but they cannot tell who placed them there.

The gods of the Indians are supposed to have bodies, and to live much in the same manner as themselves; but without any of the inconveniences to which they are subject. The word spirit, among them, signifies only a being of a more excellent nature than others.

According to the Iroquois, in the third generation there came a deluge, in which not a soul was saved; so that, in order to re-people the earth, it was necessary to change beasts into men. Beside the First Being or Great Spirit, they admit an infinite number of genii, or inferior spirits, both good and evil, who have each their peculiar form of worship. They ascribe to these beings a kind of immensity and omnipresence, and constantly invoke them as the guardians of mankind; and they only address themselves to the evil genii, to beg of them to do them no hurt. They believe the immortality of the soul, and say that the region of their everlasting abode lies so far westward, that the souls are several months in arriving at it, and have vast difficulties to surmount. The happiness that they hope to enjoy is not believed to be the recompense of virtue only; but to have been a good hunter, brave in war, &c., are the chief merits which entitle them to their paradise: this they, and other American natives, describe as a delightful country, blessed with perpetual spring, whose forests abound with game, whose rivers swarm with fish; where famine is never felt, but uninterrupted plenty shall be enjoyed without labor or fatigue.

The number of native Indians within the United States is, by a recent census, stated within a half a million; and the most active measures are using by the government, and benevolent societies, for their civilization and instruction. See Report of the Secretary of War, and Dr. Morse's Tour; New Haven, 1822.

Most of the natives of South America have an idea of a Supreme Being, whom they call the Great Spirit, by way of excellence; and whose perfections are as much superior to other beings, as the fire of the sun is to elementary fire. They believe this omnipotent Being is so good, that he could not do evil to any one, if he were even inclined. That though he created all things by his will, yet he had under him spirits of an inferior order, who, by his assistance, formed the beauties of the universe; but that man was the work of the Creator's own hands. These spirits are, by the Natches, termed free servants or agents; but at the same time they are as submissive as slaves: they are constantly in the presence of God, and prompt to execute his will. The air, according to them, is full of other spirits of more mischievous dispositions; and these have a chief, who was so eminently mischievous, that God Almighty was obliged to confine him; and ever since, those aerial spirits do not commit so much mischief as they did before, especially if they are intreated to be favorable. For this reason, the savages always invoke them when they want either rain or fair weather. They give this account of the creation of the world, viz. that God first formed a little man of clay, and breathed on his work; and that he walked about, grew up, and became a perfect man: but they are silent as to the creation of women.

The greatest part of the natives of Louisiana had formerly their temples, as well as the Natches; and in all these temples a perpetual fire was preserved.

The Aborigines of East and West Florida own a supreme benevolent Deity, and a subordinate one, who is malevolent: neglecting the good god, who does no harm, they bend their whole attention to soften the latter, who, they say, torments them day and night.

The Apalachians, bordering on Florida, worship the sun, but sacrifice nothing to him which has life: they hold him to be the parent of life, and think he can take no pleasure in the destruction of any living creature. Their devotion is exerted in perfumes and songs.

The divinities of the ancient inhabitants of Mexico were clothed with terror, and delighted in vengeance. The figures of serpents, of tigers, and of other destructive animals, decorated their temples. Fasts, mortifications, and penances, all rigid, and many of them excruciating to an extreme degree, were the means which they employed to appease the wrath of the gods: but of all offerings, human sacrifices were deemed the most acceptable. At the dedication of the great temple at Mexico, it is reported there were sixty or seventy thousand human sacrifices. The usual amount of them was about twenty thousand.

The city of Mexico is said to have contained nearly two thousand small temples, and three hundred and sixty which were adorned with steeples. The whole empire of Mexico contained above forty thousand temples, endowed with very considerable revenues. For the service in the grand temple of Mexico itself, above five thousand priests were appointed; and the number in the whole empire is said to have amounted to nearly a million. The whole priesthood, except that of the conquered nations, was governed by two high-priests, who were also the oracles of the kings. Beside the service in the temple, their clergy were to instruct youth, to compose the calendars, and to paint the mythological pictures. The Mexicans had also priestesses, but they were not allowed to offer up sacrifices. They likewise had monastic orders, especially one, into which no person was admitted under sixty years of age.

Notwithstanding the vast depopulation of America, a very considerable number of the native race still remains both in Mexico and Peru. Their settlements in some places are so populous, as to merit the name of cities. In the three audiences into which New Spain is divided, there are at least two millions of Indians; a pitiful remnant indeed of its ancient population: but such as still forms a body of people, superior in number to all the other inhabitants of this vast country.

The sun, as the great source of light, of joy, and fertility in the creation, attracted the principal homage of the native Peruvians. The moon and stars, as co-operating with him, were offered to secondary honors. They offered to the sun a part of those productions which his genial warmth had called forth from the bosom of the earth, and reared to maturity. They sacrificed, as an oblation of gratitude, some of the animals who were indebted to his influence for nourishment. They presented to him choice specimens of those works of ingenuity which his light had guided the heart of man in forming. But the Incas never stained his altars with human blood; nor could they conceive that their beneficent father, the sun, would be delighted with such horrid victims.

The savage tribes of Guiana believe the existence of one supreme Deity, whose chief attribute is benevolence; and to him they ascribe every good which happens. But as it is against his nature to do ill, they believe in subordinate malevolent beings, like our devil, who occasion thunders, hurricanes, and earthquakes; and who are the authors of death and diseases, and of every misfortune.

The natives of Amazonia have a vast variety of idols, whom they consider as subordinate to one Supreme Being; but of that Being they have very confused notions. They stand in great awe of their priests, and hold them in the utmost veneration. They have a particular house, or rather hut, for the celebration of their ceremonies; and this is to them what others call a church, or temple. Here the priests address themselves to their gods, and receive answers from their oracles. When they go to war, they apply to their priests for assistance against their enemies; and the first thing the priests do, is to curse them. Upon their going out to war, they hoist at the prow of their canoes that idol, under whose auspices they look for victory; but, like too many called Christians, they never pray to their gods, except in cases of difficulty, when they feel their need of divine assistance or support. Neal's History of New England, vol. i. pp. 33—4; Dr. Trumbull's Hist. of the United States, vol. i. ch. 1. INDIGNATION; a strong disapprobation of mind, excited by something flagitious in the conduct of another. It does not, as Mr. Cogan observes, always suppose that excess of depravity which alone is capable of committing deeds of horror. Indignation always refers to culpability of conduct, and cannot, like the passion of horror, be extended to distress either of body or mind. It is produced by acts of treachery, abuse of confidence, base ingratitude, &c., which we cannot contemplate without being provoked to anger, and feeling a generous resentment.—Hend. Buck.

INDUCTION, (ECCLESIASTICAL;) the act of giving a clergyman formal possession of his church, to which he has been appointed by institution; which see. It is performed by the archdeacon, or some person appointed by him for the purpose, who takes the clergyman to be inducted by the hand, lays it upon the key of the church, the ring of the door, the latch of the church gate, or on the church wall, and pronounces these words:—"By virtue of this commission, I induct you into the real and actual possession of the rectory of —," &c. He then opens the church door, and puts the parson in possession of it, who commonly tolls a bell to give notice to the people that he has taken possession. Induction may likewise be made by simply delivering a clod or turf of the glebe.—Hend. Buck.

INDULGENCES, in the Romish church, are a remission of the punishment due to sin, granted by the church, and supposed to save the sinner from purgatory.

According to the doctrine of the Romish church, all the good works of the saints, over and above those which were necessary towards their own justification, are deposited, together with the infinite merits of Jesus Christ, in one inexhaustible treasury. The keys of this were committed to St. Peter, and to his successors, the popes, who may open it at pleasure; and, by transferring a portion of this superabundant merit to any particular person for a sum of money, may convey to him either the pardon of his own sins, or a release for any one in whom he is interested, from the pains of purgatory. Such indulgences were first invented in the eleventh century, by Urban II., as a recompense for those who went in person upon the glorious enterprise of conquering the Holy Land. They were afterwards granted to those who hired a soldier for that purpose; and in process of time were bestowed on such as gave money for accomplishing any pious work enjoined by the pope. The power of granting indulgences has been greatly abused in the church of Rome. Pope Leo X., in order to carry on the magnificent structure of St. Peter's at Rome, published indulgences and a plenary remission to all such as should contribute money towards it. Finding the project take, he granted to Albert, elector of Mentz, and archbishop of Magdeburg, the benefit of the indulgences of Saxony, and the neighboring parts, and farmed out those of other countries to the highest bidders; who, to make the best of their bargain, procured the ablest preachers to cry up the value of the ware. The form of these indulgences was as follows:—"May our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon thee, and absolve thee by the merits of his most holy passion. And I, by his authority, that of his blessed apostles, Peter and Paul, and of the most holy pope, granted and committed to me in these parts, do absolve thee, first from all ecclesiastical censures, in whatever manner they have been incurred; then from all thy sins, transgressions, and excesses, how enormous soever they may be: even from such as are reserved for the cognizance of the holy see, and as far as the keys of the holy church extend. I remit to you all punishment which you deserve in purgatory on their account; and I restore you to the holy sacraments of the church, to the unity of the faithful, and to that innocence and purity which you possessed at baptism: so that when you die, the gates of punishment shall be shut, and the gates of the paradise of delights shall be opened; and if you shall not die at present, this grace shall remain in full force when you are at the point of death. In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost." According to a book, called the "Tax of the sacred Roman Chancery," in which are contained the exact sums to be levied for the pardon of each particular sin, we find some of the fees to be thus:—

	s.	d.
For procuring abortion . . . . .	7	6
For simony . . . . .	10	6
For sacrilege . . . . .	10	6
For taking a false oath in a criminal case . . . . .	9	0
For robbing . . . . .	12	0
For burning a neighbor's house . . . . .	12	0
For defiling a virgin . . . . .	9	0
For lying with a mother, sister, &c. . . . .	7	6
For murdering a layman . . . . .	7	6
For keeping a concubine . . . . .	10	6
For laying violent hands on a clergyman . . . . .	10	6
And so on.

The terms in which the retailers of indulgences described their benefits, and the necessity of purchasing them, were so extravagant, they they appear almost incredible. If any man, said they, purchase letters of indulgence, his soul may rest secure with respect to its salvation. The souls confined in purgatory, for whose redemption indulgences are purchased, as soon as the money tinkles in the chest, instantly escape from that place of torment, and ascend into heaven. That the efficacy of indulgences was so great, that the most heinous sins, even if one should violate (which was impossible) the Mother of God, would be remitted and expiated by them, and the person be freed both from punishment and guilt. That this was the unspeakable gift of God, in order to reconcile man to himself. That the cross erected by the preachers of indulgences was equally efficacious with the cross of Christ itself. "Lo," said they, "the heavens are open: if you enter not now, when will you enter? For twelve pence you may redeem the soul of your father out of purgatory: and are you so ungrateful that you will not rescue the soul of your parent from torment? If you had but one coat, you ought to strip yourself instantly and sell it, in order to purchase such benefit," &c. It was this great abuse of indulgences that contributed not a little to the reformation of religion in Germany, where Martin Luther began first to declaim against the preachers of indulgences, and afterwards against indulgences themselves. Since that time the popes have been more sparing in the exercise of this power; although it is said they still carry on a great trade with them to the Indies, where they are purchased at two rials a piece, and sometimes more. We are told, also, that a gentleman not long since being at Naples, in order that he might be fully ascertained respecting indulgences, went to the office, and for two sequins purchased a plenary remission of all sins for himself, and any two other persons of his friends or relations, whose names he was empowered to insert. Hawes's Church Hist., vol. iii. p. 147; Smith's Errors of the Church of Rome; Watson's Theol. Tracts, v. p. 274; Mosheim's Ecl. Hist., vol. i. p. 594, 4to. Ency. Amer.—Hend. Buck.

INDUSTRY; diligence; constant application of the mind, or exercise of the body. (See DILIGENCE, and INDUSTRY.)—Hend. Buck.

INDWELLING SCHEME; a scheme which derives its name from that passage in Col. 2: 9: "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," which, according to some, asserts the doctrine of Christ's consisting of two beings; one the self-existent Creator, and the other a creature, made into one person by an ineffable union and indwelling, which renders the same attributes and honors equally applicable to both. INFALLIBILITY; the quality of not being able to be deceived or mistaken.

The infallibility of the church of Rome has been one of the great controversies between the Protestants and papists. By this infallibility, it is understood, that she cannot at any time cease to be orthodox in her doctrine, or fall into any pernicious errors; but that she is constituted, by divine authority, the judge of all controversies of religion, and that all Christians are obliged to acquiesce in her decisions. This is the chain which keeps its members fast bound to its communion; the charm which retains them within its magic circle; the opiate which lays asleep all their doubts and difficulties: it is likewise the magnet which attracts the desultory and unstable in other persuasions within the sphere of popery; the foundation of its whole superstructure, the cement of all its parts, and its fence and fortress against all inroads and attacks.

Under the idea of this infallibility, the church of Rome claims, 1. To determine what books are and what are not canonical, and to oblige all Christians to receive or reject them accordingly. 2. To communicate authority to the Scripture; or, in other words, that the Scripture, (quoad nos,) as to us, receives its authority from her. 3. To assign and fix the sense of Scripture, which all Christians are submissively to receive. 4. To decree as necessary to salvation whatever she judges so, although not contained in Scripture. 5. To decide all controversies respecting matters of faith. These are the claims to which the church of Rome pretends, but which we shall not here attempt to refute, because any man with the Bible in his hand, and a little common sense, will easily see that they are all founded upon ignorance, superstition, and error. It is not a little remarkable, however, that the Roman Catholics themselves are much divided as to the seat of this infallibility, and which, indeed, may be considered as a satisfactory proof that no such privilege exists in the church. For is it consistent with reason to think that God would have imparted so extraordinary a gift to prevent errors and dissensions in the church, and yet have left an additional cause of error and dissension, viz. the uncertainty of the place of its abode? No, surely.—Some place this infallibility in the pope or bishop of Rome; some in a general council; others in neither pope nor council separately, but in both conjointly; whilst others are said to place it in the church diffusive, or in all churches throughout the world. But that it could not be deposited in the pope, is evident, for many popes have been heretics, and on that account censured and deposed, and therefore could not have been infallible. That it could not be placed in a general council, is as evident; for general councils have actually erred. Neither could it be placed in the pope and council conjointly; for two fallible could not make one infallible, any more than two ciphers could make an integer. To say that it is lodged in the church universal or diffusive, is equally as erroneous; for this would be useless and insignificant, because it could never be exercised. The whole church could not meet to make decrees, or to choose representatives, or to deliver their sentiments on any question started; and, less than all would not be the whole church, and so could not claim that privilege.

The most general opinion, however, it is said, is that of its being seated in a pope and general council. The advocates for this opinion consider the pope as the vicar of Christ, head of the church, and centre of unity; and therefore conclude that his concurrence with and approbation of the decrees of a general council are necessary, and sufficient to afford it an indispensable sanction and plenary authority. A general council they regard as the church representative, and suppose that nothing can be wanting to ascertain the truth of any controversial point, when the pretended head of the church and its members, assembled in their supposed representatives, mutually concur and coincide in judicial definitions and decrees, but that infallibility attends their coalition and conjunction in all their determinations.

Every impartial person who considers this subject with the least degree of attention, must clearly perceive that neither any individual nor body of Christians have any ground, from reason or Scripture, for pretending to infallibility. It is evidently the attribute of the Supreme Being alone, which we have all the foundation imaginable to conclude he has not communicated to any mortal, or associations of mortals. The human being who challenges infallibility, seems to imitate the pride and presumption of Lucifer, when he said, "I will ascend, and will be like the Most High." A claim to it was unheard of in the primitive and purest ages of the church; but became, after that period, the arrogant pretension of papal ambition. History plainly informs us that the bishops of Rome, on the declension of the western Roman empire, began to put in their claim of being the supreme and infallible heads of the Christian church, which they at length established by their deep policy and unremitting efforts; by the concurrence of fortunate circumstances; by the advantages which they reaped from the necessities of some princes, and the superstition of others; and by the general and excessive credulity of the people. However, when they had grossly abused this absurd pretension, and committed various acts of injustice, tyranny, and cruelty; when the blind veneration for the papal dignity had been greatly diminished by the long and scandalous schism occasioned by contending popes; when these had been for a considerable time roaming about Europe, fawning on princes, squeezing their adherents, and cursing their rivals; and when the councils of Constance and Basil had challenged and exercised the right of deposing and electing the bishops of Rome, then their pretensions to infallibility were called in question, and the world discovered that councils were a jurisdiction superior to that of the towering pontiffs. Then it was that this infallibility was transferred by many divines from popes to general councils; and the opinion of the superior authority of a council above that of a pope spread vastly, especially under the profligate pontificate of Alexander VI., and the martial one of Julius II. The popes were thought by numbers to be too unworthy possessors of so rich a jewel; at the same time it appeared to be of too great a value, and of too extensive consequence, to be parted with entirely. It was, therefore, by the major part of the Roman church, deposited with, or made the property of general councils, either solely or conjointly with the pope. See Smith's Errors of the Church of Rome detected; and a list of writers under article POPERY.—Hend. Buck.

INFANT BAPTISM. (See BAPTISM.)

INFANT COMMUNION; the admission of infants to the ordinance of the Lord's supper. It has been debated by some, whether or not infants should be admitted to this ordinance. One of the greatest advocates for this practice was Mr. Pierce. He pleads the use of it even unto this day among the Greeks, and in the Bohemian churches till near the time of the Reformation; but especially from the custom of the ancient churches, as it appears from many passages in Photius, Augustin, and Cyprian. But Dr. Doddridge observes, that Mr. Pierce's proof from the more ancient fathers is very defective. His arguments from Scripture chiefly depend upon this general medium; that Christians succeeding to the Jews as God's people, and being grafted upon that stock, their infants have a right to all the privileges of which they are capable, till forfeited by some immoralities; and consequently have a right to partake of this ordinance, as the Jewish children had to eat of the passover, and other sacrifices: besides this, he pleads those texts which speak of the Lord's supper as received by all Christians.

The most obvious answer to all this, is that which is taken from the incapacity of infants to examine themselves, and discern the Lord's body; but he answers that this precept is only given to persons capable of understanding and complying with it, as those which require faith in order to baptism are interpreted by the Pædo-baptists. As for his argument from the Jewish children eating the sacrifice, it is to be considered that this was not required as circumcision was; the males were not necessarily brought to the temple till they were twelve years old, (Luke 2: 42.) and the sacrifices they ate of were chiefly peace-offerings, which became the common food to all that were clean in the family, and were not looked upon as acts of devotion to such a degree as our eucharist is: though, indeed, they were a token of their acknowledging the divinity of that God to whom they had been offered; (1 Cor. 10: 18.) and even the passover was a commemoration of a temporal deliverance; nor is there any reason to believe that its reference to the Messiah was generally understood by the Jews.

On the whole, it is certain there would be more danger of a contempt arising to the Lord's supper from the admission of infants, and of confusion and trouble to other communicants; so that not being required in Scripture, it is much the best to omit it. When children are grown up to a capacity of behaving decently, they may soon be instructed in the nature and design of the ordinance; and if they appear to understand it, and behave for some competent time of trial in a manner suitable to that profession, it would probably be advisable to admit them to communion, though very young; which, by the way, might be a good security against many of the snares to which youth are exposed. Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 207; Pierre's Essay on the Eucharist, p. 76, &c.; Witsius on Cov. b. 4. c. 17. § 30, 32; *J. INFANTS, SALVATION OF. "Various opinions," says an acute writer, "concerning the future state of infants have been adopted. Some think, all dying in infancy are annihilated; for, say they, infants, being incapable of moral good or evil, are not proper objects of reward or punishment. Others think that they share a fate similar to adults; a part saved and a part perish. Others affirm all are saved because all are immortal, and all are innocent. Others, perplexed with these divers sentiments, think best to leave the subject untouched;—cold comfort to parents who bury their families in infancy! The most probable opinion seems to be that they are all saved, through the merits of the Mediator, with an everlasting salvation. This has nothing in it contrary to the perfections of God, or to any declaration of the Holy Scriptures; and it is highly agreeable to all those passages which affirm where sin hath abounded, grace hath much more abounded. On these principles, the death of Christ saves more than the fall of Adam lost." INFIDELS, or unbelievers in divine revelation, and consequently in Christianity, may be divided into two great classes—Atheists and Deists, which see.

INFIDELITY; absolute want of faith in God, or the disbelief of the truths of revelation, and the great principles of religion. If we inquire into the source of infidelity, we shall find it is not in ordinary cases the result of sober inquiry, close investigation, or full conviction; but it is rather, as one observes, "the slow production of a careless and irreligious life, operating together with prejudices and erroneous conceptions concerning the nature of the leading doctrines of Christianity. It may, therefore, be laid down as an axiom, that 'infidelity is, in general, a disease of the heart more than of the understanding;' for we always find that infidelity increases in proportion as the general morals decline."

As to its progress, it has ever been from bad to worse. Lord Herbert did not, indeed, so much impugn the doctrine or the morality of the Scriptures, as to attempt to supersede their necessity, by endeavoring to show that the great principles of the unity of God, a moral government, and a future world, are taught with sufficient clearness by the light of nature. Bolingbroke, and others of his successors, advanced much farther, and attempted to invalidate the proofs of the moral character of the Deity, and consequently all expectation of rewards and punishments, leaving the Supreme Being no other perfections than those which belong to a first cause, or Almighty contriver. After him, at a considerable distance, followed Hume, the most subtle of all, who boldly aimed to introduce an universal scepticism, and to pour a more than Egyptian darkness into the whole region of morals. Since his time, meaner writers have sprung up in abundance, and infidelity has allured multitudes to its standard; the young and superficial, by its dexterous sophistry; the vain, by the literary fame of a few of its champions; and the profligate, by the licentiousness of its principles.

If we consider the nature and effects of infidelity, we shall find that it subverts the whole foundation of morals; it tends directly to the destruction of a taste for moral excellence, and promotes the growth of those vices which are the most hostile to social happiness, especially vanity, ferocity, and unbridled sensuality. Facts have recently come to light in this country, illustrating its connexion with licentiousness, of a most astounding character. Still it is destined to be banished from the earth. Its inconsistency with reason; its incongruity with the nature of man; its cloudy and obscure prospects; its unsatisfying nature; its opposition to the dictates of conscience; its pernicious tendency to efface every just principle from the breast of man, and to lead the way to every species of vice and immorality, show that it cannot flourish, but must finally fall. See Hall's admirable Ser. on Modern Infidelity; Fuller's Gospel of Christ its own Witness; Bishop Watson's Apology for the Bible; Wilberforce's Practical View, § 3. ch. 7; Ep. Horne's Letters on Infidelity; M'Ilvaine's Lectures; Christian Watchman, 1833-4. and books under articles ATHEISTS and DEISTS.—Head. Buck.

INFIRMITY, applied to the mind, denotes frailty, weakness. It has been a question what may properly be denominated sins of infirmity.

1. Nothig, it is said, can be excused under that name which at the time of its commission is known to be a sin.—2. Nothing can be called a sin of infirmity which is contrary to the express letter of any of the commandments.—3. Nothing will admit of a just and sufficient excuse upon the account of infirmity, which a man beforehand considers and deliberates with himself, whether it be a sin or not. A sin of infirmity is, 1. Such a failing as proceeds from excusable ignorance.—2. Or unavoidable surprise.—3. Or want of courage and strength, Rom. 15: 1.

By infirmity also we understand the corruptions that are still left in the heart, (notwithstanding a person may be sanctified in part,) and which sometimes break out. These may be permitted to humble us; to animate our vi-science; perhaps that newly-convinced sinners might not be discouraged by a sight of such perfection they might despair of ever attaining to; to keep us prayerful and dependent; to prevent those honors which some would be ready to give to human nature rather than to God; and, lastly, to excite in us a continual desire for heaven. Let us be cautious and watchful, however, against sin in all its forms: for it argues a deplorable state of mind when men love to practise sin, and then lay it upon constitution, the infirmity of nature, the decree of God, the influence of Satan, and thus attempt to excuse themselves by saying they could not avoid it. Clarke's Serms., ser. 12. vol. ix.; Maclaurin and Massillon's Sermon.—Hend. Buck.

INFINITE; without bounds or limits. Many have objected to the common opinion that sin is an infinite evil, but without sufficient grounds, since every sin is committed against a God of infinite excellence, in violation of infinite obligations, and in its natural results leads to the perpetuation of innumerable, inconceivable, and interminable miseries. Objectors usually confound the finite act with the infinite evil—the metaphysical or physical quantity, with the moral quality; which is an absurdity founded on a double sophism.—Hend. Buck.

INFINITY OF GOD. Infinity is taken in two senses entirely different, i. e. in a positive and a negative one. Positive infinity is a quality being perfect in itself, or capable of receiving no addition. Negative is the quality of being boundless, unlimited, or endless. That God is infinite is evident; for, as Doddridge observes, 1. If he be limited, it must either be by himself, or by another; but no wise being would abridge himself, and there could be no other being to limit God.—2. Infinity follows from self-existence; for a necessity that is not universal must depend on some external cause, which a self-existent Being does not.—3. Creation is so great an act of power, that we can imagine nothing impossible to that Being who has performed it, but must therefore ascribe to him infinite power.—4. It is more honorable to the Divine Being to conceive of him as infinite than finite.—5. The Scriptures represent all his attributes as infinite. His understanding is infinite, Psal. 147: 5. His knowledge and wisdom, Rom. 11: 33. His power, Rom. 1: 20. Heb. 11: 3. His goodness, Psal. 16: 2. His purity, holiness, and justice, Job 4: 17, 18. Isa. 6: 2, 3.—6. His omnipotence and eternity prove his infinity; for were he not infinite, he would be bounded by space and by time, which he is not.—Doddridge's Lect., lect. 49; Watts' Ontology, ch. 17; Locke on Underst., vol. i. ch. 17; Howe's Works, vol. i. pp. 63, 64, 67; Saurin's Sermons.—Hend. Buck.

INFLUENCE, DIVINE; a term made use of to denote the operations of the Divine Being upon the mind. This doctrine of divine influence has been much called in question of late; but we may ask, 1. What doctrine can be more reasonable? “The operations which the power of God carries on in the natural world are no less mysterious than those which the Spirit performs in the moral world. If men, by their counsels and suggestions, can influence the minds of one another, must not divine suggestion produce a much greater effect? Surely the Father of Spirits, by a thousand ways, has access to the spirits he has made, so as to give them what determination, or impart to them what assistance he thinks proper, without injuring their frame or disturbing their rational powers.”

We may observe, 2. Nothing can be more scriptural. Eminent men from the patriarchal age down to St. John, the latest writer, believed in this doctrine, and ascribed their religious feelings to this source. Our Lord strongly and repeatedly inculcated this truth; and that he did not mean miraculous, but moral influences of the Spirit, is evident, John 3: 3. Matt. 7: 22, 23. John 6: 44, 46; see also John 12: 32, 40. Rom. 8: 9. 1 Cor. 2: 14. And we may add, 3. Nothing can be more necessary, if we consider the natural depravity of the heart, and the insufficiency of all human means to render ourselves either holy or happy without a supernatural power. INGATHERING, (THE FEAST OF,) after all the fruits of fields and vineyards were gathered in, was the same with the feast of tabernacles, Exod. 23: 16.—Brown.

INGHAM, (BENJAMIN, ESQ.) was born at Ossett, York, June 11, 1712. He received a liberal education, first at Batley school, and afterwards at Queen's college, Oxford, where, in 1733, he became acquainted with Messrs. Charles and John Wesley, the founders of Methodism, and, for a time, was somewhat attached to them, partly from witnessing their exemplary moral conduct and zeal to do good, and partly from a spirit of sympathy which he felt towards them, on hearing them ridiculed and reproached for what, he thought, merited commendation. Mr. Ingham, in 1735, received episcopal ordination. He received a pressing invitation from Mr. John Wesley to accompany him across the Atlantic, which he accepted, and they embarked for Georgia, in October, 1735. He remained in Georgia about two years, visited Carolina and Pennsylvania, and then returned to England, where, on his arrival, he began to preach, in the established church, the doctrines of the gospel, according to the best light he then had into them. Numbers flocked to hear him; the clergy became jealous, and took the alarm, and in about two years, he found himself entirely excluded from their pulpits, which drove him into the fields, where he often had large congregations.

When the schism took place between Messrs. Whitfield and Wesley, Mr. Ingham stood aloof from both, and was inclined rather to unite with the Moravians, who about this period began to form their establishment at Fulneck, near Leeds.

In 1741, Mr. Ingham married lady Margaret Hastings, sister to the earl of Huntingdon; on which he removed his residence from Ossett to Aberford, where he continued to reside till his death. After forming this connexion, he was so far from relaxing in his exertions to preach the gospel, that he greatly extended the sphere of his operations, and, in process of time, may be said to have evangelized all the surrounding country. Ministers rose up to co-operate with him; many societies were collected; and, though amidst much opposition from the high church party, the cause went forward, and “the little one became a thousand.” About the year 1760, Mr. Ingham, having perused Mr. Glas' Testimony of the King of Martyrs, and obtained much information from it, concerning the nature of Christ's kingdom, the order of gospel churches, and its peculiar laws, precepts, and institutions, together with his friends resolved on constituting their churches on the same model. Two years afterwards, he published his “Treatise on the Faith and Hope of the Gospel,” in which these important subjects are discussed with much simplicity and regard to the New Testament. Mr. Ingham died in the year 1772. The churches formerly in connexion with Mr. Ingham, and commonly known by the appellation of Inghamites, have lately united with the second class of Scotch Independents, known by the name of Daleites, after the late Mr. David Dale, of Glasgow, who was an elder among them. Mr. Ingham's character and conduct were highly exemplary, and in all respects becoming the gospel of Christ; and at his death he left behind him “a good name,” which is better than precious ointment. See New Evang. Mag. 1819; Jones' Chris. Biog.—Hend. Buck.

INGHAMITES. (See the preceding Article.)

INGLIS, (HENRY DAVID, ESQ.) was born 1757, probably in the city of Edinburgh. Young Inglis, having received the rudiments of education, and discovering unusual quickness of parts, was destined by his father for the bar; but at the age of seventeen, his mind became awakened to the concerns of eternity, in consequence of a sermon which he heard, preached by his honored relative, Dr. John Erskine; and, after a time, he resolved upon exchanging the profession of the law for the ministry of the gospel of peace, having his views at that moment directed, probably by Dr. Erskine, to a station in the church of Scotland. His design, however, in this respect, was frustrated, in consequence of the light which, in a little time, poured into his mind, respecting the nature of Christ's kingdom, as not of this world; and, in 1777, he was baptized by the late Mr. N'Lean, and added to the church under his pastoral care. In the year 1784, he became one of its elders or pastors, in conjunction with Messrs. M'Lean and Bradwood, and a first-rate preacher of the gospel. His labors in this respect were not confined to the church under his charge: but he went out "into the highways and hedges," explored the streets and lanes of the city; and wherever the Lord opened a door for him, he was ready to testify the gospel of the grace of God, and show unto perishing sinners the way of salvation. And in this way his labors were crowned with wonderful success; many, by his means, were made acquainted with the saving truth; the church greatly increased, and he had the satisfaction of seeing numerous seals to his ministry.

From the time that Mr. Inglis abandoned all thoughts of being a clergyman of the establishment, he resumed the study and practice of the law; and, in the year 1794, he was admitted advocate, and took his seat at the bar, where he continued to plead as a barrister for ten or twelve years, with considerable repute: his powers of elocution, combined with a clear understanding, and the most inflexible integrity, procured him considerable business. But, about the close of the year 1805, his health began visibly to decline; and on the twelfth of May, 1806, he was removed from the scene of his labors and sufferings, at the age of forty-nine, to the great grief of the church, and a large circle of friends, to whom he was much endeared by his amiable deportment, his unostentatious manners, and by his learning, piety, and zeal for the cause of the Redeemer. His friends published, in 1812, an octavo volume, entitled "Letters, Sermons, and Tracts, on various important Subjects, by the late Henry David Inglis, Esq., to which is prefixed an Account of the Author."—Jones' Chris. Biog.

INGRATITUDE; the vice of being insensible to favors received, without any endeavor to acknowledge and repay them. It is sometimes applied to the act of returning evil for good. Ingratitude, it is said, is no passion: for the God of nature has appointed no motion of the spirits whereby it might be excited; it is, therefore, a mere vice, arising from pride, stupidity, or narrowness of soul.—Hend. Buck.

INHERITANCE; a portion which appertains to another, after some particular event. As the principles of inheritance differ in the East, from those which are established among ourselves, it is necessary to notice them particularly. The reader will observe, that there is no need of the death of the parent in these countries, as there is among us, before the children possessed their inheritance. (See HEIR.)

Among the Hindoos, the rights of inheritance are laid down with great precision, and with the strictest attention to the natural claim of the inheritor in the several degrees of affinity. A man is considered but as tenant for life in his own property; and, as all opportunity of distributing his effects by will, after his death, is precluded, hardly any mention is made of such kind of bequest. By these ordinances also, he is hindered from dispossessing his children of his property in favor of aliens, and from making a blind and partial allotment in behalf of a favorite child, to the prejudice of the rest; by which the weakness of parental affection, or of a misguided mind in its dotage, is admirably remedied. These laws strongly elucidate the story of the prodigal son in the Scriptures, since it appears from hence to have been an immemorial custom in the East for sons to demand their portion of inheritance during their father's lifetime, and that the parent, however aware of the dissipated inclinations of his child, could not legally refuse to comply with the application.—Calmet.

INIQUITY. This word means not only sin, but by a metonymy, the punishment of sin, and the expiation of it: "Aaron will bear the iniquities of the people;" he will atone for them, Exod. 28: 38. The Lord "visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children;" (Exod. 20: 5.) he sometimes causes visible effects of his wrath to fall on the children of criminal parents.

"To bear iniquity," is to endure the punishment of it, to be obliged to expiate it. The priests bear the iniquity of the people; that is, they are charged with the expiation of it, Exod. 28: 38. Lev. 10: 17.—Calmet.

INJURY; a violation of the rights of another. Some, says Grove, distinguish between injustitia and injuria. Injustice is opposed to justice in general, whether negative or positive; an injury, to negative justice alone. (See JUSTICE.) An injury is, wilfully doing to another what ought not to be done. This is injustice, too, but not the whole idea of it; for it is injustice, also, to refuse or neglect doing what ought to be done. An injury must be wilfully committed; whereas it is enough to make a thing unjust, that it happens through a culpable negligence.

1. We may injure a person in his soul, by misleading his judgment; by corrupting the imagination; perverting the will, and wounding the soul with grief. Persecutors who succeed in their compulsive measures, though they cannot alter the real sentiments by external violence, yet sometimes injure the soul by making the man a hypocrite.

2. We may injure another in his body, by homicide, murder, preventing life, dismembering the body; by wounds, blows, slavery, and imprisonment, or any unjust restraint upon its liberty: by robbing it of its chastity, or prejudicing its health.

3. We may injure another in his name and character, by our own false and rash judgments of him; by false witness; by charging a man to his face with a crime which either we ourselves have forged, or which we know to have been forged by some other person; by detraction or backbiting; by reproach, or exposing another for some natural imbecility either in body or mind; or for some calamity into which he is fallen, or some miscarriage of which he has been guilty; by innuendoes, or indirect accusations that are not true. Now if we consider the value of character, the resentment which the injurious person has of such treatment when it comes to his own turn to suffer it, the consequence of a man's losing his good name, and finally, the difficulty of making reparation, we must at once see the injustice of lessening another's good character. There are these two considerations which should sometimes restrain us from speaking the whole truth of our neighbor, when it is to his disadvantage:—(1.) That he may possibly live to see his folly, and repent and grow better.—(2.) Admitting that we speak the truth, yet it is a thousand to one but, when it is handed about for some time, it will contract a deal of falsehood.

4. We may injure a person in his relations and dependencies. In his servants, by corrupting them; in his children, by drawing them into evil courses; in his wife, by sowing strife, or attempting to alienate her affections.

5. We may be guilty of injuring another in his worldly goods or possessions. (1.) By doing him a mischief, without any advantage to ourselves, through envy and malice.—(2.) By taking what is another's, which is theft. See Grove's Mor. Phil. ch. 8. p. 2; Watts' Sermons, vol. ii. ser. 33; Tillotson's Sermons, ser. 42.—Hend. Buck.

INJURIES, (FORGIVENESS OF.) (See FORGIVENESS.)

INJUSTICE. (See INJURY.)

INK. The ink of the ancients was not so fluid as ours. Demosthenes reproaches Æschines with laboring in the grinding of ink, as painters do in the grinding of their colors. The substance also found in an ink-stand at Herculaneum, looks like a thick oil or paint, with which the manuscripts there have been written in a relievio visible in the letters, when you hold a leaf to the light in a horizontal direction. Such vitriolic ink as has been used on the old parchment manuscripts would have corroded the delicate leaves of the papyrus, as it has done the skins of the most ancient manuscripts of Virgil and Terence, in the Vatican library; the letters are sunk into the parchment, and some have eaten quite through it, in consequence of the corrosive acid of the vitriolic ink, with which they were written.—Watson.

INKHORN. The modern inhabitants of Egypt appear to make use of ink in their sealing, as well as the Arabs of the desert, who may be supposed not to have such conveniences as those that live in such a place as Egypt; for Dr. Pococke says, that "they make the impression of their name with their seal, generally of corneelian, which they wear on their finger, and which is blacked when they have occasion to seal with it." This may serve to show us, that there is a closer connexion between the vision of John, (Rev. 7: 2.) and that of Ezekiel, (chap. 9: 2.) than commentators appear to have apprehended. They must be joined, we imagine, to have a complete view of either. John saw an angel with the seal of the living God, and therewith multitudes were sealed in their foreheads; but, to understand what sort of mark was made there, you must have recourse to the inkhorn of Ezekiel. On the other hand, Ezekiel saw a person with an inkhorn, who was to mark the servants of God on their foreheads, that is, with ink; but how the ink was to be applied is not expressed; nor was there any need that it should be, if in those times ink was applied with a seal; a seal being in the one case plainly supposed; as in the Apocalypse, the mention of a seal made it needless to take any notice of any inkhorn by his side. (See GIRDLE.)—Calmet.

INN. The inns or caravansaries of the East, in which travellers are accommodated, are not all alike, some being simply places of rest, by the side of a fountain, if possible, and at a proper distance on the road. Many of these places are nothing more than naked walls; others have an attendant, who subsists either by some charitable donation, or the benevolence of passengers; others are more considerable establishments, where families reside, and take care of them, and furnish the necessary provisions. "Caravansaries," says Campbell, "were originally intended for, and are now pretty generally applied to, the accommodation of strangers and travellers, though, like every good institution, sometimes perverted to the purposes of private emolument, or public job. They are built at proper distances through the roads of the Turkish dominions, and afford to the indigent or weary traveller an asylum from the inclemency of the weather; are in general built of the most solid and durable materials, have commonly one story above the ground floor, the lower of which is arched, and serves for warehouses to store goods, for lodgings, and for stables, while the upper is used merely for lodgings; besides which they are always accommodated with a fountain, and have cooks' shops and other conveniences to supply the wants of lodgers. In Aleppo, the caravansaries are almost exclusively occupied by merchants, to whom they are, like other houses, rented." The Orientals, says Volney, "contrive their equipage in the most simple and portable form. The baggage of a man who wishes to be completely provided, consists in a carpet, a mattress, a blanket, two sauce-pans with lids contained within each other, two dishes, two plates, and a coffee-pot, all of copper, well tinned; a small wooden box for salt and pepper, a round leathern table, which he suspends from the saddle of his horse, small leathern bottles or bags for oil, melted butter, water and brandy; if the traveller be a Christian, a tinder-box, a cup of cocoa-nut, some rice, dried raisins, dates, Cyprus cheese, and, above all, coffee-berries, with a roaster and wooden mortar to pound them." The Scriptures use two words to express a caravansary, in both instances translated inn: katalumati, (Luke 2: 7.) "the place of untying," that is, of beasts for rest: pasodochion, (Luke 10: 34.) "a receptacle open to all comers."—Calmet; Watson.

INNOCENT; INNOCENCE. The signification of these words is well known. The Hebrews considered innocence as consisting chiefly in an exemption from external faults committed contrary to the law; hence they often join innocent with hands, Gen. 37: 22. Ps. 24: 4. 26: 6. "I will wash my hands in innocency." And, (Ps. 73: 13.) "Then have I cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency." Josephus admits of no other sins than those actions which are put in execution. Sins in thought, in his account, are not punished by God. To be innocent, is used sometimes for being exempt from punishment. "I will not treat you as one innocent;" (Jer. 46: 28.) literally, I will not make thee innocent.—Calmet.

INQUISITION; in the church of Rome, a tribunal, in several Roman Catholic countries, erected by the popes for the examination and punishment of heretics. Its first objects and victims were more especially the Waldenses. This court was founded in the twelfth century, under the patronage of pope Innocent, who issued out orders to excite the Catholic princes and people to extirpate heretics, to search into their number and quality, and to transmit a faithful account thereof to Rome. Hence they were called inquisitors, and gave birth to this formidable tribunal, called the inquisition. That nothing might be wanting to render this spiritual court formidable and tremendous, the Roman pontiffs persuaded the European princes, and more especially the emperor Frederick II. and Louis IX., king of France, not only to enact the most barbarous laws against heretics, and to commit to the flames, by the ministry of public justice, those who were pronounced such by the inquisitors, but also to maintain the inquisitors in their office, and grant them their protection in the most open and solemn manner. The edicts to this purpose issued out by Frederick II. are well known; edicts sufficient to have excited the greatest horror, and which rendered the most illustrious piety and virtue incapable of saving from the most cruel death such as had the misfortune to be disagreeable to the inquisitors. These abominable laws were not, however, sufficient to restrain the just indignation of the people against those inhuman judges, whose barbarity was accompanied with superstition and arrogance, with a spirit of suspicion and perfidy, nay, even with temerity and imprudence. Accordingly, they were insulted by the multitude in many places, were driven in an ignominious manner out of some cities, and were put to death in others: and Conrad, of Marburg, the first German inquisitor who derived his commission from Gregory IX., was one of the many victims that were sacrificed on this occasion to the vengeance of the public, which his incredible barbarities had raised to a dreadful degree of vehemence and fury.

This diabolical tribunal takes cognizance of heresy, Judaism, Mahometanism, sodomy, and polygamy; and the people stand in so much fear of it, that parents deliver up their children, husbands their wives, and masters their servants, to its officers, without daring in the least to murmur. The prisoners are kept for a long time, till they themselves turn their own accusers, and declare the cause of their imprisonment, for which they are neither told their crime, nor confronted with witnesses. As soon as they are imprisoned, their friends go into mourning, and speak of them as dead, not daring to solicit their pardon, lest they should be brought in as accomplices. When there is no shadow of proof against the pretended criminal, he is discharged, after suffering the most cruel tortures, a tedious and dreadful imprisonment, and the loss of the greatest part of his effects. The sentence against prisoners is pronounced publicly, and with extraordinary solemnity. In Portugal they erect a theatre capable of holding three thousand persons, in which they place a rich altar, and raise seats on each side, in the form of an amphitheatre. There the prisoners are placed, and over against them is a high chair, whither they are called one by one to hear their doom from one of the inquisitors. These unhappy persons know what they are to suffer by the clothes they wear that day: those who appear in their own clothes are discharged on paying a fine; those who have a santo benito, or strait yellow coat without sleeves, charged with St. Andrew's cross, have their lives, but forfeit all their effects; those who have the resemblance of flames made of red serge sewed upon their santo benito, without any cross, are pardoned, but threatened to be burnt if ever they relapse; but those who, besides those flames, have on their santo benito their own picture surrounded with devils, are condemned to expire in the flames. We have here given a representation of the procession of inquisitors and the condemned. For the conclusion of this horrid scene, see ACT OF FAITH.

The Inquisition was put down by Napoleon in 1808; though restored at Rome over the clergy by Pius VII. In 1826, it condemned to death Casehir, a pupil of the Propaganda, who was appointed patriarch of Memphis, but not accepted by the viceroy of Egypt. His crime is unknown; but the pope commuted his punishment into imprisonment for life. Works on the Inquisition have been published by Baker, Limborch, Geddes, Lavalle, Llorente, and Puigblanch. The Records of the Inquisition, from the original manuscripts taken from the inquisitorial palace at Barcelona, when it was stormed in 1819, were published at Boston, (Mass.) in 1828. In Spain alone near half a million have suffered as its victims.—Hend. Euck.

INSPIRATION; divine dictation; the communication by the Holy Spirit of certain supernatural ideas and emotions to the human soul; or any supernatural influence of God upon the mind of a rational creature, whereby he is raised to a degree of information or excellence, to which he could not, or would not, in fact, have attained in his present circumstances in a natural way. By the Inspiration of the Scriptures we are to understand, that the sacred writers composed their works under so plenary and immediate an influence of the Holy Spirit, that God may be said to speak by those writers to men, and not merely that they spoke to men in the name of God, and by his authority. There is a considerable difference between the two propositions. Each supposes an authentic revelation from God; but the former secures the Scriptures from all error, both as to the subjects spoken, and the manner of expressing them. This too is the doctrine taught in the Scriptures themselves, Heb. 1: 1. 4: 12, 13. Acts 4: 24—28. 28: 25.

It is generally allowed that the Scriptures were written by divine inspiration. That they claim this, in every variety of form, implied and express, is certain. See for example, 2 Tim. 3: 16, 17. John 10: 35. 5: 39, 46. Rom. 3: 1, 2. 2 Sam. 23: 2. Acts 1: 16. 3: 21. 26: 22. Ps. 119: 111. Luke 16: 29—31. 1 Pet. 1: 10—12. Acts 11: 14. Rom. 3: 4. Prov. 30: 5, 6. Rev. 22: 18, 19. John 17: 17. Rom. 2: 12. John 12: 47, 48. 1 Cor. 4: 3, 4. Luke 10: 10—16. 12: 47, 48. Phil. 3: 16. 1 Joh. 4: 1—6. Isa. 8: 20. Acts 17: 10, 11. Gal. 1: 11, 12. Eph. 3: 3—5. 1 Cor. 2: 10—16. 1 Thes. 2: 13. 4: 8. 5: 27. The celestial ideas in them; the spirituality and elevation of their design; the majesty and simplicity of their style; the candor, disinterestedness, and uprightness of the penmen; the harmonious agreement of their various parts; their wonderful efficacy on the consciences and character of mankind; their astonishing preservation; the multitude of miracles wrought in confirmation of the doctrines they contain, and the exact fulfilment of all their predictions up to this hour, sufficiently prove this.

The inspiration of the Old Testament Scriptures is so expressly attested by our Lord and his apostles, that among those who receive their authority the only question relates to the inspiration of the New Testament. It is true we do not find the claim to inspiration formally advanced in the Four Gospels. This omission has sometimes been stated by those superficial critics, whose prejudices serve to account for their haste, as an objection against the existence of inspiration. But if we attend to the reason of the omission, we shall perceive that it is only an instance of that delicate propriety which pervades all the New Testament. The gospels are the records of the great facts which vouch the truth of Christianity. These facts are to be received upon the testimony of men who had been eye-witnesses of them. The foundation of Christian faith being laid in an assent to these facts, it would have been preposterous to have introduced in support of them that influence of the Spirit which preserved the minds of the apostles from error. For there can be no proof of the inspiration of the apostles unless the truth of the facts be previously admitted. The apostles therefore bring forward the evidence of Christianity in its natural order, when they speak in the gospels as the companions and eye-witnesses of Jesus, claiming that credit which is due to honest men who had the best opportunities of knowing what they declared. But after the respect which their character and conduct procured to their testimony, and the visible confirmation which it received from heaven by miracles, &c. had established the truth of the facts they testified, no room was left to doubt of their inspiration. Without it they were indeed credible witnesses of facts, but without it they were not qualified to execute the higher office of apostles, Luke 24: 49. And therefore whenever the circumstances of the church required the execution of that office, we find the claim which had been conveyed to them by the promise of their Master, (John 14—17. Acts 1—2.) and which is implied in the apostolical character, asserted in their history and writings. They uniformly demanded from all who had received the faith of Christ, submission to the doctrines and commandments of his apostles, as the inspired messengers of heaven, 1 John 4: 6. 1 Cor. 14: 37. 1 Thess. 4: 8.

It has been disputed, however, whether this inspiration is, in the most absolute sense, plenary or entire. As this is a subject of importance, and ought to be carefully studied by every Christian, in order that he may render a reason of the hope that is in him, we shall here subjoin the remarks of an able writer, who, though he may differ from some others, as to the terms made use of, yet we are persuaded his arguments will be found weighty and powerful. They express also the latest and best views.

“There are many things in the Scriptures, which the writers might have known, and probably did know, by ordinary means. As persons possessed of memory, judgment, and other intellectual faculties which are common to men, they were able to relate certain events in which they had been personally concerned, and to make such occasional reflections as were suggested by particular subjects and occurrences. In these cases no supernatural influence was necessary to invigorate their minds; it was only necessary that they should be infallibly preserved from error. It is with respect to such passages of Scripture alone, as did not exceed the natural ability of the writers to compose, that I would admit the notion of superintendence, if it should be admitted at all. Perhaps this word, though of established use and almost undisputed authority, should be entirely laid aside, as insufficient to express even the lowest degree of inspiration. In the passages of Scripture which we are now considering, I conceive the writers to have been not merely superintended, that they might commit no error, but likewise to have been moved or excited by the Holy Ghost to record particular events, and set down particular observations. The passages written in consequence of the direction and under the care of the Divine Spirit, may be said, in an inferior sense, to be inspired; whereas if the men had written them at the suggestion of their own spirit, they would not have possessed any more authority, though they had been free from error, than those parts of profane writings which are agreeable to truth.

2. “There are other parts of the Scriptures in which the faculties of the writers were supernaturally invigorated and elevated. It is impossible for us, and perhaps it was not possible for the inspired person himself, to actermine where nature ended, and inspiration began. It is enough to know, that there are many parts of Scripture in which, though the unassisted mind might have proceeded some steps, a divine impulse was necessary to enable it to advance. I think, for example, that the evangelists could not have written the history of Christ if they had not enjoyed miraculous aid. Two of them, Matthew and John, accompanied our Savior during the space of three years and a half. At the close of this period, or rather several years after it, when they wrote their gospels, we may be certain that they had forgotten many of his discourses and miracles; that they recollected others indistinctly; and that they would have been in danger of producing an inaccurate and unfair account, by confounding one thing with another. Besides, from so large a mass of particulars, men of uncultivated minds, who were not in the habit of distinguishing and classifying, could not have made a proper selection; nor would persons unskilled in the art of composition have been able to express themselves in such terms as should insure a faithful representation of doctrines and facts, and with such dignity as the nature of the subject required. A divine influence, therefore, must have been exerted on their minds, by which their memories and judgments were strengthened, and they were enabled to relate the doctrines and miracles of their Master, in a manner the best fitted to impress the readers of their histories. The promise of the Holy Ghost to bring to their remembrance all things whatsoever Christ had said to them, proves that, in writing their histories, their mental powers were endowed, by his agency, with more than usual vigor, John 14: 16—26. 16: 12—15.

“Further, it must be allowed that in several passages of Scripture there is found such elevation of thought and of style, as clearly shows that the powers of the writers were raised above their ordinary pitch. If a person of moderate talents should give as elevated a description of the majesty and attributes of God, or reason as profoundly on the mysterious doctrines of religion, as a man of the most exalted genius and extensive learning, we could not fail to be convinced that he was supernaturally assisted; and the conviction would be still stronger, if his composition should far transcend the highest efforts of the human mind. Some of the sacred writers were taken from the lowest ranks of life; and yet sentiments so dignified, and representations of divine things so grand and majestic, occur in their writings, that the noblest flights of human genius, when compared with them, appear cold and insipid.

3. “It is manifest, with respect to many passages of Scripture, that the subjects of which they treat must have been directly revealed to the writers. They could not have been known by any natural means, nor was the knowledge of them attainable by a simple elevation of the faculties. With the faculties of an angel we could not discover the purposes of the divine mind. This degree of inspiration we attribute to those who were empowered to reveal heavenly mysteries, ‘which eye had not seen, and ear had not heard;’ to those who were sent with particular messages from God to his people, and to those who were employed to predict future events. The plan of redemption being an effect of the sovereign counsels of heaven, it could not have been known but by a communication from the Father of Lights, 1 Cor. 2: 6—16.

“This kind of inspiration has been called the inspiration of suggestion. It is needless to dispute about a word; but suggestion seeming to express an operation on the mind, by which ideas are excited in it, is of too limited signification to denote the various modes in which the prophets and apostles were made acquainted with supernatural truths. God revealed himself to them not only by suggestion, but by dreams, visions, voices, and the ministry of angels. This degree of inspiration, in strict propriety of speech, should be called revelation; a word preferable to suggestion, because it is expressive of all the ways in which God communicated new ideas to the minds of his servants. It is a word, too, chosen by the Holy Ghost himself, to signify the discovery of truths formerly unknown to the apostles. The last book of the New Testament, which is a collection of prophecies, is called the Revelation of Jesus Christ. Paul says, that he received the gospel by revelation; that ‘by revelation the mystery was made known to him, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it was then revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit;’ and, in another place, having observed that ‘eye had not seen, nor ear heard, neither had entered into the heart of man the things which God had prepared for them that love him,’ he adds, ‘But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit,’ Rev. 1: 1. Gal. 1: 12. Eph. 3: 5. 1 Cor. 2: 9, 10.

“I have not names to designate the other two kinds of inspiration. The names used by Doddridge, and others, superintendence, elevation, and suggestion, do not convey the ideas stated in the three preceding particulars, and are liable to other objections, besides those which have been mentioned. This account of the inspiration of the Scriptures has, I think, these two recommendations: that there is no part of Scripture which does not fall under one or other of the foregoing heads; and that the different degrees of the agency of the Divine Spirit on the minds of the different writers are carefully discriminated.”

Some men have adopted very strange and dangerous notions respecting the inspiration of the Scriptures. Dr. Priestley denies that they were written by a particular divine inspiration; and asserts that the writers, though men of the greatest probity, were fallible, and have actually committed mistakes in their narrations and their reasonings. But Dr. Priestley and his followers find it necessary to weaken and set aside the authority of the Scriptures, as they have adopted a system of religion from which all the distinguishing doctrines of revelation are excluded. Others consider the Scriptures as inspired in those places where they profess to deliver the word of God; but in other places, especially in the historical parts, they ascribe to them only the same authority which is due to the writings of well-informed and upright men. But as this distinction is perfectly arbitrary, having no foundation in any thing said by the sacred writers themselves, so it is liable to very material objections. It represents our Lord and his apostles, when they speak of the Old Testament, as having attested, without any exception or limitation, a number of books as divinely inspired, while some of them were partly, and some were almost entirely, human compositions: it supposes the writers of both Testaments to have profanely mixed their own productions with the dictates of the Spirit, and to have passed the unallowed compound on the world as genuine. In fact, by denying that they were constantly under infallible guidance, it leaves us utterly at a loss to know when we should or should not believe them. If they could blend their own stories with the revelations made to them, how can I be certain that they have not, on some occasions, published, in the name of God, sentiments of their own, to which they were desirous to gain credit and authority? Who will assure me of their perfect fidelity in drawing a line of distinction between the divine and the human parts of their writings? The denial of the plenary inspiration of the Scripture tends to unsettle the foundations of our faith, involves us in doubt and perplexity, and leaves us no other method of ascertaining how much we should believe, but by an appeal to reason. But when reason is invested with the authority of a judge, not only is revelation dishonored, and its Author insulted, but the end for which it was given is completely defeated.

A question of very great importance demands our attention, while we are endeavoring to settle, with precision, the notion of the inspiration of the Scriptures: it relates to the words in which the sacred writers have expressed their ideas. Some think, that in the choice of words they were left to their own discretion, and that the language is human, though the matter be divine; while others believe, that in their expressions, as well as in their sentiments, they were under the infallible direction of the Spirit. The last opinion has been supported by the following reasoning:—

“Every man, who hath attended to the operations of his own mind, knows that we think in words, or that, when we form a train or combination of ideas, we clothe them with words; and that the ideas which are not thus clothed, are indistinct and confused. Let a man try to think upon any subject, moral or religious, without the aid of lan guage, and we will either experience a total cessation of thought, or, as this seems impossible, at least while we are awake, he will feel himself constrained, notwithstanding his utmost endeavors, to have recourse to words as the instrument of his mental operations. As a great part of the Scriptures was suggested or revealed to the writers; as the thoughts or sentiments, which were perfectly new to them, were conveyed into their minds by the Spirit, it is plain that they must have been accompanied with words proper to express them; and, consequently, that the words were dictated by the same influences on the mind which communicated the ideas. The ideas could not have come without the words, because without them they could not have been conceived. A notion of the form and qualities of a material object may be produced by subjecting it to our senses; but there is no conceivable method of making us acquainted with new abstract truths, or with things which do not lie within the sphere of sensation, but by conveying to the mind, in some way or other, the words significant of them. In all those passages of Scripture, therefore, which were written by revelation, it is manifest that the words were inspired; and this is still more evident with respect to those passages which the writers themselves did not understand. No man could write an intelligible discourse on a subject which he does not understand, unless he were furnished with the words as well as the sentiments: and that the penmen of the Scriptures did not always understand what they wrote, might be safely inferred from the comparative darkness of the dispensation under which some of them lived; and is intimated by Peter, when he says, that the prophets 'inquired and searched diligently what, and what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow,' 1 Pet. 1: 10, 11.

"In other passages of Scripture, those not excepted in which the writers relate such things as had fallen within the compass of their own knowledge, we shall be disposed to believe that the words are inspired, if we calmly and seriously weigh the following considerations. If Christ promised to his disciples, that, when they were brought before kings and governors for his sake, 'it should be given them in that same hour what they should speak, and that the spirit of their Father should speak in them,' (Matt. 10: 19, 20. Luke 12: 11, 12).—a promise which cannot be reasonably understood to signify less than that both words and sentiments should be dictated to them,—it is fully as credible that they should be assisted in the same manner when they wrote, especially as the record was to last through all ages, and to be a rule of faith to all the nations of the earth. Paul affirms, that he and the other apostles spoke 'not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost taught;' (1 Cor. 2: 13.) and this general assertion may be applied to their writings as well as to their sermons. Besides, every person who hath reflected upon the subject, is aware of the importance of a proper selection of words in expressing our sentiments; and knows how easy it is for a heedless or unskilful person, not only to injure the beauty and weaken the efficacy of a discourse by the impropriety of his language, but, by substituting one word for another, to which it seems to be equivalent, to alter the meaning, and perhaps render it totally different. If, then, the sacred writers had not been directed in the choice of words, how could we have been assured that those which they have chosen were the most proper? Is it not possible, nay, is it not certain, that they would have sometimes expressed themselves inaccurately, and, as many of them were illiterate, by consequence, would have obscured and misrepresented the truth? In this case, how could our faith have securely rested on their testimony? Would not the suspicion of error in their writings have rendered it necessary, before we received them, to try them by the standard of reason? and would not the authority and the design of revelation have thus been overthrown? We must conclude, therefore, that the words of Scripture are from God, as well as the matter; or we shall charge him with a want of wisdom in transmitting his truths through a channel by which they might have been, and most probably have been polluted.

"To the inspiration of the words, the diversity of the style of the sacred writers seems to be an objection; because if the Holy Ghost were the author of the words, the style might be expected to be uniformly the same. But in answer to this objection it may be observed, that the Divine Spirit, whose operations are various, might act differently on different persons, according to the natural turn of their minds. He might enable one man, for instance, to write more sublimely than another, because he was naturally of a more exalted genius than the other, and the subject assigned to him demanded more elevated language: or he might produce a difference in the style of the same man, by raising, at one time, his faculties above their ordinary state, and by leaving them, at another, to act according to their native energy, under his inspection and control. We should not suppose that inspiration, even in its higher degrees, deprived those who were the subjects of it of the use of their faculties. They were, indeed, the organs of the Spirit; but they were conscious, intelligent organs. They were dependent, but distinct agents; and the operation of their mental powers, though elevated and directed by superior influence, was analogous to their ordinary mode of procedure. It is easy, therefore, to conceive that the style of the writers of the Scriptures should differ, just as it would have differed if they had not been inspired. A perfect uniformity of style could not have taken place, unless they had been all inspired in the same degree, and by inspiration their faculties had been completely suspended, so that divine truths were conveyed by them in the same passive manner in which a pipe affords a passage to water, or a trumpet to the breath."

A more serious objection to plenary verbal inspiration is founded on the indisputable fact, that there are numerous passages of Scripture containing a repetition or new representation of what is found in other passages, between which there are many verbal discrepancies, though it be expressly stated before each, that the Lord made the communications in these words. It is sufficient, however, to say that the Holy Spirit, the Author of all wisdom, should here be allowed the same latitude in the use of language, universally allowed to men in like cases. As the words were spoken only once, it is obvious they could not be communicated exactly under both the forms in which they now appear, and therefore the words now exhibited in the original text are not, in every respect, though to every useful purpose, the identical words spoken on the occasion. INSTINCT; that power which acts on and impels any creature to any particular manner of conduct, not by a view of the beneficial consequences, but merely from a strong impulse, supposed necessary in its effects, and to be given them to supply the place of reason.—Hend. Buck.

INSTITUTE; INSTITUTION; an established custom or law; a precept, maxim, or principle. Institutions may be considered as positive, moral, and human. 1. Those are called positive institutions or precepts which are not founded upon any reasons known to those to whom they are given, or discoverable by them, but which are observed merely because some superior has commanded them. 2. Moral are those, the reasons of which we see, and the duties of which arise out of the nature of the case itself, prior to external command. 3. Human, are generally applied to those inventions of men, or means of honoring God, which are not appointed by him, and which are numerous in the church of Rome, and too many of them in Protestant churches. Butler's Analogy, p. 214; Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 158; Robinson's Claude, 217, vol. 1. and 258, vol. ii.; Burrough's two Diss. on Positive Institutions; Ep. Hoadly's Plain Account, p. 3.—Hend. Buck.

INSTITUTION; an act in the church of England, by which a clergyman is approved as a fit person for a living, and is preparatory to his induction into it. The former renders him complete as to spiritual rights: the latter gives him a right to the temporalities. The words used by the bishop on the occasion are, "I institute you rector of such a church, with care of souls, and receive your care and mine."—Hend. Buck.

INSTRUMENT. The second causes whereby God executes his works of mercy or judgment are his instruments, Isa. 41: 15. Sword, famine, pestilence, and diseases, are his instruments of death, Ps. 7: 13. The evil instruments of the churl are the sinful methods which he uses to increase his wealth, Isa. 32: 7. Men's bodies or members, are instruments of righteousness or unrighteousness; are, as it were, tools by which they work the one or the other in outward acts, Rom. 6: 13.—Brown.

INTANGLE; to bring into trouble or danger, that one can hardly escape. The Hebrews were intangled at the Red sea, the sea being before them, the Egyptians behind them, and rocks on each side of them, Exod. 14: 3. The Jews thought to intangle Christ in his talk, by deceiving him to speak something criminal, and which he could not excuse or defend, Matt. 22: 15. The Jews were intangled with the enslaving yoke of ceremonies; so fully accustomed to it, as neither to be able or willing to free themselves from it, Gal. 5: 1. Men are intangled by their usings when so invigiled and fixed in a course of sin that they neither will nor can leave it, 2 Pet. 2: 20. Men are intangled in the affairs of this life when their care of, and labor therein, distract and captivate their minds, 2 Tim. 2: 4.—Brown.

INTEGRITY; purity of mind, free from any undue bias or principle, Prov. 11: 3. Many hold, that a certain artful sagacity, founded upon knowledge of the world, is the best conductor of every one who would be a successful adventurer in life, and that a strict attention to integrity would lead them into danger and distress. But in answer to this, it is justly observed, 1. That the guidance of integrity is the safest under which we can be placed; that the road in which it leads us is, upon the whole, the freest from dangers, Prov. 3: 21, &c. 2. It is unquestionably the most honorable; for integrity is the foundation of all that is high in character among mankind, Prov. 4: 8. 3. It is the most conducive to felicity, Phil. 4: 6, 7. Prov. 3: 17. 4. Such a character can look forward to eternity without dismay, Rom. 2: 7.—Hend. Buck.

INTEMPERANCE; excess in eating or drinking. This is the general idea of it; but we may observe, that whatever indulgence undermines the health, impairs the senses, inflames the passions, clouds and sullies the reason, perverts the judgment, enslaves the will, or in any way disorders or debilitates the faculties, may be ranked under this vice. (See TEMPERANCE.)—Hend. Buck; Bap. Repos. 1834.

INTERCESSION OF CHRIST; his interposing for sinners by virtue of the satisfaction he made to divine justice.

1. As to the fact itself, it is evident, from many places of Scripture, that Christ pleads with God in favor of his people, Rom. 8: 34. Heb. 7: 25. 1 John 2: 1. 2. As to the manner of it: the appearance of the high-priest among the Jews, in the presence of God, on the day of atonement, when he offered before him the blood of the sin-offering, is at large referred to by St. Paul, as illustrating the intercession of Christ, Heb. 9: 11, 14, 22, 26. 10: 13, 21. Christ appears before God with his own body; but whether he intercedes vocally or not cannot be known, though it is most probable that he does not; however, it is certain that he does not intercede in like manner as when on earth, with prostration of body, cries and tears, which would be quite inconsistent with his state of exaltation and glory; nor as supplicating an angry judge, for peace is made by the blood of the cross; nor as litigating a point in a court of judicature: but his intercession is carried on by showing himself as having done, as their surety, all that law and justice could require, by representing his blood and sacrifice as the ground of his people's acceptance with the Father, Rev. 5: 6. John 17: 24. 3. The end of Christ's intercession is not to remind the Divine Being of any thing which he would otherwise forget, nor to persuade him to any thing which he is not disposed to do; but it may serve to illustrate the holiness and majesty of the Father, and the wisdom and grace of the Son; not to say that it may have other unknown uses with respect to the inhabitants of the invisible world. He is represented, also, as offering up the prayers and praises of his people, which become acceptable to God through him, Rev. 8: 3, 4. Heb. 13: 15. 1 Pet. 2: 5. He there pleads for the conversion of his unconverted ones; and for the consolation, preservation, and glorification of his people, John 17: 1. 1 John 2: 1, 2.

4. Of the properties of Christ's intercession, we may observe, 1. That it is authoritative. He intercedes not without right, John 17: 24. Ps. 2: 8. 2. Wise: he understands the nature of his work, and the wants of his people, John 2: 25. 3. Righteous; for it is founded upon justice and truth, 1 John 3: 5. Heb. 7: 26. 4. Compassionate, Heb. 2: 17. 5: 8. Is. 63: 9. 5. He is the sole advocate, 1 Tim. 2: 5. 6. It is perpetual, Heb. 7: 25. 7. Efficacious, 1 John 2: 1, 2. John 11: 42.

5. The use we should make of Christ's intercession is this:—1. We may learn the wonderful love of God to man, Rom. 5: 10. 2. The durability and safety of the church, Luke 22: 31, 32. Is. 17: 24. 3. The ground we have for comfort, Heb. 9: 24. Rom. 8: 34. 4. It should excite us to offer up prayers to God, as they are acceptable through him, Rev. 8: 3, 4. (See ADVOCATE.) Charnock's Works, vol. ii. p. 1109; Flavel's Works, vol. i. p. 72; Doddridge's Lectures, vol. ii. p. 294, octavo; Gill's Body of Divinity, vol. ii. p. 126, octavo edit.; Brown's Natural and Revealed Religion, p. 348; Berry Street Lectures, no. 18; Ridgley's Body of Divinity, qu. 55; Dwight's Theology.—Hend. Buck.

INTERDICTION; an ecclesiastical censure, by which the church of Rome forbids the performance of divine service in a kingdom, province, town, &c. This censure has been frequently executed in France, Italy, and Germany; and, in the year 1170, pope Alexander III. put all England under an interdict, forbidding the clergy to perform any part of divine service, except baptizing infants, taking confessions, and giving absolution to dying penitents; but this censure being liable to ill consequences, of promoting libertinism and a neglect of religion, the succeeding popes have very seldom made use of it. There was also an interdict of persons, who were deprived of the benefit of attending on divine service. Particular persons were also anciently interdicted of fire and water, which signifies a banishment for some particular offence: by this censure, no person was permitted to receive them, or allow them fire or water; and being thus wholly deprived of the two necessary elements of life, they were, doubtless, under a kind of civil death.—Hend. Buck.

INTEREST IN CHRIST; a term often made use of in the religious world, and implies an actual participation in the blessings of salvation. In one sense, every human being has an interest in the mediation of our Redeemer, inasmuch as it is only through that mediation that his eternal well-being can be secured, and eternal blessedness is thus procured to all; but it is not till a sinner receives the divine testimony respecting the way of salvation, that he becomes possessed of a real personal interest in Christ.—Hend. Buck.

INTERIM; the name of a formulary, or confession of faith, obtained upon the Protestants, after the death of Luther, by the emperor Charles V., when he had defeated their forces. It was so called, because it was only to take place in the interim, till a general council should decide all the points in question between the Protestants and Catholics. The occasion of it was this:—The emperor had made choice of three divines, viz. Julius Pflug, bishop of Naumberg; Michael Helling, titular bishop of Sidon; and John Agricola, preacher to the elector of Brandenburg; who drew up a project, consisting of twenty-six articles, concerning the points of religion in dispute between the Catholics and Protestants. The controverted points were, the state of Adam before and after his fall; the redemption of mankind by Jesus Christ; the justification of sinners; charity and good works; the confidence we ought to have in God; that our sins are remitted; the church and its true marks, its power, its authority, and ministers; the pope and bishops; the sacraments; the mass; the commemoration of saints; their intercession, and prayers for the dead.

The emperor sent this project to the pope for his approbation, which he refused: whereupon Charles V. published the imperial constitution, called the "Interim," wherein he declared, that "it was his will, that all his Catholic dominions should, for the future, inviolably observe the customs, statutes, and ordinances of the universal church; and that those who had separated themselves from it, should either reunite themselves to it, or at least conform to this constitution; and that all should quietly expect the decisions of the general council." A ordinance was published in the diet of Augsburg, May 15, 1548: but this device not being agreeable to the Protestants: the Lutheran preachers openly declared they would not receive it, alleging that it re-established popery: some chose rather to quit their chairs and livings than to subscribe it; nor would the duke of Saxony receive it. Calvin and several others wrote against it. On the other side, the emperor was so severe against those who refused to accept it, that he disannexed the territory of Magdeburg and Constance for their opposition.—Hend. Buck.

INTERMEDIATE STATE; a term made use of to denote the state of the soul between death and the resurrection. From the Scriptures speaking frequently of the dead as sleeping in their graves, many have supposed that the soul sleeps till the resurrection, i. e. is in a state of entire insensibility. But against this opinion, and that the soul, after death, enters immediately into a state of reward or punishment, the following passages seem to be conclusive: Matt. 17: 3. Luke 23: 42. 2 Cor. 5: 6. Phil. 1: 21. Luke 16: 22, 23. Rev. 6: 9. See HADES; RESURRECTION; SOUL; and FUTURE STATE; Campbell's Dissertations; Bishop Law's Appendix to his Theory of Religion; Search's Light of Nature Pursued; Bennet's Olam Haneshamoth, or View of the Intermediate State; Archibald Campbell's View of the Middle State; Archdeacon Blackburne's Historical View of the Controversy concerning an Intermediate State, and the separate Existence of the Soul between Death and the general Resurrection; in which last the reader will find a large account of the writings on this subject, from the beginning of the Reformation to almost the present time. See also Doddridge's Lectures, lect. 219; Watts' World to Come; Fuller's Letters on the Socinian Controversy; Dwight's Theology; Watson's Theological Institutes; Stuart's Essays; Balfour's Essays, and Cooke's Examination.—Hend. Buck.

INTERNUNTIVS; the messenger or representative of the pope, sent to small foreign courts and republics. The papal ambassador sent to emperors and kings is called nuntius.—Hend. Buck.

INTERPRETATION. (See BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.)

INTERPRETING OF TONGUES; a gift bestowed on the apostles and primitive Christians, so that in a mixed assembly, consisting of persons of different nations, if one spoke in a language understood by one part, another could repeat and translate what he said into the different languages understood by others, 1 Cor. 12: 10. 14: 5, 6, 13.—Hend. Buck.

INTOLERANCE, is a word chiefly used in reference to those persons, churches, or societies, who do not allow men to think for themselves, but impose on them articles, creeds, ceremonies, &c. of their own devising. (See TOLERATION.)

Nothing is more abhorrent from the genius of the Christian religion than an intolerant spirit, or an intolerant church. "It has inspired its votaries with a savage ferocity; has plunged the fatal dagger into innocent blood; depopulated towns and kingdoms; overthrown states and empires, and brought down the righteous vengeance of heaven upon a guilty world. The pretence of superior knowledge, sanctity, and authority for its support, is the disgrace of reason, the grief of wisdom, and the paroxysm of folly. To fetter the conscience, is injustice; to insure it, is an act of sacrilege; but to torture it by an attempt to force its feelings, is horrible intolerance; it is the most abandoned violation of all the maxims of religion and morality. Jesus Christ formed a kingdom purely spiritual: the apostles exercised only a spiritual authority under the direction of Jesus Christ; particular churches were united only by faith and love; in all civil affairs they submitted to civil magistracy; and in religious concerns they were governed by the reasoning, advice, and exhortations of their own officers: their censures were only honest reproofs; and their excommunications were only declarations that such offenders, being incorrigible, were no longer accounted members of their communities."

Let it ever be remembered, therefore, that no man or men have any authority whatever from Christ over the consciences of others, or to persecute the persons of any whose religious principles agree not with their own. See Lowell's Sermons; Robinson's Claude, vol. ii. p. 227, 229; Saurin's Sermons, vol. iii. preface; Locke on Government and the State of Man; Mem. of Roger Williams.—Hend. Buck.

INTREPIDITY, is a disposition of mind unaffected with fear at the approach of danger. Resolution either banishes fear or surmounts it, and is firm on all occasions. Courage is impatient to attack, undertakes boldly, and is not lessened by difficulty. Valor acts with vigor, gives no way to resistance; but it pursues an enterprise in spite of opposition. Bravery knows no fear; it runs nobly into danger, and prefers a glorious life itself. Intrepidity encounters the greatest perils with the most coolness, and dares even present death. (See COURAGE; FORTITUDE).—Hend. Buck.

INTROITO; part of the fifth verse of the forty-second Psalm, with which the Catholic priest, at the foot of the altar, after having made the sign of the cross, begins the mass; on which the servitor answers with the rest of the verse. The whole psalm is then recited alternately by the priest and the servitor. In masses for the dead, and during passion-week, the psalm is not pronounced.—Hend. Buck.

INVESTITURE, in ecclesiastical policy, is the act of conferring any benefice on another. It was customary for princes to make investiture of ecclesiastical benefices, by delivering to the person they had chosen a pastoral staff and a ring. The account of this ceremony may be seen at large in Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, cent. xi. part ii. chap. 2.—Hend. Buck.

INVISIBLES; a name of distinction given to the disciples of Oslander, Flaccius Illyricus, Swenfeld, &c., because they denied the perpetual visibility of the church.—Hend. Buck.

INVOCATION; a calling upon God in prayer. It is generally considered as the first part of that necessary duty, and includes, 1. A making mention of one or more of the names or titles of God, indicative of the object to whom we pray. 2. A declaration of our desire and design to worship him. And, 3. A desire of his assistance and acceptance, under a sense of our own unworthiness.

In the church of Rome, invocation also signifies adoration of, and prayers to, the saints. The council of Trent expressly teaches, that the saints who reign with Jesus Christ are employed as the intercessors of men, and offer up their prayers to God, and condemn those who maintain the contrary doctrine. The Protestants censure and reject this opinion, as contrary to Scripture; deny the truth of the fact; and think it highly unreasonable to suppose that a limited, finite being should be in a manner omnipresent, and, at one and the same time, hear and attend to the prayers that are offered up to him in England, China, and Peru; and from hence infer, that the saints cannot hear their request, it is inconsistent with common sense to address any kind of prayer to them.—Hend. Buck.

IONIC PHILOSOPHY; the doctrine of Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece, who taught philosophy at Miletus, in Ionia. He taught that water was the origin of all things; which doctrine he probably derived from a tradition of the Mosaic chaos. He taught the doctrine of a Supreme Being, who is sometimes represented by him as the soul of the world, and the source of all motion and intelligence. He invented several mathematical propositions, which were afterwards adopted by Euclid, and had sufficient skill in astronomy to foretell an eclipse. His doctrines were, however, superseded by those of Plato and Aristotle, and sunk into obscurity, until, in the close of the sixteenth century, it was revived by Claude Berigard, of Spain. Enfield's Philosophy, vol. i. book ii. ch. 3; vol. ii. p. 422.—Williams.

IRENÆUS; bishop of Lyons, in France, one of the best

Christian writers of the second century. He was a Greek by birth, and probably born of Christian parents. He was in early life a disciple of the venerable Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, by whom he was sent to preach the gospel among the Gauls. His labors were remarkably useful. He employed his pen against the internal and domestic enemies of the church, by attacking the monstrous errors adopted by some classes of professed Christians. His five Books against Heresies are yet preserved in a Latin translation, through the barbarity of which, though excessive, it is easy to discern the eloquence and erudition that reign throughout the original. Only the first book is yet extant in the original Greek.—Mosheim.

IRON, (brenel), occurs first in Gen. 4: 22, and afterwards frequently; and the Chaldee prenel in Dan. 2: 33, 41, and elsewhere often in that book; Greek sideros, Rev. 18: 12, and the adjectives, Acts 12: 10. Rev. 2: 27. 9: 12. 5: 19: 15; a well-known and very serviceable metal. The knowledge of working it was very ancient, as appears from Gen. 4: 22. We do not, however, find that Moses made use of iron in the fabric of the tabernacle in the wilderness, or Solomon in any part of the temple at Jerusalem. Yet, from the manner in which the Jewish legislator speaks of iron, the metal, it appears, must have been in use in Egypt before his time. He celebrates the great hardness of it; (Lev. 26: 19. Deut. 28: 23, 48.) takes notice that the bedstead of Og, king of Bashan, was of iron; (Deut. 3: 11.) he speaks of mines of iron; (Deut. 8: 9.) and he compares the severity of the servitude of the Israelites in Egypt to the heat of a furnace for melting iron, Deut. 4: 20. We find, also, that swords, (Num. 35: 16.) axes, (Deut. 19: 5.) and tools for cutting stones, (Deut. 27: 5.) were made of iron.

By the "northern iron," (Jer. 15: 12.) we may probably understand the hardened iron, called in Greek chalups, from the Chalybes, a people bordering on the Euxine sea, and consequently lying on the north of Judea, by whom the art of tempering steel is said to have been discovered. Strabo speaks of this people by the name of Chalybes, but afterwards Chaldei; and mentions their iron mines. These, however, were a different people from the Chaldeans, who were united with the Babylonians.—Watson.

ISAAC, the son of Abraham and Sarah, was born in the year of the world 2108. His name, which signifies laughter, was given him by his mother, because when it was told her by an angel that she should have a son, and that at a time of life when, according to the course of nature, she was past child-bearing, she privately laughed, Gen. 18: 10—12. And when the child was born she said, "God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me," Gen. 21: 6. The life of Isaac, for the first seventy-five years of it, is so blended with that of his illustrious father, that the principal incidents of it have been already noticed under the article ABRAHAM.

His birth was attended with some extraordinary circumstances: it was the subject of various promises and prophecies; an event most ardently desired by his parents, and yet purposely delayed by divine providence till they were both advanced in years, no doubt for the trial of their faith, and that Isaac might more evidently appear to be the gift of God, and "the child of promise." At an early period of life he was the object of the profane contempt of Ishmael, the son of the bond-woman, by whom he was persecuted; and as in the circumstances attending his birth there was something typical of the birth of Abraham's greater Son, the Messiah, the promised Seed; so, in the latter instance, we contemplate in him a resemblance of real Christians, who, as Isaac was, are "the children of promise," invested with all the immunities and blessings of the new covenant; but, as then, "he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so it is now," Gal. 4: 29. (See ESAR, and JACOB)—Watson.

ISAIAH. Though fifth in the order of time, the writings of the prophet Isaiah are placed first in order of the prophetic books, principally on account of the sublimity and importance of his predictions, and partly also because the book which bears his name is larger than all the twelve minor prophets put together.

1. Concerning his family and descent, nothing certain has been recorded, except what he himself tells us, (Isa. 1: 1.) namely, that he was the son of Amos, and discharged the prophetic office "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah," who successively flourished between A. M. 3194 and 3305. There is a current tradition that he was of the blood-royal; and some writers have affirmed that his father Amos or Amos was the son of Josiah, and consequently brother of Uzziah, king of Judah. He must have exercised the office of a prophet during a long period of time; for the lowest computation, beginning from the year in which Uzziah died, when he is by some supposed to have received his first appointment to that office, to the reign of Manasseh, brings it to sixty-one years. But the tradition of the Jews, which has been adopted by most Christian commentators, that he was put to death by Manasseh, is very uncertain; and Aben Ezra, one of the most celebrated Jewish writers, is rather of opinion that he died before the decease of Hezekiah; which bishop Lowth thinks most probable. Of his wife and two sons, we have notices in Isa. 8: 1—3. The name of Isaiah, as Vitringa has remarked, after several preceding commentators, is in some measure descriptive of his high character, since it signifies the Salvation of Jehovah; and was given with singular propriety to him, who foretold the advent of the Messiah, through whom "all flesh shall see the salvation of God," Isa. 40: 5. Luke 3: 6. Acts 4: 12. Isaiah was contemporary with the prophets Amos, Hosea, Joel, and Micah.

2. Besides the volume of prophecies, which we are now to consider, it appears from 2 Chron. 26: 22, that Isaiah wrote an account of "the acts of Uzziah," king of Judah: this has perished with some other writings of the prophets, which, as probably not written by inspiration, were never admitted into the canon of Scripture. There are also two apocryphal books ascribed to him, namely, the Ascension of Isaiah, and the Apocalypse of Isaiah; but these are evidently forgeries of a later date, and the Apocalypse has long since perished.

3. Isaiah is uniformly spoken of in the Scriptures as a prophet of the highest dignity. Bishop Lowth calls him the prince of all the prophets, and pronounces the whole of his book to be poetical, with the exception of a few detached passages. The scope of Isaiah's predictions is threefold, namely, 1. To detect, reprove, aggravate, and condemn, the sins of the Jewish people especially, and also the iniquities of the ten tribes of Israel, and the abominations of many gentile nations and countries; denouncing the severest judgments against all sorts and degrees of persons, whether Jews or Gentiles. 2. To invite persons of every rank and condition, both Jews and Gentiles, to repentance and reformation, by numerous promises of pardon and mercy. It is worthy of remark, that no such promises are intermingled with the denunciations of divine vengeance against Babylon, although they occur in the threatenings against every other people. (See BABYLON.) 3. To comfort all the truly pious, in the midst of all the calamities and judgments denounced against the wicked, with prophetic promises of the true Messiah, which seem almost to anticipate the gospel history, so clearly do they foreshew the divine character of Christ.

4. Isaiah has, with singular propriety, been denominated the evangelical prophet, on account of the number and variety of his prophecies concerning the advent and character, the ministry and preaching, the sufferings and death, and the extensive, permanent kingdom of the Messiah. So explicit and determinate are his predictions, as well as so numerous, that he seems to speak rather of things past than of events yet future; and he may rather be called an evangelist than a prophet. No one, indeed, can be at a loss in applying them to the mission and character of Jesus Christ, and to the events which are cited in his history by the writers of the New Testament. This prophet, says bishop Lowth, abounds in such transcendent excellencies, that he may be properly said to afford the most perfect model of prophetic poetry. He is at once elegant and sublime, forcible and ornamented; he unites energy with copiousness, and dignity with variety. In his sentiments there is uncommon elevation and majesty; in his imagery, the utmost propriety, elegance, dignity, and diversity; in his language, uncommon beauty and energy; and, notwithstanding the obscurity of his subjects, a surprising degree of clearness and simplicity. To these we may add, that there is such sweetness in the poetical composition of his sentences, whether it proceed from art or genius, that, if the Hebrew poetry at present is possessed of any remains of its native grace and harmony, we shall chiefly find them in the writings of Isaiah: so that the saying of Ezekiel may most justly be applied to this prophet:—

“Thou art the confirmed exemplar of measures,
Full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty.”

Ezekiel 28: 12.

Isaiah also greatly excels in all the graces of method, order, connexion, and arrangement: though in asserting this we must not forget the nature of the prophetic impulse, which bears away the mind with irresistible violence, and frequently in rapid transitions from near to remote objects, from human to divine. We must likewise be careful in remarking the limits of particular predictions, since, as in our version, they are often improperly connected, without any marks of discrimination; which injudicious arrangement, on some occasions, creates almost insuperable difficulties.—Wats.

ISRANIKI; a denomination which appeared in Russia about the year 1662, and assumed this name, which signifies the multitude of the elect. But they were called by their adversaries Raskolniki, or the seditious faction. They professed a rigorous zeal for the letter of the Holy Scriptures. They maintained that there is no subordination of rank among the faithful, and that a Christian may kill himself for the love of Christ.—Hend. Buck.

ISHBOSHETH, or ISHBAAL; son of Saul, and also his successor. Abner, Saul's kinsman and general, so managed, that Ishbosheth was acknowledged king at Mahanaim by the greater part of Israel, while David reigned at Hebron over Judah. He was forty-four years of age when he began to reign, and he reigned two years peaceably; after which he had skirmishes, with loss, against David, 2 Sam. 2: 8, &c. With this prince terminated the royal family of Saul, B. C. 1048.—Calmet.

ISHMAEL, son of Abraham and Hagar, was born A. M. 2094. The angel of the Lord appeared to Hagar in the wilderness, when she fled from her mistress, and bade her return, adding, “Thou shalt bring forth a son, and call his name Ishmael, ‘the Lord hath heardened;’ because the Lord hath heard thee in thy affliction. He shall be a fierce, savage man, whose hand shall be against all men, and the hands of all men against him.” Hagar returned therefore to Abraham's house, and had a son, whom she named Ishmael. (See HAGAR.) Fourteen years after this the Lord visited Sarah, and Isaac being born to Abraham, Ishmael, who till then had been considered as the sole heir, saw his hope disappointed, and was filled with envy and hatred against his younger brother. Five or six years afterwards, Ishmael by his persecuting spirit displeased Sarah, who prevailed on Abraham to expel him and his mother. Hagar, with Ishmael, wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba, and when reduced to great distress, a voice from heaven said, “Fear not, Hagar, the Lord hath heard the child's voice. I will make him the father of a great people.” They abode in the wilderness of Paran, where Ishmael became expert in archery, and his mother married him to an Egyptian woman. He had twelve sons; viz. Nabajoth, Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hader or Hadad, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, Kedemah. He had likewise a daughter, named Mahalath or Bashemath. (Gen. 36: 3.) who married Esau, Gen. 28: 9. From the twelve sons of Ishmael are derived the twelve tribes of the Arabians, still subsisting; and Jerome says that in his time they called the districts of Arabia by the names of their several tribes. The descendants of Ishmael inhabited from Havilah to Shur, and are usually mentioned in history under the general name of Arabians and Ishmaelites. Since the seventh century, they have almost all embraced the religion of Mahomet. Ishmael died in the presence of all his brethren, (Gen. 25: 18.) as the Vulgate renders; or, according to another translation, his inheritance lay opposite to that of all his brethren. See Gen. 16: 12. The year of his death is not known. (See ARABIA.)—Calmet.

ISHMAELITES, or ISMAIANS. (See ASSASSINS.)

ISHTOB; a country situated at the northern extremity of the mountains of Gilead, towards mount Libanus, 2 Sam. 10: 6. (See TOB.)—Watson.

ISLAMISM; the orthodox religion of the followers of Mohammed. (See MOHAMMEDANISM.) The word signifies an entire submission or devotion to the will of another, and especially of God, and thence the security, peace, and prosperity which those who thus submit themselves enjoy. The profession of faith in the unity of God, and the divine apostleship of Mohammed, is called aslana; and every one who makes such a profession, receives the name of Moslem, i. e., one who has entirely embraced the true faith, and surrendered himself to the will of God. The plural of this would be Muslim; but the dual number, Muslimani, being commonly substituted for the singular by the Persians and Turks, the word Mussulman, or Musliman, has in these, as well as in the European languages, nearly superseded the shorter and more correct term.—H. Buck.

ISLANDS; ISLES. Considerable errors in sacred geography have arisen from taking the word rendered islands, for a spot surrounded by water. It rather imports a settlement, or plantation; that is to say, a colony or establishment, as distinct from an open, unappropriated region. Thus we should understand Gen. 10: 5: “By these were the settlements of the Gentiles divided in their lands.” The sacred writer evidently had enumerated countries, which were not isles in any sense whatever. So Job 22: 30: “He (God) shall deliver the island of the innocent,” i. e. settlement, or establishment. Isa. 42: 15: “I will make the rivers islands;” rather settlements of human population. In these places, and many others, the true idea of the Hebrew word is establishments, or colonies, understood to be at some distance from others of a similar nature. The oases of Africa, which are small districts comprising wells, verdure, and population, surrounded by immense deserts of sand, are called islands, in Arabic, to this day; and no doubt but such were so called by the Hebrews, notwithstanding that they had no stream of water within many days' journey around them. (See JARRETH.)—Calmet.

ISRAEL, (who prevails with God;) a name given to Jacob, after having wrestled with him at Mahanaim, or Penael, Gen. 32: 1, 2, and 28, 29, 30. Husea 12: 3. (See JACOB.) By the name Israel is sometimes understood the person of Jacob; sometimes the people of Israel, the race of Jacob; and sometimes the kingdom of Israel, or the ten tribes, as distinct from the kingdom of Judah.—Calmet.

ISRAELITES. (See JEWS.)

ISSACHAR, the fifth son of Jacob and Leah, was born about B. C. 1749. He had four sons, Tola, Phuvah, Job, and Shimron, Gen. 46: 13. We know nothing particular of his life. Jacob, blessing him, said, “Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens. And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant, and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute.” The Chaldee translates it in a quite contrary sense: “He shall subdue provinces, and make those tributary to him, who shall remain in his land.” The tribe of Issachar had its portion among the best parts of the land of Canaan, along the great plain, or valley of Jezreel, with the half-tribe of Manasseh to the south, Zebulun to the north, the Mediterranean sea west, and Jordan, with the south point of the sea of Tiberias, east. (See CANAAN.)—Calmet.

ISSUE. The issues from death, that is, all the means of escape from sin or misery, and all the persons redeemed, belong to the Lord, Ps. 68: 20. Out of the heart are the issues of life; the holy thoughts and good works of men demonstrate spiritual life to be in their heart, and prepare them for eternal life, Prov. 4: 23.—Brown.

ITALA. (See ANCIENT BIBLE VERSION, under the article BIBLE, No. 10.)

ITALY; a Latin word, which some derive from Vitulu or Vitula, because this country abounded in calves and heifers; but others, from a king called Italus. We know not the ancient name of Italy in the Hebrew language. Jerome has sometimes rendered chittim, Italy; (Numb. 24: 24. Ezek. 27: 6.) and in Isa. 66: 19. he translates thubal. Italy, though, according to others, the Tibarenians are here meant. In the sacred books written in Greek, there is no ambiguity in the word Italy; it signifies that country of which Rome is the capital. (See Rome.)

The Italian band mentioned in Acts 10: 1. is thought by Calmet to have been a cohort, named from Italica, a city in Spain, built by Scipio, A. U. C. 654, at the beginning of a peace with the Carthaginians. Appian (de Bello Hisp.) informs us that Scipio collected his wounded soldiers into one city, which, from Italy, he named Italica.—Calmet.

ITHAMAR; Aaron's fourth son, who, with his descendants, exercised the functions of common priests only, till the high-priesthood passed into his family in the person of Eli. The successors of Eli, of the family of Ithamar, were Abitub, Ahiah, Ahimelech, and Abiathar, whom Solomon deposed, 1 Kings 2: 27.—Calmet.

ITINERANT PREACHERS; those who are not settled over any particular congregation, but go from place to place for the purpose of preaching to and instructing the ignorant. A great deal has been said against persons of this description; and it must be acknowledged, that there would not be so much necessity for them, were every minister to do his duty. But the sad declension of morals in many places, the awful ignorance that prevails as to God and real religion, the little or no exertion of those who are the guides of the people; "villages made up of a train of idle, profligate, and miserable poor, and where the barbarous rhymes in their church-yards inform us that they are all either gone or going to heaven;" these things, with a variety of others, form a sufficient reason for every able and benevolent person to step forward, and to do all that he can to enlighten the minds, lessen the miseries, and promote the welfare of his fellow-creatures.

"Notwithstanding the prejudices of mankind, and the indiscretions of some individuals, an itinerant teacher is one of the most honorable and useful characters that can be found upon earth; and there needs no other proof than the experience of the church in all ages, that, when this work is done properly and with perseverance, it forms the grand method of spreading wide, and rendering efficacious religious knowledge; for great reformatations and revivals of religion have uniformly been thus effected; and it is especially sanctioned by the example of Christ and his apostles, and recommended as the divine method of spreading the gospel through the nations of the earth, itinerant preaching having almost always preceded and made way for the solid ministry of regular pastors. But it is a work which requires peculiar talents and dispositions, and a peculiar call in God's providence; and is not rashly and hastily to be ventured upon by every novice who has learned to speak about the gospel, and has more zeal than knowledge, prudence, humility, or experience. An unblemished character, a disinterested spirit, an exemplary deadness to the world, unaffected humility, deep acquaintance with the human heart, and preparation for enduring the cross not only with boldness, but with meekness, patience, and sweetness of temper, are indispensably necessary for such a service." Hall's Works.—Hend. Buh.

ITUREA; a province of Syria or Arabia, beyond Jordan, east of the Batanea, and south of Trachonitis. Luke 3: 1. speaks of Iturea; and 1 Chron. 5: 19. of the Itureans, or of Jethur, who was one of the sons of Ishmael, and gave name to Iturea. In Gen. 25: 15, and in 1 Chron. 1: 31, Iturea is included in Arabia Petraea. Early in his reign Aristobolus made war with the Itureans, subdued the greater part of them, and obliged them to embrace Judaism, as Hircanus his father had some years before obliged the Idumeans to do. He gave them their choice, either to be circumcised and embrace the Jewish religion, or to leave the country. They chose the former. Philip, one of Herod's sons, was tetrarch of Iturea, when John the Baptist entered on his ministry, Luke 3: 1.—Calmet.

IVORY; (Heb. shenhalim, from shen, a tooth, and halim, elephants; Greek, elephantinos, Rev. 18: 12.) The first time that ivory is mentioned in Scripture is in the reign of Solomon. If the forty-fifth Psalm was written before the Canticles, and before Solomon had constructed his royal and magnificent throne, then that contains the first mention of this commodity. It is spoken of as used in decorating those boxes of perfume, whose odors were employed to exhilarate the king's spirits. It is probable that Solomon, who traded to India, first brought thence elephants and ivory to Judea, 1 Kings 10: 23. 2 Chron 9: 21. It seems that Solomon had a throne decorated with ivory, and inlaid with gold; the beauty of these materials relieving the splendor, and heightening the lustre of each other, 1 Kings 10: 18. Cabinets and wardrobes were ornamented with ivory, by what is called marquetry, Ps. 45: 8.

*Quelle per artem
Incisum buxo aut Oricta terebintho Lucret eburt. VIRGIL.*

"So shines a gem, illustrious to behold,
On some fair virgin's neck, encased in gold:
So the surrounding ebony's darker hue
Improves the polish'd ivory to the view."

PITT.

These were named "houses of ivory," probably because made in the form of a house, or palace; as the silver naos of Diana, mentioned Acts 19: 24, were in the form of her temple at Ephesus; and as we have now ivory models of the Chinese pagodas, or temples. In this sense we may understand what is said of the ivory house which Ahab made, 1 Kings 22: 39. As to dwelling-houses, the most we can suppose in regard to them is, that they might have ornaments of ivory, as they sometimes have of gold, silver, or other precious materials, in such abundance as to derive an appellation from the article of their decoration; as the emperor Nero's palace, mentioned by Suetonius, was named aurca, or "golden," because lita auro, "overlaid with gold." This method of ornamenting buildings, or apartments, was very ancient among the Greeks. Homer mentions ivory as employed in the palace of Menelaus, at Lacedaemon:—

"Above, beneath, around the palace, shines
The sunless treasure of exhausted mines;
The spoils of elephants the roof inlay,
And studded amber darts a golden ray."
Odys. iv. 72. FORN.

Bacchylides, cited by Athenæus, says, that, in the island of Ceos, one of the Cyclades, the houses of the great men "glisten with gold and ivory." Harris' Nat. His.—Watson.

JABAL; son of Lamech and Adah, father of those who lodge under tents, and of shepherds; (Gen. 4: 20.) that is, the first distinguished example of that class of men, who, like the Arab Bedouens, live under tents, and are shepherds. (See FATHER.)—Calmet.

JABOK; a small river rising in the mountains of Gilead, which falls into the Jordan on the east, below the sea of Tiberias. Near the ford of this brook the angel wrestled with Jacob, Gen. 32: 22.

Mr. Buckingham thus describes it: "The banks of this stream are so thickly wooded with oleander and plane-trees, wild olives, and wild almonds in blossom, with many flowers, the names of which were unknown to us; with tall and waving reeds, at least fifteen feet in height; that we could not perceive the water through them from above, though the presence of these luxuriant borders marked the winding of its course, and the murmur of its flow, echoing through its long, deep channel, was to be heard distinctly from afar. The river, where we crossed it at this point, was not more than ten yards wide, but it was deeper than the Jordan, and nearly as rapid; so that we had some difficulty in fording it. As it ran in a rocky bed, its waters were clear, and we found their taste agreeable." It is now called El Zerka.—Watson.

JABESH, or JABESH-GILEAD; the name of a city in the half-tribe of Manasseh, east of Jordan. Naash, king of the Ammonites, besieged it, 1 Sam. 11: 1, &c. The inhabitants were friendly to Saul and his family, 1 Sam. 31: 11, 12.—Watson.

JABIN; king of Hazor, in the northern part of Canaan, Josh. 11: 1, &c. Discomfited at the conquests of Joshua, who had subdued the south of Canaan, he formed with other kings in the northern part along the Jordan, and the Mediterranean, and in the mountains, a league offensive and defensive. With their troops they rendezvoused at the waters of Merom, but Joshua attacked them suddenly, defeated them, and pursued them to great Zidon, and the valley of Mizpeh. He lamed their horses, burnt their chariots, took Hazor, and killed Jabin, about A. M. 2555.—2. Another king of Hazor, who oppressed the Israelites twenty years, from A. M. 2699 to 2719, Judg. 4: 2, &c. Sisera, his general, was defeated by Barak at the foot of mount Tabor; and the Israelites were delivered.—Calmet.

JABNEH, or JABNIA; a city of the Philistines, thirty miles east of Jerusalem, (2 Chron. 26: 6.) called Januia, (1 Mac. 4: 15.) and Jamneia, chap. 5: 58. 2 Mac. 12: 8. Its situation may be gathered from the passage last cited, as being not far from Jaffa or Joppa. The following is Dr. Witman's account of it: "Yebna is a village about twelve miles distant from Jaffa; in a fine open plain, surrounded by hills and covered with herbage. A rivulet formed by the rains supplies water. It is conjectured that the rock Etam, where Samson was surprised by the Philistines, was not far from Yebna. North-east of Yebna is a lofty hill, from which is an extensive and pleasing view of Ramla, distant about five miles. On sloping hills of easy ascent, by which the plains are bordered, Yebna, Ekron, Asdod, and Ashkalon, were in sight." Comp. 2 Chron. 26: 6.—Calmet.

JACHIN, (stability;) the name of a brass pillar placed at the porch of Solomon's temple. (See Boaz.)—Calmet.

JACINTH. This precious gem, which is mentioned in Rev. 21: 20, where it is called in the Greek text hyacinth, as it also is in Pliny, is now thought to be the amethyst of the moderns. The amethysts of the ancients are now called garnets. There seems to be no reason for doubting the propriety of rendering the Hebrew ahalmah, and the Greek amethystos, by amethyst. Pliny says the reason assigned for its name is, that though it approaches to the color of wine, it falls short of it and stops at a violet color. Others think it is called amethyst, because its color resembles wine mixed with water; and in this view, also, it derives its name from a, negative, and methy, wine. The Oriental amethyst or jacinth is an extremely rare gem. If heated, it loses its color and becomes transparent, in which state it is hardly distinguishable from the diamond.—Harris.

JACOB; the younger twin son of Isaac and Rebekah. It was observed, that at his birth he held his brother Esau's heel; and for this reason was called Jacob, (Gen. 25: 26.) which signifies "he supplanted." Jacob was of a meek and peaceable temper, and loved a quiet, pastoral life; whereas Esau was of a fierce and turbulent nature, and was fond of hunting. Isaac had a particular fondness for Esau; but Rebekah was more attached to Jacob. The manner in which Jacob purchased his brother's birthright for a mass of pottage, and supplanted him by obtaining Isaac's blessing, is already referred to in the article ESAU.

The events of the interesting and chequered life of Jacob are so plainly and consecutively narrated by Moses, that they are familiar to all; but upon some of them a few remarks may be useful.

1. As to the purchase of the birthright, Jacob appears to have been innocent, so far as any guile on his part or real necessity from hunger on the part of Esau is involved in the question; but his obtaining the ratification of this by the blessing of Isaac, though agreeable, indeed, to the purpose of God, that the elder should serve the younger, was blamable as to the means employed. Indeed all the parties were more or less culpable; Isaac, for endeavoring to set aside the oracle which had been pronounced in favor of his younger son; but of which he might have an obscure conception; Esau, for wishing to deprive his brother of the blessing which he had himself relinquished; and Rebekah and Jacob, for securing it by fraudulent means, not trusting wholly in the Lord. That their principal object, however, was the spiritual part of the blessing, and not the temporal, was shown by the event. For Jacob afterwards revered Esau, as his elder brother, and insisted on Esau's accepting a present from his hand, in token of submission, Gen. 33: 3—15. Esau also appears to have possessed himself of his father's property during Jacob's long exile.

But though the intention of Rebekah and Jacob might have been free from worldly or mercenary motives, they ought not to have done evil that good might come. And they were both severely punished in this life for their fraud, which destroyed the peace of the family, and planted a mortal enmity in the breast of Esau against his brother, Gen. 27: 36—41. And there can be little doubt of his intention of executing his threat, when he came to meet him on his return, with such an armed force as strongly alarmed Jacob's fears, had not God in answer to Jacob's wrestling prayer changed the spirit of Esau into mildness, so that "he ran to meet Jacob, and fell on his neck, and they wept," Gen. 33: 4. Rebekah, also, was deprived of the society of her darling son, whom "she sent away for one year," as she fondly imagined, "until his brother's fury should turn away," (Gen. 27: 42—44.) but whom she saw no more; for she died during his long exile of twenty years, though Isaac survived, Gen. 35: 27. Thus was "she pierced through with many sorrows."

2. Jacob, also, had abundant reason subsequently to say, "Few and evil have been the days of the years of my pilgrimage," Gen. 47: 9. At the period of his flight how forcible would have been the question—By whom shall Jacob arise? Amos 7: 5. Though he had the consolation of having the blessing of Abraham voluntarily renewed to him by his father, before he was forced to fly from his brother's fury, (Gen. 28: 1—4.) and had the satisfaction of obeying his parents in going to Padan-aram, or Charran, in quest of a wife of his own kindred, (Gen. 28: 7.) yet he set out on a long and perilous journey of six hundred miles and upwards, through barren and inhospitable regions, unattended and unprovided, like a pilgrim, indeed, with only his staff in his hand, Gen. 32: 10. And though he was supported with the assurance of the divine protection, and the renewal of the blessing of Abraham by God himself, in his remarkable vision at Bethel, and solemnly devoted himself to his service, wishing only for food and raiment, and vowing to profess the worship of God, and pay tithes unto him, should he return back in peace, (Gen. 28: 10—22.) yet he was forced to engage in a tedious and thankless servitude of seven years, at first for Rachel, with Laban, who retaliated upon him the imposition he had practised on his own father, and substituted Leah, whom he hated, for Rachel, whom he loved; and thereby compelled him to serve seven years more; and changed his wages several times during the remainder of his whole servitude of twenty years; in the course of which, as he pathetically complained, "the drought consumed him by day, and the frost by night, and the sleep departed from his eyes," in watching Laban's flocks; (Gen. 31: 40.) and at last he was forced to steal away, and was only protected from Laban's vengeance, as afterwards from Esau's, by divine interposition. Add to these his domestic troubles and misfortunes; the impatience of his favorite wife, "Give me children, or I die;" her death in bearing her second son, Benjamin; the rape of his daughter Dinah; the perfidy and cruelty of her brothers, Simeon and Levi; to the Shechemites, the misbehavior of Reuben; the supposed death of Joseph, his favorite and most deserving son:—these were, all together, sufficient to have brought down his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave, had he not been divinely supported and encouraged throughout the whole of his pilgrimage. For the circumstances which led Jacob into Egypt, (Gen. 47: 1—10.) see JOSEPH.

Jacob spent the remainder of his days in tranquillity and prosperity, enjoying the society of his beloved child seventeen years. The close of his life was a happy calm, after a stormy voyage.

3. Of all the predictions which he pronounced with his expiring breath, (Gen. 49.) the most remarkable and the most interesting is that relating to Judah: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be," Gen. 49: 10. One grand personage was in the mind of the patriarch, as it had been in the contemplation of his predecessors, even the illustrious Deliverer who should arise in after ages to redeem his people, and bring salvation to the human race. (See SHILOH.) Here, then, in this prediction and its fulfilment, we have a glorious proof not only of the piety and faith of Jacob, but of the veracity of Scripture, and the truth of our religion, Gen. 50: 1—11. See Calmet.—Watson.

JACOBITES; a sect of Christians in Syria and Mesopotamia; so called, either from Jacob, a Syrian, who lived in the reign of the emperor Mauritius, or from one Jacob, a monk, who flourished in the year 550.

The Jacobites are of two sects, some following the rites of the Latin church, and others continuing separated from the church of Rome. There is also a division among the latter, who have two rival patriarchs, and consist of about thirty or forty thousand families, living in Syria and Mesopotamia. As to their belief, they hold but one nature in Jesus Christ. (See HYPOSTASIS, and MONOPHYSITES.) With respect to purgatory, and prayers for the dead, they are of the same opinion with the Greeks and other Eastern Christians. They consecrate unleavened bread at the eucharist, and are against confession, believing that it is not of divine institution. They also practise circumcision before baptism. (See NESTORIANS.)

The name of Jacobites is also applied to the adherents of James II., particularly to the non-jurors who separated from the high Episcopal church, simply because they would not take the oath of allegiance to the new king, and who in their public services prayed for the Stuart family. They were most numerous in Scotland, but were very much lessened by the defeat of the Pretender, in 1745, and at his death, in 1788, they began to pray for George III.—Hend. Buck.

JACOB'S WELL; a fountain near Sychar or Shechem, Gen. 35. John 4: 6. "The principal object of veneration here is Jacob's well, over which a church was formerly erected. This is situated at a small distance from the town, in the road to Jerusalem, and has been visited by pilgrims of all ages, but particularly since the Christian era, as the place where our Savior revealed himself to the woman of Samaria. The spot is so distinctly marked by the evangelist, and so little liable to uncertainty, from the circumstance of the well itself, and the features of the country, that, if no tradition existed for its identity, the site of it could hardly be mistaken. Perhaps no Christian scholar ever attentively read the fourth chapter of St. John without being struck with the numerous internal evidences of truth which crowd upon the mind in its perusal. Within so small a compass it is impossible to find in other writings so many sources of reflection and of interest. Independently of its importance as a theological document, it concentrates so much information, that a volume might be filled with the illustration it reflects on the history of the Jews, and on the geography of their country. All that can be gathered on these subjects from Josephus seems but as a comment to illustrate this chapter. The journey of our Lord from Judea into Galilee; the cause of it; his passage through the territory of Samaria; his approach to the metropolis of this country; its name; his arrival at the Amorite field, which terminates the narrow valley of Sichem; the ancient custom of halting at a well; the female employment of drawing water; the disciples sent into the city for food, by which its situation out of the town is obviously implied; the question of the woman referring to existing prejudices which separated the Jews from the Samaritans; the depth of the well; the Oriental allusion contained in the expression, 'living water'; the history of the well, and the customs thereby illustrated; the worship upon mount Gerizim; all these occur within the space of twenty verses: and if to these be added, what has already been referred to in the remainder of the same chapter, we shall perhaps consider it as a record which, in the words of him who sent it, 'WE MAY LIFT UP OUR EYES, AND LOOK UPON, FOR IT IS WHITE ALREADY TO HARVEST.'" Dr. E. D. Clarke, p. 517.—Calmet.

JACOMB, (THOMAS, D. D.), an English divine, of great learning and piety, was born in 1622, studied at Oxford and Cambridge, and was settled at Ludgate parish, London, in 1647; where he continued till ejected for non-conformity, in 1662. He was received as chaplain into the house of the countess dowager of Exeter, where he labored faithfully, and with great usefulness, until his death, in 1687, aged sixty-five.

His complaint was a cancer; but through his long and painful sickness he was a model of Christian patience and resignation; with comfort reviewing his course, and with joy expecting his crown from Christ his Savior, "who was made unto him of God, wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption." Once indeed he said to a friend, while longing to be above, "Death flies from me; I make no haste to my Father's house. I lie here, but get no ground for heaven or earth." It being said, "Yes, in your preparations for heaven," he replied, "O yes, there I sensibly get ground, I bless God. It will not be long before we meet in heaven, never to part more; but to be with Christ is best of all."

His works consist of a Commentary on Rom. VIII.; a Treatise of Holy Dedication; Life and Death of Mr. William Whitaker; and several occasional Sermons.—Middleton, vol. iv. p. 3.

JAEI, or JAEH, wife of Heber the Kenite, killed Sisera, general of the Canaanitish army, Judg. 4: 17, 21. Why this woman violated the sacred rites of hospitality, by murdering her guest, does not appear. Mr. Taylor suggests as probable, (1.) That Jael had herself felt the severity of the late oppression of Israel by Sisera; (2.) That she was actuated by motives of patriotism, and of gratitude toward Israel; (3.) That the general character of Sisera might be so atrocious, that at any rate his death was desirable. We find a similar proceeding in the case of Judith.—Calmet.

JAH; one of the names of God; which is combined with many Hebrew words; as Adonijah, Halleluiah, Malachia:—God is my Lord, praise the Lord, the Lord is my King, &c. (See JEHOVAH).—Calmet.

JAIR, of Manasseh, possessed the whole country of Argob beyond Jordan, to the borders of Geshur and Maachathi, Judg. 10: 3. He succeeded Tola in the government of Israel, and was succeeded by Jephthah. His government continued twenty-two years, from A. M. 2795 to 2817. Comp. Num. 32: 41. Deut. 3: 14. Josh. 13: 30. 1 Kings 4: 13. 1 Chron. 2: 22.

2. JAIR; the eighth month of the Hebrew civil year, and the second of the sacred year. It corresponded partly to March and April.—Calmet.

JAIRUS; chief of the synagogue at Capernaum, whose only daughter, an interesting girl of twelve, falling dangerously sick, was healed by Jesus, Mark 5: 22.—Calmet.

JAMBRES. (See JANNES.)

JAMES, (Gr. Jakobos;) of the same import as Jacob. James, surnamed the Greater, or the Elder, to distinguish him from James the Younger, was brother to John the evangelist, and son to Zebedee and Salome, Matt. 4: 21. He was of Bethsaida, in Galilee, with his brother John, a fisherman, and left all to follow Christ, Mark 1: 18, 19. They were witnesses of our Lord's transfiguration, Matt. 17: 2. When certain Samaritans refused to admit Jesus Christ, James and John wished leave to pray for fire from heaven to consume them, Luke 9: 54. Some days after the resurrection of our Savior, James and John went to fish in the sea of Tiberias, where they saw Jesus. They were present at the ascension of our Lord. St. James is said to have preached to all the dispersed tribes of Israel; but for this there is only report. His martyrdom is related, Acts 12: 1, 2, about A. D. 42, or 44, for the date is not well ascertained. Herod Agrippa, king of the Jews, and grandson of Herod the Great, caused him to be seized and executed at Jerusalem. Clemens Alexandrinus informs us, that he who brought St. James before the judges, was so much affected with his constancy in confessing Jesus Christ, that he also declared himself a Christian, and was condemned, as well as the apostle, to be beheaded. (See BOANERGES.)

2. JAMES THE LESS, surnamed the brother of our Lord, (Gal. 1: 19.) was the son of Cleophas, otherwise called Alphaeus, and Mary, sister to the blessed virgin; conse quently, he was cousin-german to Jesus Christ. He was surnamed the Just, on account of the admirable holiness and purity of his life. He is said to have been a priest, and to have observed the laws of the Nazarites from his birth. Our Savior appeared to James the Less, eight days after his resurrection, 1 Cor. 15: 7. He was at Jerusalem, and was considered as a pillar of the church, when St. Paul first came thither after his conversion, (Gal. 1: 19.) A. D. 37. In the council of Jerusalem, held in the year 51, St. James gave his vote last; and the result of the council was principally formed from what St. James said, who, though he observed the ceremonies of the law, and was careful that others should observe them, was of opinion, that such a yoke was not to be imposed on the faithful converted from among the heathens, Acts 15: 13, &c. About A. D. 63, it is said James was commanded by the Jews to proclaim from one of the galleries of the temple, that Jesus of Nazareth was not the Messiah; instead of which he proclaimed him to be the Son of God, and Judge of the world. For this he was thrown from the battlement, and while praying for his murderers, was stoned to death.

James the Less was a person of great prudence and discretion, and was highly esteemed by the apostles and other Christians. Such, indeed, was his general reputation for piety and virtue, that, (as we learn from Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome,) Josephus thought, and declared it to be the common opinion, that the sufferings of the Jews, and the destruction of their city and temple, were owing to the anger of God, excited by the murder of James. This must be considered as a strong and remarkable testimony to the character of this apostle, as it is given by a person who did not believe that Jesus was the Christ. The passages of Josephus, referred to by those fathers upon this subject, are not found in his works now extant.

3. JAMES, GENERAL EPISTLE OF. Clement of Rome and Hermas allude to this epistle; and it is quoted by Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Jerome, Chrysostom, Augustine, and many other fathers. But though the antiquity of this epistle had been always undisputed, some few formerly doubted its right to be admitted into the canon. Eusebius says, that in his time it was generally, though not universally, received as canonical, and publicly read in most, but not in all, churches; and Estius affirms, that after the fourth century, no church or ecclesiastical writer is found who ever doubted its authenticity; but that, on the contrary, it is included in all subsequent catalogues of canonical Scripture, whether published by councils, churches, or individuals. It had, indeed, been the uniform tradition of the church, that this epistle was written by James the Just; but it was not universally admitted, till after the fourth century, that James the Just was the same as James the Less, one of the twelve apostles; that point being ascertained, the canonical authority of this epistle was no longer doubted.

It has always been considered as a circumstance very much in favor of this epistle, that it is found in the Syriac version, which was made as early as the end of the first century, and for the particular use of converted Jews,—the very description of persons to whom it was originally addressed. Hence we infer, that it was from the first acknowledged by those for whose instruction it was intended; and “I think,” says Dr. Doddridge, “it can hardly be doubted that they were better judges of the question of its authenticity than the Gentiles, to whom it was not written; among whom, therefore, it was not likely to be propagated so early; and who at first might be prejudiced against it, because it was inscribed to the Jews.”

The immediate design of this epistle was to animate the Jewish Christians to support with fortitude and patience any sufferings to which they might be exposed, and to enforce the genuine doctrine and practice of the gospel, in opposition to the errors and vices which then prevailed among them. St. James begins by showing the benefits of trials and afflictions, and by assuring the Jewish Christians that God would listen to their sincere prayers for assistance and support: he reminds them of their being the distinguished objects of divine favor, and exhorts them to practical religion; to a just and impartial regard for the poor, and to an uniform obedience to all the commands of God, without any distinction or exception; he shows the inefficacy of faith without works, that is, unless followed by moral duties; he inculcates the necessity of a strict government of the tongue, and cautions them against censoriousness, strife, malevolence, pride, indulgence of their sensual passions, and rash judgment; he denounces threats against those who make an improper use of riches; he intimates the approaching destruction of Jerusalem; and concludes with exhortations to patience, devotion, and a solicitous concern for the salvation of others.

This epistle is written with great perspicuity and energy, and it contains an excellent summary of those practical duties and moral virtues which are required of Christians. Although the author wrote to the Jews dispersed throughout the world, yet the state of his native land passed more immediately before his eyes. Its final overthrow was approaching; and oppressions, factions, and violent scenes troubled all ranks, and involved some professing Christians in suffering, others in guilt, James 5: 8, 9.—Watson.

JAMES, (THOMAS,) a learned English critic and divine, was born 1571, and educated at Oxford. In 1602, he was designated first keeper of the public library in that university, to which were soon added some other preferments. In 1620 he resigned his place as keeper, and devoted himself more intensely to study. In 1624, he thus writes to archbishop Usher: “I have of late given myself wholly to the reading of manuscripts, and in them I find so many and so pregnant testimonies either fully for our religion, or against the papists, that it is to be wondered at.” He had published more than twenty learned works, and had commenced the collation of all the manuscripts of the fathers in all the libraries of England, in order to detect the forgeries of the popish editions, when he was arrested by death, in August, 1629. No man exceeded him in indefatigable industry.—Middleton, vol. ii. p. 486.

JANEWAY, (JOHN.) This very pious and extraordinary young man was born at Lyly, Hertford, in 1633, of religious parents, to whom he gave early hopes of much comfort, by his mental superiority. He entered Cambridge at seventeen, and at eighteen it pleased God to bring his soul to the Savior, in part by means of Baxter's Saint's Rest. He now looked upon human learning as useless, if not fixed below Christ, and pursued for Christ; without whom it can only augment the soul's capacity for guilt and misery. His zeal now glowed for the salvation of souls, especially of those nearly related to him. Secret prayer now became his element, his joy, and his strength, and his great instrument of success. On leaving college, his father being dead, he went to live in the family of Dr. Cox, where his health sunk under his studies and labors; and he finished his short course in June, 1657, aged twenty-four. His lying bed was a scene of triumph. “I am going,” said he, “to him whom I love above life. I charge you all, do not pray for my life any more. You do me wrong if you do. Oh that glory, that unspeakable glory that I behold. My heart is full.”—Middleton, vol. iii. p. 362.

JANNES and JAMBRES; the two chief magicians who resisted Moses, in Egypt, by pretending to perform similar wonders, 2 Tim. 3: 8. The paraphrast Jonathan, on Num. 23: 22, says they were the two sons of Balaam, who accompanied him to Balak, king of Moab. They are called by several names, in several translations. Artapanus affirms, that Pharaoh sent for magicians, from Upper Egypt, to oppose Moses; and Ambrosiaster or Hilary the Deacon says they were brothers. Numenius, cited by Aristobulus, says, “Jannes and Jambres were sacred scribes of the Egyptians, who excelled in magic, at the time when the Jews were driven out of Egypt. These were the only persons whom the Egyptians found capable of opposing Moses, who was a man whose prayers to God were very powerful. These two men, Jannes and Jambres, were alone able to frustrate the calamities which Moses brought upon the Egyptians.”

The Mussulmen have several particulars to the same purpose. Their recital supposes, that the magicians wrought no miracle, but only played conjuring tricks, in which they endeavored to impose upon the eyes of spectators. Moses, however, expresses himself as if Pharaoh's magicians operated the same effects as himself; so that Pharaoh and his whole court were persuaded, that the power of their magicians was equal to that of Moses, till those magicians themselves were constrained to acknowledge, This is the finger of God! Exod. 8: 18, 19. (See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.)—Calmet.

JANSENISTS; a denomination of Roman Catholics in France, which was formed in the year 1640. They follow the opinions of Jansenius, bishop of Ypres, from whose writings the following propositions are said to have been extracted:—1. That there are divine precepts which good men, notwithstanding their desire to observe them, are, nevertheless, absolutely unable to obey; nor has God given them that measure of grace which is essentially necessary to render them capable of such obedience. 2. That no person in this corrupt state of nature, can resist the influence of divine grace, when it operates upon the mind. 3. That, in order to render human actions capable of merit or demerit, it is not requisite that they be exempt from necessity; but that they be free from constraint. 4. That the Semi-Pelagians err greatly, in maintaining that the human will is endowed with the power either of obeying or resisting the aids and influences of preventing grace. 5. That whoever affirms that Jesus Christ made expiation, by his sufferings and death, for the sins of all mankind, is a Semi-Pelagian. Of these propositions, pope Innocent X. condemned the first four as heretical, and the last as rash and impious. But he did this without asserting that these were the doctrines of Jansenius, or even naming him; which did not satisfy his adversaries, nor silence him. The next pope, however, Alexander VII., was more particular, and determined the said propositions to be the doctrines of Jansenius; which excited no small trouble in the Gallican church.

This denomination was also distinguished from many of the Roman Catholics, by their maintaining that the Holy Scriptures and public liturgies should be given to the people in their mother tongue; and they consider it as a matter of importance to inculcate upon all Christians, that true piety does not consist in the performance of external devotions, but in inward holiness and divine love.

As to Jansenius, it must be confessed that he was more diligent in the search of truth, than courageous in its defence. It is said that he read through the whole of St. Augustine's works ten, and some parts thirty, times. From these he made a number of excerpta, which he collected in his book called "Augustinus." This he had not the courage to publish; but it was printed after his death, and from it his enemies, the Jesuits, extracted the propositions above named; but the correctness and fidelity of their extracts may be justly questioned. Jansenius himself, undoubtedly, held the opinions of Calvin on unconditional election, though he seems to have been reserved in avowing them.

The Jansenists of Port Royal may be denominated the evangelical party of the Catholic church: among their number were the famous Father Quessel, Pierre Nicole, Pascal, De Sacy, Duguet, and Arnauld; the last of whom is styled by Boileau, "the most learned mortal that ever lived." They consecrated all their great powers to the service of the cross; and for their attachment to the grand article of the Protestant Reformation,—justification by faith, with other capital doctrines, they suffered the loss of all things. The Jesuits, their implacable enemies, never ceased until they prevailed upon their sovereign, Louis XIV., to destroy the abbey of Port Royal, and banish its inhabitants. It must be confessed, however, that all the Jansenists were not like the eminent men whom we have just mentioned; and even these were tinged with enthusiasm and superstition. Some of them even pretended to work miracles, by which their cause was greatly injured.—Watson; Hend. Buck.

JAPHETH, the son of Noah, who is commonly named the third in order of Noah's sons, was born in the five hundredth year of that patriarch; (Gen. 5: 32.) but Moses (Gen. 10: 21.) says expressly he was the oldest of Noah's sons, according to our translation, and those of the Septuagint and Symmachus. Abraham was named the first of Terah's sons, "not from primogeniture, but from pre-eminence," as the father of the faithful, and the illustrious ancestor of the Israelites, and of the Jews, whose "seed was Christ," according to the flesh; with whose history the Old Testament properly commences: "Now these are the generations of Terah," &c.; (Gen. 11: 27.) all the preceding parts of Genesis being only introductory to this. By the same analogy, Shem, the second son of Noah, is placed first of his three sons, (Gen. 5: 32.) and Japheth, "the eldest," last. Compare Gen. 10: 21. 11: 20. Thus Isaac is put before Ishmael, though fourteen years younger, 1 Chron. 1: 28. And Solomon, the eldest, is reckoned the last of Bathsheba's children, 1 Chron. 3: 5.

Japheth signifies enlargement; and how wonderfully did Providence enlarge the boundaries of Japheth! His posterity diverged eastwards and westwards; from the original settlement in Armenia, through the whole extent of Asia, north of the great range of Taurus, distinguished by the general names of Tartary and Siberia, as far as the Eastern ocean; and in process of time, by an easy passage across Behring's straits, the entire continent of America; and they spread in the opposite direction, throughout the whole of Europe, to the Atlantic ocean; thus literally encompassing the earth, within the precincts of the northern temperate zone. While the enterprising and warlike genius of this hardy hunter-race frequently led them to encroach on the settlements, and to dwell in "the tents of Shem," whose pastoral occupations rendered them more inactive, peaceable, and unwarlike; as when the Scythians invaded Media, and overran western Asia southwards, as far as Egypt, in the days of Cyaxares; and when the Greeks, and afterwards the Romans, subdued the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians, in the East, and the Scythians and Jews in the South, as foretold by the Assyrian prophet, Balaam:—

"And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim,
And shall afflict the Assyrians, and afflict the Hebrews;
But he [the invader] shall perish himself at last."

Núm. 24: 24.

Chittim here denotes the southern coasts of Europe, bordering on the Mediterranean sea, called the "isles of the Gentiles," Gen. 10: 5. And, in later times, the Tartars in the East have repeatedly invaded and subdued the Hindoos and Chinese; while the warlike and enterprising genius of the British isles has spread their colonies, their arms, their arts, and their language, and, in some measure, their religion, from the rising to the setting sun. (See DIVISION OF THE EARTH.)

Japheth was known, by profane authors, under the name of Japetus. The poets make him father of heaven and earth. The Greeks believed that Japheth was the father of their race, and acknowledged nothing more ancient than him. Hence the phrase, Old as Japetus.—Watson.

JAR. (See JAIR.)

JAREB; (Hos. 5: 13. 10: 6.) the name of a king, or more probably of an idol, for it was common among the heathen to call their idols kings.—Calmet.

JASHER, (Book of;) a modern apocryphal work, intended to impose on the credulous and ignorant, to sap the credit of the books of Moses, and to blacken the character of Moses himself. It pretends to be a translation of the ancient record, mentioned Josh. 10: 13, and 2 Sam. 1: 18, but is one of the most clumsy and impudent forgeries that ever were attempted to be palmed on the public. It was first published by Jacob Ilive, a printer, in 1751, in quarto, who worked it off secretly by night, at a private press.—Hend. Buck.

JASON, a high-priest of the Jews, and brother of Onias III., was a man of unbounded ambition, who scrupled not to divest his brother of the high-priesthood, in order to seize that dignity himself, sacrilegiously purchasing it of Antiochus Epiphanes. Jason did all he could to abolish the worship of God in Jerusalem, and to prevail with the very priests to adopt the religion of the Greeks. He is to be considered as the cause of all the calamities which befel the Jews under Antiochus. He died at Lacedæmon, a city in alliance with the Jews, to which he had fled from Aretas, or Menelaus; and his body remained without burial, the greatest indignity that could be offered to him.

2. Paul's kinsman, and his host at Thessalonica, (Rom. 16: 21.) hazarded his life to preserve him during a sedition in that city, Acts 17: 7.—Calmet.

JASPER; (Heb. jaspeth, Exod. 28: 20. 39: 13, and Ezek. 28: 13. Gr. iaspis, Rev. 4: 3, and 21: 11, 18, 19.)

The Greek and Latin name, jaspis, as well as the English jasper, is plainly derived from the Hebrew, and leaves little room to doubt what species of gem is meant by the original word. The jasper is usually defined, a hard stone, of a bright, beautiful, green color; sometimes clouded with white, and spotted with red or yellow.—Watson.

JAVAN, or Iov, (for the Hebrew word, differently pointed, forms both names,) was the fourth son of Japheth, and the father of all those nations which were included under the name of Grecians, or Ionians, as they were invariably called in the East. (See DIVISION OF THE EARTH, and GREECE.)—Watson.

JAVELIN. (See ARMS, MILITARY.)

JEALOUSY, is that particular uneasiness which arises from the fear that some rival may rob us of the affection of one whom we greatly love, or suspicion that he has already done it. The first sort of jealousy is inseparable from love, before it is in possession of its object; the latter is unjust, generally mischievous, and always troublesome.

God's tender love towards his church is sometimes called jealousy. Paul says to the Corinthians, that he is jealous over them with a godly jealousy, that he might present them as a chaste virgin to Christ. The word, however, is frequently used to express the vindictive acts of dishonored love. Thus the Psalmist, (79: 5.) representing the church as smarting under divine judgments, occasioned by her infidelity to God, says, "How long, Lord, shall thy jealousy burn like fire?" See also 1 Cor. 10: 22.

WATERS OF JEALOUSY.—There is something very striking in the solemn process prescribed in Num. 5: 11—31, for the detection and punishment of a woman who had excited her husband's jealousy, without affording him the ordinary means of proving her infidelity. (See ADULTERY.)—Hend. Buck; Calmet.

JEARIM, (mount;) Josh. 15: 10; a boundary of the inheritance of Judah. It was a woody mountain, on which the city of Balah, or Kirjath-jearim, was situated.—Calmet.

JEBUS; the son of Canaan, (Gen. 10: 16.) and father of the people of Palestine called Jebusites. Their dwelling was in Jerusalem and round about, in the mountains. This people were very warlike, and held Jerusalem till David's time, Josh. 15: 65. 2 Sam. 5: 6, &c.—Watson.

JEDUTHUN; a Levite of Merari's family; and one of the four great masters of music belonging to the temple, 1 Chron. 16: 41. He is the same as Ethan; and some of the psalms are said to have been composed by him, as Psalm 89, entitled, "Of Ethan the Ezrahite;" also 39, 62, and 77, under the name of Jeduthun. There are some psalms with the name of Jeduthun affixed to them, which seem to have been composed during, or after, the captivity. These were probably composed, or sung, by his descendants, or class.—Calmet.

JEGAR-SHADUTHA; (the heap of witness, Gen. 31: 47, &c.) The term is Chaldee, and it is usually thought to prove that the Chaldee language was different from the Hebrew. It might be so; but, we should remember that Jacob gave two names to this place, "Galed, and Mizpah." Might not Laban do the same? varying the term, as Mizpah differs from Galed; for it does not appear that Laban when speaking afterwards uses the Chaldee words, Jegar shadutha; but the Hebrew words which Jacob used, "this (gal) heap be witness, and this (mizpeth) pillar be witness." So that in these instances he certainly retained his Hebrew. (See STONES.)—Calmet.

JEHOAHAZ, otherwise SHALLEN; the son of Josiah, king of Judah, Jer. 22: 11. Jehoahaz was made king in his room, though he was not Josiah's eldest son, 2 Kings 23: 30—32. He was in all probability thought fitter than any of his brethren to make head against the king of Egypt. He reigned, however, only three months in Jerusalem, B. C. 609.—Watson.

JEHOIACHIN; king of Judah, otherwise called Coniah, (Jer. 22: 24.) and Jeconiah, 1 Chron. 3: 17. He ascended the throne, and reigned only three months. It seems he was born about the time of the first Babylonish captivity, A. M. 3398, when Jehoiahim, or Eliakim, his father, was carried to Babylon. Jehoiahim returned from Babylon, and reigned till A. M. 3405, when he was killed by the Chaldeans, in the eleventh year of his reign; and was succeeded by this Jehoiahin, who reigned alone three months and ten days; but he reigned about ten years in conjunction with his father. Thus 2 Kings 24: 8, is reconciled with 2 Chron. 36: 9. In the former of these passages, he is said to have been eighteen when he began to reign, and in Chronicles only eight; that is, he was only eight when he began to reign with his father, and eighteen when he began to reign alone. The words of the prophet Jeremiah, (22: 30,) are not to be taken in the strictest sense; since he was the father of Salathiel and others, 1 Chron. 3: 17, 18. Matt. 1: 12. It signifies that he should have no heir to his throne; as proved to be the fact.—Watson.

JEHOIADA, by Josephus called Joadus, succeeded Azariah in the high-priesthood. In 1 Chron. 6: 9, 10, Johanan and Azariah seemed to be confounded with Jehoiaad and Zechariah. This excellent high-priest, with his wife Jehoshabath, rescued Joash, son of Joram, king of Judah, when but one year old, from the murderous violence of Athaliah, and concealed him in the temple. After seven years, he set him on the throne of David, 2 Kings 11, 12, and 2 Chron. 23, 24. (See ATHALIAH, and JOASH.) While Jehoiaad lived, and Joash followed his advice, every thing happily succeeded. The high-priest formed a design of repairing the temple, and collected considerable sums in the cities of Judah; but the Levites did not acquit themselves of their commission with diligence till after the king was of age, and the prince and the high-priest united their authority in promoting the design, 2 Kings 12, and 2 Chron. 24: 5, &c. He died B. C. 834, aged one hundred and thirty.—Calmet.

JEHOIAKIM, or ELIAKIM, brother and successor of Jehoahaz, king of Judah, was made king by Necho, king of Egypt, at his return from an expedition against Carchemish, (2 Kings 23: 34—36.) B. C. 609.

In 2 Chron. 36: 6, according to the Hebrew, it is said, that Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim in chains to carry him to Babylon; and Daniel relates, that the Lord delivered Jehoiakim into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar; that that prince carried to Babylon a great part of the vessels belonging to the house of God, with some captives, among whom were Daniel and his companions; but he does not say that Jehoiakim was carried there. The books of Kings and Chronicles inform us, that Jehoiakim reigned eleven years at Jerusalem, 2 Kings 23: 36. 2 Chron. 36: 5. Jeremiah says, that Nebuchadnezzar retook Carchemish from Necho, king of Egypt, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim; and elsewhere, that the first year of Nebuchadnezzar agreed with the fourth of Jehoiakim. All these chronological marks evince, that Nebuchadnezzar did not come into Judea till A. M. 3399, which is the fourth year of Jehoiakim; that Jehoiakim was not carried into Babylon, but put in chains in order to be removed thither, yet afterwards was set at liberty, and left at Jerusalem; and lastly, that Jehoiakim was four years subject to Necho, before he became tributary to Nebuchadnezzar.

After a vile and turbulent reign of eleven years, Jehoiakim was taken, slain, and thrown into the common sewer, B. C. 599, as Jeremiah had predicted, Jer. 22: 18, 19. 26: 23.—Calmet.

JEHORAM, son and successor of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, (2 Kings 8: 16,) was born A. M. 3060, and associated with his father in the kingdom, A. M. 3112. He reigned alone after the death of Jehoshaphat, and died, according to Usher, B. C. 885. His queen, Athaliah, daughter of Omri, engaged him in idolatry, and other sins, which produced calamities throughout his reign. Jehoram, being settled in the kingdom, began his career with the murder of all his brothers, whom Jehoshaphat had removed from public business, and placed in the fortified cities of Judah. To punish his impiety, the Lord permitted the Edomites who had been subject to the kings of Judah to revolt, 2 Kings 8: 20, 21. 2 Chron. 21: 8, 9. He died and was buried in Jerusalem, but not in a royal sepulchre, B. C. 885.—Calmet.

JEHOSHAPHAT, son of Asa, a pious and illustrious king of Judah, ascended the throne when aged thirty-five, and reigned twenty-five years. He prevailed against Baasha, king of Israel; and placed garrisons in the cities of Judah and Ephraim, which had been conquered by his father. He demolished the high places and groves, and God was with him, because he was faithful. In the third year of his reign he sent officers, with priests and Levites, throughout Judah, with the book of the law, to instruct the people, and God blessed his zeal. He was feared by all his neighbors; and the Philistines and Arabians were tributaries to him. He built several houses in Judah in the form of towers, and fortified several cities. He generally kept an army, or more probably an enrolled militia, of a million of men, without reckoning the troops in his strong holds.

Scripture, however, reproaches Jehoshaphat on account of his alliance with the idolatrous Ahab, king of Israel, 1 Kings 22: 44. 2 Chron. 18: 35. 19: 1, &c. Jehoshaphat repaired his fault by the regulations and good order which he afterwards established in his dominions, both as to civil and religious affairs; by appointing honest and able judges, by regulating the discipline of the priests and Levites, and by enjoining them to perform punctually their duty. After this, God gave him in answer to his prayers a complete triumph over the Moabites, Ammonites, and Meonians, people of Arabia Petraea.

Some time afterwards, Jehoshaphat, repeating his error, agreed with Ahaziah, the idolatrous king of Israel, jointly to equip a fleet in the port of Ezion-gaber, on the Red sea, in order to go to Tarshish, (ver. 35, 36,) and was punished by the loss of his fleet. He died, after reigning twenty-five years, and was buried in the royal sepulchre, B. C. 889, 2 Chron. 21: 1, &c. 1 Kings 22: 42.—Calmet.

JEHOSHAPHAT, (VALLEY OF.) This valley is a deep and narrow gulf, which runs from north to south, between the mount of Olives and mount Moriah; the brook Cedron flowing through the middle of it, which is dry the greatest part of the year, but has a current of a red color, after storms, or in rainy seasons.

The prophet Joel (3: 2, 12,) says, "The Lord will gather all nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there." Some maintain that the ancient Hebrews had named no particular place the valley of Jehoshaphat; but that Joel intended generally the place where God would judge the nations, and will appear at the last judgment in the brightness of his majesty. Jehoshaphat, in Hebrew, signifies "the judgment of God." It is very probable that the valley of Jehoshaphat, that is, of God's judgment, is symbolical, as well as the valley of slaughter, in the same chapter. From this passage, however, the Jews and many Christians have been of opinion, that the last judgment will be solemnized in the valley of Jehoshaphat.—Calmet; Watson.

JEHOVAH, (SELF-EXISTENT;) the awful and incommunicable name of the Divine Essence. It seems to be a compound of JAH, the Essence, and HAVAH, existing; that is, always existing; whence the word ETERNAL appears best to express its import. It is well rendered, "He who is, and who was, and who is to come," (Rev. 1: 4. 11: 17.) that is, as the schoolmen speak, ETERNAL, both a parte ante, and a parte post. Compare John 8: 58. That this name was known to the heathens, as the God of the Hebrews, there can be no doubt. Sanchoniaton writes it Jebo; Diodorus the Sicilian, Macrobius, Clemens Alexandrinus, Jerome, and Origen, write it Jao; Epiphanius, Theodoret, and the Samaritans, Jabe, Jaré. The Latins hence took their Jovis Pater. The Egyptians also seem to have some acquaintance with its sublime meaning, for on the temple of Isis was the following inscription, evidently borrowed from it: "I am whatever is, was, and will be, and no mortal has ever raised my veil."

According to Exod. 6: 2, 3, God never revealed himself by this peculiar and glorious name before the time of Moses; though Moses himself employs it in narrating the history of patriarchs.

The Jews, after their captivity in Babylon, out of an excessive and superstitious respect for this name, left off to pronounce it, and thus lost the true pronunciation. The Septuagint generally renders it Kurios, "the Lord." Origen, Jerome, and Eusebius, testify that in their time the Jews left the name of Jehovah written in their copies in Samaritan characters, instead of writing it in the common Chaldee or Hebrew characters; which shows their veneration for this holy name; and the fear they were under, lest strangers who were not unacquainted with the Chaldee letters and language, should discover and misap-ply it. Josephus calls this Tetragrammaton, or four-lettered name, (Heb. JHVH,) the shuddering name of God.

The Jewish cabalists have refined much on the name Jehovah. The letters which compose it they affirm to abound with mysteries. He who pronounces it shakes heaven and earth, and inspires the very angels with terror. A sovereign authority resides in it; it governs the world; is the fountain of graces and blessings; the channel through which God's mercies are conveyed to men.

It would be waste of time and patience to repeat all that has been said on this INCOMMUNICABLE NAME. It may not be amiss, however, to remind the reader, 1. That although it signifies the state of being, yet it forms no verb. 2. It never assumes a plural form. 3. It does not admit an article, or take an affix. 4. Neither is it placed in a state of construction with other words; though other words may be in construction with it.

It is usually marked in Jewish books, where it must be alluded to, by an abbreviation, (Jod.) It is also abbreviated in the term JAH, which, the reader will observe, enters into the formation of many Hebrew appellations. (See JAH.) In our version it is printed LORD, in large capitals. As applied to Christ, it becomes a decisive testimony to his divine nature, Ps. 97, and 103. Jer. 23: 5, 6, and 33: 15, 16. Mal. 3: 1. Isa. 40: 3—11.—Hend. Buck; Calmet; Watson; Jones; Robinson's Bib. Repos., 1833, 1834.

JEHOVAH JIREH; (Jehovah will provide; or, perhaps, shall be seen.) Abraham used this expression in allusion to the question of Isaac, (Gen. 22: 8.) touching the victim for sacrifice, and gave this name to a place, (Gen. 22: 14.) in such a manner that in after ages, (at the time when Ezra revised the copy,) it became usual to say, "In this mountain Jehovah shall provide; this is where we expect his appearance." When we consider the building of the temple of Solomon nearly adjacent, (if not on the very spot,) where "the Lord had chosen to put his name;" (Deut. 12: 5. 1 Kings 14: 21. 2 Chron. 12: 13.) and also the crucifixion of Jesus, at, or near, perhaps on, this very spot, we cannot but think that such titles not only commemorated past facts, but predicted future expectations.—Calmet.

JEHOVAH NISSI; (Jehovah my banner.) Among the most perplexing passages of Scripture, is Exod. 17: 15, 16: "And Moses built an altar—rather, consecrated a piece of ground for a sacrificial—and called its name, JEHOVAH NISSI: the Lord exalthee me; or, Jehovah my banner—or streamer—or signal; [or, perhaps, 'To Jehovah of lifting up;'] i. e. he to whom I lifted up my hands, in prayer against Amalek. And he said, Because the Lord hath smorn war with Amalek—so our translation; but the Hebrew is, 'Because of the hand upon—above—or against the throne of Jehovah, war against Amalek.' Either of these renderings, implies two memorials of the vengeance to be taken on Amalek: (1.) The writing in the book of the law, which the king was to copy out for his personal study, mentioned in the preceding verse; (2.) A consecrated trophy, or elevation of some kind, to commemorate the battle fought under Moses, and to prefigure the future punishment of Amalek.—Calmet.

JEHOVAH SHALOM; (Jehovah of peace;) a name given by Gideon to an altar which he built in a place where an angel of Jehovah had appeared to him, and saluted him by saying, "Peace be to thee," Judg. 6: 24. Probably the name may be taken, (1.) To Jehovah of peace, that is, taking peace for general welfare; to the Divine Protector; (2.) As the words are usually rendered—Jehovah shall send peace; that is, we expect prosperity under the auspices of Jehovah. The phrase appears to have become, in after ages, a kind of proverb, as probably was the case with all those remarkable titles, which are come down to us. What else has been their preservation, when so many thousand other titles have perished?—Calmet.

JEHOVAH SHAMMAH; (Jehovah is there; or, the residence of Jehovah;) a name given by Ezekiel to a future holy city, which he describes in the close of his prophecy, chap. 48: 35, margin.—Calmet.

JEHOVAH TZIDEKENU; (Jehovah our righteousness, Jer. 23: 6. 33: 16, margin.) In the first of these passages we read of a branch, a king, called the Lord our righteousness; in the second passage we read, "This is the name wherewith she [Jerusalem] shall be called, the Lord our righteousness." Now the impropriety of calling a female, she, by the name of the Lord, masculine, is apparent; and the words "is the name" are supplied by our translators; but the word "name" is in the original in the former passage; where the words are, "and this his name is, which they shall call him, Jehovah our righteousness:" but in the latter passage the words are, literally, "and this is he that shall call her, Jehovah our righteousness."—Calmet.

JEHOZADAK; son and successor of Seraiah, high-priest of the Jews, (1 Chron. 6: 14, 15. Ezra 3: 2.) though it does not appear that he ever exercised the sacred functions.—Calmet.

JEHU, the son of Jehoshaphat, and grandson of Nimshi, captain of the troops of Joram, the king of Israel, was appointed by God to reign over Israel, and to avenge the sins committed by the house of Ahab, 1 Kings 19: 16. His history may be found in full in the books of Kings.

Yet, though Jehu had been the instrument in the hand of God for taking vengeance on the profane house of Ahab, we find him accused in Scripture of not entirely forsaking the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin in worshipping the golden calves, 2 Kings 10: 29, 31. It appears also that, in executing the divine indignation on the wicked house of Ahab, he was actuated more by the spirit of ambition and animosity than the fear of God, or a regard to the purity of his worship. And thus it is that God, in the course of his providence, makes use of tyrants and wicked men, as his instruments to execute his righteous judgments in the earth. After a reign of eight-and-twenty years over Israel, Jehu died, and was succeeded by his son, Jehoahaz; but his reign was embittered by the war which Hazaiah, king of Syria, long waged against him, 2 Kings 10: 32—36. His four descendants who succeeded him in the throne were Jehoahaz, Joash, Jeroboam II., and Zechariah.

2. JEHU, the prophet, son of Hanani, was sent by God to Baasha, king of Israel, to predict punishment for his misdeeds, 1 Kings 16: 1, 4. The Vulgate adds that Baasha, incensed at this message, put Jehu to death; but the Hebrew says, "Jehu having declared to Baasha what the Lord had pronounced against him, and that the Lord would treat his house as he had treated the house of Jeroboam; for this he slew him;" leaving it doubtful whether Baasha slew Jehu, or the Lord slew Baasha. What renders the latter more credible, is, that about thirty years after the death of Baasha, we find Jehu, son of Hanani, again sent by God to Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, 2 Chron. 19: 1, &c. Some think there were two persons named Jehu, sons of Hanani; but Calmet is of opinion that in the passage above quoted, the death of Baasha, not that of Jehu, is intimated.

It is said in chap. 20: 34, that the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat first and last, are written in the book of Jehu, son of Hanani, who is mentioned in the book of the Kings of Israel; whence it appears that the prophets employed themselves in recording the transactions of their times, and that what Jehu had written of this kind, was thought worthy to be inserted in the memoirs, in which the several events in every prince's reign were registered.—Watson; Calmet.

JENNINGS, (DAVID, D. D.,) a learned dissenting divine, was the son of an ejected minister, and born at Kibworth, in Leicestershire, in 1691. He was respectably educated in London; and, in 1714, entered on the sacred ministry. After some time he succeeded to the pastoral office in the Independent congregation, meeting in Old Gravel lane, Wapping. In 1743, he became a trustee of the charities of Mr. William Coward, and one of his lecturers at Little St. Helen's, and in the following year theological tutor at the academy founded by that gentleman. He now published several works of merit for the use of the students, particularly an "Introduction to the Use of the Globes and Orrery, and also, the Application of Astronomy to Chronology," &c. octavo, 1747; "An Appeal to Reason and Common Sense for the Truth of the Holy Scriptures;" "An Introduction to the Knowledge of Medals," octavo; and "A Treatise on Jewish Antiquities, with a Dissertation on the Hebrew Language," two volumes, octavo, which has been deservedly esteemed, and still maintains its reputation as one of the best works in our language on the subject.

Dr. Jennings died on the 16th of September, 1762. Besides the pieces already mentioned, he was the author of "Sermons to Young Persons," 1743, and a number of single sermons on particular occasions, especially one "On Preaching Christ," which has been often reprinted.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

JENYNS, (SOAME, Esq.,) a celebrated English writer, was born in London, in 1704. He was the only son of Sir Roger Jenyns, of Botolphsham. At St. John's college, Cambridge, his genius appeared in juvenile essays and poetical effusions, many of which were published in Dodsley's collection. He was elected member of parliament for Cambridge in 1741, and, being repeatedly re-elected, continued to sit in parliament till 1780. In 1775, he was appointed one of the lords of trade, which post he held till the board was abolished, in 1780.

For a considerable part of his life Mr. Jenyns was an avowed infidel, and is said to have sat down to read the Scriptures with a view to expose their spurious claims; but in the course of examination his mind was so overpowered with the evidence of their divine origin and authority, that he published the result in a small volume, entitled, "A View of the Internal Evidences of the Christian Religion," London, 1776; a book which has been extensively read, and which has produced no little controversy. Mr. Jenyns's works were collected and published in four volumes, octavo, London, 1790, with a Memoir of the author prefixed. He died at London, the 18th of December, 1787.

The intellectual powers of Mr. Jenyns were of a superior order; and Mr. Burke pronounced his style to be that of the purest English, the simplest, and most aboriginal language, the least tinged with foreign impregnation. Life by Cole, prefixed to his Works.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

JEPHTHAH, one of the judges of Israel, was the son of Gilead by a concubine, Judg. 11: 1, 2. Though early rejected by his brethren, he was subsequently called by the people to lead them in battle against the Ammonites, who had invaded Israel. At this time the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he made his celebrated vow to the Lord, that if he delivered the Ammonites into his hand, whatever came forth out of the doors of his house to meet him when he returned should be the Lord's; it is also added in our English version, "and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering," Judg. 11: 31. The battle terminated auspiciously for Jephthah; the Ammonites were defeated, and the Israelites ravaged their country. But on returning towards his own house, his daughter, an only child, came out to meet her father with timbrels and dances, accompanied by a chorus of virgins, to celebrate his victory. On seeing her, Jephthah rent his clothes, and said, "Alas, my daughter! thou hast brought me very low; for I have opened my mouth to the Lord, and cannot go back," Judg. 11: 34—39.

2. JEPHTHAH'S VOW. It is scarcely necessary to mention, that almost from the days of Jephthah to the present time, it has been a subject of warm contest among the critics and commentators, whether the judge of Israel really sacrificed his daughter, or only devoted her to a state of celibacy. Among those who contend for the former opinion, may be particularly mentioned the very learned professor Michælis, who insists most peremptorily that the word, "did with her as he had vowed," cannot mean any thing else but that her father put her to death, and burnt her body as a burnt-offering. On this point, however, the following remarks of Dr. Hales are of great weight:—When Jephthah went forth to battle against the Ammonites, "he vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, if thou wilt surely give the children of Ammon into my hand, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh out of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall either be the Lord's, or I will offer it up for a burnt-offering," Judg. 11: 30, 31. According to this rendering of the conjunctions, (etiam), in the last clause, either, or, (which is justified by the Hebrew idiom, the paucity of connecting particles in that language making it necessary that this conjunction should often be understood disjunctively,) the vow consisted of two parts: 1. That what person soever met him should be the Lord's, or be dedicated to his service. 2. That what best soever met him, if clean, should be offered up for a burnt-offering unto the Lord. This rendering, and this interpretation, is warranted by the Levitical law about vows. The neder, or nom, in general, included either persons, beasts, or things, dedicated to the Lord for pious uses; which, if it was a simple vow, was redeemable at certain prices, if the person repented of his vow, and wished to commute it for money, according to the age and sex of the person, Lev. 27: 1—8. This was a wise regulation to remedy rash vows. But if the vow was accompanied with cherem, devotement, it was irredemable, as in the following cases:—"Notwithstanding, no devotement which a man shall devote unto the Lord, [either] of man, or of beast, or of land of his own property, shall be sold or redeemed. Every thing devoted is most holy unto the Lord," Lev. 27: 28. Here the three vows in the original should necessarily be rendered disjunctively, or; as the last actually is in our public translation, because there are three distinct subjects of devotement, to be applied to distinct uses; the man, to be dedicated to the service of the Lord, as Samuel by his mother, Hannah; (1 Sam. 1: 11.) the cattle, if clean, such as oxen, sheep, goats, turtle-doves, or pigeons, to be sacrificed; and if unclean, as camels, horses, asses, to be employed for carrying burdens in the service of the tabernacle or temple; and the lands, to be sacred property. This law, therefore, expressly applied, in its first branch, to Jephthah's case, who had devoted his daughter to the Lord, or opened his mouth unto the Lord, and therefore could not go back; as he declared in his grief at seeing his daughter, and his only child, coming to meet him with timbrels and dances. She was, therefore, necessarily devoted, but with her own consent, to perpetual virginity, in the service of the tabernacle, Judg. 11: 36, 37. And such service was customary; for in the division of the spoils taken in the first Midianite war, of the whole number of captive virgins, "the Lord's tribute was thirty-two persons," Num. 31: 35—40. This instance appears to be decisive of the nature of her devotement. Her father's extreme grief on this occasion, and her requisition of a respite of two months to bewail her virginity, are both perfectly natural: having no other issue, he could only look forward to the extinction of his name or family; and a state of celibacy, which is reproachful among women every where, was peculiarly so among the Israelites; and was therefore no ordinary sacrifice on her part, who, though she generously gave up, could not but regret the loss of becoming "a mother in Israel." "And he did with her according to his vow which he had vowed, and she knew no man," or remained a virgin all her life, Judg. 11: 34—49.

Dr. Hales adds, "The other case of devotement, (Lev. 27: 27.) is utterly irrelative to Jephthah's vow, which did not regard a foreign enemy, or a domestic transgressor, devoted to destruction, but, on the contrary, was a vow of thanksgiving, and therefore properly came under the former case. And that Jephthah could not possibly have sacrificed his daughter, according to the vulgar opinion, founded on incorrect translation, may appear from the following considerations:—1. The sacrifice of children to Moloch was an abomination to the Lord, of which, in numberless passages, he expresses his detestation; and it was prohibited by an express law, under pain of death, as "a defilement of God's sanctuary, and a profanation of his holy name," Lev. 20: 2, 3. Such a sacrifice, therefore, unto the Lord himself, must be a still higher abomination. And there is no precedent of any such under the law, in the Old Testament. 2. The case of Isaac, before the law, is irrelevant; for Isaac was not sacrificed; and it was only proposed for a trial of Abraham's faith. 3. No father, merely by his own authority, could put an offending, much less an innocent, child to death, upon any account, without the sentence of the magistrates, (Deut. 21: 18—21.) and the consent of the people, as in Jonathan's case. 4. The Mischna, or traditional law of the Jews, is pointedly against it:—"If a Jew should devote his son or daughter, his man or maid servant, who are Hebrews, the devotement would be void; because no man can devote what is not his own, or of whose life he has not the absolute disposal."

These arguments appear to be decisive against the sacrifice; and that Jephthah could not even have devoted his daughter to celibacy against her will, is evident from the history, and from the high estimation in which she was always held by the daughters of Israel, for her filial duty, and her hapless fate, which they celebrated by a regular anniversary commemoration four days in the year, Judg. 11: 40. We may, however, remark, that, if it could be clearly established that Jephthah actually immolated his daughter, there is not the least evidence that his conduct was sanctioned by God. Jephthah was manifestly like Samson, an instrument of God's power, rather than an example of his grace.—Watson; Calmet; Jones.

JERAHMEEL, a district in the south of Judah, possessed by the descendants of Jerahmeel, son of Hezron, 1 Sam. 27: 10. 30: 29. David told Achish that he invaded the country of Jerahmeel, while he was ravaging the territories of the Amalekites, Geshurites, and Jezrites.—Calmet.

JEREMIAH. This amiable, but afflicted prophet, was of the sacerdotal race. ΑΝΑΘΟΥΡΑ, his native place, was only three miles north of Jerusalem. Some have supposed his father to have been that Hilkiah the high-priest, by whom the book of the law was found in the temple in the reign of Josiah: but for this there is no other ground than his having borne the same name.

Jeremiah appears to have been very young when he was called to the exercise of the prophetic office, from which he modestly endeavored to excuse himself by pleading his youth and incapacity; but being overruled by the divine authority, he set himself to discharge the duties of his function with unremitting diligence and fidelity during a period of at least forty-two years, reckoned from the thirtieth year of Josiah's reign. In the course of his ministry he met with great difficulties and opposition from his countrymen of all degrees, whose persecution and ill usage sometimes wrought so far upon his mind, as to draw from him expressions, in the bitterness of his soul, which many have thought hard to reconcile with his religious principles; but which, when duly considered, may be found to demand our pity for his unremitting sufferings, rather than our censure for any want of piety and reverence towards God. He was, in truth, a man of unblemished piety and conscientious integrity; a warm lover of his country, whose misery he pathetically deplores; and so affectionately attached to his countrymen, notwithstanding their injurious treatment of him, that he chose rather to abide with them, and undergo all hardships in their company, than separately to enjoy a state of ease and plenty, which the favor of the king of Babylon would have secured to him. At length, after the destruction of Jerusalem, being carried with the remnant of the Jews into Egypt, whither upon the murder of Gedaliah, whom the Chaldeans had left governor in Judea, they had resolved to retire, though contrary to his advice, he there continued warmly to remonstrate against their idolatrous practices, foretelling the consequences that would inevitably follow. But his freedom and zeal are said to have cost him his life; for the Jews at Tahpanhes, according to tradition, took such offence at him that they stoned him to death. Their wickedness, however, did not long pass without its reward; for, in a few years after, they were miserably destroyed by the Babylonian armies which invaded Egypt, according to the prophet's prediction, Jer. 44: 27, 28.

2. The idolatrous apostasy, and other criminal enormities of the people of Judah, and the severe judgments which God was prepared to inflict upon them, but not without a distant prospect of future restoration and deliverance, are the principal subject matters of the prophecies of Jeremiah; excepting only the forty-fifth chapter, which relates personally to Baruch, and the six succeeding chapters, which respect the fortunes of some particular heathen nations. It is observable, however, that though many of these prophecies have their particular dates annexed to them, and other dates may be tolerably well conjectured from certain internal marks and circumstances, there appears much disorder in the arrangement, not easy to be accounted for on any principle of regular design, but probably the result of some accident or other, which has disturbed the original order. The best arrangement of the chapters appears to be according to the list which will be subjoined; the different reigns in which the prophecies were delivered were most probably as follows: the first twelve chapters seem to contain all the prophecies delivered in the reign of the good king Josiah. During the short reign of Shallum, or Jehoahaz, his second son, who succeeded him, Jeremiah does not appear to have had any revelation. Jehoiaikim, the eldest son of Josiah, succeeded. The prophecies of this reign are continued on from the thirteenth to the twentieth chapter inclusively; to which we must add the twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, thirty-fifth, and thirty-sixth chapters, together with the forty-fifth, forty-sixth, forty-seventh, and most probably the forty-eighth, and as far as the thirty-fourth verse of the forty-ninth chapter. Jeconiah, the son of Jehoiaikim, succeeded. We read of no prophecy that Jeremiah actually delivered in this king's reign; but the fate of Jeconiah, his being carried into captivity, and continuing an exile till the time of his death, were foretold early in his father's reign, as may be particularly seen in the twenty-second chapter. The last king of Judah was Zedekiah, the youngest son of Josiah. The prophecies delivered in his reign are contained in the twenty-first and twenty-fourth chapters, the twenty-seventh to the thirty-fourth, and the thirty-seventh to the thirty-ninth inclusively, together with the last six verses of the forty-ninth chapter, and the fiftieth and fifty-first chapters, concerning the fall of Babylon. The siege of Jerusalem, in the reign of Zedekiah, and the capture of the city, are circumstantially related in the fifty-second chapter; and a particular account of the subsequent transactions is given in the fortieth to the forty-fourth inclusively. The arrangement of the chapters, alluded to above, is here subjoined: 1—20, 22, 23, 25, 26, 35, 36, 45, 24, 29, 31, 27, 28, 21, 34, 37, 32, 33, 38, 39, from the fifteenth to the eighteenth verse, 39, from the first to the fourteenth verse, 40—44, 46, and so on.

3. The prophecies of Jeremiah, of which the circumstantial accomplishment is often specified in the Old and New Testament, are of a very distinguished and illustrious character. He foretold the fate of Zedekiah, (Jer. 34: 2—5. 2 Chron. 36: 11—21. 2 Kings 25: 5. Jer. 52: 11.) the Babylonian captivity, the precise time of its duration, and the return of the Jews. He describes the destruction of Babylon, and the downfall of many nations, Jer. 25: 12. 9: 26. 25: 19—25. 42: 10—18. 46., and the following chapters, in predictions, of which the gradual and successive completion kept up the confidence of the Jews for the accomplishment of those prophecies, which he delivered relative to the Messiah and his period, Jer. 23: 5, 6. 30: 9. 31: 15. 32: 14—18. 33: 9—26. He foreshadowed the miraculous conception of Christ, (Jer. 31: 22.) the virtue of his atonement, the spiritual character of his covenant, and the inward efficacy of his laws, Jer. 31: 31—36. 33: 6. The reputation of Jeremiah had spread among foreign nations, and his prophecies were deservedly celebrated in other countries. Many heathen writers also have undesignedly borne testimony to the truth and accuracy of his prophetic and historical descriptions.

4. As to the style of Jeremiah, says bishop Lowth, this prophet is by no means wanting either in elegance or sublimity, although, generally speaking, inferior to Isaiah in both. His thoughts, indeed, are somewhat less elevated, and he is commonly more large and diffuse in his sentences; but the reason of this may be, that he is mostly taken up with the gentler passions of grief and pity, for the expression of which he has a peculiar talent. This is most evident in the Lamentations, where those passions altogether predominate; but it is often visible also in his Prophecies, in the former part of the book more especially, which is principally poetical; the middle parts are chiefly historical; but the last part, consisting of six chapters, is entirely poetical, and contains several oracles distinctly marked, in which this prophet falls very little short of the lofty style of Isaiah.

Jeremiah survived to behold the sad accomplishment of all his darkest predictions. He witnessed all the horrors of the famine, and, when that had done its work, the triumph of the enemy. He saw the strong holds of the city cast down, the palace of Solomon, the temple of God, with all its courts, its roofs of cedar and of gold, levelled to the earth, or committed to the flames; the sacred vessels, the ark of the covenant itself, with the cherubim, pillaged by profane hands. What were the feelings of a patriotic and religious Jew at this tremendous crisis, he has left on record in his unrivalled elegies. Never did city suffer 2 more miserable fate, never was ruined city lamented in language so exquisitely pathetic. Jesusa-<sup>er</sup>ez is, as it were, personified, and bewailed with the passionate sorrow of private and domestic attachment; while the more general pictures of the famine, the common misery of every rank, and age, and sex, all the desolation, the carnage, the violation, the dragging away into captivity, the remembrance of former glories, of the gorgeous ceremonies and the glad festivals, the awful sense of the divine wrath heightening the present calamities, are successively drawn with all the life and reality of an eye-witness. They combine the truth of history with the deepest paths of poetry. (See LAMENTATIONS.)—Watson.

JERICHO was a city of Benjamin, about twenty miles north-east from Jerusalem, and six from the Jordan, Josh. 18: 21. Moses calls it the city of palm-trees, Deut. 34: 3. Josephus says, that in the territory of this city were not only many palm-trees, but also the balsam-tree. (See BALSAM TREE.) The valley of Jericho was watered by a rivulet which had been formerly salt and bitter, but was sweetened by the prophet Elisha, 2 Kings 2: 19. Jericho was the first city in Canaan taken by Joshua, 2: 1, 2, &c. It being devoted by God, they set fire to the city, and consecrated all the gold, silver, and brass. Then Joshua said, "Cursed be the man before the Lord who shall rebuild Jericho." About five hundred and thirty years after this, Hiel, of Bethel, undertook to rebuild it; but he lost his eldest son, Abiram, at laying the foundations, and his youngest son, Segub, when he hung up the gates.

However, we are not to imagine that there was no city of Jericho till the time of Hiel. There was a city of palm-trees, probably the same as Jericho, under the judges, Judges 3: 13. David's ambassadors, who had been insulted by the Ammonites, resided at Jericho till their beards were grown, 2 Sam. 10: 4. There was, therefore, a city of Jericho which stood in the neighborhood of the original Jericho. These two places are distinguished by Josephus. After Hiel of Bethel had rebuilt old Jericho, no one scrupled to dwell there. In the days of Christ it was the second city in Judea. It had a circus and an amphitheatre, and in the beautiful palace he had here erected Herod died. Our Savior also wrought miracles at Jericho.

The modern village of Jericho is described by Mr. Buckingham as a settlement of about fifty dwellings, all very mean in their appearance, and fenced in front with thorny bushes, while a barrier of the same kind, the most effectual that could be raised against mounted Arabs, encircles the town. A fine brook flows by it, which empties itself into the Jordan; the nearest point to that river is about three miles distant. The grounds in the immediate vicinity of the village, being fertilized by this stream, bear crops of dourra, Indian corn, rice, and onions. The population is entirely Mahometan, and is governed by a sheik; their habits are those of Bedouins, and robbery and plunder form their chief and most gainful occupation.

According to Pococke, the mountains around this place are the highest in all Judea; and he is probably correct; they form part of a chain extending from Scythopolis into Idumea. The hills nearest to Jerusalem consist, according to Hasselquist, of a very hard limestone; and different sorts of plants are found on them, in particular the myrtle, the carob-tree, and the turpentine-tree; but further towards Jericho they are bare and barren, the hard limestone giving way to a looser kind, sometimes white and sometimes greyish, with interjacent layers of a reddish micaceous stone, saxum purum micaceum. The vales contain good red mould, which would amply reward the husbandman's toil, though now bare and uncultivated, and full of pebbles.

Nothing can be more savage than the present aspect of these wild and gloomy solitudes, through which runs the very road where is laid the scene of that exquisite parable, the good Samaritan; and from that time to the present, it has been the haunt of the most desperate banditti, being one of the most dangerous in Palestine. Sometimes the track leads along the edges of cliffs and precipices, which threaten destruction on the slightest false step; at other times it winds through craggy passes, overshadowed by projecting or perpendicular rocks. At one place the road has been cut through the very apex of a hill, the rocks overhanging it on either side. Here, in 1820, an English traveller, Sir Frederic Henniker, was attacked by the Arabs with fire-arms, who stripped him naked, and left him severely wounded:—"It was past mid-day, and burning hot," says Sir Frederic; "I bled profusely; and two vultures, whose business it is to consume corpses, were hovering over me. I should scarcely have had strength to resist, had they chosen to attack me." Here, pillage, wounds, and death would be accompanied with double terror, from the frightful aspect of every thing around. Here the unfeeling act of passing by a fellow-creature in distress, as the priest and Levite are said to have done, strikes one with horror, as an act almost more than inhuman. And here, too, the compassion of the good Samaritan is doubly virtuous, from the purity of the motive which must have led to it, in a spot where no eyes were fixed on him to draw forth the performance of any duty, and from the bravery which was necessary to admit of a man's exposing himself, by such delay, to the risk of a similar fate to that from which he was endeavoring to rescue his fellow-creature.—Watson; Calmet.

JEROBOAM, the son of Nebat, was born at Zereda, in the tribe of Ephraim, 1 Kings 11: 26. He is stigmatized in Scripture, as "he who made Israel to sin," by instituting the idolatrous worship of the golden calves at Dan and Bethel, 1 Kings 12: 26—33. He seems to have been a bold, unprincipled, and enterprising man, with much of the address of a deep politician about him; qualities which probably pointed him out to king Solomon as a proper person to be intrusted with the obnoxious commission of levying certain taxes throughout the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, 1 Kings 11: 14—39. Whether it were that the promises made by Ahijah prompted Jeroboam to aim at taking their accomplishment into his own hands, and, with a view to that, began to solicit the subjects of Solomon to revolt; or whether the bare information of what had passed between the prophet and Jeroboam, excited his fear and jealousy, it appears evident that the aged monarch took the alarm, and attempted to apprehend Jeroboam, who, getting notice of what was intended him, made a precipitate retreat into Egypt, where he remained till the death of Solomon. He then returned, and found that Rehoboam, who had succeeded his father Solomon in the throne of David, had already excited the disgust of ten of the tribes by some arbitrary proceedings, in consequence of which they had withdrawn their allegiance from the new monarch. These tribes no sooner heard of his return than they invited him to appear among them in a general assembly, in which they elected him to be king over Israel. Jeroboam fixed his residence at Shechem, and there fortified himself; he also rebuilt Penuel, a city beyond Jordan, putting it into a state of defence, in order to keep the tribes quiet which were on that side Jordan, 1 Kings 12: 1—25.

But Jeroboam soon forgot the duty which he owed to God, who had given him the kingdom; and thought of nothing but how to maintain himself in the possession of it, though he discarded the worship of the true God. The first suggestion of his unbelieving heart was, that if the tribes over whom he reigned were to go up to Jerusalem to sacrifice and keep the annual festivals, they would be under continual temptations to return to the house of David. To counteract this, he caused two golden calves to be made as objects of religious worship, one of which he placed at Dan, and the other at Bethel, the two extremities of his dominions; and caused a proclamation to be made throughout all his territories, that in future none of his subjects should go up to Jerusalem to worship; and, directing them to the two calves which had been recently erected, he cried out, "Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of Egypt!" He also caused idolatrous temples to be built, and priests to be ordained of the lowest of the people, who were neither of the family of Aaron nor of the tribe of Levi, 1 Kings 12: 26—33. Notwithstanding the manifest indication of the displeasure of Heaven, (1 Kings 13: 1—10.) it failed of recovering Jeroboam from his impious procedure. He continued to encourage his subjects in idolatry, by appointing priests of the high places, and engaging them in such worship as was contrary to the divine law. This was the sin of Jeroboam's family, and it was the cause of its utter extirpation. After a reign of two-and-twenty years, Jeroboam died, and Nadab, his son, succeeded for a moment to the crown, 1 Kings 13: 33, 34. 14: 1—20.

2. JEROBOAM, the second of that name, was the son of Jehoash, king of Israel. He succeeded to his father's royal dignity, A. M. 3179, and reigned forty-one years. Though much addicted to the idolatrous practices of the son of Nebat, yet the Lord was pleased so far to prosper his reign, that by his means, according to the predictions of the prophet Jonah, the kingdom of the ten tribes was restored from a state of great decay, into which it had fallen, and was even raised to a pitch of extraordinary splendor. The prophets Amos and Hosea, as well as Jonah, lived during this reign.—Watson.

JEROME, one of the most learned and productive authors of the early Latin church, was born about 331, in Dalmatia, of wealthy parents, educated with care in literary studies, and made familiar with the Roman and Greek classics, under the grammarian Donatus, at Rome. He did not escape the contaminating licentiousness of the capital, but his feelings were excited by the catacombs and tombs of the martyrs, and becoming inclined towards the Christian faith, he became acquainted with several of its preachers in Gaul, and on the Rhine, and was baptized before his fortieth year at Rome.

Having formed a high idea of the ascetic life, he retired in 374 into the deserts of Chalcis, where for four years he practised the severest mortifications, and applied himself to the most laborious studies. He now obtained ordination as presbyter of Antioch; went soon after to enjoy the instruction of Gregory Nazianzen at Constantinople; and at length proceeded to Rome, where his public exposition of the Scriptures procured him great favor, especially among the ladies; some of whom, matrons of rank in the fashionable world, together with their daughters, complied with his exhortations, and became nuns. Marcella and Paula are celebrated for the epistles which he wrote to them; and the latter accompanied him to Palestine in 386, where he founded a convent at Bethlehem, with her funds, and in her society, and where he died in A. D. 420.

His biblical labors are highly valuable. His Latin version of the Old Testament from the original Hebrew is the foundation of the Vulgate, and his commentaries contain much useful matter. He was the only one of the fathers who seems to have thoroughly studied the Hebrew, which he did, with the assistance of learned rabbins in Palestine. He engaged much in controversy, on which occasions he frequently displayed great acerbity. He had neither the philosophical genius nor the scriptural views of his celebrated contemporary Augustine; but he possessed a more extensive knowledge of the languages, and a glowing and lively imagination, which gave attractions to his style, and rendered him the most distinguished writer of his time.—Hend. Buck.

JEROME, (of Prague,) the celebrated lay-reformer, was born at Prague, about the year 1370. Very little is extant relative to the early part of his life; but he was very eager in the pursuit of knowledge, and spent his youth in the universities of Prague, Paris, Heidelberg, Cologne, and Oxford. At the latter university, he became acquainted with the works of Wickliffe; translated them into his native language; professed himself, on his return to Prague, to be an open favorer of him, and attached himself to the reformed in Bohemia, over whom Huss presided. Before the council of Constance, Jerome was cited on the 17th of April, 1415, when Huss was confined at that place. On his arrival, he found that he could not render any assistance to Huss, and therefore thought it prudent to retire; and on behalf of Huss, he wrote to the emperor. At Kirsaw, Jerome was seized by an officer of the duke of Sullybach, who immediately wrote to the council concerning him, and they directed him to send his prisoner to Constance. On his arrival at that place, he was immediately brought before the council, accused of his attachment to Protestant principles, and was remanded from the assembly into a dungeon. As he was there sitting, ruminating on his approaching fate, he heard a voice calling out in these words: "Fear not, Jerome, to die in the cause of that truth which, during thy life, thou hast defended." It was the voice of Madderwitz, who had contributed to the comfort of Huss; but, in consequence of it, Jerome was conveyed to a strong tower, and exposed to torture and want.

This suffering brought on him a dangerous illness, and attempts were then made to induce him to retract his principles; but he remained immovable. Unhappily, however, for his subsequent peace of mind, he was at length induced to retract, and acknowledged the errors of Wickliffe and Huss; assented to the condemnation of the latter; and declared himself a firm believer in the church of Rome. But the conscience of Jerome would not allow him to suffer that retraction to remain; and he accordingly recanted, and demanded a second trial.

Accordingly, in the month of May, 1416, Jerome was again called before the council, and charged with his adherence to the errors of Wickliffe; his having had a picture of him in his chamber; his denial of transubstantiation; with other matters of a similar description. On these articles he answered with equal spirit. Through the whole oration he manifested an amazing strength of memory. His voice was sweet, distinct, and full. Firm and intrepid, he stood before the council; collected in himself, and not only despising, but seeming even desirous of death.

His speech did not, however, excite pity; and he was delivered over to the civil power for martyrdom. When surrounded by blazing fagots, he cried out, "Oh, Lord God, have mercy upon me!" and a little afterwards, "Thou knowest how I have loved thy truth." With cheerful countenance he met his fate; and observing the executioner about to set fire to the wood behind his back, he cried out, "Bring thy torch hither: perform thy office before my face. Had I feared death, I might have avoided it." As the wood began to blaze, he sang a hymn, which the violence of the flames did not interrupt.

Jerome was, unquestionably, an excellent man. His Christianity must have been sincere thus to have supported him; and the uniform tenor of his aged and virtuous life corroborated the truth of that opinion. His temper was mild and affable, and the relations of life he supported with great piety and benevolence. He was a light set upon a hill; and though for a few moments it was obscured and darkened, yet it again burst forth, and continued to shine with splendor and advantage. JERUBBAAL. (See GIDEON.)

JERUEL; a wilderness west of the Dead sea, and south of Judah, where Jehoshaphat obtained a great victory over the Ammonites, Moabites, &c. It was called the valley of Berachah, or blessing; and lay between Engaddi and Tekoah, 2 Chron. 20: 26.—Calmet.

JERUSALEM; (the abode of peace; corrupted in the Greek, Hierosolyma, the sacred Solyma;) the celebrated capital of Palestine, originally the royal residence of Melchisedec, then the possession of the Jebusites, and ultimately the sacred metropolis of the Hebrews, situated on the boundary line of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin.

As Jerusalem was the centre of the true worship, (Ps. 122: 4.) and the place where God did in a peculiar manner dwell, first in the tabernacle, (2 Sam. 6: 7, 12. 1 Chron. 15: 1. 16: 1. Ps. 132: 13. 135: 2.) and afterwards in the temple, (1 Kings 6: 13.) so it is used figuratively to denote the church, or the celestial society, to which all that believe, both Jews and Gentiles, are come, and in which they are initiated, Gal. 4: 56. Heb. 12: 22. Rev. 3: 12. 21: 2, 10.

Jerusalem was situated in a stony and barren soil, and was about sixty furlongs in length, according to Strabo. The territory and places adjacent were well watered, having the fountains of Gihon and Siloam, and the brook Cedron, at the foot of its walls; and, besides these, there were the waters of Ethan, which Pilate had conveyed through aqueducts into the city. The ancient city of Jerusalem or Jebus, which David took from the Jebusites, was not very large. It was seated upon a mountain southward of the temple. The opposite mountain, situated to the north, is Sion, where David built a new city, which he called the city of David, wherein was the royal palace, and the temple of the Lord. The temple was built upon mount Moriab, which was one of the little hills belonging to mount Sion.

Through the reigns of David and Solomon, Jerusalem was the metropolis of the whole Jewish kingdom, and continued to increase in wealth and splendor. It was resorted to at the festivals by the whole population of the country; and the power and commercial spirit of Solomon, improving the advantages acquired by his father David, centred in it most of the eastern trade, both by sea, through the ports of Elath and Ezion-Geber, and over land, by the way of Tadmor or Palmyra. Or, at least, though Jerusalem might not have been made a depot of merchandise, the quantity of precious metals flowing into it by direct importation, and by duties imposed on goods passing to the ports of the Mediterranean, and in other directions, was unbounded. Some idea of the prodigious wealth of Jerusalem at this time may be formed, by stating, that the quantity of gold left by David for the use of the temple amounted to twenty-one million six hundred thousand pounds sterling, besides three million one hundred and fifty thousand pounds in silver; and Solomon obtained three million two hundred and forty thousand pounds in gold by one voyage to Ophir, while silver was so abundant, "that it was not any thing accounted of." These were the days of Jerusalem's glory. Universal peace, unmeasured wealth, the wisdom and clemency of the prince, and the worship of the true God, marked Jerusalem, above every city, as enjoying the presence and the especial favor of the Almighty.

But these days were not to last long: intestine divisions and foreign wars, wicked and tyrannical princes, and last of all, the crime most offensive to Heaven, and the one least to be expected amongst so favored a people, led to a series of calamities, through the long period of nine hundred years, with which no other city or nation can furnish a parallel. After the death of Solomon, ten of the twelve tribes revolted from his successor Rehoboam, and, under Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, established a separate kingdom: so that Jerusalem, no longer the capital of the whole empire, and its temple frequented only by the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, must have experienced a mournful declension. Four years after this, the city and temple were taken and plundered by Shishak, king of Egypt, 1 Kings 14: 26, 27. 2 Chron. 12: 2—9. One hundred and forty-five years after, under Amaziah, they sustained the same fate from Joash, king of Israel, 2 Kings 14. 2 Chron. 25. One hundred and sixty years from this period, the city was again taken, by Esarhaddon, king of Assyria; and Manasseh, the king, carried a prisoner to Babylon, 2 Chron. 33. Within the space of sixty-six years more, it was taken by Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt, whom Josiah, king of Judah, had opposed in his expedition to Carchemish; and who, in consequence, was killed at the battle of Megiddo, and his son Eliakim placed on the throne in his stead by Necho, who changed his name to Jehoiakim, and imposed a heavy tribute upon him, having sent his elder brother, Jehozabaz, who had been proclaimed king at Jerusalem, a prisoner to Egypt, where he died, 2 Kings 23. 2 Chron. 35.

Jerusalem was three times besieged and taken by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, within a very few years. The first, in the reign of the last-mentioned king, Jehoiakim, who was sent a prisoner to Babylon, and the vessels of the temple transported to the same city, 2 Chron. 36. The second, in that of his son Jehoiachin: when all the treasures of the palace and the temple, and the remainder of the vessels of the latter which had been hidden or spared in the first capture, were carried away or destroyed, and the best of the inhabitants, with the king, led into captivity, 2 Kings 24. 2 Chron. 36. And the third, in the reign of Zedekiah, the successor of Jehoiachin ; in whose ninth year the most formidable siege which this ill-fated city ever sustained, except that of Titus, was commenced. It continued two years ; during a great part of which the inhabitants suffered all the horrors of famine : when, on the ninth day of the fourth month, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, which answers to July, in the year B. C. 588, the garrison, with the king, endeavored to make their escape from the city, but were pursued and defeated by the Chaldeans in the plains of Ribicho ; Zedekiah taken prisoner ; his sons killed before his face at Riblah, whither he was taken to the king of Babylon ; and he himself, after his eyes were put out, was bound with fetters of brass, and carried prisoner to Babylon, where he died : thus fulfilling the prophecy of Ezekiel, which declared that he should be carried to Babylon, but should not see the place, though he should die there, Ezek. 12: 13. In the following month, the Chaldean army, under their general, Nel uzaradan, entered the city, took away every thing that was valuable, and then burnt and utterly destroyed it, with its temple and walls, and left the whole razed to the ground. The entire population of the city and country, with the exception of a few husbandmen, were then carried captive to Babylon.

During seventy years, the city and temple lay in ruins : when those Jews who chose to take immediate advantage of the proclamation of Cyrus, under the conduct of Zerubbabel, returned to Jerusalem, and began to build the temple ; all the vessels of gold and silver belonging to which, that had been taken away by Nebuchadnezzar, being restored by Cyrus. Their work, however, did not proceed far without opposition ; for in the reign of Cambyes, the son of Cyrus, who in Scripture is called Ahasuerus, the Samaritans presented a petition to that monarch to put a stop to the building, Ezra 4: 6. Cambyes appears to have been too busily engaged in his Egyptian expedition to pay any attention to this malicious request. His successor, Smerdis the Magian, however, who in Scripture is called Artaxerxes, to whom a similar petition was sent, representing the Jews as a factious and dangerous people, listened to it, and, in the true spirit of a usurper, issued a decree putting a stop to the further building of the temple, (Ezra 4: 7, &c.) which, in consequence, remained in an unfinished state till the second year, according to the Jewish, and third, according to the Babylonian and Persian account, of Darius Hystaspes, who is called simply Darius in Scripture. To him also a representation hostile to the Jews was made by their inveterate enemies, the Samaritans ; but this noble prince refused to listen to it, and having searched the rolls of the kingdom, and found in the palace at Achmetha the decree of Cyrus, issued a similar one, which reached Jerusalem in the subsequent year, and even ordered these very Samaritans to assist the Jews in their work ; so that it was completed in the sixth year of the same reign, Ezra 4: 24. 5: 6: 1—15. But the city and walls remained in a ruinous condition until the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, the Artaxerxes Longimanus of profane history ; by whom Nehemiah was sent to Jerusalem, with a power granted to him to rebuild them. Accordingly, under the direction of this zealous servant of God, the walls were speedily raised, but not without the accustomed opposition on the part of the Samaritans ; who despairing of the success of an application to the court of Persia, openly attacked the Jews with arms. But the building, notwithstanding, went steadily on ; the men working with an implement of work in one hand, and a weapon of war in the other ; and the wall, with incredible labor, was finished in fifty-two days, in the year B. C. 445 ; after which, the city itself was gradually rebuilt, Neh. 2, 4, 6. From this time Jerusalem remained attached to the Persian empire, but under the local jurisdiction of the high-priests, until the subversion of that empire by Alexander, fourteen years after. (See ALEXANDER.)

At the death of Alexander, and the partition of his empire by his generals, Jerusalem, with Judea, fell to the kings of Syria. But in the frequent wars which followed between the kings of Syria and those of Egypt, called by Daniel, the kings of the north and south, it belonged sometimes to one and sometimes to the other ; an unsettled and unhappy state, highly favorable to disorder and corruption ; the high-priesthood was, openly sold to the highest bidder ; and numbers of the Jews deserted their religion for the idolatries of the Greeks. At length, in the year B. C. 170, Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, enraged at hearing that the Jews had rejoiced at a false report of his death, plundered Jerusalem, and killed eighty thousand men. Not more than two years afterwards, this cruel tyrant, who had seized every opportunity to exercise his barbarity on the Jews, sent Apollonius with an army to Jerusalem ; who pulled down the walls, grievously oppressed the people, and built a citadel on a rock adjoining the temple, which commanded that building, and had the effect of completely overawing the seditious. Having thus reduced this unfortunate city into entire submission, and rendered resistance useless, the next step of Antiochus was to abolish the Jewish religion altogether, by publishing an edict which commanded all the people of his dominions to conform to the religion of the Greeks : in consequence of which, the service of the temple ceased, and a statue of Jupiter Olympus was set up on the altar. But this extremity of ignominy and oppression led, as might have been expected, to rebellion ; and those Jews who still held their insulted religion in reverence, fled to the mountains, with Mattathias and Judas Maccabæus ; the latter of whom, after the death of Mattathias, who, with his followers and successors, are known by the name of Maccabees, waged successful war with the Syrians ; defeated Apollonius, Nicanor, and Lysias, generals of Antiochus ; obtained possession of Jerusalem, purified the temple, and restored the service, after three years' defilement by the gentile idolatries. (See ANTIOCHUS.)

From this time, during several succeeding Maccabæan rulers, who were at once high-priests and sovereigns of the Jews, but without the title of king, Jerusalem was able to preserve itself from Syrian violence. It was, however, twice besieged, first by Antiochus Eupator, in the year 163, and afterwards by Antiochus Sidetes, in the year B. C. 134. But the Jews had caused themselves to be sufficiently respected to obtain conditions of peace on both occasions, and to save their city ; fill, at length, Hyrcanus, in the year 130 B. C., shook off the Syrian yoke, and reigned, after this event, twenty-one years in independence and prosperity. His successor, Judas, made an important change in the Jewish government, by taking the title of king, which dignity was enjoyed by his successors forty-seven years ; when a dispute having arisen between Hyrcanus II. and his brother Aristobulus, and the latter having overcome the former, and made himself king, was, in his turn, conquered by the Romans under Pompey, by whom the city and temple were taken, Aristobulus made prisoner, and Hyrcanus created high-priest and prince of the Jews, but without the title of king. By this event Judea was reduced to the condition of a Roman province, in the year 63 B. C. Nor did Jerusalem long after enjoy the dignity of a metropolis, that honor being transferred to Cæsarea. Julius Cæsar, having defeated Pompey, continued Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, but bestowed the government of Judea upon Antipater, an Idumean by birth, but a Jewish proselyte, and father of Herod the Great. For the siege and destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, see Jews.

Jerusalem lay in ruins about forty-seven years, when the emperor Ælius Adrian began to build it anew, and erected a heathen temple, which he dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus. (See ÆLIA CAPITOLINA.) In this state Jerusalem continued, under the name of Ælia, and inhabited more by Christians and pagans than by Jews, till the time of the emperor Constantine, styled the Great ; who, about the year 323, having made Christianity the religion of the empire, began to improve it, adorned it with many new edifices and churches, and restored its ancient name. About thirty-five years afterwards, Julian, named the Apostate, not from any love he bore the Jews, but out of hatred to the Christians, whose faith he had abjured, and with the avowed design of defeating the prophecies, which had declared that the temple should not be rebuilt, wrote to the Jews, inviting them to their city, and promising to restore their temple and nation. He accordingly employed great numbers of workmen to clear the foundations ; but balls of fire bursting from the earth, soon put a stop to their proceeding. This miraculous interposition of Providence is attested by many credible witnesses and historians; and, in particular, by Ammianus Marcellinus, a heathen, and friend of Julian; Zemus David, a Jew; Nazianzen, Chrysostom, Ambrose Rufinus, Theodoret, Sozomen, and Socrates, who wrote his account within fifty years after the transaction, and while many eye-witnesses of it were still living. So stubborn, indeed, is the proof of this miracle, that even Gibbon, who strives to invalidate it, is obliged to acknowledge the general fact.

Jerusalem continued in nearly the same condition till the beginning of the seventh century, when it was taken and plundered by the celebrated Chosroes, king of Persia, by whom many thousands of the Christian inhabitants were killed, or sold for slaves. The Persians, however, did not hold it long, as they were soon after entirely defeated by the emperor Heraclius, who rescued Jerusalem, and restored it, not to the unhappy Jews, who were forbidden to come within three miles of it, but to the Christians. A worse calamity was, however, speedily to befall this ill-fated city. The Mohammedan imposture arose about this time; and the fanatics who had adopted its creed carried their arms and their religion with unprecedented rapidity over the greater part of the East. The caliph Omar, the third from Mohammed, invested the city, which, after once more suffering the horrors of a protracted siege, surrendered on terms of capitulation in the year 637; and has ever since, with the exception of the short period that it was occupied by the crusaders, been trodden under foot by the followers of the false prophet.

2. The accounts of modern Jerusalem by travellers are very numerous. Mr. Conder, in his "Palestine," has abridged them with judgment. Dr. Clarke was fortunate in catching his first view of Jerusalem under the illusion of a brilliant evening sunshine; but his description is decidedly overcharged. Mr. Buckingham, Mr. Brown, Mr. Jolliffe, Sir F. Henniker, and almost every other modern traveller, confirm the darker representation of Chateaubriand and Dr. Richardson.

The following is a very spirited sketch of modern Jerusalem, from the pen of Mr. Buckingham.

"Reposing beneath the shade of an olive-tree upon the brow of this hill, (the mount of Olives,) we enjoyed from hence a fine prospect of Jerusalem on the opposite one. This city occupies an irregular square, of about two miles and a half in circumference. Its shortest apparent side, is that which faces the east, and in this is the supposed gate of the ancient temple, now closed up, and the small projecting stone on which Mohammed is to sit when the world is to be assembled to judgment in the vale below. The southern side is exceedingly irregular, taking quite a zigzag direction; the south-west extreme being terminated by the mosque built over the supposed sepulchre of David, on the summit of mount Zion. The form and exact direction of the western and southern walls are not distinctly seen from hence; but every part of this appears to be a modern work, and executed at the same time. The walls are flanked at irregular distances by square towers, and have battlements running all around on their summits, with loop-holes for arrows or musquetry close to the top. The walls appear to be about fifty feet in height, but are not surrounded by a ditch. The northern wall runs over slightly declining ground; the eastern brow runs straight along the brow of mount Moriah, with the deep valley of Jehoshaphat below; the southern wall runs over the summit of the hill assumed as mount Zion, with the vale of Hinnom at its feet; and the western wall runs along on more level ground, near the summit of the high and stony mountains over which we had first approached the town. As the city is thus seated on the brow of one large hill, divided by name into several smaller hills, and the whole of these slope gently down towards the east; this view, from the mount of Olives, a position of greater height than that on which the highest part of the city stands, commands nearly the whole of it at once.

"On the north, it is bounded by a level and apparently fertile space, now covered with olive-trees, particularly near the north-east angle. On the south, the steep side of mount Zion, and the valley of Hinnom, both show patches of cultivation and little garden inclosures. On the west, the sterile summits of the hills there barely lift their outlines above the dwellings. And, on the east, the deep valley of Jehoshaphat, now at our feet, has some partial spots relieved by trees, though as forbidding in its general aspect as the vale of death could ever be desired to be, by those who have chosen it for the place of their interment.

"Within the walls of the city are seen crowded dwellings, remarkable in no respect, except being terraced by flat roofs, and generally built of stone. On the south are some gardens and vineyards, with the long red mosque of Al Sakhara, having two tiers of windows, a sloping roof, and a dark dome at one end, and the mosque of Zion and the sepulchre of David in the same quarter. On the west is seen the high square, castle, and palace of the same monarch, near the Bethlehem gate. In the centre rise the two cupolas, of unequal form and size; the one blue, and the other white, covering the church of the Holy Sepulchre. Around, in different directions, are seen the minarets of eight or ten mosques, amid an assemblage of about two thousand dwellings. And on the east is seated the great mosque of Al Harrem, or, as called by Christians, the mosque of Solomon, from being supposed, with that of Al Sakhara near it, to occupy the site of the ancient temple of that splendid and luxurious king." Travels in Palestine, &c. p. 203—205, 4to.

Chateaubriand's description is very striking and graphical. After citing the language of the prophet Jeremiah, in his lamentations on the desolation of the ancient city, as accurately portraying its present state, (Lam. 1: 1—6. 2: 1—9, 15.) he thus proceeds:—

"When seen from the mount of Olives, on the other side of the valley of Jehoshaphat, Jerusalem presents an inclined plane, descending from west to east. An embattled wall, fortified with towers and a Gothic castle, encompasses the city all round; excluding, however, part of mount Zion, which it formerly inclosed. In the western quarter, and in the centre of the city, the houses stand very close; but, in the eastern part, along the brook Cedron, you perceive vacant spaces; among the rest, that which surrounds the mosque erected on the ruins of the temple, and the nearly deserted spot where once stood the castle of Antonia, and the second palace of Herod. The houses of Jerusalem are heavy square masses, very low, without chimneys or windows; they have flat terraces or domes on the top, and look like prisons or sepulchres. The whole would appear to the eye one uninterrupted level, did not the steeples of the churches, the minarets of the mosques, the summits of a few cypresses, and the clumps of nopals, break the uniformity of the plan. On beholding these stone buildings, encompassed by a stony country, you are ready to inquire if they are not the confused monuments of a cemetery in the midst of a desert.

"Enter the city, but nothing will you there find to make amends for the dulness of its exterior. You lose yourself among narrow, unpaved streets, here going up hill, there down, from the inequality of the ground; and you walk among clouds of dust or loose stones. Canvass stretched from house to house increases the gloom of this labyrinth. Bazaars, roofed over, and fraught with infection, completely exclude the light from the desolate city. A few paltry shops expose nothing but wretchedness to view; and even these are frequently shut, from apprehension of the passage of a cadî. Not a creature is to be seen in the streets, not a creature at the gates, except now and then a peasant gliding through the gloom, concealing under his garments the fruits of his labor, lest he should be robbed of his hard earnings by the rapacious soldier. Aside, in a corner, the Arab butcher is slaughtering some animal suspended by the legs from a wall in ruins: from his haggard and ferocious look, and his bloody hands, you would suppose that he had been cutting the throat of a fellow-creature, rather than killing a lamb. The only noise heard from time to time in the city is the galloping of the steed of the desert: it is the janissary who brings the head of the Bedouin, or who returns from plundering the unhappy Fellah.

"Amid this extraordinary desolation, you must pause a moment to contemplate two circumstances still more extraordinary. Among the ruins of Jerusalem, two classes of independent people find in their religion sufficient fortitude to enable them to surmount such complicated horrors and wretchedness. Here reside communities of Christian monks, whom nothing can compel to forsake the tomb of Christ; neither plunder, nor personal ill-treatment, nor menaces of death itself. Night and day they chant their hymns around the holy sepulchre. Driven by the cudgel and the sabre, women, children, flocks, and herds, seek refuge in the cloisters of these recluses. What prevents the armed oppressor from pursuing his prey, and overthrowing such feeble ramparts? The charity of the monks: they deprive themselves of the last resources of life to ransom their suppliants. Cast your eyes between the temple and mount Zion; behold another petty tribe cut off from the rest of the inhabitants of this city. The particular objects of every species of degradation, these people bow their heads without murmuring; they endure every kind of insult without demanding justice; they sink beneath repeated blows without sighing; if their head be required, they present it to the scimitar. On the death of any member of this proscribed community, his companion goes at night, and interms him by stealth in the valley of Jehoshaphat, in the shadow of Solomon's temple. Enter the abodes of these people, you will find them, amid the most abject wretchedness, instructing their children to read a mysterious book, which they in their turn will teach their offspring to read. What they did five thousand years ago, these people still continue to do. Seventeen times have they witnessed the destruction of Jerusalem, yet nothing can discourage them, nothing can prevent them from turning their faces towards Zion. To see the Jews scattered over the whole world, according to the word of God, must doubtless excite surprise. But to be struck with supernatural astonishment, you must view them at Jerusalem; you must behold these rightful masters of Judea living as slaves and strangers in their own country; you must behold them expecting, under all oppressions, a king who is to deliver them. Crushed by the cross that condemns them, skulking near the temple, of which not one stone is left upon another, they continue in their deplorable infatuation. The Persians, the Greeks, the Romans, are swept from the earth; and a petty tribe, whose origin preceded that of those great nations, still exists unmixed among the ruins of its native land."

To the same effect are the remarks of Dr. Richardson: "The heart of this wonderful people, in whatever clime they roam, still turns to it as the city of their promised rest. They take pleasure in her ruins, and would kiss the very dust for her sake. Jerusalem is the centre around which the exiled sons of Judah build, in imagination, the mansions of their future greatness. In whatever part of the world he may live, the heart's desire of a Jew is to be buried in Jerusalem. Thither they return from Spain and Portugal, from Egypt and Barbary, and other countries among which they have been scattered: and when, after all their longings, and all their struggles up the steep of life, we see them poor, and blind, and naked, in the streets of their once happy Zion, he must have a cold heart that can remain untouched by their sufferings, without uttering a prayer that God would have mercy on the darkness of Judah; and that the day-star of Bethlehem might arise in their hearts."

"Jerusalem," remarks Sir Frederic Henniker, "is called, even by Mohammedans, the Blessed City, (El Gootz, El Koudes.) The streets of it, however, are narrow and deserted, the houses dirty and ragged, the shops few and forsaken; and throughout the whole there is not one symptom of either commerce, comfort, or happiness. The best view of it is from the mount of Olives: it commands the exact shape and nearly every particular; namely, the church of the holy sepulchre, the Armenian convent, the mosque of Omar, St. Stephen's gate, the round-topped houses, and the barren vacancies of the city. Without the walls are a Turkish burial-ground, the tomb of David, a small grove near the tombs of the kings, and all the rest is a surface of rock, on which are a few numberless trees."

The Jerusalem of sacred history is, in fact, no more. Not a vestige remains of the capital of David and Solomon; not a monument of Jewish times is standing. The very course of the walls is changed, and the boundaries of the ancient city are become doubtful. (See CALVARY.) "A few gardens," says Dr. Richardson, "still remain on the sloping base of mount Zion, watered from the pool of Siloam; the gardens of Gethsemane are still in a sort of ruined cultivation; the fences are broken down, and the olive-trees decaying, as if the hand that dressed and fed them were withdrawn; the mount of Olives still retains a languishing verdure, and nourishes a few of those trees from which it derives its name; but all round about Jerusalem the general aspect is blighted and barren; the grass is withered; the bare rock looks through the scanty sward; and the grain itself, like the staring progeny of famine, seems in doubt whether to come to maturity, or die in the ear. The vine that was brought from Egypt is cut off from the midst of the land; the vineyards are wasted; the hedges are taken away; and the graves of the ancient dead are open and tenantless."

3. On the accomplishment of prophecy in the condition in which this celebrated city has lain for ages, Keith well remarks:—It formed the theme of prophecy from the death-bed of Jacob; and, as the seat of the government of the children of Judah, the sceptre departed not from it till the Messiah appeared, on the expiration of seventeen hundred years after the death of the patriarch, and till the period of its desolation, prophesied of by Daniel, had arrived. It was to be trodden down, of the Gentiles, till the time of the Gentiles should be fulfilled. The time of the Gentiles is not yet fulfilled, and Jerusalem is still trodden down of the Gentiles. The Jews have often attempted to recover it: no distance of space or of time can separate it from their affections: they perform their devotions with their faces towards it, as if it were the object of their worship as well as of their love; and, although their desire to return be so strong, indelible, and innate, that every Jew, in every generation, counts himself an exile, yet they have never been able to rebuild their temple, nor to recover Jerusalem from the hands of the Gentiles.

But greater power than that of a proscribed and exiled race has been added to their own, in attempting to frustrate the counsel that professed to be of God. Julian, the emperor of the Romans, not only permitted but invited the Jews to rebuild Jerusalem and their temple; and promised to re-establish them in their paternal city. By that single act, more than by all his writings, he might have destroyed the credibility of the gospel, and restored his beloved but deserted paganism. The zeal of the Jews was equal to his own; and the work was begun by laying again the foundations of the temple. It was never accomplished, and the prophecy stands fulfilled. But even if the attempt of Julian had never been made, the truth of the prophecy itself is unassailable. The Jews have never been reinstated in Judea. Jerusalem has ever been trodden down of the Gentiles. The edict of Adrian was renewed by the successors of Julian; and no Jews could approach unto Jerusalem but by bribery or by stealth. It was a spot unlawful for them to touch. In the crusades, all the power of Europe was employed to rescue Jerusalem from the heathens, but equally in vain. It has been trodden down for nearly eighteen centuries by its successive masters; by Romans, Grecians, Persians, Saracens, Mamelukes, Turks, Christians, and again by the worst of rulers, the Arabs and the Turks.

And could any thing be more improbable to have happened, or more impossible to have been foreseen by man, than that any people should be banished from their own capital and country, and remain expelled and expatriated for nearly eighteen hundred years? Did the same fate ever befall any nation, though no prophecy existed respecting it? Is there any doctrine in Scripture so hard to be believed as was this single fact at the period of its prediction? And even with the example of the Jews before us, is it likely, or is it credible, or who can foretell, that the present inhabitants of any country upon earth shall be banished into all nations, retain their distinctive character, meet with an unparalleled fate, continue a people, without a government and without a country, and remain for an indefinite period, exceeding seventeen hundred years, till the fulfilment of a prescribed event which has yet to be accomplished? Must not the knowledge of such truths be derived from that prescience alone which scans alike the will and the ways of mortals, the actions of future nations, and the history of the latest generations?

JERUSALEM, THE NEW. The city of Jerusalem, like Gehenna, Paradise, &c., furnishes a metaphorical application of its name, in an exalted and spiritual sense. The first hint of this in the New Testament, occurs in Gal. 4: 25, where the apostle refers to the formation of the Hebrew nation into a church state, by the giving of the law from Sinai; under which terrific and slavish dispensation, the "Jerusalem that now is," he says, "continues; but the Jerusalem above is free, which is the mother of us all," believing Gentiles as well as Jews; (perhaps pau-tôn môtêr, the Universal Mother.)

The name seems to denote the formation of all mankind, as it were; (not of a single nation,) into the church of God, beginning at Jerusalem; though properly originating in heaven, the seat of the celestial Jerusalem, the mansion of complete and uninterrupted tranquility.

The metaphor is resumed and enlarged by the writer of the Revelation; who describes a new Jerusalem, after the destruction of the former city by Titus: (Rev. 3: 12.) "The city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven, from my God." Also, (ch. 21.) "And I saw a new heaven, and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem." ver. 1. This he describes at large, (ver. 10, et seq.) in a strain of Oriental metaphor, that can only agree to the celestial state: similar allusions to certain parts of its decorations are found, Isa. 54: 11.

This celestial city, called the holy city, and the great city, had no temple, nor other peculiarities of the Jewish service; and the whole description of it, the dimensions, the parts, and the properties of it, are magnificent in the highest degree. The new Jerusalem on earth should be carefully distinguished from the new Jerusalem in heaven, in explaining this book.—Calmet.

JESHIMON; probably the same as Hesmona, Asemona, Esom, Esemon, and Esemona; a city in the wilderness of Maon, belonging to Simeon; in the south of Palestine, or Arabia Petrea, 1 Sam. 23: 24.—Calmet.

JESHURUN; a name given to the collective political body of Israelites. Some derive the word from jeshur, just, or righteous, and so make it to signify, that though, in general, and on the whole, they were a righteous people, yet they were not without great faults. Cocceus, however, derives the word from shur, which signifies to see, behold, or discover; from whence, in the future tense, plural, comes jeshuru, which, with the addition of naun paragogicum, makes Jeshurua; that is, "the people who had the vision of God." This makes the name of Jeshurun to be properly applied to Israel, not only when Moses is called their king, but when they are upbraided with their rebellion against God; since the peculiar manifestation which God had made of himself to them, was a great aggravation of their ingratitude and rebellion.—Watson.

JESSE. (See DAVID, and RUTH.)

JESUITS, or the Society of Jesus, one of the most celebrated monastic orders of the Romish church, was founded in the year 1540, by Ignatius Loyola. (See IGNATIUS LOYOLA.) He produced a plan of its constitution and laws, which he affirmed to have been suggested by the immediate inspiration of heaven, and applied to the Roman pontiff, Paul III., for the sanction of his authority to confirm the institution. At a time when the papal authority had received so severe a shock from the progress of the Reformation, and was still exposed to the most powerful attacks in every quarter, this was an offer too tempting to be resisted. The reigning pontiff, though naturally cautious, and though scarcely capable, without the spirit of prophecy, of foreseeing all the advantages to be derived from the services of this nascent order, yet clearly perceiving the benefit of multiplying the number of his devoted servants, instantly confirmed by his bull the institution of the Jesuits, granted the most ample privileges to the members of the society, and appointed Loyola to be the first general of the order.

The recent revival of this subtle and dangerous order, together with its widely diffused and increasing influence in the United States, makes it desirable to give as full a view of its character and history, as our work will admit.

It was, indeed, a fundamental maxim with the Jesuits, from their first institution, not to publish the rules of their order: they kept concealed as an impenetrable mystery. They never communicated them to strangers, nor even to the greater part of their own members; they refused to produce them when required by courts of justice; and by a strange solecism in policy, the civil power in different countries authorized or connived at the establishment of an order of men, whose constitution and laws were concealed with a solicitude which alone was a good reason for having excluded them. During the prosecutions, however, which have been carried on against them in Portugal and France, the Jesuits have been so inconsiderate as to produce the mysterious volumes of their institute, the Mania Secreta, copious extracts from which may be seen in the British Review for 1815. By the aid of these authentic records, the principles of their government may be delineated, and the sources of their power investigated, with a degree of certainty and precision which, previous to that event, it was impossible to attain.

1. Constitution of the Order.—The simple and primary object of the society, says a writer in the Edinburgh Encyclopedia, was to establish a spiritual dominion over the minds of men, of which the pope should appear as the ostensible head, while the real power should reside with themselves. To accomplish this object, the whole constitution and policy of the order were singularly adapted, and exhibited various peculiarities which distinguished it from all other monastic orders. The immediate design of every other religious society was to separate its members from the world; that of the Jesuits, to render them masters of the world. The inmate of the convent devoted himself to work out his own salvation by extraordinary acts of devotion and self-denial; the follower of Loyola considered himself as plunging into all the bustle of secular affairs, to maintain the interests of the Romish church. The monk was a retired devotee of heaven; the Jesuit a chosen soldier of the pope. That the members of the new order might have full leisure for this active service, they were exempted from the usual functions of other monks. They were not required to spend their time in the long ceremonial offices and numberless mummeries of the Romish worship. They attended no processions, and practised no austerities. They neither chanted nor prayed. "They cannot sing," said their enemies; "for birds of prey never do." They were sent forth to watch every transaction of the world which might appear to affect the interests of religion, and were especially enjoined to study the dispositions and cultivate the friendship of persons in the higher ranks. Nothing could be imagined more open and liberal than the external aspect of the institution, yet nothing could be more strict and secret than its internal organization. Loyola, influenced, perhaps, by the notions of implicit obedience which he had derived from his military profession, resolved that the government of the Jesuits should be absolutely monarchical. A general, chosen for life by deputies from the several provinces, possessed supreme and independent power, extending to every person, and applying to every case. Every member of the order, the instant that he entered its pale, surrendered all freedom of thought and action; and every personal feeling was superseded by the interests of that body to which he had attached himself. He went wherever he was ordered; he performed whatever he was commanded; he suffered whatever he was enjoined; he became a mere passive instrument, incapable of resistance. The gradation of ranks was only a gradation in slavery; and so perfect a despotism over a large body of men, dispersed over the face of the earth, was never before realized.

2. Policy of the Order.—The maxims of policy adopted by this celebrated society were, like its constitution, remarkable for their union of laxity and rigor. Nothing could divert them from their original object; and no means were ever scrupled which promised to aid its accomplishment. They were in no degree shackled by prejudice, superstition, or real religion. Expediency, in its most simple and licentious form, was the basis of their morals, and their principles and practices were uniformly accommodated to the circumstances in which they were placed; and even their bigotry, obdurate as it was, never appears to have interfered with their interests. The paramount and characteristic principle of the order, from which none of its members ever swerved, was simply this, that its interests were to be promoted by all possible means, at all possible expense. In order to acquire more easily an ascendancy over persons of rank and power, they propagated a system of the most relaxed morality, which accommodated itself to the passions of men, justified their vices, tolerated their imperfections, and authorized almost every action which the most audacious or crafty politician would wish to perpetrate. To persons of stricter principles they studied to recommend themselves by the purity of their lives, and sometimes by the austerity of their doctrines. While sufficiently compliant in the treatment of immoral practices, they were generally rigidly severe in exacting a strict orthodoxy in opinions. "They are a sort of people," said the abbé Boileau, "who lengthen the creed and shorten the decalogue." They adopted the same spirit of accommodation in their missionary undertakings; and their Christianity, chameleon-like, readily assumed the color of every religion which it happened to be introduced. They freely permitted their converts to retain a full proportion of the old superstitions, and suppressed, without hesitation, any point in the new faith which was likely to bear hard on their prejudices or propensities. They proceeded to still greater lengths; and, besides suppressing the truths of revelation, devised the most absurd falsehoods, to be used for attracting disciples, or even to be taught as parts of Christianity. One of them in India produced a pedigree to prove his own descent from Brama; and another in America assured a native chief that Christ had been a valiant and victorious warrior, who, in the space of three years, had scalped an incredible number of men, women, and children. It was, in fact, their own authority, not the authority of true religion, which they wished to establish; and Christianity was generally as little known, when they quitted the foreign scenes of their labors, as when they entered them.

3. Progress of the Order.—These detestable objects and principles, however, were long an impenetrable secret: and the professed intention of the new order was to promote, with unequalled and unfettered zeal, the salvation of mankind. Its progress, nevertheless, was at first remarkably slow. Charles V., who is supposed, with his usual sagacity, to have discerned its dangerous tendency, rather checked than encouraged its advancement; and the universities of France resisted its introduction into that kingdom. Thus, roused by obstacles, and obliged to find resources within themselves, the Jesuits brought all their talents and devices into action. They applied themselves to every useful function and curious art; and neither neglected nor despised any mode, however humble, of gaining employment or reputation. The satirist's description of the Greeks in Rome has been aptly chosen to describe their indefatigable and universal industry:—

Grammaticus, rhetor, geometres, pictor, aliptes, Agur, schanobates, medicus, magus; omnia novit Græcibus. Juvenal, lib. iii. 76.

"A Protean tribe, one knows not what to call.

Which shifts to every form, and shines in all:

Grammatian, painter, agur, rhetorician,

Rope-dancer, conjurer, fiddler, and physician,—

All trades his own, your hungry Greekling counts."

GIFFORD.

They labored with the greatest assiduity to qualify themselves as the instructors of youth; and succeeded, at length, in supplanting their opponents in every Catholic kingdom. They aimed, in the next place, to become the spiritual directors of the higher ranks; and soon established themselves in most of the courts which were attached to the papal faith, not only as the confessors, but frequently also as the guides and ministers, of superstitious princes. The governors of the society, pursuing one uniform system, with unwearied perseverance, became entirely successful; and, in the space of half a century, had in a wonderful degree extended the reputation, the number, and influence of the order. When Loyola, in 1540, petitioned the pope to authorize the institution of the Jesuits, he had only ten disciples; but in 1608 the number amounted to ten thousand five hundred and eighty-one. Before the expiration of the sixteenth century, they had obtained the chief direction of the education of youth in every Catholic country in Europe, and had become the confessors of almost all its noblest monarchs. In spite of their vow of poverty, their wealth increased with their power; and they soon rivalled, in the extent and value of their possessions, the most opulent monastic fraternities. About the beginning of the seventeenth century, they obtained from the court of Madrid the grant of the large and fertile province of Paraguay, which stretches across the southern continent of America, from the mountains of Potosi to the banks of the river La Plata; and, after every deduction which can reasonably be made from their own accounts of their establishment, enough will remain to excite the astonishment and applause of mankind. They found the inhabitants in the first stage of society, ignorant of the arts of life, and unacquainted with the first principles of subordination. They applied themselves to instruct and civilize these savage tribes. They commenced their labors by collecting about fifty families of wandering Indians, whom they converted and settled in a small township. They taught them to build houses, to cultivate the ground, and to rear tame animals; trained them to arts and manufactures, and brought them to relish the blessings of security and order. By a wise and humane policy, they gradually attracted new subjects and converts; till at last they formed a powerful and well-organized state of three hundred thousand families.

But even in this meritorious effort of the Jesuits for the good of mankind, the genius and spirit of their order was discernible: they plainly aimed at establishing in Paraguay an independent empire, subject to the society alone, and which, by the superior excellence of its constitution and police, could scarcely have failed to extend its dominion over all the southern continent of America. With this view, in order to prevent the Spaniards or Portuguese in the adjacent settlements from acquiring any dangerous influence over the people within the limits of the province subject to the society, the Jesuits endeavored to inspire the Indians with hatred and contempt of these nations; they cut off all intercourse between their subjects and the Spanish or Portuguese settlements. When they were obliged to admit any person in a public character from the neighboring governments, they did not permit him to have any conversation with their subjects; and no Indian was allowed even to enter the house where these strangers resided, unless in the presence of a Jesuit. In order to render any communication between them as difficult as possible, they industriously avoided giving the Indians any knowledge of the Spanish, or of any other European language; but encouraged the different tribes which they had civilized to acquire a certain dialect of the Indian tongue, and labored to make that the universal language throughout their dominions. As all these precautions, without military force, would have been insufficient to have rendered their empire secure and permanent, they instructed their subjects in the European art of war, and formed them into bodies completely armed and well disciplined.

Even Henry IV., either dreading their power, or pleased with the exultation of his licentious habits, which he found in their flexible system of morality, became their patron, and selected one of their number as his confessor. They were favored by Louis XIII. and his minister Richelieu, on account of their literary exertions; but it was in the succeeding reign of Louis XIV., that they reached the summit of their prosperity. The fathers La Chaise and Le Tellier were successively confessors to the king; and did not fail to employ their influence for the interest of their order: but the latter carried on his projects with so blind and fiery a zeal, that one of the Jesuits is reported to have said of him, "He drives at such a rate, that he will overturn us all." The Jansenists were peculiarly the objects of his machinations, and he rested not till he had accomplished the destruction of their celebrated college and convent at Port Royal.

4. Gradual overthrow of the Order.—Before the fall, however, of the Port Royal seminary, a shaft from its bow had reached the heart of its proud oppressor. The "Provincial Letters of Pascal" had been published, in which the quibbling morality and unintelligible metaphysics of the Jesuits were exposed in a strain of inimitable humor, and a style of unrivalled elegance. The impression which they produced was wide and deep, and gradually sapped the foundation of public opinion, on which the power of the order had hitherto rested. Voltaire afterwards directed against them all the powers of his ridicule, and finished the piece which Pascal had sketched. Their power was brought to a very low ebb, when the war of 1756 broke out, which occasioned the famous lawsuit that led to their final overthrow.

In the mean time, the king of Portugal was assassinated; and Carvalho, the minister, who detested the Jesuits, found means to load them with the odium of the crime. Malagrida, and a few more of these fathers, were charged with advising and absolving the assassins; and, having been found guilty, were condemned to the stake. The rest were banished with every brand of infamy, and even treated with the most iniquitous cruelty. On the sixth of August, 1762, their institute was condemned by the parliament of France, as contrary to the laws of the state, to the obedience due to the sovereign, and to the welfare of the kingdom. The order was dissolved, and their effects alienated. But in certain quarters, where the provincial parliaments had not decided against them, Jesuits still subsisted; and a royal edict was afterwards promulgated, which formally abolished the society in France, but permitted its members to reside within the kingdom under certain restrictions.

In Spain, where they conceived their establishment to be perfectly secure, they experienced an overthrow equally complete, and much more unexpected. At midnight, March 31, 1767, large bodies of military surrounded the six colleges of the Jesuits in Madrid, forced the gates, secured the bells, collected the fathers in the refectory, and read to them the king's order for their instant transportation. They were immediately put into carriages previously placed at proper stations; and were on their way to Carthagena before the inhabitants of the city had any intelligence of the transaction. Three days afterwards, the same measures were adopted with regard to every other college of the order in the kingdom; and, ships having been provided at the different sea-ports, they were all embarked for the ecclesiastical states in Italy. All their property was confiscated, and a small pension assigned to each individual as long as he should reside in a place appointed, and satisfy the Spanish court as his peaceable demeanor. All correspondence with the Jesuits was prohibited, and the strictest silence on the subject of their expulsion was enjoined under penalties of high treason. A similar seizure and deportation took place in the Indies, and an immense property was acquired by the government. The example of the king of Spain was immediately followed by Ferdinand VI., of Naples, and soon after by the prince of Parma. They had been expelled from England in 1604; from Venice in 1606; and from Portugal in 1759, upon the charge of having instigated the families of Tavora and D'Aveiro to assassinate king Joseph I. Frederic the Great, of Prussia, was the only monarch who showed a disposition to afford them protection; but in 1773 the order was entirely suppressed by pope Clement XIV., who is supposed afterwards to have fallen a victim to their vengeance.

5. Recent revival of the Order.—In 1801 the society was restored in Russia by the emperor Paul; and in 1804, by king Ferdinand, in Sardinia. In August, 1814, a bull was issued by pope Pius VII., restoring the order to all their former privileges, and calling upon all Catholic princes to afford them protection and encouragement. This act of their revival is expressed in all the solemnity of papal authority; and even affirmed to be above the recall or revision of any judge, with whatever power he may be clothed; but to every enlightened mind it cannot fail to appear as a measure altogether incapable of justification, from any thing either in the history of Jesuitism, or in the character of the present times.

6. Incidental benefits of the Order.—It would be in vain to deny that many considerable advantages were derived by mankind from the labors of the Jesuits. Their ardor in the study of ancient literature, and their labors in the instruction of youth, greatly contributed to the progress of polite learning. They have produced a greater number of ingenious authors than all the other religious fraternities taken together; and though there never was known among their order one person who could be said to possess an enlarged philosophical mind, they can boast of many eminent masters in the separate branches of science, many distinguished mathematicians, antiquarians, critics, and even some orators of high reputation. They were in general, also, as individuals, superior in decency, and even purity of manners, to any other class of regular clergy in the church of Rome. But all these benefits by no means counterbalanced the pernicious effects of their influence and intrigues on the best interests of society.

7. Essential Evils of the Order.—The essential principles of the institution, namely, that their order is to be maintained at the expense of society at large, and that the end sanctifies the means, are utterly incompatible with the welfare of any community of men. Their system of lax and pliant morality, justifying every vice, and authorizing every atrocity, has left deep and lasting ravages on the face of the moral world. Their zeal to extend the jurisdiction of the court of Rome over every civil government, gave currency to tenets respecting the duty of opposing princes who were hostile to the Catholic faith, which shook the basis of all political allegiance, and loosened the obligations of every human law. Their indefatigable industry, and countless artifices in resisting the progress of the reformed religion, perpetuated the most pernicious errors of popery, and postponed the triumph of tolerant and Christian principles. Whence, then, it may well be asked, whence the recent restoration? What long-latent proof has been discovered of the excellence, or even the expediency, of such an institution? The sentence of their abolition was passed by the senates, and monarchs, and statesmen, and divines, of all religions, and of almost every civilized country in the world. Almost every land has been stained and torn by their crimes; and almost every land bears on its public records the most solemn protests against their existence. The evils of Jesuitism arise not from the violation of the principles of the order; on the contrary, they are the natural and necessary fruits of the system; they are confined to no age, place, or person; they follow, like the tail of the comet, the same disastrous course with the luminary itself; and, in consequence, not this or that nation, but humanity, is startled at the reappearance of this common enemy of man.

The number of Jesuits at present in Europe and America amounts to several thousand. Their general resides at Rome. In Italy, including Sicily, there are seven hundred, who possess eighteen colleges for the instruction of youth. The number in France is not exactly known. The society, it has been said, is a sword, of which the hilt is at Rome! But if the hilt be there, the blade is everywhere, and that with so fine an edge as to make itself felt before it can be seen. *Edin. Brit. Enc. and Enc. Am.; Mosheim's Ecc. JESUS CHRIST; the son of God, the Messiah, and Savior of the world; the first and principal object of the prophecies; prefigured and promised in the Old Testament; expected and desired by the patriarchs; the hope of the Gentiles; the glory, salvation, and consolation of Christians. The name Jesus, or, as the Hebrews pronounce it, Jehoshua, or Joshua, signifies, he who shall save. No one ever bore this name with so much justice, nor so perfectly fulfilled the signification of it, as Jesus Christ, who saves even from sin and hell, and hath merited heaven for us by the price of his blood. It is not necessary here to narrate the history of our Savior's life, which can nowhere be read with advantage except in the writings of the four evangelists; but there are several general views which require to be noticed under this article.

I. Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ or Messiah promised under the Old Testament. That he professed himself to be that Messiah to whom all the prophets gave witness, and who was, in fact, at the time of his appearing, expected by the Jews; and that he was received under that character by his disciples, and by all Christians ever since, is certain. And if the Old Testament Scriptures afford sufficiently definite marks by which the long-announced Christ should be infallibly known at his advent, and these presignations are found realized in our Lord, then is the truth of his pretensions established. From the books of the Old Testament we learn that the Messiah was to authenticate his claim by miracles; and in those predictions respecting him, so many circumstances are recorded, that they could meet only in one person; and so, if they are accomplished in him, they leave no room for doubt, as far as the evidence of prophecy is deemed conclusive. As to MIRACLES, we refer to that article; here only observing, that if the miraculous works wrought by Christ were really done, they prove his mission, because, from their nature, and having been wrought to confirm his claim to be the Messiah, they necessarily imply a divine attestation. With respect to PROPHECY, the principles under which its evidence must be regarded as conclusive will be given under that head; and here therefore it will only be necessary to show the completion of the prophecies of the sacred books of the Jews relative to the Messiah in one person, and that person the Founder of the Christian religion.

The time of the Messiah's appearance in the world, as predicted in the Old Testament, is defined, says Keith, by a number of concurring circumstances, which fix it to the very date of the advent of Christ, Gen. 49: 10. Mal. 3: 1. Hag. 2: 7. Dan. 9: 24, 25. Isa. 40: 3—11. The plainest inference may be drawn from these prophecies. All of them, while, in every respect, they presuppose the most perfect knowledge of futurity; while they were unquestionably delivered and publicly known for ages previous to the time to which they referred; and while they refer to different contingent and unconnected events, utterly undeterminable and inconceivable by all human sagacity; accord in perfect unison to a single precise period where all their different lines terminate at once,—the very fullness of time when Jesus appeared. A king then reigned over the Jews in their own land; they were governed by their own laws; and the council of their nation exercised its authority and power. Before that period, the other tribes were extinct or dispersed among the nations. Judah alone remained, and the last sceptre in Israel had not then departed from it. Every stone of the temple was then unmoved; it was the admiration of the Romans, and might have stood for ages. But in a short space, all these concurring testimonies to the time of the advent of the Messiah passed away. During the very year, the twelfth of his age, in which Christ first publicly appeared in the temple, Archelaus the king was dethroned and banished; Coponius was appointed procurator; and the kingdom of Judea, the last remnant of the greatness of Israel, was debased into a part of the province of Syria. The sceptre was smitten from the tribe of Judah; the crown fell from their heads; their glory departed; and, soon after the death of Christ, of their temple one stone was not left upon another; their commonwealth itself became as complete a ruin, and was broken in pieces; and they have ever since been scattered throughout the world, a name but not a nation. After the lapse of nearly four hundred years posterior to the time of Malachi, another prophet appeared who was the herald of the Messiah. And the testimony of Josephus confirms the account given in Scripture of John the Baptist. Every mark that denoted the time of the coming of the Messiah was erased soon after the crucifixion of Christ, and could never afterwards be renewed. And with respect to the prophecies of Daïeïl, it is remarkable, at this remote period, how little discrepancy of opinion has existed among the most learned men, as to the space from the time of the passing out of the edict to rebuild Jerusalem, after the Babylonish captivity, to the commencement of the Christian era, and the subsequent events foretold in the prophecy.

The predictions contained in the Old Testament respecting both the family out of which the Messiah was to arise, and the place of his birth, are almost as circumstantial, and are equally applicable to Christ, as those which refer to the time of his appearance. He was to be an Israelite, of the tribe of Judah, of the family of David, and of the town of Bethlehem. That all these predictions were fulfilled in Jesus Christ; that he was of that country, tribe, and family, of the house and lineage of David, and born in Bethlehem, we have the fullest evidence in the testimony of all the evangelists; in two distinct accounts of the genealogies, by natural and legal succession, which, according to the custom of the Jews, were carefully preserved; in the acquiescence of the enemies of Christ in the truth of the fact, against which there is not a single surmise in history; and in the appeal made by some of the earliest Christian writers to the unquestionable testimony of the records of the census, taken at the very time of our Savior's birth by order of Cæsar. Here, indeed, it is impossible not to be struck with the exact fulfilment of prophecies which are apparently contradictory and irreconcilable, and with the manner in which they were providentially accomplished. The spot of Christ's nativity was distant from the place of the abode of his parents, and the region in which he began his ministry was remote from the place of his birth; and another prophecy respecting him was in this manner verified: "In the land of Zebulun and Naphtali, by the way of the sea beyond Jordan, in Galilee of the nations, the people that walked in darkness have seen a great light; they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them both the light shined," Isaiah 9: 1, 2. Matt. 4: 16. Thus, the time at which the predicted Messiah was to appear; the nation, the tribe, and the family from which he was to be descended; and the place of his birth,—no populous city, but of itself an inconsiderable place,—were all clearly foretold; and as clearly refer to Jesus Christ; and all meet their completion in him.

But the facts of his life, and the features of his character, are also drawn with a precision that cannot be misunderstood. The obscurity, the meanness, and the poverty of his external condition are represented, Isa. 53: 2, 49: 7. His riding in humble triumph into Jerusalem; his being betrayed for thirty pieces of silver, and scourged, and buffeted, and spit upon; the piercing of his hands and of his feet; the last offered draught of vinegar and gall; the parting of his raiment, and casting lots upon his vesture; the manner of his death and of his burial, and his rising again without seeing corruption, were all expressly predicted, and all these predictions were literally fulfilled, Zech. 9: 9, 11: 12. Isaiah 1: 6. Psalm 22: 16, 69: 21, 22: 18. Isaiah 53: 9. Psalm 16: 10. If all these prophecies admit of any application to the events of the life of any individual, it can only be to that of the Author of Christianity. And what other religion can produce a single fact which was actually foretold of its founder?

The death of Christ was as unparalleled as his life; and the prophecies are as minutely descriptive of his sufferings as of his virtues. Not only did the paschal lamb, which was to be killed every year in all the families of Israel, which was to be taken out of the flock, to be without blemish, to be eaten with bitter herbs, to have its blood sprinkled, and to be kept whole that not a bone of it should be broken; not only did the offering up of Isaac; and the lifting up of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, by looking upon which the people were healed, and many ritual observances of the Jews, prefigure the manner of Christ's death, and the sacrifice which was to be made for sin; but many express declarations abound in the prophecies, that Christ was indeed to suffer. But Isaiah, who describes, with eloquence worthy of a prophet, the glories of the kingdom that was to come, characterizes, with the accuracy of an historian, the humiliation, the trials, and the agonies which were to precede the triumphs of the Redeemer of a world; and the history of Christ forms, to the very letter, the commentary and the completion of his every prediction. In a single passage, (Isaiah 52: 13, &c. 53.) the connexion of which is uninterrupted, its antiquity indisputable, and its application obvious, the sufferings of the servant of God (who, under that same denomination, is previously described as he who was to be the light of the Gentiles, the salvation of God to the ends of the earth, and the elect of God in whom his soul delighted, Isaiah 42: 10. 49: 6.) are so minutely foretold, that no illustration is requisite to show that they testify of Jesus. The whole of this prophecy thus refers to the Messiah. It describes both his debasement and his dignity; his rejection by the Jews; his humility, his affliction, and his agony; his magnanimity and his charity; how his words were disbelieved; how his state was lowly; how his sorrow was severe; how he opened not his mouth but to make intercession for the transgressors. In diametrical opposition to every dispensation of Providence which is registered in the records of the Jews, it represents spotless innocence suffering by the appointment of Heaven; death as the issue of perfect obedience; God's righteous servant as forsaken of him; and one who was perfectly immaculate bearing the chastisement of many guilty; sprinkling many nations from their iniquity, by virtue of his sacrifice; justifying many by his knowledge; and dividing a portion with the great and the spoil with the strong, because he hath poured out his soul in death. This prophecy, therefore, simply as a prediction prior to the event, renders the very unbelief of the Jews an evidence against them, converts the scandal of the cross into an argument in favor of Christianity, and presents us with an epitome of the truth, a miniature of the gospel in some of its most striking features. The simple exposition of it sufficed at once for the conversion of the eunuch of Ethiopia. To these prophecies may, in fact, be added all those which relate to his spiritual kingdom, or the circumstances of the promulgation, the opposition, and the triumphs of his religion; the accomplishment of which equally proves the divine mission of its Author, and points him out as that great personage with whom they stand inseparably connected.

II. But if Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah, in that character his Deity also is necessarily involved, because the Messiah is surrounded with attributes of divinity in the Old Testament; and our Lord himself as certainly lays claim to those attributes as to the office of "the Christ."

The divinity of Jesus Christ seems evident, if we consider, 1. The language of the New Testament, and compare it with the state of the pagan world at the time of its publication. If Jesus Christ were not God, the writers of the New Testament discovered great injudiciousness in the choice of their words, and adopted a very incautious and dangerous style. The whole world, except the small kingdom of Judea, worshipped idols at the time of Jesus Christ's appearance. Jesus Christ; the evangelists, who wrote his history; and the apostles, who wrote epistles to various classes of men, proposed to destroy idolatry, and to establish the worship of one only living and true God. To effect this purpose, it was absolutely necessary for these founders of Christianity to avoid confusion and obscurity of language, and to express their ideas in a cool and cautious style. The least expression that would tend to deify a creature, or countenance idolatry, would have been a source of the greatest error. Hence Paul and Barnabas rent their clothes at the very idea of the multitude's confounding the creature with the Creator, Acts 14. The writers of the New Testament knew that, in speaking of Jesus Christ, extraordinary caution was necessary; yet, when we take up the New Testament, we find such expressions as these: "The word was God," John 1: 1. "God was manifest in the flesh," 1 Tim. 3: 16. "God with us," Matt. 1: 23. "The Jews crucified the Lord of glory," 1 Cor. 2: 8. "Jesus Christ is Lord of all," Acts 10: 36. "Christ is over all, God blessed for ever," Rom. 9: 5. These are a few of many propositions, which the New Testament writers lay down relative to Jesus Christ. If the writers intended to affirm the divinity of Jesus Christ, these are words of truth and soberness; if not, the language is incautious and unwarrantable; and to address it to men prone to idolatry, for the purpose of destroying idolatry, is a strong presumption against their inspiration. It is remarkable, also, that the richest words in the Greek language are made use of to describe Jesus Christ. This language, which is very copious, would have afforded lower terms to express an inferior nature; but it could have afforded none higher to express the nature of the Supreme God. It is worthy of observation, too, that these writers addressed their writings, not to philosophers and scholars, but to the common people, and consequently used words in their plain, popular signification. The common people, it seems, understood the words in our sense of them; for in the Diocletian persecution, when the Roman soldiers burnt a Phrygian city inhabited by Christians, men, women, and children submitted to their fate, "calling upon Christ, the God over all."

2. Compare the style of the New Testament with the state of the Jews at the time of its publication. In the time of Jesus Christ, the Jews were zealous defenders of the unity of God, and of that idea of his perfections which the Scriptures excited. Jesus Christ and his apostles professed the highest regard for the Jewish Scriptures; yet the writers of the New Testament described Jesus Christ by the very names and titles by which the writers of the Old Testament had described the Supreme God. Compare Exod. 3: 14, with John 8: 58. Is. 44: 6, with Rev. 1: 11, 17. Deut. 10: 17, with Rev. 17: 14. Ps. 24: 10, with 1 Cor. 2: 8. Hos. 1: 7, with Luke 2: 11. Dan. 5: 23, with 1 Cor. 15: 47. 1 Chron. 29: 11, with Col. 2: 10. If they who described Jesus Christ to the Jews by these sacred names and titles intended to convey an idea of his deity, the description is just and the application safe; but if they intended to describe a mere man, they were surely of all men the most preposterous. They chose a method of recommending Jesus to the Jews the most likely to alarm and enrage them. Whatever they meant, the Jews understood them in our sense, and took Jesus for a blasphemer, John 10: 33.

3. Compare the perfections which are ascribed to Jesus Christ in the Scriptures, with those which are ascribed to God. Jesus Christ declares, "All things that the Father hath are mine;" (John 16: 15.) a very dangerous proposition, if he were not God. The writers of revelation ascribe to him the same perfections which they ascribe to God. Compare Jer. 40: 10, with Is. 9: 6. Exod. 15: 13, with Heb. 1: 8. Jer. 32: 19, with Is. 9: 6. Ps. 102: 24, 27, with Heb. 13: 8. Jer. 23: 24, with Eph. 1: 20, 23. 1 Sam. 2: 5, with John 14: 30. If Jesus Christ be God, the ascription of the perfections of God to him is proper: if he be not, the apostles are chargeable with weakness or wickedness, and either would destroy their claim to inspiration.

4. Consider the works that are ascribed to Jesus Christ, and compare them with the claims of Jehovah. Is creation a work of God? "By Jesus Christ were all things created," Col. 1: 16. Is preservation a work of God? "Jesus Christ upholds all things by the word of his power," Heb. 1: 3. Is the mission of the prophets a work of God? Jesus Christ is the Lord God of the holy prophets; and it was the spirit of Christ which testified to them beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow, Neh. 9: 30. Rev. 22: 6, 16. 1 Pet. 1: 11. Is the salvation of sinners a work of God? Christ is the Savior of all that believe, John 4: 42. Heb. 5: 9. Is the forgiveness of sin a work of God? The Son of man hath power to forgive sins, Matt. 9: 6. The same might be said of the illumination of the mind; the sanctification of the heart; the resurrection of the dead; the judging of the world; the glorification of the righteous; the eternal punishment of the wicked; all which works, in one part of Scripture, are ascribed to God; and all which, in another part of Scripture, are ascribed to Jesus Christ. Now, if Jesus Christ be not God, into what contradictions these writers must fall! They contradict one another: they contradict themselves. Either Jesus Christ is God, or their conduct is unaccountable.

5. Consider that divine worship which the Scriptures claim for Jesus Christ. It is a command of God, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve," Matt. 4: 20. Yet the Scriptures command "all the angels of God to worship Christ," Heb. 1: 6. Twenty times, in the New Testament, grace, mercy, and peace, are implored of Christ, together with the Father. Baptism is an act of worship performed in his name, Matt.

28: 19. Swearing is an act of worship: a solemn appeal in important cases to the omniscient God; and this appeal is made to Christ, Rom. 9: 1. The committing of the soul to God at death is a sacred act of worship: in the performance of this act, Stephen died, saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit, Acts 7: 59. The whole host of heaven worship him that sitteth upon the throne, and the Lamb forever and ever, Rev. 5: 13, 14.

6. Observe the application of Old Testament passages which belong to Jehovah, to Jesus in the New Testament, and try whether you can acquit the writers of the New Testament of misrepresentation, on supposition that Jesus is not God. Paul says, "We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ." That we shall all be judged, we allow; but how do you prove that Christ shall be our judge? Because, adds the apostle, it is written, "As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God;" Rom. 14: 10, 11, with Isa. 45: 20, &c. What sort of reasoning is this? How does this apply to Christ, if Christ be not God? And how dare a man quote one of the most guarded passages in the Old Testament for such a purpose? John the Baptist is he who was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying, Prepare ye the way, Matt. 3: 1, 3. Isaias saith, Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make straight a highway for our God, Isa. 40: 3, &c. But what has John the Baptist to do with all this description if Jesus Christ be only a messenger of Jehovah, and not Jehovah himself? for Isaias saith, Prepare ye the way of Jehovah. Compare also Zech. 12: 10, with John 19: 34, 37. Isa. 6, with John 12: 39. Isa. 8: 13, 14, with 1 Pet. 2: 8. Allow Jesus Christ to be God, and all these applications are proper. If we deny it, the New Testament, we must own, is one of the most unaccountable compositions in the world, calculated to make easy things hard to be understood.

7. Examine whether events have justified that notion of Christianity which the prophets gave their countrymen of it, if Jesus Christ be not God. The calling of the Gentiles from the worship of idols to the worship of the one living and true God is one event, which, the prophets said, the coming of the Messiah should bring to pass. If Jesus Christ be God, the event answers the prophecy; if not, the event is not come to pass, for Christians in general worship Jesus, which is idolatry, if he be not God, Isa. 2, 3, and 4. Zeph. 1: 11. Zech. 14: 9. The primitive Christians certainly worshipped him as God. Pliny, who was appointed governor of the province of Bithynia by the emperor Trajan, in the year 103, examined and punished several Christians for their non-conformity to the established religion of the empire. In a letter to the emperor, giving an account of his conduct, he declares, "they affirmed the whole of their guilt, or their error, was that they met on a certain stated day, before it was light, and addressed themselves in a form of prayer to Christ as to some God." Thus Pliny meant to inform the emperor that Christians worshipped Christ. Justin Martyr, who lived about 150 years after Christ, asserts, that the Christians worshipped the Father, the Son, and the Spirit. Besides his testimony there are numberless passages in the fathers that attest the truth in question; especially in Tertullian, Hippolytus, Felix, &c. Mahomet, who lived in the sixth century, considers Christians in the light of infidels and idolaters throughout the Koran; and, indeed, had not Christians worshipped Christ, he could have had no shadow of a pretence to reform their religion, and to bring them back to the worship of one God. That the far greater part of Christians have continued to worship Jesus will not be doubted; now if Christ be not God, then the Christians have been guilty of idolatry; and if they have been guilty of idolatry, then it must appear remarkable that the apostles, who foretold the corruptions of Christianity, (2 Tim. 3.) should never have foreseen nor warned us against worshipping Christ. In no part of the Scripture is there the least intimation of Christians falling into idolatry in this respect. Surely if this had been an error which was to be so universally prevalent, those Scriptures which are able to make us wise unto salvation, would have left us warning on so important a topic. Lastly, consider what numberless passages of Scripture have no sense, or a very absurd one, if Jesus Christ be a mere man.

See Rom. 1: 3. 1 Tim. 3: 16. John 14: 9. 17: 5. Phil. 2: 6. Ps. 110: 1, 4. 1 Tim. 1: 2. Acts 22: 12, and 9: 17.

III. But though Jesus Christ in his original nature be divine, yet for our sakes, and for our salvation, he took upon him human nature; this is, therefore, called his humanity. Marcion, Apelles, Valentins, and many other heretics, denied Christ's humanity, as some have done since. But that Christ had a true human body, and not a mere human shape, or a body that was not real flesh, is very evident from the sacred Scriptures, Isa. 7: 12. Luke 24: 39. Heb. 2: 14. Luke 1: 42. Phil. 2: 7, 8. John 1: 14. Besides, he ate, drank, slept, walked, worked, and was weary. He groaned, bled, and died upon the cross. It was necessary that he should thus be human, in order to fulfil the divine designs and prophecies respecting the shedding of his blood for our salvation, which could not have been done had he not possessed a real body. It is also as evident that he assumed our whole nature, soul as well as body. If he had not, he could not have been capable of that sore amazement and sorrow unto death, and all those other acts of grieving, feeling, rejoicing, &c. ascribed to him. It was not, however, our sinful nature he assumed, but the likeness of it, (Rom. 8: 2.) for he was without sin, and did no iniquity. His human nature must not be confounded with his divine; for though there be an union of natures in Christ, yet there is not a mixture or confusion of them or their properties. His humanity is not changed into his deity, nor his deity into humanity; but the two natures are distinct in one person. How this union exists is above our comprehension; and, indeed, if we cannot explain how our own bodies and souls are united, it is not to be supposed we can explain this astonishing mystery of God manifest in the flesh. (See MEDIATOR.)

The doctrine of the union of divine and human perfections in the person of Christ, derives further confirmation from the consideration, that in no sound sense without admitting it, can the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments be interpreted, so as to make their very different and often apparently contradictory statements respecting him harmonize. How, for instance, is it that he is arrayed in the attributes of divinity; and yet is capable of being raised to a kingdom and glory?—that he is addressed, "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever," and yet that it should follow "God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows?"—that he should be God, and yet, by a human birth, "God with us?"—that he should say, "I and my Father are one," and, "My Father is greater than I?"—that he is supreme, and yet a servant? that he is equal and yet subordinate?—that he, a man, should require and receive worship and trust?—that he should be greater than angels, and yet "made lower than the angels?"—that he should be "made flesh," and yet be the Creator of all things?—that he should raise himself from the dead, and yet be raised by the power of the Father? These and many other declarations respecting him, all accord with the orthodox view of his person; and are intelligible so far as they state the facts respecting him; but are wholly beyond the power of interpretation into any rational meaning on any theory which denies to him a real humanity on the one hand, or a real and personal divinity on the other. So powerfully, in fact, has this been felt, that, in order to evade the force of the testimony of Scripture, the most licentious criticisms have been resorted to by the deniers of his divinity; such as would not certainly have been tolerated by scholars in the case of an attempt to interpret any other ancient writing.

IV. We now proceed to the character of Jesus Christ, which, while it affords us the most pleasing subject for meditation, exhibits to us an example not only of the most binding authority, but of the most perfect and delightful kind.

1. "Here," as an elegant writer observes, "every grace that can recommend religion, and every virtue that can adorn humanity, are so blended as to excite our admiration and engage our love. In abstaining from licentious pleasures, he was equally free from ostentatious singularity and churlish sullenness. When he complied with the established ceremonies of his countrymen, that compliance was not accompanied by any marks of bigotry or superstition; when he opposed their rooted prepossessions, his opposition was perfectly exempt from the captious petulance of a controversialist, and the undistinguishing zeal of an innovator. His courage was active in encountering the dangers to which he was exposed, and passive under the aggravated calamities which the malice of his foes heaped upon him; his fortitude was remote from every appearance of rashness, and his patience was equally exempt from abject pusillanimity: he was firm without obstinacy, and humble without meanness. Though possessed of the most unbounded power, we behold him living continually in a state of voluntary humiliation and poverty: we see him daily exposed to almost every species of want and distress; afflicted without a comforter, persecuted without a protector, and wandering about, according to his own pathetic complaint, because "he had not where to lay his head." Though regardless of the pleasures, and sometimes destitute of the comforts of life, he never provokes our disgust by the sourness of the misanthrope, or our contempt by the inactivity of the recluse. His attention to the welfare of mankind was evidenced not only by his salutary injunctions, but by his readiness to embrace every opportunity of relieving their distress and administering to their wants. In every period and circumstance of his life, we behold dignity and elevation blended with love and pity; something which, though it awakens our admiration, yet attracts our confidence. We see power; but it is power which is rather our security than our dread; a power softened with tenderness, and soothing while it awes. With all the gentleness of a meek and lowly mind, we behold an heroic firmness which no terrors could restrain. In the private scenes of life, and in the public occupations of his ministry, whether the object of admiration or ridicule, of love or of persecution, whether welcomed with hosannas, or insulted with anathemas, we still see him pursuing, with unwearied constancy, the same end, and preserving the same integrity of life and manners." White's Sermons, ser. 5.

2. Considering him as our great MORAL TEACHER, we must be struck with the greatest admiration. As Dr. Paley observes, "he preferred solid to popular virtues: a character which is commonly despised, to a character universally extolled; he placed, on our licentious vices, the check in the right place, viz., upon the thoughts; he collected human duty into two well-devised rules; he repeated these rules, and laid great stress upon them, and thereby fixed the sentiments of his followers: he excluded all regard to reputation in our devotion and alms; and, by parity of reason, in our other virtues: his instructions were delivered in a form calculated for impression; they were illustrated by parables, the choice and structure of which would have been admired in any composition whatever: he was free from the usual symptoms of enthusiasm, heat, and vehemence in devotion, austerity in institutions, and a wild particularity in the description of a future state: he was free, also, from the depravities of his age and country, without superstition among the most superstitious of men; yet not decriing positive distinctions or external observances, but soberly recalling them to the principle of their establishment, and to their place in the scale of human duties: there was nothing of sophistry or trifling, though amidst teachers remarkable for nothing so much as frivolous subtleties and quibbling expositions: he was candid and liberal in his judgment of the rest of mankind, although belonging to a people who affected a separate claim to divine favor, and, in consequence of that opinion, prone to uncharitableness, partiality and restriction: in his religion there was no scheme of building up a hierarchy, or of ministering to the views of human governments: in a word, there was every thing so grand in doctrine, and so delightful in manner, that the people might well exclaim,—'Surely never man spake like this man!'"

3. As our exalted FRIEND and PATTERN, says archbishop Newcome, "he sets an example of the most perfect piety to God, and of the most extensive benevolence and the most tender compassion to man. He does not merely exhibit a life of strict justice, but of overflowing benignity. His temperance has not the dark shades of austerity: his meekness does not degenerate into apathy; his humility is signal, amidst a splendor of qualities more than human; his fortitude is eminent and exemplary in enduring the most formidable external evils, and the sharpest actual sufferings. His patience is invincible; his resignation entire and absolute. Truth and sincerity shine throughout his whole conduct. Though of heavenly descent, he shows obedience and affection to his earthly parents; he approves, loves, and attaches himself to amiable qualities in the human race; he respects authority, religious and civil; and he evidences regard for his country by promoting its most essential good in a painful ministry dedicated to its service, by deploring its calamities, and by laying down his life for its benefit. Every one of his eminent virtues is regulated by consummate prudence; and he both wins the love of his friends, and extorts the approbation and wonder of his enemies. Never was a character at the same time so commanding and natural, so resplendent and pleasing, so amiable and venerable. There is a peculiar contrast in it between an awful greatness, dignity, and majesty, and the most conciliating loveliness, tenderness, and softness. He now converses with prophets, lawgivers, and angels; and the next instant he meekly endures the dulness of his disciples, and the blasphemies and rage of the multitude. He now calls himself greater than Solomon; one who can command legions of angels; and give of life to whomsoever he pleaseth; the Son of God, and who shall sit on his glorious throne to judge the world: at other times we find him embracing young children; not lifting up his voice in the streets, nor quenching the smoking flax; calling his disciples, not servants, but friends and brethren, and comforting them with an exuberant and parental affection. Let us pause an instant, and fill our minds with the idea of one who knew all things, heavenly and earthly; searched and laid open the inmost recesses of the heart; rectified every prejudice, and removed every mistake of a moral and religious kind; by a word exercised a sovereignty over all nature, penetrated the hidden events of futurity, gave promises of admission into a happy immortality, had the keys of life and death, claimed an union with the Father; and yet was pious, mild, gentle, humble, affable, social, benevolent, friendly, and affectionate. Such a character is fairer than the morning star. Each separate virtue is made stronger by opposition and contrast; and the union of so many virtues forms a brightness which fitly represents the glory of that God who inhabiteth light inaccessible." Such a character must have been a real one. There is something so extraordinary, so perfect, and so godlike in it, that it could not have been thus supported throughout by the utmost stretch of human art, much less by men confessedly unlearned and obscure."

A great deal has been written concerning the form, stature, and beauty of Jesus Christ. Some have asserted, that he was in form the noblest of all the sons of men. Others have maintained, that there was no beauty nor any graces in his outward appearance. This difference in opinion shows that no certain tradition was handed down on this subject. The truth probably is, that all which was majestic and attractive in the person of our Lord, was in the expression of the countenance, the full influence of which was displayed chiefly in his confidential intercourse with his disciples; whilst his general appearance presented no striking peculiarity to the common observer. See Robinson's Plea for the Divinity of Christ, from which many of the above remarks are taken; Bishop Bull's Judgment of the Catholic Church; Abadie, Waterland, Hancker, and Hey, on the Divinity of Christ; Stackhouse, Wright, and D'Oyley's Lives of Christ; Dr. Jannison's View of the Doctrine of Scripture, and the Primitive Faith concerning the Deity of Christ; Oslen on the Glory of Christ's Person; Hurriam's Christ Crucified; Dwight's Theology; *J. JETHRO, priest, or prince, of Midian, (for the Hebrew, cohen, signifies a prince as well as a priest;) the father-in-law of Moses. It is believed that he was a priest of the true God, and maintained the true religion, being descended from Midian, son of Abraham and Keturah. Moses does not conceal his alliance with Jethro's family, but invites him to offer sacrifices to the Lord, on his arrival in the camp of Israel, as one who adored the same God, Ex. 18: 11, 12. Some assert that he had four names, Jethro, Raguel, Hobab, and Ceni. Others, that Jethro and Raguel were the same person; that Hobab was son of Jethro, and brother of Zipporah; and that Ceni is a common name, signifying the country of the Kenites, inhabited by the posterity of Hobab, south of the promised land. The Hebrew chothen, which Jerome translates kinsman, is used in Numb. 10: 29. and Ex. 18: 1, 27, to denote the relation between Moses and Hobab; in Numbers, however, Hobab is called son of Raguel, whence others are of opinion that Raguel was the father of Jethro, and Jethro the father of Hobab. On the other side, Raguel gives Zipporah to Moses, Ex. 2: 18. The signification of the Hebrew chothen not being fixed, it is impossible to determine this question with certainty.—Calmet.

JEW, (THE WANDERING;) a fictitious person, who, according to popular tradition, was a Jew that drove our Savior away with curses, when, oppressed with the weight of his cross, he wished to rest on a stone before his house. The calm reply of Jesus was, "Thou shalt wander on the earth till I return." The astonished Jew did not come to himself till the crowd had passed, and the streets were empty; since which time, driven by fear and remorse, he has been obliged to wander from place to place, and has never yet been able to find a grave. Numerous Jews have been suspected and even persecuted as the unhappy wanderer; and doubtless the fable has been realized by many thousands of that hapless race; but it was most likely invented to characterize their condition from the time of the destruction of Jerusalem to the present period, and their rejection of the Savior as the cause of their wanderings. See Croly's "Salathiel."—Hend. Budk.

JEWS; a name derived from the patriarch Judah, and given to the descendants of Abraham by his eldest son, Isaac. We shall here present as comprehensive a view of this singular people as we can.

1. JEWS, HISTORY OF THE.—As the reader of this article may be supposed familiar with their history as recorded in Scripture, we shall pass over here all that preceded the Babylonish captivity, under Nebuchadnezzar. It was then the kingdom of Judah, as well as Israel, was ruined, A. M. 3416, about three hundred and eighty-eight years after its division from that of the ten tribes. In the seventieth year of the begun captivity, the Jews, according to the edict of Cyrus, king of Persia, who had overturned the empire of Chaldaea, returned to their own country. (See NEMEMIAH; EZRA.) After their return they rebuilt the temple and city of Jerusalem, put away their strange wives, and renewed their covenant with God. Vast numbers of them, who had agreeable settlements, remained in Babylon.

About A. M. 3490, or 3546, they escaped the ruin designed them by Haman. About 3653, Darius Ochus, king of Persia, ravaged part of Judea, and carried off a great many prisoners. When Alexander was in Canaan, about 3670, he confined to them all their privileges; and, having built Alexandria, he settled vast numbers of them there. About fourteen years after, Ptolemy Lagus, the Greek king of Egypt, ravaged Judea, and carried one hundred thousand prisoners to Egypt, but used them kindly, and assigned them many places of trust. About eight years after, he transported another multitude of Jews to Egypt, and gave them considerable privileges. About the same time, Seleucus Nicator, having built about thirty new cities in Asia, settled in them as many Jews as he could; and Ptolemy Philadelphus, of Egypt, about 3720, bought the freedom of all the Jew slaves in Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes, about 3834, enraged with them for rejoicing at the report of his death, and for the peculiar form of their worship, in his return from Egypt, forced his way into Jerusalem, and murdered forty thousand of them; and about two years after he ordered his troops to pillage the cities of Judea, and murder the men, and sell the women and children for slaves. Multitudes were killed, and ten thousand prisoners carried off: the temple was dedicated to Olympius, an idol of Greece, and the Jews exposed to the basest treatment. Mattath-ias, the priest, with his sons, chiefly Judas, Jonathan and Simon, who were called Maccabees, bravely fought for their religion and liberties. Judas, who succeeded his father about 3840, gave Nicanor and the king's troops a terrible defeat, regained the temple, and dedicated it anew, restored the daily worship, and repaired Jerusalem, which was almost in a ruinous heap. After his death, Jonathan and Simon, his brethren, successively succeeded him; and both wisely and bravely promoted the welfare of the church and state. Simon was succeeded by his son Hircanus, who subdued Idumea, and reduced the Samaritans. In 3899 he was succeeded by his son Jannæus, who reduced the Philistines, the country of Moab, Ammon, Gilead, and part of Arabia. Under these three reigns alone the Jewish nation was independent after the captivity. After the death of the widow of Jannæus, who governed nine years, the nation was almost ruined with civil broils. In 3939, Aristobulus invited the Romans to assist him against Hircanus, his elder brother. The country was quickly reduced, and Jerusalem taken by force; and Pompey, and a number of his officers, pushed their way into the sanctuary, if not into the holy of holies, to view the furniture thereof. Nine years after, Crassus, the Roman general, pillaged the temple of its valuables. After Judea had for more than thirty years been a scene of ravage and blood, and twenty-four of which it had been oppressed by Herod the Great, Herod got himself installed in the kingdom. Twenty years before our Savior's birth, he, with the Jews' consent, began to build the temple. About this time the Jews had hopes of the Messiah; and about A. M. 4000, Christ actually came, whom Herod (instigated by the fear of losing his throne) sought to murder. The Jews, however, a few excepted, rejected the Messiah, and put him to death. The sceptre was now wholly departed from Judah; and Judea, about twenty-seven years before, reduced to a province. At the destruction of Jerusalem about eleven hundred thousand Jews perished, and since that disastrous event they have been scattered, contemned, persecuted, and enslaved among all nations, not mixed with any in the common manner, but have remained as a body distinct by themselves.

2. JEWS, CALAMITIES OF.—All history cannot furnish us with a parallel to the calamities and miseries of the Jews—rapine and murder, famine and pestilence, within; fire and sword, and all the terrors of war, without. Our Savior wept at the foresight of these calamities; and it is almost impossible for persons of any humanity to read the account without being affected. The predictions concerning them were remarkable, and the calamities that came upon them were the greatest the world ever saw, Dent. 28, 29. Matt. 24. Now, what heinous sin was it that could be the cause of such heavy judgments? Can any other be assigned than what the Scripture assigns? (1 Thess. 2: 15, 16.) "They both killed the Lord Jesus and his own prophets, and persecuted the apostles, and so filled up their sins, and wrath came upon them to the uttermost." It is hardly possible to consider the nature and extent of their sufferings, and not conclude the Jews' own imprecation to be singularly fulfilled upon them, Matt. 27: 25: "His blood be on us and our children." At Cesarea twenty thousand of the Jews were killed by the Syrians in their mutual broils. At Damascus ten thousand unarmed Jews were killed; and at Bethshan the heathen inhabitants caused their Jewish neighbors to assist them against their brethren, and then murdered thirteen thousand of these inhabitants. At Alexandria the Jews murdered multitudes of the heathens, and were murdered in their turn to about fifty thousand. The Romans under Vespasian invaded the country, and took the cities of Galilee, Chorazin, Bethsaida, Capernaum, &c., where Christ had been especially rejected, and murdered numbers of the inhabitants. At Jerusalem the scene was most wretched of all. At the passover, when there might be two or three millions of people in the city, the Romans surrounded it with troops, trenches, and walls, that none might escape. The three different factions within, murdered one another. Titus, one of the most merciful generals that ever breathed, did all in his power to persuade them to an advantageous surrender, but they scorned every proposal. The multitudes of unburied carcasses corrupted the air, and produced a pestilence. The people fed on one another; and even ladies, it is said, broiled their sucking infants, and ate them. After a siege of six months, the city was taken. They murdered almost every Jew they met with. Titus was bent to save the temple, but could not: there were six thousand Jews, who had taken shelter in it, all burnt or murdered. The outcries of the Jews, when they saw it, were most dreadful: the whole city, except three towers and a small part of the wall, was razed to the ground, and the foundations of the temple and other places were ploughed up. Soon after the forts of Herodian and Macheroa were taken, the garrison of Massada murdered themselves rather than surrender. At Jerusalem alone, it is said one million one hundred thousand perished by sword, famine, and pestilence. In other places we hear of two hundred and fifty thousand that were cut off, besides vast numbers sent into Egypt to labor as slaves. About fifty years after, the Jews murdered about five hundred thousand of the Roman subjects, for which they were severely punished by Trajan. About 130, one Barchochab pretended that he was the Messiah, and raised a Jewish army of two hundred thousand, who murdered all the heathens and Christians who came in their way; but he was defeated by Adrian's forces. In this war, it is said, about sixty thousand Jews were slain, and perished. Adrian built a city on mount Calvary, and erected a marble statue of swine over the gate that led to Bethlehem. No Jew was allowed to enter the city, or to look to it at a distance, under pain of death. In 360 they began to rebuild their city and temple; but a terrible earthquake and flames of fire issuing from the earth, killed the workmen, and scattered their materials. Nor till the seventh century durst they so much as creep over the rubbish to bewail it, without bribing the guards. In the third, fourth, and fifth centuries, there were many of them furiously harassed and murdered. In the sixth century, twenty thousand of them were slain, and as many taken and sold for slaves. In 602 they were severely punished for their horrible massacre of the Christians at Antioch. In Spain, in 700, they were ordered to be enslaved. In the eighth and ninth centuries they were greatly derided and abused: in some places they were made to wear leather girdles, and ride without stirrups on asses and mules. In France and Spain they were much insulted. In the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, their miseries rather increased: they were greatly persecuted in Egypt. Besides what they suffered in the East by the Turkish war and crusades, it is shocking to think what multitudes of them the eight crusades murdered in Germany, Hungary, Lesser Asia, and elsewhere. In France, multitudes were burnt. In England, in 1020, they were banished; and at the coronation of Richard I., the mob fell upon them and murdered a great many of them. About one thousand five hundred of them were burnt in the palace in the city of York, which they set fire to themselves, after killing their wives and children. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries their condition was no better. In Egypt, Canaan, and Syria, the crusaders still harassed them. Provoked with their mad running after pretended Messiahs, Khalif Nasser scarcely left any of them alive in his dominions of Mesopotamia. In Persia, the Tartars murdered them in multitudes. In Spain, Ferdinand persecuted them furiously. About 1249, the terrible massacre of them at Toledo forced many to murder themselves, or change their religion. About 1253, many were murdered, and others banished from France; but in 1275 recalled. In 1320 and 1330 the crusades of the fanatic shepherds, who wasted the south of France, massacred them; besides fifteen hundred that were murdered on another occasion. In 1358 they were totally banished from France, since which few of them have entered that country. In 1291 king Edward expelled them from England, to the number of one hundred and sixty thousand. In the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, their misery continued. In Persia they have been terribly used: from 1663 to 1666, the murder of them was so universal, that but a few escaped to Turkey. In Portugal and Spain they have been miserably handled. About 1392, six or eight hundred thousand were banished from Spain; some were drowned in their passage to Africa; some died by hard usage; and many of their carcasses lay in the fields till the wild beasts devoured them. In Germany they have endured many hardships. They have been banished from Bohemia, Bavaria, Cologne, Nuremberg, Augsburg, and Vienna: they have been terribly massacred in Moravia, and plundered in Bonn and Bamberg. Except in Portugal and Spain, their present condition is generally tolerable. In Holland, Poland, and at Frankfort and Hamberg, they have their liberty. They have repeatedly, but in vain, attempted to obtain a naturalization in England, and other nations among whom they are scattered.

3. JEWS, PRESERVATION OF.—“The preservation of the Jews,” says Basnage, “in the midst of the miseries which they have undergone during seventeen hundred years, is the greatest prodigy that can be imagined. Religions depend on temporal prosperity; they triumph under the protection of a conqueror; they languish and sink with sinking monarchies. Paganism, which once covered the earth, is extinct. The Christian church, glorious in its martyrs, yet was considerably diminished by the persecutions to which it was exposed; nor was it easy to repair the breaches in it, made by those acts of violence. But here we behold a church hated and persecuted for seventeen hundred years, and yet sustaining itself, and widely extended. Kings have often employed the severity of edicts and the hand of executioners to ruin it. The seditious multitudes, by murders and massacres, have committed outrages against it still more violent and tragical. Princes and people, pagans, Mohammedans, Christians, disagreeing in so many things, have united in the design of exterminating it, and have not been able to succeed. The bush of Moses, surrounded with flames, ever burns, and is never consumed. The Jews have been expelled, in different times, from every part of the world, which hath only served to spread them in all regions. From age to age they have been exposed to misery and persecution; yet still they subsist, in spite of the ignominy and the hatred which hath pursued them in all places, whilst the greatest monarchies are fallen, and nothing remains of them besides the name.

“The judgments which God has exercised upon this people are terrible, extending to the men, the religion, and the very land in which they dwell. The ceremonies essential to their religion can no more be observed: the ritual law, which cast a splendor on the national worship, and struck the pagans so much, that they sent their presents and their victims to Jerusalem, is absolutely fallen, for they have no temple, no altar, no sacrifices. Their land itself seems to lie under a never-ceasing curse. Pagans, Christians, Mohammedans, in a word, almost all nations, have by turns seized and held Jerusalem. To the Jew only hath God refused the possession of this small tract of ground, so supremely necessary for him, since he ought to worship on this mountain. A Jewish writer hath affirmed, that it is long since any Jew has been seen settled near Jerusalem: scarcely can they purchase there six feet of land for a burying-place.

“In all this there is no exaggeration: I am only pointing out known facts; and, far from having the least design to raise an odium against the nation from its miseries, I conclude that it ought to be looked upon as one of those prodigies which we admire without comprehending; since, in spite of evils so durable, and a patience so long exercised, it is preserved by a particular providence. The Jew ought to be weary of expecting a Messiah, who so unkindly disappoints his vain hopes; and the Christian ought to have his attention and his regard excited towards men whom God preserves for so great a length of time, under calamities which would have been the total ruin of any other people.”

4. JEWS, MODERN NUMBER AND DISPERSION OF.—They are looked upon to be as numerous at present as they were formerly in the land of Canaan. Some have rated them at three millions, and others more than double that number. Their dispersion is a remarkable particular in this people. They swarm all over the East, and are settled, it is said, in the remotest parts of China. The Turkish empire abounds with them. There are more of them at Constantinople and Salonichi than in any other place: they are spread through most of the nations of Europe and Africa, and many families of them are established in the West Indies; not to mention whole nations in middle Asia, and some discovered in the inner parts of America, if we may give any credit to their own writers. Their being always in rebellions (as Addison observes) while they had the holy temple in view, has excited most nations to banish them. Besides, the whole people are now a race of such merchants as are wanderers by profession; and at the same time are in most, if not in all places, incapable of either lands or offices, that might engage them to make any part of the world their home.—In addition to this, we may consider what providential reasons may be assigned for their numbers and dispersion. Their firm adherence to their religion, and being dispersed all over the earth, has furnished every age and every nation with the strongest arguments for the Christian faith; not only as these very particulars are foretold of them, but as they themselves are the depositaries of these and all other prophecies which tend to their own confusion, and the establishment of Christianity. Their number furnishes us with a sufficient cloud of witnesses that attest the truth of the Bible, and their dispersion spreads these witnesses through all parts of the world.

5. JEWS, MODERN, SENTIMENTS OF.—A summary of the Jewish creed was drawn up by Moses Maimonides, otherwise called the Great Rambam, (i. e. Rabbi Moses Ben Maimon,) an Egyptian rabbi of the eleventh century, which is still acknowledged as their confession of faith. It consists of thirteen articles, and reads as follows:—

I. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is the governor and creator of all the creatures, and that it is he who made, maketh, and will make all things.

II. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is one, and that no unity is like his, and he alone, our God, was, is, and shall be.

III. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is incorporeal; that he is not to be comprehended by those faculties which comprehend corporeal objects; and that there is no resemblance to him whatever.

IV. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is the first and the last.

V. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! is alone worthy of adoration; and that none besides him is worthy of adoration.

VI. I believe, with a perfect faith, that all the oracles of the prophets are true.

VII. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the prophecies of Moses, our master, on whom be peace, are true; and that he is the father of all the wise men who were before him, and who came after him.

VIII. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the whole law of commandments which we now have in our hands, was given to Moses, our master, on whom be peace.

IX. I believe, with a perfect faith, that this law will not be changed, and that there will not be any other law from the Creator, blessed be his name!

X. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! knows all the actions of the children of men, and all their thoughts; as it is said—“Who frameth all their hearts; who understandeth all their actions.”

XI. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name! will recompense good to him who observeth his commandments, and that he will punish him that transgresseth them.

XII. I believe, with a perfect faith, in the advent of the Messiah, and though he should tarry, yet I will patiently wait for him every day till he come.

XIII. I believe, with a perfect faith, that there will be a revivification of the dead, at the period when it shall please the Creator, blessed be his name! and let his remembrance be exalted forever and ever!

The modern Jews still adhere as closely to the Mosaic dispensation, as their dispersed and despoiled condition will permit them. Their service consists chiefly in reading the law in their synagogues, together with a variety of prayers. They use no sacrifices since the destruction of the temple. They repeat blessings and particular praises to God, not only in their prayers, but on all accidental occasions, and in almost all their actions. They go to prayers three times a day in their synagogues. Their sermons are not made in Hebrew, which few of them now perfectly understand, but in the language of the country where they reside. They are forbidden all vain swearing, and pronouncing any of the names of God without necessity. They abstain from meats prohibited by the Levitical law; for which reason, whatever they eat must be dressed by Jews, and after a manner peculiar to themselves. As soon as a child can speak, they teach him to read the Bible in the original Hebrew, but without understanding the meaning of the words. In general they observe the same ceremonies which were practised by their ancestors in the celebration of the passover. They acknowledge a twofold law of God, a written and an unwritten one; the former is contained in the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses; the latter, they pretend, was delivered by God to Moses, and handed down from him by oral tradition, and now to be received as of equal authority with the former. They assert the perpetuity of their law, together with its perfection. They deny the accomplishment of the prophecies in the person of Christ; alleging that the Messiah is not yet come, and that he will make his appearance with the greatest worldly pomp and grandeur, subduing all nations before him, and subjecting them to the house of Judah. Since the prophets have predicted his mean condition and sufferings, they confidently talk of two Messiahs; one Ben-Ephraim, whom they grant to be a person of a mean and afflicted condition in this world; and the other, Ben-David, who shall be a victorious and powerful prince.

The Jews pray for the souls of the dead, because they suppose there is a paradise for the souls of good men, where they enjoy glory in the presence of God. They believe that the souls of the wicked are tormented in hell with fire and other punishments; that some are condemned to be punished in this manner forever, while others continue only for a limited time; and this they call purgatory, which is not different from hell in respect of the place, but of the duration. They suppose no Jew, unless guilty of heresy, or certain crimes specified by the rabbins, shall continue in purgatory above a twelvemonth; and that there are but few who suffer eternal punishment.

Almost all the modern Jews are Pharisees, and are as much attached to tradition as their ancestors were; and assert, that whoever rejects the oral law deserves death.

Hence they entertain an implacable hatred to the Karaites, who adhere to the text of Moses, rejecting the rabbinical interpretation. (See KARAITES.)

There are still some of the Sadducees in Africa, and in several other places; but they are few in number—at least there are but very few who declare openly for these opinions.

There are to this day some remains of the ancient sect of the Samaritans, who are zealous for the law of Moses, but are despised by the Jews, because they receive only the Pentateuch, and observe different ceremonies from theirs. They declare they are no Sadducees, but acknowledge the spirituality and immortality of the soul. There are numbers of this sect at Gaza, Damascus, Grand Cairo, and in some other places of the East; but especially at Sichem, now called Naplouse, which is risen out of the ruins of the ancient Samaria, where they sacrificed not many years ago, having a place for this purpose on mount Gerizim.

David Levi, a learned Jew, who in 1796 published “Dissertations on the Prophecies of the Old Testament,” observes in that work, that deism and infidelity have made such large strides in the world, that they have at length reached even to the Jewish nation; many of whom are at this time so greatly infected with scepticism by reading Bolingbroke, Hume, Voltaire, &c., that they scarcely believe in a revelation, much less have they any hope in their future restoration.

6. JEWS, RESTORATION OF.—From the declarations of Scripture we have reason to suppose the Jews shall be called to a participation of the blessings of the gospel, (Rom. 11. 2 Cor. 3. 16. Hos. 1. 11.) and some suppose shall return to their own land, Hos. 3. 5. Is. 65. 17. &c. Ezek. 36. As to the time, some think about 1866 or 2016; but this, perhaps, is not so easy to determine altogether, though it is probable it will not be before the fall of Anti-christ and the Ottoman empire. Let us, however, avoid putting stumbling-blocks in their way. If we attempt any thing for their conversion, let it be with peace and love. Let us, says one, propose Christianity to them, as Christ proposed it to them. Let us lay before them their own prophecies. Let us show them their accomplishment in Jesus. Let us applaud their hatred of idolatry. Let us show them the morality of Jesus in our lives and tempers. Let us never abridge their civil liberty, nor ever try to force their consciences. Josephus' History of the Jews; Spectator, no. 495, vol. iv.; *Levi's Ceremonies of the Jewish Religion; Buxtorf de Synagoga Judaica; Spencer de Legibus, Heb. JEWELL, (JOHN), a learned English writer and bishop, was born, in 1522, at Buden, in the county of Devon, and educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts in 1540, became a noted tutor, and was soon after chosen lecturer in rhetoric in his college. He had early imbibed the principles of the Reformation, and inculcated them upon his pupils, though it was done privately till the accession of king Edward the Sixth, which took place in 1546, when he made a public declaration of his faith, and entered into a close friendship with Peter Martyr. On the accession of queen Mary, in 1553, he was one of the first to feel the rage of the storm then raised against the Reformation; he was obliged to fly; and, after encountering many difficulties, arrived at Frankfort, in the second year of queen Mary's reign, where he made a public recantation of his forced subscription to the popish doctrines. He then went to Strasburg, and afterwards to Zurich, where he resided with Peter Martyr. He returned to England in 1558, after the death of queen Mary, and in the following year was consecrated bishop of Salisbury. Two years afterwards he published his famous "Apologia pro Ecclesia Anglicana." But his watchful and laborious manner of life impaired his health, and brought him quickly to the grave. He died at Monkton Farley, the 22d of September, 1571, in the fiftieth year of his age.

He was a prelate of great learning, piety, and moderation; irreproachable in his private life; extremely generous and charitable to the poor, to whom, it is said, his doors stood always open. He was of a pleasant and affable temper, modest, meek, and temperate, and a great master of his passions. His memory was naturally strong and retentive, but he is said to have greatly improved it by art, inasmuch that marvellous things are related of it by his biographers.

He wrote, besides his Apology for the Church of England, "A View of a seditious Bull sent into England by pope Pius V. in 1569;" "A Treatise on the Holy Scriptures;" "An Exposition of the Two Epistles to the Thessalonians;" "A Treatise on the Sacrament;" besides several sermons and controversial treatises. His works were collected and published in one folio volume, London, 1609. Brit. Biog.—Jones' Chris. Biog.

JEWELS; valuables, whether for store, or for apparel. This word does not mean jewellery works, gems, &c. but whatever is stored up in consequence of its superior estimation. God calls his people jewels; (Mal. 3: 17.) the lips of knowledge are a jewel, Prov. 20: 15.—Calmet.

JEZEBEL; daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and wife of Ahab, king of Israel, 1 Kings 16: 31. This princess introduced into the kingdom of Samaria the public worship of Baal, Astarte, and other Phœnician deities, which the Lord had expressly forbidden; and with this impious worship, a general prevalence of those abominations which had formerly incensed God against the Canaanites, to their utter extirpation. Jezebel was so zealous, that she fed at her own table four hundred prophets belonging to the goddess Astarte; and her husband Ahab, in like manner, kept four hundred of Baal's prophets, as ministers of his false gods. The name of Jezebel is used proverbially, Rev. 2: 20. (See JEUU.)—Watson.

JEZIRAH; a cabalistic term, denoting the third world, or the world of thinking substances. It is also the name of a book on cabalistic theology, containing six chapters, and treating of the world, of motion, of time, and of the soul. It is extremely obscure; every thing in it is expressed in numbers and letters. It is mentioned in the Mishna, and therefore must have existed before the Talmud.—Hend. Buck.

JEZREEL; a royal city of the kings of Israel, who sometimes resided here as well as at Samaria. Ahab, in particular, is known to have made this his residence; near to whose palace was the vineyard of the unfortunate Naboth. The name of Jezreel was by the Greeks moulded into that of Esdraela; which is described by Eusebius and Jerome, in the fourth century, as a considerable town. In like manner, the valley of Jezreel obtained the name of the valley or plain of Esdraeloon. (See ESDRAELON.)—Watson.

JOAB, was the son of Zeruiah, David's sister, and brother to Abishai and Asahel. He was one of the most valiant soldiers and greatest generals in David's time; but he was also cruel, revengeful, and imperious. He performed great services for David, to whose interests he was always firm, and was commander-in-chief of his troops, when David was king of Judah only. His history is related in the second book of Samuel and the first book of Kings. (See DAVID; ABNER; and AMASA.)—Watson.

JOACHIMITES; the disciples of Joachim, abbot of Flora, in Calabria. Joachim was a Cistercian monk, and a great pretender to inspiration. He relates of himself, that, being very young, he went to Jerusalem in the dress of a hermit to visit the holy places; and that, while he was in prayer to God in the church of that city, God communicated to him, by infusion, the knowledge of divine mysteries, and of the Holy Scriptures. He wrote against Lombard, the master of the sentences, who had maintained that there was but one essence in God, though there were three persons; and he pretended, that, since there were three persons, there must be three essences. This dispute was in the year 1195. Joachim's writings were followed by the fourth Lateran council.

His followers, the Joachimites, were particularly fond of certain ternaries. The Father, they said, operated from the beginning until the coming of the Son; the Son from that time to theirs, viz. the year 1260; and the Holy Spirit then took it up, and was to operate in his turn. They likewise divided every thing relating to men, doctrine, and manner of living, into three classes, according to the three persons of the Trinity. The first ternary was that of men; of whom, the first class was that of married men, which had lasted during the whole period of the Father; the second was that of clerks, which lasted during the time of the Son; and the last was that of monks, wherein was to be an uncommon effusion of grace by the Holy Spirit. The second ternary was that of doctrine, viz. the Old Testament, the New, and the everlasting Gospel: the first they ascribed to the Father, the second to the Son, and the third to the Holy Spirit. A third ternary consisted in the manner of living; viz. under the Father, men lived according to the flesh; under the Son, they lived according to the flesh and the spirit; and under the Holy Ghost, they were to live according to the spirit only.—Hend. Buck.

JOANNA, wife of Chnza, Herod's steward, (Luke 8: 3.) was one of those women who followed our Savior, and assisted him with their property. Luke observes, that these women had been delivered by Christ from evil spirits; or cured of diseases. Perhaps Joanna was not a widow. It was customary among the Jews, for men who dedicated themselves to preaching, to accept services from women of piety, who attended them, without any scandal.—Calmet.

JOASH; son of Ahaziab, king of Judah, 2 Kings 11. (See JEHOIAH, and JESHOSHEBA.)—Watson.

JOB; a patriarch celebrated for his patience, and the constancy of his piety and virtue.

1. His reality.—That Job was a real, and not a fictitious, character, may be inferred from the manner in which he is mentioned in the Scriptures, Ezck. 14: 14. James 5: 11. But, besides the authority of the inspired writers, we have the strongest internal evidence, from the book itself, that Job was a real person; for it expressly specifies the names of persons, places, facts, and other circumstances usually related in true histories. Thus, we have the name, country, piety, wealth, &c., of Job described; (Job 1.) the names, number, and acts of his children are mentioned; the conduct of his wife is recorded as a fact; (2.) his friends, their names, countries, and discourses with him in his afflictions are minutely delineated, (Job 2: 11, &c.) Further: no reasonable doubt can be entertained respecting the real existence of Job, when we consider that it is proved by the concurrent testimony of all Eastern tradition: he is mentioned by the author of the book of Tobit, who lived during the Assyrian captivity; he is also repeatedly mentioned by Arabian writers as a real character. The whole of his history, with many fabulous additions, was known among the Syrians and Chaldeans; and many of the noblest families among the Arabs are distinguished by his name, and boast of being descended from him.

2. Date of the History.—The following are the principal circumstances from which the era of Job may be collected and ascertained:—1. The Usurian or Bible chronology dates the trial of Job about the year 1520 before the Christian era, twenty-nine years before the departure of the Israelites from Egypt; and that the book was composed before that event, is evident from its total silence respecting the miracles which accompanied the exode; such as the passage of the Red sea, the destruction of the Egyptians, the manna in the desert, &c.; all of which happened in the vicinity of Job's country, and were so apposite in the debate concerning the ways of Providence, that some notice could not but have been taken of them, if they had been coeval with the poem of Job. 2. That it was composed before Abraham's migration to Canaan, may also be inferred from its silence respecting the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the other cities of the plain, which were still nearer to Idumea, where the scene is laid. 3. The length of Job's life places him in the patriarchal times. He survived his trial one hundred and forty years, (Job 42: 16.) and was probably not younger at that time; for we read that his seven sons were all grown up, and had been settled in their own houses for a considerable time, Job 1: 4, 5. He speaks of the sins of his youth, (Job 13: 26.) and of the prosperity of his youth; and yet Eliphaz addresses him as a novice: "With us are yet the gray-headed and very aged men, much elder than thy father;" Job 15: 10. 4. That he did not live at an earlier period, may be collected from an incidental observation of Bildad, who refers Job to their forefathers for instruction in wisdom:—

"Inquire, I pray thee, of the former age, And prepare thyself to the search of their fathers:"

assigning as a reason the comparative shortness of human life, and consequent ignorance of the present generation:—

"For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing; Because our days upon earth are a shadow:"

Job 8: 8, 9.

But the fathers of the former age, or grandfathers of the present, were the contemporaries of Peleg and Joktan, in the fifth generation after the deluge, and they might easily have learned wisdom from the fountain-head by conversing with Shem, or perhaps with Noah himself; whereas, in the seventh generation, the standard of human life was reduced to about two hundred years, which was a shadow compared with the longevity of Noah and his sons. 5. The general air of antiquity which pervades the manners recorded in the poem, is a further evidence of its remote date. The manners and customs, indeed, critically correspond with that early period. Thus, Job speaks of the most ancient kind of writing, by sculpture; (Job 19: 24.) his riches also are reckoned by his cattle, Job 42: 12. Further: Job acted as high-priest in his family, according to the patriarchal usage; (Gen. 8: 20.) for the institution of an established priesthood does not appear to have taken place anywhere until the time of Abraham. Melchizedec, king of Salem, was a priest of the primitive order; (Gen. 14: 18.) such also was Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, in the vicinity of Idumea, Exod. 18: 12. The first regular priesthood was probably instituted in Egypt, where Joseph was married to the daughter of the priest of On, Gen. 41: 45. 6. The slavish homage of prostration to princes and great men, which prevailed in Egypt, Persia, and the East in general, and which still subsists there, was unknown in Arabia at that time. Though Job was one of the greatest men of all the East, we do not find any such adoration paid to him by his contemporaries, in the zenith of his prosperity, among the marks of respect so minutely described in the twenty-ninth chapter. With this description correspond the manners and conduct of the genuine Arabs of the present day, a majestic race, who were never conquered, and who have retained their primitive customs, features, and character, with scarcely any alteration. 7. The allusion made by Job to that species of idolatry alone, which by general consent is admitted to have been the most ancient, namely, Zabianism, or the worship of the sun and moon, and also to the exertion of the judicial authority against it, (Job 31: 26—28.) is an additional and most complete proof of the high antiquity of the poem, as well as a decisive mark of the patriarchal age. 8. A further evidence of the remote antiquity of this book is the language of Job and his friends; who, being all Idumeans, or at least Arabians of the adjacent country, yet conversed in Hebrew. This carries us up to an age so early as that in which all the posterity of Abraham, Israelites, Idumeans, and Arabians, yet continued to speak one common language, and had not branched into different dialects.

3. Its Locality.—The country in which the scene of this poem is laid, is stated (Job 1: 1.) to be the land of Uz, which by some geographers has been placed in Sandy, and by others in Stony, Arabia. Bochart strenuously advocated the former opinion, in which he has been powerfully supported by Spaheim, Calmet, Carpzov, Heidegger, and some later writers; Michaëlis and Iigen place the scene in the valley of Damascus; but bishops Louth and Magee, Dr. Hales, Dr. Good, and some later critics and philologists, have shown that the scene is laid in Edom, or Idumea. In effect, nothing is clearer than that the history of an inhabitant of Idumea is the subject of the poem which bears the name of Job, and that all the persons introduced into it were Idumeans, dwelling in Idumea, in other words, Edomite Arabs. These characters are, Job himself, of the land of Uz; Eliphaz, of Teman, a district of as much repute as Uz, and which, it appears from the joint testimony of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Amos, and Obadiah, (Jer. 49: 7, 20. Ezek. 25: 13. Amos 1: 11, 12. Obadiah 8: 9.) formed a principal part of Idumea; Bildad, of Shuah, who is always mentioned in conjunction with Sheba and Dedan, the first of whom was probably named after one of the brothers of Joktan or Kahtan, and the two last from two of his sons, all of them being uniformly placed in the vicinity of Idumea; (Gen. 25: 2, 3. Jer. 49: 8.) Zophar, of Naama, a city importing pleasantness, which is also stated by Joshua (15: 21, 41.) to have been situate in Idumea, and to have lain in a southern direction towards its coast, on the shores of the Red sea; and Elihu, of Buz, which, as the name of a place, occurs only once in sacred writ, (Jer. 25: 23.) but is there mentioned in conjunction with Teman and Dedan; and hence necessarily, like them, a border city upon Uz or Idumea. Allowing this chorography to be correct, (and such, upon a fair review of facts, we may conclude it to be,) there is no difficulty in conceiving that hordes of nomadic Chaldeans, as well as Sabæans, a people addicted to rapine, and roving about at immense distances for the sake of plunder, should have occasionally infested the defenceless country of Idumea, and roved from the Euphrates even to Egypt.

4. Its Author.—The different parts of the book of Job are so closely connected together, that they cannot be detached from each other. Hence it is evident, that the poem is the composition of a single author; but who that was, is a question concerning which the learned are very much divided in their sentiments. Moses, Elihu, Job; Solomon, Isaiah, an anonymous writer in the reign of Manasseh, Ezekiel, and Ezra, have all been contended for. The arguments already adduced respecting the age of Job, prove that it could not be either of the latter persons. But, independently of the characters of antiquity already referred to, and which place the book of Job very many centuries before the time of Moses, the total absence of every the slightest allusion to the manners, customs, ceremonies, or history of the Israelites, is a direct evidence that the great legislator of the Hebrews was not, and could not have been, the author. Upon the whole, then, we have sufficient ground to conclude that this book was not the production of Moses, but of some earlier age. Bishop Lowth favors the opinion of Schultens, Peters, and others, which is adopted by bishop Tomline and Dr. Hales, who suppose Job himself, or some contemporary, to have been the author of this poem; and there seems to be no good reason for supposing that it was not written by Job himself. It appears, indeed, highly probable that Job, who, it appears, was also an inspired prophet, was the writer of his own story, 42: 1.

The original work was probably more ancient than the time of Moses, and seems to have been written in the old Hebrew, or perhaps the Arabic. Our present copy is evidently altered in its style, so as to have transfused into it a Hebrew phraseology, resembling that in the age of Solomon, to the writings of which author the style bears a great resemblance. This idea, for which we are indebted to Dr. J. P. Smith, meets the difficulty that has been urged from the style of the book, against its antiquity, and unites the discordant opinions that have been entertained on the subject.

5. Its contents, style, &c.—The book of Job contains the history of a man equally distinguished for purity and uprightness of character, and for honors, wealth, and domestic felicity, whom God permitted, for the trial of his faith, to be suddenly deprived of all his numerous blessings, and to be at once plunged into the deepest affliction, and most accumulated distress. His trial is unspeakably aggravated by the false judgments of his three friends. It gives an account of his eminent piety, patience, and resignation under the pressure of these severe calamities, of their humbling and purifying effects upon him, and of his subsequent elevation to a degree of prosperity and happiness, still greater than that which he had before enjoyed. How long the sufferings of Job continued, we are not informed; but it is said, that after God turned his captivity, and blessed him a second time, he lived one hundred and forty years, Job 42: 16. Through the whole work we discover religious instruction shining forth amidst the venerable simplicity of ancient manners. It everywhere abounds with the noblest sentiments of piety, uttered with the spirit of inspired conviction.

It is a work unrivalled for the magnificence of its language, and for the beautiful and sublime images which it presents. In the wonderful speech of the Deity, (Job 38, 39.) every line delineates his attributes, every sentence opens a picture of some grand object in creation, characterized by its most striking features. Add to this, that its prophetic parts reflect much light on the economy of God's moral government, revealing the consoling truth, that in this transitory state of discipline, it is whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth; and every admirer of sacred antiquity, every inquirer after religious instruction, will seriously rejoice that the sublime wish of Job 19: 23, is realized to a more effectual and unforeseen accomplishment; that while the memorable records of antiquity have mouldered from the rock, the prophetic assurance and sentiments of Job are graven in Scriptures that no time shall alter, no changes shall efface. The best translation of this book is that of Mr. Noyes. The best analysis by far, of its arguments, is that of Dr. Good. See Horne's Introduction; Magee on Atonement, Notes; Memoir, Translation, and Notes, of Dr. Good.—Calmet; Jones; Watson.

JOEL; the second of the twelve lesser prophets. It is impossible to ascertain the age in which he lived, but it seems most probable that he was contemporary with Hosea. No particulars of his life or death are certainly known. His prophecies are confined to the kingdom of Judah. He inveighs against the sins and impieties of the people, and threatens them with divine vengeance; he exhorts to repentance, fasting, and prayer; and promises the favor of God to those who should be obedient. The principal predictions contained in this book are the Chal-

dean invasion, under the figurative representation of locusts; the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus; the blessings of the gospel dispensation; the conversion and restoration of the Jews to their own land; the overthrow of the enemies of God; and the glorious state of the Christian church in the end of the world. The style of Joel is perspicuous and elegant, and his descriptions are remarkably animated and poetical.—Watson; Horne.

JOGEES, or JOGUIS. (See YOGUES.)

JOHANAN; high-priest, son of Azariah the high-priest, and father of another Azariah, 1 Chron. 6: 9, 10. Some believe him to be Jehoiaida, the father of Zechariah, in the reign of Joash, king of Judah, 2 Chron. 24: 11, &c.—Calmet.

JOHN HIRCANUS; son of Simon Maccabeus, and high-priest of the Jews. He made himself master of all Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and many frontier towns; so that he was one of the most powerful princes of his time. At home, however, he was troubled by the Pharisees, who envied his exaltation, and at length their mutual ill-will broke out into open enmity. John forbade the observance of such ceremonies as were founded on tradition only; and he enforced his orders by penalties on the contumacious. He is said to have built the castle of Baris, on the mount of the temple; which became the palace of the Asmonean princes; and where the pontifical vestments were kept. After having been high-priest twenty-nine years, John died, B. C. 107. Josephus says he was endowed with the spirit of prophecy, Antiq. lib. xiii. 17, 18; xviii. 6. 2 Mac. 3: 11, et al.—Calmet.

JOHN THE BAPTIST, (qui immergit.) the greatest of prophets, and the forerunner of the Messiah, was the son of Zechariah and Elisabeth, and born about six months before the Savior, Luke 1: 5—15.

Of the early part of his life, we have but little information. It is only observed, "that he grew and waxed strong in the Spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel," ver. 80. Though consecrated from the womb to the ministerial office, John did not enter upon it in the heat of youth, but after several years spent in solitude, and a course of self-denial. He had gained the conquest of his own passions, and was mortified to the temptations of the world, before he went forth to preach repentance to others. Divine knowledge is not to be acquired in the busy scenes of life, amidst the noise of folly, the clamor of parties, the confusion of opinions, and the allurements of vice. In the world we may learn much of what is generally admired; but if we would gain spiritual wisdom, obtain the mastery of our passions, and an habitual love of holiness, we must, at least occasionally, retire from the world, to commune with our own hearts, and be still.

The prophetic descriptions of the Baptist in the Old Testament are various and striking. That by Isaiah is direct and unequivocal, ch. 40: 3. The voice which was thus sounded in the prophet's ears before it was really heard upon the earth, was that of the Baptist, who, at a proper season, was sent to dispose the hearts of men for the reception of the Savior.

Malachi has the following prediction: "Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to the fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse," ch. 4: 5. "That this was meant of the Baptist, we have the testimony of our Lord himself, who declared, "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. And if ye will receive it, this is Elias who was to come," Matt. 11: 14.

The appearance and manners of the Baptist, when he first came out into the world, excited general attention. His clothing was of camel's hair, bound around him with a leathern girdle, and his food consisted of locusts and wild honey, Matt. 3: 4. The message which he declared was authoritative: "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" and the impression produced by his faithful reproofs and admonitions was powerful and extensive, and in a great number of instances lasting. Most of the first followers of our Lord appear to have been awakened to seriousness and religious inquiry by John's ministry. His first station for preaching and baptizing was at Be-thabara, on the river Jordan. (See JORDAN; BETHABARA; JUDEA; WILDERNESS.) He afterwards went up the river to Enon. (See ENON.)

His character was so eminent, that many of the Jews thought him to be the Messiah; but he plainly declared that he was not that exalted personage. Nevertheless, he was at first unacquainted with the person of Jesus Christ; only the Holy Ghost had told him that he on whom he should see the Holy Spirit descend and rest was the Messiah. When Jesus Christ presented himself to receive baptism from him, the sign was vouchsafed; and from that time he bore his testimony to Jesus, as the Christ.

A beautiful feature in John's character is the lowly spirit which on every occasion he manifested. Great popularity is dangerous to the most sanctified minds. But in what a critical situation was the Baptist placed, when followed by men of all ranks, sects, and parties: his fame echoed far and near, and "all men mused in their hearts concerning him, whether he was the Christ?" John 1: 19—28, and 3: 23—36. Let every minister of Christ imitate John in turning the public attention from himself to the Savior. (See the article BAPTISM.)

Herod Antipas, having married his brother Philip's wife while Philip was still living, occasioned great scandal. John the Baptist, with his usual liberty and vigor, reproved Herod to his face; and told him that it was not lawful for him to have his brother's wife, while his brother was yet alive. Herod, incensed at this freedom, ordered him into custody, in the castle of Machærus; where he ultimately put him to death. (See ANTIPAS.) Thus (A. D. 32.) fell this honored prophet, a martyr to ministerial faithfulness. Other prophets testified of Christ; he pointed to him as already come. Others saw him afar off; he beheld the advancing glories of his ministry eclipsing his own, and rejoiced to "decrease" whilst his Master "increased." His ministry stands as a type of the true character of evangelical repentance: it goes before Christ and prepares his way; it is humbling, but not despairing; for it points to "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world."

The Jews had such an opinion of this prophet's sanctity, that they ascribed the overthrow of Herod's army, which he had sent against his father-in-law Aretas, to the just judgment of God for putting John the Baptist to death.

The death of John was sharp, but momentary; and though sudden, it did not find him unprepared. From the darkness and confinement of a prison, he passed to the liberty and light of heaven: and while malice was gratified with a sight of his head, and his body was carried by a few friends in silence to the grave, his immortal spirit repaired to a court, where no Herod desires to have his brother's wife; where no Herodias thirsts after the blood of a prophet; where he who hath labored with sincerity and diligence in the work of reformation is sure to be well received; where holiness, zeal, and constancy, "are crowned, and receive palms from the Son of God, whom they confessed in the world." Bishop Horne's Life of John the Baptist; Robinson's History of Baptism.—Jones; Watson.

JOHN, (ST., CHRISTIANS OF.) (See CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN.)

JOHN, (THE EVANGELIST,) was a native of Bethsaida, in Galilee, son of Zebedee and Salome, by profession a fisherman. Some have thought that he was a disciple of John the Baptist before he attended Jesus Christ. He was brother to James the Greater. It is believed that St. John was the youngest of the apostles. Tillemont is of opinion that he was twenty-five or twenty-six years of age when he began to follow Jesus. Our Savior had a particular friendship for him; and he describes himself by the name of "that disciple whom Jesus loved." St. John was one of the four apostles to whom our Lord delivered his predictions relative to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the approaching calamities of the Jewish nation, Mark 13: 3. St. Peter, St. James, and St. John were chosen to accompany our Savior on several occasions, when the other apostles were not permitted to be present. When Christ restored the daughter of Jairus to life, (Mark 5: 37. Luke 8: 51.) when he was transfigured on the mount, (Matt. 17: 1, 2. Mark 9: 2. Luke 9: 28.) and when he endured his agony in the garden, (Matt. 26: 36, 37. Mark 14: 32, 33.) St. Peter, St. James, and St. John were his only attendants. That St. John was treated by Christ with greater familiarity than the other apostles, is evident from St. Peter's desiring him to ask Christ who should betray him, when he himself did not dare to propose the question, John 13: 24. He seems to have been the only apostle present at the crucifixion, and to him Jesus, just as he was expiring upon the cross, gave the strongest proof of his confidence and regard, by consigning to him the care of his mother, John 19: 26, 27. As St. John had been witness to the death of our Savior, by seeing the blood and water issue from his side, which a soldier had pierced, (John 19: 34, 35.) so he was one of the first made acquainted with his resurrection. Without any hesitation, he believed this great event, though "as yet he knew not the Scripture, that Christ was to rise from the dead," John 20: 9. He was also one of those to whom our Savior appeared at the sea of Galilee; and he was afterwards, with the other ten apostles, a witness of his ascension into heaven, Mark 16: 19. Luke 24: 51. St. John continued to preach the gospel for some time at Jerusalem: he was imprisoned by the sanhedrim, first with Peter only, (Acts 4: 1, &c.) and afterwards with the other apostles, Acts 5: 17, 18. Some time after this second release, he and St. Peter were sent by the other apostles to the Samaritans, whom Philip the deacon had converted to the gospel, that through them they might receive the Holy Ghost, Acts 8: 14, 15. St. John informs us, in his Revelation, that he was banished to Patmos, an island in the Ægean sea, Rev. 1: 9. This banishment is mentioned by many of the early ecclesiastical writers; all of whom, except Epiphanius in the fourth century, agree in attributing it to Domitian. Sir Isaac Newton was of opinion that John was banished to Patmos in the time of Nero; but even the authority of this great man is not of sufficient weight against the unanimous voice of antiquity. Dr. Lardner has examined and answered his arguments with equal candor and learning.

It is not known at what time John went into Asia Minor. Lardner thought that it was about the year 66. It is certain that he lived in Asia Minor the latter part of his life, and principally at Ephesus. He planted churches at Smyrna, Pergamos, and many other places; and, by his activity and success in propagating the gospel, he is supposed to have incurred the displeasure of Domitian. Irenæus, speaking of the vision which he had in Patmos, says, "It is not very long ago that it was seen, being but a little before our time, at the latter end of Domitian's reign." An opinion has prevailed, that he was, by order of Domitian, thrown into a caldron of boiling oil at Rome, and came out unhurt; but this account rests almost entirely on the authority of Tertullian, and seems to deserve little credit. On the succession of Nerva to the empire, in the year 96, John returned to Ephesus, where he died at an advanced age, in the third year of Trajan's reign, A. D. 100.

The genuineness of St. John's gospel has always been unanimously admitted by the Christian church. It is universally agreed that St. John published his gospel in Asia; and that, when he wrote it, he had seen the other three gospels. It is, therefore, not only valuable in itself, but also a tacit confirmation of the other three; with none of which it disagrees in any material point. The time of its publication is placed by some rather before, and by others considerably after, the destruction of Jerusalem. If we accede to the opinion of those who contend for the year 97, this late date, exclusive of the authorities which support it, seems favored by the contents and design of the gospel itself. The immediate design of St. John in writing his gospel, as we are assured by Irenæus, Jerome, and others, was to refute the Cerinthians, Ebonites, and other heretics, whose tenets, though they branched out into a variety of subjects, all originated from erroneous opinions concerning the person of Christ, and the creation of the world. These points had been scarcely touched upon by the other evangelists; though they had faithfully recorded all the leading facts of our Savior's life, and his admirable precepts for the regulation of our conduct. St. John, therefore, undertook, perhaps at the request of the true believers in Asia, to write what Clement of Alexandria called a spiritual gospel; and, accordingly, we find in it more of doctrine, and less of historical narrative, than in any of the others. It is also to be remembered, that this book, which contains so much additional information relative to the doctrines of Christianity, and which may be considered as a standard of faith for all ages, was written by that apostle who is known to have enjoyed, in a greater degree than the rest, the affection and confidence of the divine Author of our religion; and to whom was given a special revelation concerning the state of the Christian church in all succeeding generations.

His object in writing, as stated by himself, (John 20: 31.) is threefold; to prove, 1. That Jesus is the promised Messiah; 2. That his person is truly divine; and, 3. That eternal life may be obtained by faith in his name. The first fourteen verses of the first chapter lay down the same propositions at large; and the selection of facts, testimony, and evidence throughout the whole book, is made to bear with admirable skill and irresistible force on their illustration and establishment.

3. We have three epistles by this apostle. Some critics have thought that all these epistles were written during St. John's exile in Patmos; the first, to the Ephesian church; the others to individuals; and that they were sent along with the gospel, which the apostle is supposed also to have written in Patmos. Thus Hug observes, in his "Introduction:"—If St. John sent his gospel, to the continent, an epistle to the community was requisite, commending and dedicating it to them. Other evangelists, who deposited their works in the place of their residence, personally superintended them, and delivered them personally; consequently they did not require a written document to accompany them. An epistle was therefore requisite, and, as we have abundantly proved the first of John's epistles to be inseparable from the gospel, its contents demonstrate it to be an accompanying writing, and a dedication of the gospel. It went consequently to Ephesus. We can particularly corroborate this by the following observation: John, in the Apocalypse, has individually distinguished each of the Christian communities, which lay the nearest within his circle and his superintendence, by criteria, taken from their faults or their virtues. The church at Ephesus he there describes by the following traits: It was thronged with men who arrogated to themselves the ministry and apostolical authority, and were impostors. But in particular he feelingly reproaches it because its "first love was cooled." The circumstance of impostors and false teachers happens in more churches. But decreasing love is an exclusive criterion and failing, which the apostle reprimands in no other community. According to his judgment, want of love was the characteristic fault of the Ephesians: but this epistle is from beginning to the end occupied with admonitions to love, with recommendations of its value, with corrections of those who are guilty of this fault, 1 John 2: 5, 9—11, 15. 3: 1, 11, 12, 14—18, 23. 4: 7—10, 12, 16—21. 5: 1—3. Must not we therefore declare, if we compare the opinion of the apostle respecting the Ephesians with this epistle, that, from its peculiar tenor, it is not so strikingly adapted to any community in the first instance as to this?

The second epistle is directed to a matron, who is not named, but only designated by the honorable mention, "the elect lady." The two chief positions, which are discussed in the first epistle, constitute the contents of this brief address. He again alludes to the words of our Savior, "a new commandment," &c., as in 1 John 2: 7, and recommends love, which is manifested by observance of the commandments. After this he warns her against false teachers, who deny that Jesus entered into the world as the Christ, or Messiah, and forbids an intercourse with them. At the end, he hopes soon to see her himself, and complains of the want of writing materials. The whole is a short syllabus of the first epistle, or it is the first in a renewed form. The words also are the same. It is still full of the former epistle; nor are they separated from each other as to time. The matron appears before his mind in the circumstances and dangers of the society, in instructing and admonishing which he had just been employed. If we may judge from local circumstances, she also lived at Ephesus. But as for the author, his residence was in none of the Ionian or Asiatic cities, where the want of writing materials is not conceivable: he was still therefore in the place of his exile. The other circumstances noticed in it, are probably the following: The sons of the elect lady had visited John, 2 John 4. The sister of this matron wishing to show to him an equal respect and sympathy in his fate, sent her sons likewise to visit the apostle. Whilst the latter were with the apostle, there was an opportunity of sending to the continent, (2 John 13.) namely, of despatching the two epistles and the gospel.

The third epistle is written to Caius. The author consoles himself with the hope, as in the former epistle, of soon coming himself, 3 John 14. He still experiences the same want of writing materials, 3 John 13. Consequently, he was still living in the same miserable place. Also, if we may judge from his hopes, the time was not very different. The residence of Caius is determined by the following criteria: The most general of them is the danger of being misled by false teachers, 3 John 3, 4. That which leads us nearer to the point, is the circumstance of John sometimes sending messages thither, and receiving accounts from thence; (3 John 5—8.) that he supposes his opinions to be so well known and acknowledged in this society, that he could appeal to them, as judges respecting them; (3 John 12.) and that, finally, he had many particular friends among them, 3 John 15. The whole of this is applicable to a considerable place, where the apostle had resided for a long time; and in the second epoch of his life, it is particularly applicable to Ephesus. He had lately written to the community, of which Caius was a member, "I wrote to the church," 3 John 9. If this is to be referred to the first epistle, (for we are not aware of any other to a community,) then certainly Ephesus is the place to which the third epistle was also directed, and was the place where Caius resided. From hence, the rest contains its own explanation. John had sent his first epistle thither; it was the accompanying writing to the gospel, and with it he also sent the gospel. Who was better qualified to promulgate the gospel among the believers than Caius, especially if it was to be published at Ephesus?

The above view is ingenious, and in its leading parts satisfactory; but the argument from the apostle's supposed want of "writing materials" is founded upon a very forced construction of the texts. There seems, however, no reason to doubt of the close connexion, in point of time, between the epistles and the gospel; and, that being remembered, the train of thought in the mind of the apostle sufficiently explains the peculiar character of the latter.—Watson; Horne's Introduction.

JOHN MARK. (See MARK.)

JOHN A LASCO, a Polish reformer, was born of a noble family in Poland, and received a learned and accomplished education. He also travelled to extend his knowledge; and his distinguished abilities, learning, and eloquence, gained him access to several crowned heads, and made him acceptable everywhere. It seems that while visiting Switzerland, divine grace first visited his heart, and not only visited, but fixed its abode within him. Zuinglius was the instrument of this important change, who also prevailed on him to study divinity. Leaving Zurich he returned to his own country, and was appointed provost of Gaesna, and bishop of Vesprim, in Hungary; but these popish appointments he declined, and left Poland again in 1540. He became pastor at Embden, in Friesland; in 1542. The following year he was engaged by Anne, countess dowager of Oldenburg, in East Friesland, to introduce and establish the reformed religion in that territory.

In 1549, he was invited by Cromer into England, to assist the Reformation, and here many privileges were conferred on him and his friends. He however was dissatisfied with the English ritual, and wrote against it. Notwithstanding this, Edward VI. highly honored him, and so arranged religious affairs, "that every stranger, who was not protected by John a Lasco, became amenable to the English governors." After Edward's death, a Lasco fled to Denmark, where he was refused shelter, because a Zuinglian in regard to the sacrament, and he therefore landed in Embden. In 1555, he went to Frankfort, and in 1560, returned to Poland, where he died, greatly esteemed. He left a number of writings behind him.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 492.

JOHNSON, (SAMUEL, LL. D.), the English moralist, and one of the greatest literary characters of the eighteenth centure, was the son of a bookseller; was born, in 1709, at Litchfield; and completed his education at Pembroke college, Oxford. After having been usher at Market Bosworth school, and having married Mrs. Porter, the widow of a mercer, and vainly endeavored to establish an academy at Edial, he settled in the metropolis, in 1737. In the following year he published his London, a satire, which established his poetical reputation, and was praised by Pope. For some years his subsistence was chiefly derived from supplying biographical and miscellaneous articles, including the debates in parliament, to the Gentleman's Magazine. His Life of Savage appeared in 1744. From 1747 to 1755, he was engaged on his English dictionary. In the interval, however, he gave to the world the Vanity of Human Wishes; the Rambler; and the tragedy of Irene. These labors, however, were more productive of fame than of profit. He was still obliged to toil to provide for the passing day, and thus necessity called into existence the Idler, Rasselas, and various productions of less consequence. At length, in 1762, a pension of three hundred pounds was granted to him by the crown; and, in 1765, a large increase was made to his comforts by his becoming intimate with the family of Mr. Thrale. In the course of the last twenty years of his life he produced his political pamphlets; an edition of Shakspeare; a Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland; and the Lives of the Poets. He died December 13, 1784.

The powerful and lofty mind of Johnson was capable of scorning the ridicule, and defying the opposition of wits and worldlings to religious seriousness. And yet the nature of his social life was unfavorable to a deep and simple consideration of Christian truth, and the cultivation of Christian sentiments; and the very ascendancy by which he intimidated and silenced impiety contributed to the injury. His writings contain more explicit and solemn references to the grand purpose of human life, to a future judgment, and to eternity, than almost any other of our elegant moralists has had the piety or the courage to make. Yet it was not till the closing scene of life, that his views became perfectly evangelical, and his Christian character received its full development.

It was truly an instructive scene. It was then that on a deliberate review of life he said, "I have written like a philosopher, but I have not lived like one;" adding with evident agony of spirit, the affecting exclamation, "Shall I, who have been a teacher of others, be myself a castaway?" His sun did not however set in this cloud. He at length obtained comfort where alone true comfort could be obtained, in the sacrifice and mediation of Jesus Christ. Hankins; Boswell; Wilkes's Chris. Essays.—Davenport.

JOHNSON, (SAMUEL, D. D.), president of King's college, New York, was a native of Connecticut, and was graduated at Yale college. He studied divinity, became an Episcopalian, and in 1722, went to England to obtain ordination. In 1754, he was chosen president of the college just established at New York, and filled the office with much credit until 1763, when he resigned and returned to Stratford to resume his pastoral duties. He died in 1772, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He was the author of some controversial works, and of a Hebrew and an English grammar.—Davenport.

JOHNSONIANs; the followers of Mr. John Johnson, many years Baptist minister at Liverpool, in the last century, of whose followers there are still several congregations in different parts of England. He denied that faith was a duty, or even action of the soul, and defined it "an active principle" conferred by grace; and denied also the duty of ministers to exhort the unconverted, or preach any moral duties whatever.

Though Mr. Johnson entertained high supralapsarian notions on the divine decrees, he admitted the universality of the death of Christ. On the doctrine of the trinity, his followers are said to have embraced the indwelling scheme, with Calvinistic views of justification and the atonement. Johnson's Faith of God's Elect; Brine's Mistakes of Mr. Johnson, 1745.—Williams.

JOIN. To be joined to the Lord is to be spiritually espoused to his Son, and solemnly devoted to his service, 1 Cor. 6: 17. Jer. 1: 5. To be joined to idols is to be firmly intent on worshipping them, Hos. 4: 17.—Brown.

JOINTS, are, (1.) The uniting of bones in an animal body, Dan. 5: 6. (2.) The uniting parts of a harness, 2 Chron. 18: 33. The joints and bands which unite Christ's mystical body are his Spirit, ordinances, and influences, and their mutual relation to him and to one another, and their graces of faith and love fixed on him, and in him loving one another, Col. 2: 19. Eph. 4: 16. The joints and marrow of men's hearts are their secret dispositions, which the searching word of God, with no small pain to them, shows and affects them with, Heb. 4: 12.—Brown.

JOKSHAN, second son of Abraham and Keturah, (Gen. 25: 2.) is thought to have peopled part of Arabia, and to be the person whom the Arabians call Cahtan, and acknowledge as the head of their nation. He dwelt in part of Arabia Felix, and part of Arabia Deserta. This Moses expressly mentions, Gen. 25: 6. Jokshan's sons were Sheba and Dedan, who dwelt in the same country, ver. 3. (See DIVISION OF THE EARTH.)—Calmet.

JOKTAN; the eldest son of Eber, who had for his portion all the land which lies "from Mesha as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east," or Kedem, Gen. 10: 25. Mesha, Calmet takes to be the place where Masias was situated, in Mesopotamia, and Sephar the country of the Sepharvaim, or Sepharrenians, or Sapirores, or Serapares; for these all denote the same, that is, a people, which, according to Herodotus, were placed between the Colchians and the Medes. Now this was in the provinces which Moses commonly describes by the name of Kedem, or the East. We find traces in this country of the names of Joktan's sons; which is a further confirmation of this opinion. These sons were Almodah, Saleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, Hadoran, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimeel, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab, Gen. 10: 26, &c.—Calmet.

JOKTHEEL, (obedience to the Lord;) a place previously called Selah, which Amaziab, king of Judah, took from the Edomites, and which is supposed to have been the city of Petra, the celebrated capital of the Nabathæi, in Arabia Petræa, by the Syrians called Rekem, 2 Kings 14: 7.

There are two places, however, which dispute this honor; Kerek, a town two days' journey south of Syault, the see of a Greek bishop, who resides at Jerusalem; and Wady-Mousa, a city which is situated in a deep valley at the foot of mount Hor, and where Burckhardt and more recent travellers describe the remains of a magnificent and extensive city. The latter is no doubt the Petra described by Strabo and Pliny.—Calmet.

JONADAB, son of Rechab, and head of the Rechabites, lived in the time of Jehu, king of Israel. He is thought to have added to the ancient austerity of the Rechabites, that of abstinence from wine; and to have introduced the non-cultivation of their lands, 2 Kings 10: 15.—Calmet.

JONAH, son of Amittai, the fifth of the minor prophets, was born at Gath-hepher, in Galilee. He is generally considered as the most ancient of the prophets, and is supposed to have lived B. C. 840. The book of Jonah is chiefly narrative.

Upon the repentance of the Ninevites under his preaching, God deferred the execution of his judgment till the increase of their iniquities made them ripe for destruction, about a hundred and fifty years afterwards. The last chapter gives an account of the murmuring of Jonah at this instance of divine mercy, and of the gentle and condescending manner in which it pleased God to reprove the prophet for his unjust complaint.

The style of Jonah is simple and perspicuous; and his prayer, in the second chapter, is strongly descriptive of the feelings of a pious mind under a severe trial of faith. Our Savior mentions Jonah in the gospel, Matt. 12: 41. Luke 11: 32. (See NINEVER, and GODD.)—Watson.

JONAS, (JOSÉPH.) This famous German divine was born at Northausen, in Thuringia, June 5, 1493, where his father was chief magistrate. He first studied law, but afterwards applied himself to theology, when the light of the gospel dawned upon him. He united in one person the characters of a most able divine and learned civilian; and as the state of religion at that time was unavoidably connected with human politics, he became a very necessary man to the Protestants in being a skilful politician. He assisted Luther and Melancthon in the assembly at Marburg, in 1529, and was afterwards with Melancthon at the famous diet of Augsburg, in which he was a principal negotiator.

In 1521, he was made pastor, principal, and professor at Wittenberg. He aided the Reformation greatly in Misnia, Thuringia, and also Saxony. After the death of Luther, being placed over the church in Eisfield, he there ended his days in much peace and comfort, October 9, 1555, in his sixty-third year. His loss was widely and deeply regretted.

Jonas was one of the moderate reformers. His motives in receding as little as possible from the church of Rome might be good, but the result of this course in the Lutheran church has not demonstrated its wisdom. He wrote in defence of the marriage of priests; upon the study of divinity; Notes on the Acts; with some other treatises; and translated several of Luther's works into Latin.—Middleton, vol. i. p. 373.

JONATHAN; the son of Saul, a prince of an excellent disposition, and in all varieties of fortune a sincere and steady friend to David. Jonathan gave signal proofs of courage and conduct upon all occasions that offered, during the wars between his father and the Philistines. The death of Jonathan was lamented by David, in one of the noblest and most pathetic odes ever uttered by genius consecrated by pious friendship. See I Sam. 13: 16, &c. 14: 1, 2, &c.—Watson.

JONES, (JEREMIAH,) a learned English Dissenting minister, was born, as is supposed, of parents in opulent circumstances, in the north of England, in 1693. He was educated by the Rev. Samuel Jones, of Tewkesbury, who was also the tutor of Chandler, Butler, Secker, and many other distinguished divines. After finishing his education he became minister of a congregation of Protestant Dissenters near Naisworth, in Gloucestershire, where he also kept an academy. He died in 1724, at the early age of thirty-one. His works are, a "Vindication of the former Part of the Gospel by Matthew, from Mr. Whiston's Charge of Dislocation, &c." Also a "New and full Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament," in three volumes, octavo. These works, which are highly and deservedly esteemed by the learned, have been lately republished by the conductors of the Clarendon press, of Oxford. Gentlemen's Magazine, vol. xxxii.; Monthly Magazine, April, 1803.—*Jones's Chris. JONES, (GRIFFITH,) called the Welsh Apostle, was born at Kildreid, in the county of Carmarthen, in 1684, of a religious and reputable family. A thirst for learning, joined with a quickness of genius, engaged him in an early and successful application to study. From his youth he was inclined to religious seriousness, which ripening into unfeigned piety, he devoted himself to the weighty responsibilities of the Christian ministry, and was ordained by bishop Bull, September 19, 1708. He was made rector of Llandowor by his friend Sir John Philips, who was capable of appreciating the worth of his learning and Christian character.

Here he soon developed all the best qualities of a man of God and a most eloquent and evangelical preacher. Christ was all to him; and it was his greatest delight to publish and exalt the unsearchable riches of his Redeemer's righteousness. A sacred pathos distinguished his address. He spoke naturally, for he spoke feelingly. Every thing he uttered bore that stamp of sincerity, which art may mimic, but cannot reach. Great was the power of the Divine Spirit that attended his preaching, both at home and abroad. Nor was he less blessed in his pastoral conversations, and various plans of doing good. By means of his circulating Welsh free-schools more than a hundred and fifty thousand poor people were taught to read, and thirty thousand copies of the Welsh Bible circulated among them, besides other useful religious books.

His humility gave lustre to all these labors of love.—On his dying bed, he said, "I must bear witness to the goodness of God! Oh! how wonderful is the love of God to me! Blessed be God, his comforts fill my soul!" He died April, 1761, aged seventy-seven. At his funeral, multitudes of poor and disconsolate people testified their grief in the most affecting manner for the loss of so good a man, in whom were united the judicious divine, the eminent preacher, the loving pastor, and the faithful friend, who had labored among them forty-five years. It may be truly said of him, that few lives were more heavenly and useful, and few deaths more triumphant. He left behind him twelve or thirteen volumes, chiefly written for the benefit of the pious poor, which he had printed and distributed by thousands.—Middleton, vol. iv. p. 333.

JONES, (THOMAS, M. A.,) chaplain of St. Saviour's, Southwark, was born in 1729, and educated at Queen's college, Cambridge. This excellent man was called to stand forth in support of the truths of the gospel, at a period, when those truths seemed to have little impression among the members of the established church to which he belonged. An evangelic minister was hardly to be found in its pale. It might truly be said of them,

The pulpit then sounded with morality, deduced from the principles of nature, and the fitness of things, with no relation to Christ or the Holy Spirit; and in consequence the streets resounded with heathen immorality. Flowery language was heard in the church and loose language out of it. Only one pulpit of the establishment, in or about the great metropolis, it is said, and that only on a Sunday or Thursday afternoon during term-time, was accessible for the pure doctrines of the gospel.

Mr. Jones was endowed with great gifts and great grace; and he needed both for the work to which Providence called him. His sweetness of natural temper, great as it was, would never have supported him under the numberless insults he met with, had it not been strengthened, as well as adorned, by a sublimer influence. He lived by faith in the Son of God. Various were the methods prompted by his love and zeal, besides the stated duties of his office, to win souls to the Savior; and when opposed in one direction, his warm heart was sure to find out another. His health at length gave way under these manifold labors, at the early age of thirty-three; but his death-bed was triumphant. Once, after praying, "Lord, secure a soul thou hast died to save," he added joyfully, "He will, he will: I have part here; I shall have all soon!"—Middleton, vol. iv. p. 380.

JONES, (WILLIAM,) a divine, who was a strenuous champion of the Hutchinsonian philosophy, was born, in 1726, at Lovick, in Northamptonshire; was educated at the Charter house, and at University college, Oxford; and died in 1800, perpetual curate of Nayland, and rector of Paston and Hollingbourne. His theological and philosophical works form twelve octavo volumes. Among them are, The Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity; Physiological Disquisitions; The Scholar Armed; Memoirs of Bishop Horne; and Lectures on the Figurative Language of the Scriptures.—Davenport.

JONES, (SIR WILLIAM,) an eminent poet, scholar, and lawyer, the son of an excellent mathematician, was born, in 1746, in London. Mr. Jones, his father, survived the birth of his son William but three years: his family was respectable, and his character was excellent. The care of the education of William now devolved upon his mother, who, in many respects, was eminently qualified for the task: she had, by nature, a strong understanding, which was improved by conversation and instruction. In the plan adopted by Mrs. Jones for the instruction of her son, she proposed to reject the severity of discipline, and to lead his mind insensibly to knowledge and exertion, by exciting his curiosity, and directing it to useful objects. William greatly distinguished himself, at Harrow, and at University college, Oxford; and, in 1765, became tutor to lord Althorpe, now earl of Spencer, with whom he travelled on the continent. In 1770, he was admitted into the Inner Temple; in 1776 he was made a commissioner of bankrupt; in 1783 he was knighted, and appointed judge of the supreme court of judicature in Bengal. One of his early acts in India was the establishment, at Calcutta, of an institution on the plan of the Royal society, of which he was chosen the first president. Another was, to take vigorous measures for procuring a digest of the Hindoo and Mohammedan laws. After a life of great usefulness, he died, at Calcutta, in 1794.

His poems, translations, philological essays, and other works, form twelve volumes. In his command of languages he had few rivals; he being more or less acquainted with "no fewer than twenty-eight. His poems are always elegant, often animated, and their versification is mellifluous. His learning was extensive; his legal knowledge was profound; and he was an enlightened and zealous champion of constitutional principles.

Above all, Sir William Jones was a Christian. To devotional exercises he was habitually attentive. He knew the duty of resignation to the will of his Maker, and of dependence on the merits of a Redeemer; and these sentiments were expressed in a short prayer, which he composed during an indisposition, in September, 1784, and which is here inserted, to show the habit of his mind.

"O thou Bestower of all good! if it please thee to continue my easy tasks in this life, grant me strength to perform them as a faithful servant; but if thy wisdom hath willed to end them by this thy visitation, admit me, not weighing my unworthiness, but through thy mercy declared in Christ, into thy heavenly mansions, that I may continually advance in happiness, by advancing in true knowledge and awful love of thee. Thy will be done!"

Learning, that wantons in irreligion, may, like the Sirius of Homer, flash its strong light upon us; but though brilliant, it is hateful, and while it dazzles, makes us tremble for our safety. The belief of Sir William Jones in divine revelation is openly and distinctly declared in his works; but the above unostentatious effusion of sequestered adoration, whilst it proves the sincerity of his conviction, gives an additional weight to his avowed opinions.

"I have," says he, "carefully and regularly perused the Holy Scriptures, and am of opinion, that the volume, independently of its divine origin, contains more sublimity, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains of eloquence, than can be collected from all other books, in whatever language they may have been written." Noble testimony, from a competent judge!

This sketch of the life and character of Sir William Jones would be imperfect did we not say, that few such luminaries have ever enlightened the world; and that, distinguished as he was for learning, wisdom, taste, and imagination, he was yet more distinguished for his sincerity. JOPPA; called also Japho in the Old Testament, which is still preserved in its modern name of Jaffa or Yafah; a sea-port of Palestine, situated on an eminence in a sandy soil, about forty-five miles north-west of Jerusalem. Joppa was anciently the port to Jerusalem. Its traditional history stretches far back into the twilight of time. Pliny assigns it a date anterior to the deluge! Here all the materials sent from Tyre for the building of Solomon's temple were brought and landed: it was, indeed, the only port in Judea, though rocky and dangerous. It possesses still, in times of peace, a considerable commerce with the places in its vicinity; and is well inhabited, chiefly by Arabs. This was the place of landing of the western pilgrims; and here the promised pardons commenced during the crusades.

The present town of Jaffa is seated on a promontory jutting out into the sea, rising to the height of about one hundred and fifty feet above its level, and offering on all sides picturesque and varied prospects. Towards the west is extended the open sea; towards the south spread fertile plains, reaching as far as Gaza; towards the north, as far as Carmel, the flowery meads of Sharon present themselves; and to the east, the hills of Ephraim and Judah raise their towering heads. The town is walled round on the south and east, towards the land, and partially so on the north and west, towards the sea.—Josephus, Ant. iii. c. 9. s. 2; Calmet; Watson.

JORDAN; the largest and most celebrated stream in Palestine. It is much larger, according to Dr. Shaw, than all the brooks and streams of the Holy Land united together; and, excepting the Nile, is by far the most considerable river either of the coast of Syria or of Barbary. He computed it to be about thirty yards broad, and found it nine feet deep at the brink.

This river, which divides the country into two unequal parts, has been commonly said to issue from two fountains, or to be formed by the junction of two rivulets, the Jor and the Dan; but the assertion seems to be destitute of any solid foundation. Leaving the cave of Panion, it crosses the bogs and fens of the lake Semichonitis; and after a course of fifteen miles, passes under the city of Julias, the ancient Bethsaida; then expands into a beautiful sheet of water, named the lake of Gennesareth; and, after flowing a long way through the desert, empties itself into the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead sea. As the cave Panion lies at the foot of mount Lebanon, in the northern extremity of Canaan, and the lake Asphaltites extends to the southern extremity, the river Jordan pursues its course through the whole extent of the country from north to south. It is evident, also, from the history of Josephus, that a wilderness or desert of considerable extent stretched along the river Jordan in the times of the New Testament; which was undoubtedly the wilderness mentioned by the evangelists, where John the Baptist came preaching and baptizing. The author of "Letters from Palestine" states, that the stream when it enters the lake Asphaltites is deep and rapid, rolling a considerable volume of waters; the width appears from two to three hundred feet, and the current is so violent, that a Greek servant belonging to the author, who attempted to cross it, though strong, active, and an excellent swimmer, found the undertaking impracticable.
